fidelity then unto you; and indeed from this time he durst never ask me any more questions. Some few days after, he received a Letter from Andramites, which let him know that Mexaris had a little clashed with the Prince of Clasomena, and that he was gone unto one of his houses, some two days journey from Sardis: so that Perinthus did not well know whether he should be sad or glad at it: for when he considered Mexaris as one that was in hopes to enjoy Panthea, he was very glad he was fain foul with the Prince of Clasomena; but when he considered him as an obstacle unto the hopes of Abradates, he was sorry that Mexaris was not in that Prince's favour. Yet notwithstanding all this, his hopes that Croessus would never consent that Panthea should marry either Mexaris or Abradates, did procure him some consolation: yet it may well be said that he never enjoyed any pleasing hours: not only because he had many real miseries upon him, but because he sucked bitter Page 62 poison out of every thing; and when the Princess was recovered he grieved in lieu of rejoicing at it, foreseeing that the return of her health would be her return to Sorrow. Phelrenice (said he one day unto me when the Princess had fresher Roses in her cheeks than ere she had since her sickness paled them) am not I a most miserable man to see that the Princess is a more polished beauty by her sickness? had it impaired her, Abradates perhaps would have lessened his Love to her, and that if she had perceived it she would have had less good will to him: but alas, I am too unfortunate to see that, for she will return to Sardis more gloriously fair than when she came from it. You may easily imagine by this Madam, how much that man was tormented, who grieved at the beauty and welfare of the person he loved. Within a few days after we departed, and Perinthus appeared so melancholy, that if I had not known the secret of his heart, I should have thought he had left the object of all his affections behind him: Doralisa also began to chide him extremely the first day of our Journey, and truly that helped us to pass on with much more pleasure: for as oft as Perinthus, who was on horseback, came near the Princess Coach, from which he was never far off, she told him of a thousand pleasant passages, unto which he would answer with such a fretting chafe as made the best sport in the world. The first days Journey being thus past, we continued the next; but alas, it was not so pleasant: For he pleased to know Madam, that being come into a thick dark Forrest, in a place where was a great Pond, which we left upon the right hand, and which being shadowed with the thick Wood, was both a most pleasing and a most terrible object: Be pleased to know, I say, that being come unto this place, we saw upon our left hand come from divers places of the Forrest forty or fifty men on horseback with swords in their hands; one of which I presently knew to be the Prince Mexaris; who commanded the Coachman of the Princess Coach to stay; which accordingly he did, because he thought he could do no other: for Madam, you must know, the Princess in this voyage had but one Coach, full of women, besides her own; fifteen horsemen, and some footmen, but very few: 'Tis true, Perinthus might well be counted for more than one man, considering the prodigious acts he did that day: he no sooner saw Mexaris come with a sword in his hand, and in the head of all his men (who in coming out of the Wood rallied about him) but he put himself in a posture of defence, and calling all the Princess men together, he stood between the Coach and the Prince Mexaris, who had no sooner commanded the Coach to stay, but Perinthus advanced towards him with his Sword lifted up; Mexaris retreated a pace or two; and endeavoring to carry away the Princess without bloodshed, or perhaps without exposing himself: Perinthus (said he unto him) do not force me to ruin you, nor make any vain resistance against a man who is in a condition to force you unto obedience. No, no, Sir, said Perinthus, I have but a life to manage, and you shall not take away the Princess as long as Perinthus lives. Whilest Mexaris was keeping Perinthus in talk, four of his men went to the Coach, which Perinthus seeing, without any more ado he fell upon Mexaris, crying out he should not find it an easie matter to carry Panthea away as long as he lived: and indeed he assaulted him with such fury, as Mexaris stood in need of all his men to relieve him, as afterward we understood by one of the Princess men. As for us, Madam, we were in such a fright, that we knew not what we savv: For my part, I only savv a great confusion, and heard a hideous noise. The most advantageous thing for us was, that those men who Mexaris commanded to seize upon the Princess whilest the rest fought, seeing their Master engaged in a Fight, of which they knew not the event notwithstanding the inequality of number, they let us alone, and resolved to stay till they savv the Victory more certain, contenting themselves with keeping the Coaches from stirring away: but the longer they stayed, the weaker and fewer their Party grew: for Perinthus fought with such magnanimous courage, that I have heard certainly reported, he killed six of Mexaris his men with his own hands, being wounded himself in several places: Those who seconded him did play their parts very well; since of fifteen men which he had, three were killed, and four more out of fight, he had no other hope left but to dye in defending the Princess: so that fighting in desperation, he did such things as I know not how to relate unto you. As the poor Perinthus was thus engaged, he savv some Cavaliers galloping to the place where he fought, and since he questioned not but that they belonged unto Mexaris, he gave himself for lost: yet desiring to sell his life at as dear a rate as he could, and to kill Mexaris before he was killed himself, he advanced towards him with such a fury in spite of all his men which surrounded him, and engaged himself so amongst these Ravishers, that if Abradates, in the head of those Cavaliers which Perinthus took to belong Page 63 unto Mexaris had not come in to his relief, the poor Perinthus had died there. But this Prince was no sooner come up with twenty horse, then the state of things did put on a new face; foreseeing Perinthus in danger, he made straight to him, and clearly disingaged him. To present unto you Madam the astonishment of Mexaris, of Perinthus, of us, and every one, to see Abradates in that place, is more then language can reach unto, Mexaris then thought the Gods resolved his ruine, Panthea hoped they would preserve her, and Perinthus told me since, that when he saw Abradates save his life, he was so extremely full of sorrow, that he had a mind to fight against him as well as against Mexaris, who since the arrival of the Prince of Susiana, thought it discretion to retreat, since he was wounded, and neither in a condition to carry away his Princess, nor fight with his Rival, yet he was hotly pursued: But since the principal design of Abradates and Perinthus was only to preserve the Princess, they durst not venture to scatter themselves in the thick of the Forrest: So that returning again towards her, she called them her Deliverers, and rendered them a million of thanks for the service which they had done her. Then, as she observed, that Abradates by his arrival had saved the life of Perinthus, she rendered him no less thanks for that, then for keeping her out of the power of Mexaris: And since she did apprehend with abundance of tenderness all that Perinthus had done for her, she did accept it with great acknowledgments. On the other side, Perinthus looking upon Abradates, as upon him that had reaped the fruit of all his pains, he almost repented of what he had done, and perhaps rather wished Mexaris had carried away the Princess, then that Abradates should share with him in the glory of defending her, or that for his particular he should owe his life unto him. Since that place was not very pleasant for us to stay in, where nothing was to be seen but dead and dying men: After all these complements were tumultuously addressed, after the Princess had asked Abradates what accident brought him so happily thither, and after he had told her that it was, because he was informed of Mexaris his design, by one of his Domestiques, therefore he immediately mounted horse to oppose him, then the Coach went on. Abradates leaving some of his men to take care of those that were not yet dead, as well enemies as friends; also to relieve the one, and secure the other: But as they were going on, the Princess perceived that Perinthus was wounded in his left hand, and that he lost blood enough to weaken him, and therefore she caused her Coach to stay, and causing him to come in, I gave him a Scarf to bind up his hand. Thus the first Liberator of Panthea was in the Coach, and the Liberator of Perinthus and Panthea both rid by them, and could not chuse but render thanks unto this secret Lover for so well defending the Princess: But alas, what hollow-hearted answers did the poor Perinthus return unto all the civilities of Abradates: The only consolation he had was sometimes to look upon me, and to let me see the sorrows of his heart in his eyes: At the first habitable place we came at, the Princess stayed to dress the hand of Perinthus, the blood being not yet quite stanch'd; after which we went on. I had forgot to tell you Madam, how after the combat was ended, we found one of Mexaris his men dismounted, of whom we seized, and whom Abradates caused to be brought unto Sardis, that Croessus might be better inform'd of all passages. I will not tell you Madam, how extremely that Prince was incensed against Mexaris, when he heard of his intentions to take away Panthea, nor how the Prince of Clasomena was surprized, grieved, and angry: But give me leave to tell you that which indeed is admirable, for Perinthus who did what he could to kill Mexaris, did now use all endeavours possible by the means of Andramites, to appease Croessus, upon no other motive, but only to make him an obstacle unto Abradates. Thus the miserable Perinthus, (as generous as he was) was forced by the violence of his passion to further him whose life he would have taken away, and to hinder him unto whom he was a debtor for his own, yet was he not able to effect the one nor the other; for besides that, Croessus was highly incensed against Mexaris for offering not only to marry Panthea contrary to his commands, but to steal her away: There happened another opposition, for the Princess fearing lest Mexaris should return to Sardis, and make his peace, she desired Doralisa to treat Andramites a little better, and to desire him that he would keep the King in his angry mind against Mexaris, which accordingly she did; and Andramites the next morning went unto Perinthus, and told him that he could not satisfy his desires, because Doralisa desired of him the quite contrary; therefore he told him, that where the case of a Mistress and a friend comes in competition, he should not think himself unjust, in Page 64 giving the precedency unto Doralisa before him: You may imagine Madam, how sad Perinthus was at this news; for he knew very well Doralisa would never have made this desire, but at the instance of the Princess: Seeing then he could not oblige his friend unto his desires, yet he solicited him to keep Croessus still unto his design of not consenting that Abradates should marry Panthea; and indeed Andramites did promise him to satisfy that desire, provided Doralisa did not move him to oppose that also. This transaction of Perinthus did not proceed from any willingness to prejudice a Prince unto whom he was so much obliged, but the consideration that he was his hindrance from possessing the Princess, was above all other considerations whatsoever: He never acquainted me with this negotiation, but only with the miseries which he endured. In the mean while, that dangerous poison which was in his soul, did so invenom his wound that it would not heal, and his hand was as sore as his heart; he grew weak, pale, and languishing, being in a gentle Fever, which never intermitted one moment: But whilst he endured all these secret maladies, Abradates was much happier then he used to be; for the Prince of Clasomena knowing what he had done for the Princess his Daughter, did treat him incomparably better then ordinary, and could not in any civility forbid him the visiting Panthea, with whom his hours were much more sweet since Mexaris was not present. It seemed that Prince, (who was retired unto a Town, the Governour whereof was his creature) was dangerously wounded, so that there being no fears of his return, Abradates enjoyed as many pleasures as Perinthus did sorrows; yet had he this bitter ingredient amongst his sweets, that Croessus was no better disposed then usual to consent unto his Marriage with Panthea, so that he had some Cloudy daies as well as many Sun-shine. After he had lived thus some certain time, he understood that Croessus having conferred with the Prince of Clasomena, at last gave him leave to return, and to carry the Princess his Daughter with him, to the end that absence might extinguish the passion in Abradates his soul: Perinthus you may imagine did not oppose this design, but on the contrary, did so zealously prompt the Prince his Master unto it, and also set Andramites upon Croessus to hasten it, that the voyage was talked on as a thing certainly resolved upon: So that when Abradates thought himself nearest his happiness, he feared to be furthest off it. The Princess was extremely troubled at this resolution, insomuch as she desired Doralisa to be extremely urgent with Andramites to prevent this journey: For my particular, without either telling the Princess or Doralisa, I spoke unto Perinthus, and told him, that I found no disposition in him to satisfy my desires: Then he told me at first, how knowing that both Croessus and the Prince of Clasomena, for some reasons of State, would never suffer Panthea to marry Abradates; and therefore he thought it serviceable to the Princess to negotiate that she might be further off him, lest any longer conversation with this Prince should too much engage her heart. Moreover, the Prince his Master, desired not to let slip this favourable opportunity to return into his own Dominions, and get out of that place where he had not liberty to retire himself without this reason: In short, he told me so many things, and so handsomely, that any other besides my self would have believed that Love had no part in all his actions: But in the conclusion he ingenuously confessed, that to separate Abradates and Panthea was his main design, which prompted him unto all he did; but he told me all this in such violent raptures of Love, that as angry as I was against him, I could not quarrel with him, as I thought I should. In the mean time, Doralisa having solicited Andramites, and employed all the power she had over him, to cause this voyage to be broken off, telling him it was merely in consideration of her own interest, because she was to lose the Princess: Andramites told her, he could not do her the service he desired, for the voyage was so absolutely resolved upon, that it was impossible to prevent it. Now you may imagine Abradates all sorrows, and Panthea was not without her share, for she perceived that the designs of those that transacted her separation from Abradates was, that they should never Marry, and therefore not to see each other; yet since she had a high and constant soul, she did so hide her own sorrows, that thereby she augmented the sorrows of Abradates; he conceived that his Love deserved at least a melancholy look from her, if perhaps not tears from her eyes: He sighed and sorrowed so excessively at her insensibility, that the Princess to pacifie him, was pleased to meet him at Doralisa's house, lest he should run into some violent resolution; for since the Princess had but two daies to stay in Sardis, time was very precious with them, he came then to Dornlisa's house, and saw her so sad all that day, as he had good reason to be satisfied at the tenderness of her affection, and more than himself had Page 65 at the crossness of his fortune: This Meeting was extremely sad, and the parting was insupportable, not only because they were to be absent, but because their absence had no limits; and since the Princess would never be endued to do any thing contrary to her duty, she told Abradates, who did extremely importune her, that she would not suffer him to come and see her in a disguise. At last Madam, after all was said that could be, between two persons who were resolved to love for ever, and who feared never to meet again, they parted: For though Abradates was to make a ceremonious Visit unto the Princess to bid her adieu, he valued that but as an empty superstition, since he knew he could not then talk in private with her; so that when she left him at Doralisa's house, he looked upon her like a Statue, and as if he would have sunk with sorrow: As soon as she was gone, some of the servants of Abradates came to tell him, that Croessus sent all about to enquire for him: but since the mind of Abradates was much incensed against that Prince, he bade them tell those that looked for him, that they could not find him; and so he stayed above two hours with Doralisa, talking of the Princess, and the miserable condition he was in: after which, he went to Croessus, who carrying him into his Closet with extraordinary civility, told him, that his fortunes now looked with another face, and that he should receive a Letter from the Queen of Susiana, which would tell him that the Prince his Brother, and the King his Father were both dead, and that he was to be King: This News did extremely surprize Abradates, and moved him unto much sorrow; for though these two dead Princes had in their lives been both extremely unjust and rigorous in exiling him, yet natural affection did produce such effects in him as useth to be in generous persons; so that he received the news of his being King of Susiana with a mixture of some sorrows; but yet such sorrows as were not above his Reason. Croessus told him, that the man who brought this news had a Letter for him from the Queen his Mother; who sent this message in particular, that she conceived it expedient for him to stay yet in Sardis, until four Grantees of his Kingdom, who would set forth within three days, were come to desire him in the Name of all his People, That he would please to come and take upon him that Scepter which the King his Father had left him, who the last hour of his life did express his Repentance for exiling him, and did declare him his legitimate Successor; since he lived three days after his eldest Son, who only caused that bad understanding between them. After Abradates knew all these things, he retired to his Lodging with a mind full of various apprehensions, so that at first he could not himself well tell what he thought. Since it was now very late, very few did know this news that night: but the next morning there was not one which did not know that Abradates was King of Susiana, and rejoiced at it: Perinthus himself was glad, because he flattered himself with an imagination that Abradates would be forced to depart that very day, and that perhaps ambition and absence might root out of his heart all thoughts of Love unto the Princess: so that I do verily think she apprehended fewer joys at the good fortune of Abradates, then Perinthus did; because she feared lest the change of that Princess condition should work any mutable effects upon his heart. In the mean while, though all the World rejoiced that he was King; yet was he forced to a ceremonious Mourning, and to go and grieve at the very same thing which they in his presence rejoiced at: The Prince of Clasomena went to him, and so did Perinthus also, hoping always that as for Abradates, in mounting his Throne, every step unto it was a step further from Panthea: The Princess for her part sent to visit him, and to testify unto him the share of joys she took in the happiness which had befallen him, and that she her self with the Princess of Lidia would come and congratulate with him. But since this Complement was only such a one as Ceremony and Civility might exact from her, Abradates was not fully satisfied with it; but had rather she had sent unto him by some more trusty Messenger, who should have told him something in private from her. In the mean time, since the Princess was to depart within two days, his Soul seemed to be in a very Hell: for besides, that it was not handsom for him to go so soon either to her Lodging or Doralisa's, he thought it less handsome to talk of any Marriage before the Deputies from Susiana had addressed themselves, and so soon after the death of two Princes who were so near him; this he conceived to be out of all reason. In the mean time, his Love to Panthea was so predominate, that he consulted not a minute with himself what to do, for he was fully resolved, as soon as he was King, to make her Queen; and not to accept of the Crown but to put in upon her head: On the other side, Perinthus did press the Prince of Clasomena with all his arguments to be gone from Sardis; but as good fortune for this Prince Page 66 was, he fell so sick that the Journey was deferred: This was no small joy unto Abradates, who notwithstanding there was no such great haste required in his Transactions. But Madam, as it is the custom of the World to judge too rashly upon the thoughts of others, so, for two days after this news was brought unto Abradates, one would have said that he never had any thoughts of Panthea; and the conceit of it did so pleasingly flatter up Perinthus, that he resented real joys. Whilst these hopes were smoothing his fancy, the Deputies from Susa arrived; who after they had presented unto Abradates the fidelity of all his Subjects, rendered thanks unto Croessus from their Queen for the protection which he had given him during his unjust Exile, and assured him that she would always resent it as a great obligation upon her. After this Abradates, who had no mind to send either unto Panthea, or Doralisa, or me, until he had brought things to such a pass as he desired, went to Croessus in the morning, to tell him, that thinking he would never have been so averse to the Marriage of Panthea and himself, but because he would have no stranger Prince established within his Dominions, therefore he came to declare unto him, that he was ready to renounce all the Rights and Interests this Princess had or ever should have unto the Principality of Clasomena (if she would consent unto it as well as himself,) provided he would consent unto his Marriage with her. Croessus hearing a Proposition so advantageous for himself, was much pleased with it, and promised to motion it unto the Prince of Clasomena: After which, Abradates returning most hearty thanks, and conjured him to keep his word, he went the same day unto the Prince of Clasomena to motion the Marriage between the Princess his daughter and the King of Susiana: and although he had not yet the consent of the Queen his Mother, yet he believed she would approve of any motion which should have the Authority of Croessus to countenance it, who would never make the motion further than the Queen his Mother should give her consent, of which Abradates did make no question: The Deputies of Susa also, unto whom Abradates had imparted his design, did so confidently assure him he would find no opposition from the Queen his Mother, that he did not fear he should incense her by it; and so much the less, because these Deputies told him, that all his Subjects (considering there was not a Princess in all his own Kingdom, nor in any of his neighbor Dominions, whom he could marry) would be wondrous well satisfied, if he brought them a Queen every way so illustrious as the Princess of Clasomena. Croessus then propounded this Match unto the Prince of Clasomena, and it seemed so advantageous unto him, that without any further consultation he accepted of it: so that Croessus, to lose no time, sent for Abradates, to the end they might dispatch away in all Post haste unto the Queen of Susiana. Since this could not be so closely carried but some Reports of it would fly about, a servant unto the Princess came to tell me with great earnestness, that all was concluded upon, the Match was made up, and the Princess was immediately to be Queen of Susiana. Though I indeed hoped such a thing might be so, yet I confess I was much surprized at the suddenness of it: so that in the first rapture of my Joy, after I had made the servant tell me how he came to know it, I writ presently a Letter unto Doralisa (who was with Perinthus at her own Lodging) to acquaint her with it, and as I remember these were the words:

PHERENICE unto DORALISA.

IF it be true (as I have often heard you say) that he who gives much, loves much, it must necessarily be concluded, that the King of Susiana loves the Princess more than ever any loved; since in giving her a Crown which is descended to him, he has given her more than ever any did: If you have a reasonable Soul, come and help the Prince to put it upon her head, and participate in the Joys of

PHERENICE.

Doralisa had no sooner read this Letter, but never thinking of the conceit she had, that Perinthus was in love with Panthea, she gave it him to read: See Perinthus, said she, what Pherenice has sent me, and go along with me immediately, for I should be vexed to the Soul, if any should have the start of me in rejoicing with the Princess. Perinthus then read the Letter; but he read with so great a perplexity of Soul, and turbulency in his looks, that Doralisa remembering her former conceits, How do you Perinthus? (said she unto him,) what troubles you so much? Is it possible that joy should work the same effects in you that sorrow and anger use to produce? For truly I see at one time in you Page 67 both sadness, anger and despair, but I do not see the cause, unless my suspicions prove true, and that there be as much love in your heart, as there appears melancholy in your eyes. Ah Doralisa (cried he out) why was I not so happy as to dye in fighting with Mexaris, rather than live to see my self in such a miserable condition? I would I could conceal my follies as hitherto I have from you; but since I cannot chuse but testify my passion by my grieving at the good fortune of the Princess Panthea, I had rather confess my crime, and have recourse unto your discretion, then to deny a truth unto you which you know but too well. I do confess therefore Doralisa, that I do love the Princess, and have loved her with as much zeal, as I now do, ever since I was capable of loving; but with such a violent zeal, as I wonder I have not dyed a thousand times: yet notwithstanding there was ever so much purity in my Love, that I never had the least hope, no nor so much as wished for any thing, but that she should never marry Abradates. Yet this Abradates who is going to marry her, is he who makes her a Queen, and sends me to my grave, and happy were I if I were in it before that fatal day of solemnization. Perinthus pronounced all these words with so much vehemency, and in such a concerning manner, that the heart of Doralisa who did infinitely esteem him was much moved unto pity, and she began to comfort him: I ever imagined, said she unto him, that you were in love with the Princess, but I do confess I never thought your passion so violent. Oh Heavens, said he, could you ever think that one can love the Princess with any mediocrity? and how was it possible you should know (for know it you did) the Reason why I denied obedience unto the Princess Commands, in applying my self unto your service, and not believe my Love of her most violent? Did you not know that it was Panthea only that could hinder Perinthus from loving Doralisa? and there is no question, but since I did so highly esteem you, I should also have loved you, if my heart had not been already engaged, and therefore without any accusing me of insensibility towards you, I beseech you pity me, and help me to conceal, for a few days which I have to live, that which I have with so much care concealed all my life. But can you not possibly suit your mind unto your fortune? (said Doralisa:) Did you not ever know, that you could never hope for any thing from the Princess? no not so much as to endure your passion? Yes (replied the sad Perinthus, and sighed.) Why then are you desperate? (replied she:) Because the only man who I would not have had happy, answered he, is now upon the point of being so. This seems to be rather a symptom of hatred to Abradates, replied Doralisa, then any testimony of love to Panthea. Ah Doralisa, cried he out, how ignorant you are in the effects of Love! for if I did not love Panthea, certainly I should love Abradates: yes Doralisa, as predominante as my passion is, I must needs acknowledge him to be a most excellent qualified man; but the more excellencies he hath, the more I envy his good fortune, and the more he renders me miserable. Time, replied she, will happily cure you. Yes, if I live so long as to wait for its Remedies, answered he; but I believe I shall not, nor is it my desire. In the mean time, since I would not have my despair appear, and since it is impossible to to hide my sorrows, and since I cannot go to the Princess but I shall express some signs of my Love, it is my best course to retire my self. Since I have been a long time without my health, it will be an easie matter perhaps to make the world believe, that the indisposition of my body is the cause of the indisposition in my mind: this will hide the cause of my melancholy from those few which I shall see.

Doralisa hearing Perinthus speak in this manner, did with all her arguments perswade him to strive with himself, and not to reclude himself from the society of the world; but she found no possibility to divert him from the design he intended, and therefore she left him: he desired her at parting not to speak a word of his passion unto the Princess, and I do not well know, whether he did not in his heart desire she would tell her something; yet she told her not a syllable, knowing very well that she could not understand of the passion he had to her, and the condition unto which he was brought, without either anger or sorrow, or perhaps both: But though she would not disturb her Joys in telling her of it, yet she told it unto me in particular, and when I saw she knew it as well as I, then I related unto her all that I did know; and truly both of us were so full of pity to him, and so sorry such a compleat man as he was should be in such a miserable condition, that we apprehended the good fortune of the Princess with less satisfaction then otherwise we should: Yet since we hoped that time would be a Comforter unto him, it did not keep us from being very pleasant; and indeed Doralisa had a hundred jolly conceits upon the avarice of Mexaris and generosity of Abradates, which she told unto the Princess; Page 68 she told her also that she was much happier then ever she hoped to be, in finding so soon that which she had sought for so long, and could never find, to wit, a compleat man which never loved any but her self; then she desired the Princess that she would not command her any more to be kind unto Andramites, since now she had no more need of his solicitations unto Croessus: Since Andramites (replied the Princess) is a friend unto Perinthus, I should be very unwilling to cast him off. Doralisa was about to answer her, but the Princess prevented her, by asking where Perinthus was? wondering he did not present himself, and his complements of joy: Doralisa would not tell her she came newly from him, but told her she knew not where he was: Then presently after, the Prince of Clasomena sent for Panthea, to tell her what his resolutions were, so that the rest of the day passed on without any thoughts of Perinthus. But the next day, when Abradates came to visit the Princess, as one whom he was to marry, and when she remembered that no news was heard all that while of Perinthus, she began to wonder, and to ask me whether I knew what was become of him? and when I said no, she sent one of her servants to him, and to tell him that she took it ill, he should not come to rejoice with her, for the happy success in her affairs; and that unless he were even at death door, she should have much ado to pardon this neglect. After he whom the Princess sent unto Perinthus had delivered this message; Tell the Princess, replied he, that since I shall obtain a pardon at my death, I shall hope ere long to die in her favour, since certainly I shall not live long. Perinthus added unto this some complements of course, but with such a weak trembling voice (as he who spoke unto him related unto the Princess) that she did really believe him to be very sick; and not doubting but the Physician which belonged to the Prince her Father had seen him, she sent unto him to know what Perinthus ailed, but she wondered when the Physician told her he had not seen him of late daies.

Doralisa who was then present, would have excused the matter, and said, that Perinthus happily had sent for some other Physician; but he who was there present assured the Princess that could not be: So that to be better satisfied in what condition Perinthus was, she commanded that Physician to go and see him from her, and to give her an account how he was. In the mean time Abradates thought himself in a heaven of happiness, and hoped nothing could interrupt his joyes, yet did he not think his happiness fully compleat, because he had not yet met with Perinthus, and intended the next day to give him a visit, and discourse of his joyes unto him: But alas, this miserable Lover cared as little for his visit, as he did for the Physicians whom the Princess sent unto him, who in obedience unto her commands went the next morning to see him before the Sun was up, yet did he not find him asleep, for his cares would not permit him to rest one minute. As soon as he came into his Chamber, he saw his face so altered, that he made no question but he was more then ordinarily sick; he told him then, that he wondered he would not send for him, and afterwards told him what commands he had received from the Princess, to render unto her an account of his health. At the name of the Princess, Perinthus started up, for he yet knew not he came from her; afterwards composing himself, he told the Physician, that he was infinitely obliged unto the Princess for her cares of him, and that he was much beholding unto any that would undertake his cure, but yet he desired him to spare his labour, for he was perswaded all remedies were in vain; and therefore he was resolved to try what nature alone would do, and let all arts alone. Whilst Perinthus was saying so, the Physician laid his hand upon his arm, do what he could, and found that his Pulse was sometimes weak and slow, and sometimes quick and high; so that conceiving him to be in great need of helps, he did earnestly perswade him to use them so long that Perinthus was angry, and the Physician to submit unto his will, intending notwithstanding to acquaint the Princess with his condition, and of a great necessity he should be looked unto: Then he left him after Perinthus had desired him to thank the Princess for the cares she had of him, and conjured him to tell her, that he thought himself the most unfortunate man in the world, that he could not be a partaker of her joyes, but was forced to lament, when all the world rejoiced at her Marriage. This Physician coming to the Princess, as soon as she was ready, she no sooner saw him, but she asked how Perinthus did; For I must confess, said he, since he hath been sick ever since he received a wound in my quarrel, I much desire to know in what condition he is. Madam, replied he, Perinthus is very ill, and which is the worst, he will neither tell what aileth him, nor take any remedies: What does he say unto you, Page 69 replied the Princess? He says, that Nature only without all our art shall be his Physician (replied he) but for my part, I conceived that both Nature and Art, and all are too little to cure him.

The Princess was much surprized when she heard him say so, and caused him to make an exact relation of all he had observed concerning the disease of Perinthus who indeed, as soon as he went from Doralisa's house, was constrained to go into bed; so much had the agitation of his mind augmented his gentle Fever, which his wound first caused, and which altered all his constitution. As the Princess was thus very busily enquiring concerning Perinthus, Abradates sent a Messenger to know how she did; and in return of his Complement she sent him word that she was very well, were it not for her sorrows to hear Perinthus was very sick, and would not take any remedies. After which; she dressed her self, and went unto the Temple according to her usual manner, where she met Abradates, who presented his hand unto her as she came out of her Coach. Since the Princess did love Perinthus very well, she spoke of his sickness unto Abradates, at her coming out of the Church; and as he answered that he intended to go and see him, she said that she should be much obliged unto him for it, and desired him to use his best persuasions unto Perinthus to take some remedy, and to ask his Reasons why he had refused; telling Abradates, that her respects of Perinthus moved her unto that which she would not do for every one, and that his respects of her might perhaps move him to do that which he would not for another. Abradates, whose aymes were all to please the Princess, and who besides did much respect Perinthus ever since he defended the Princess from being taken away by Mexaris, he no sooner parted from us, but he went unto this languishing Lover, who passed only for a sick man. You may easily imagine how the sight of this Prince did disorder his Soul, and what pains he took to disguise his thoughts. As soon as Abradates was set by his bed-side, and that Complements of course were past; Is it possible (said he unto him most obligingly) that even then when Fortune has ceased all her persecutions against me, and when I am arrived at the height of my happiness, that Perinthus should mingle with my joys, so much sorrow in refusing to take such Remedies as may make him able to be a partaker with me in my happiness? Sir (replied Perinthus sadly) I perceive that the goodness of the Princess, who is pleased to interest her self in the life of her most faithful servant, hath moved you to speak thus: but if I be considered as really I am, I am most unworthy of this honour which I receive from you, so extremely unworthy, that if I durst I would entreat you to let me receive no more of it. You are much too modest Perinthus, replied Abradates, for though you were not every way so compleat a man as you are in the eyes of all that look upon you, and were only the Defender of Panthea, yet your life deserves to be most dear unto me; but then being both a man rarely accomplished, and the Defender of my Princess, and also much my friend, doubtless it is my duty to move you unto any thing that may make you live, to live happily. At these words Perinthus fetched a profound sigh, and lifting up his eyes towards Heaven, he turn'd his head the other way to hide the changing of his complexion: Abradates observing the action of Perinthus, began to suspect, that his mind was more sick then his body; yet not imagining the true cause, he conjectured, that perhaps it was only because the Prince of Clasomena had yet done nothing for him, and that the Princess being to remove away, he should thereby lose his chief support: So that desiring to know whether these conjectures were rightly grounded, after some other discourse unto which Perinthus answered very little, he told him, how strange a thing it was to him, that he should refuse life now, when the Princess was more sweet and gracious towards him then ever she was. Ah Sir, cried he out, you judge of others by your self, but there is a great difference betwixt you and me, and so very great, that I am sure the same which often makes you joyful, makes me sad: so fatally opposite is your lot and mine. What ever it be Perinthus, replied Abradates, I am most certain that if you live (as with all my Soul I wish you may) you shall be more happy then ever you were: for whether your mind be to go with us unto Susa, or to dwell in Clasomena, or to stay at Sardis, I do engage my promise to advance your fortunes unto such a degree, as that your ambition shall desire no higher. Were I a man of Reason, replied Perinthus, I should render you a thousand thanks, for giving such generous language unto a man who owes his life unto you: but alas Sir, there is such a horrid black melancholy at this present upon me, which makes me so unlike my self, that I cannot delight in any pleasant things: every thing which is not fatally sad incenseth me, and makes me angry, therefore I beseech you leave me to my Page 70 self, either to mend or die quietly: But alas how can you mend, replied Abradates, unless you will apply your mind unto it? If I do not mend (replied he sharply) then I shall die, there's an end: But dear Perinthus, replied Abradates, the Princess Panthea, and my self shall grieve extremely for you, therefore think it not strange that I should earnestly perswade you to live: It is from the commands of the Princess that I desire you to have a care of your self, and not thus obstinately to refuse all helps: The Princess (answered Perinthus, and qualified a little the agitation of his Spirits) does me a very great favour to remember me at such a time, when she hath better things to think upon: But alas Sir, one hath not power alwayes to live when one pleaseth, no nor so much power as to wish it: I do confess, replied Abradates, there are some who groan under such heavy sorrows, as that sometimes they are not Masters of their own desires: But for you Perinthus, Why should you fall into such despair? All the world honors your virtues; the Prince of Clasomena loves you, the Princess his Daughter esteems you as much as is possible, and I promise you a most safe and welcome protection: If after all these your sorrows do continue, I shall believe that Doralisa had reason to think you were in Love: But suppose you were Perinthus, yet despair not, for truly could one be more unfortunate, or further from the enjoyment of his desires, then I was of Panthea? and yet you see a happy turn has wheel'd about my Fate: I do see it (said Perinthus, and sighed) but I do not see which way its possible I can be less miserable then I am. Howliver Sir, may you enjoy your felicity in peace, but I beseech you leave me to suffer those miseries for which I seek no remedy, and unto which if you offer any, your labour will be lost. Abradates seeing, that the more he talked to him, the more he incensed him, did rise up to go away, telling him he was very sorry that he was compelled to carry the Princess such unwelcome news. Perinthus then conjecturing by the speech of this Prince, that as soon as he was gone from him, he would go unto Panthea, he presently changed his mind; for whereas before he did all he could to get him gone, now he endeavours to stay him longer, thinking it some satisfaction to keep Abradates from the pleasure of seeing Panthea. It is most true, that all his language unto this Prince was so ill-composed, and so little sometimes to the purpose, that he began to suspect the true cause of Perinthus his despair; so that after he had answered three or four times unto those questions which this languishing Lover used to keep him the longer with him, he left this Love-sick Lover, and went unto the Princess, but found her not at first, because she was busie, yet he stayed with me until she came unto him. Since his suspicions of Perinthus his Love did much disquiet him, he seemed unto me very reserved, and taking upon me the liberty to ask him, why he was so melancholy at a time of so much happiness towards him, he told me that the sickness of Perinthus did much trouble him: Afterwards, representing unto me the restlessness which he observed in his mind, he perceived that I knew something of the cause, not that I spoke a word which might make him think so; but because it seems it was my misfortune to let any eyes often discover the secret of my heart: All this while Abradates would not speak out his thoughts unto me, but we stood and spoke to each other very seldome, yet did perfectly understand the thoughts of one another. But after we had a while stood in this silent posture, Abradates desired me not to tell the Princess what he would tell me; and protesting unto me that he would never reveal what I should tell unto him; after which, he asked me whether I did not think Perinthus in Love with Panthea, and whether I did not believe as he did, that his Marriage with her was the cause of his sickness? I know not Sir, said I unto him, whether it be so or no, but I am sure the Princess does not know of it: No, no, Pherenice, (said he unto me) there is not the least spark of jealousy in me, but mainly of pity to him; the esteem that I have grounded of Panthea is so fully rooted in me, that though she had a whole thousand of Lovers at her feet imploring favours, I should never think her capable of the least weakness; therefore I conjure you to tell me ingeniously, whether you think I have not reason for my conjecture? for if you shall confirm me in my belief, I shall endeavour to find out some wayes to comfort poor Perinthus, at the least, though I cannot cure him. But Sir, (said I unto him) there needs no thoughts of Perinthus his being in Love with Panthea, to prompt you unto any endeavours of his comfort or cure, since you esteem him sufficiently without that, to induce you unto that charitable office: I see Pherenice, said he unto me, that you have no disposition to be sincere, yet I must tell you, Perinthus will die if he be not well looked unto: And I do confess, that since I am his debtor for the safety of Panthea, I should Page 71 be exceedingly troubled if he should any way miscarry. But Sir, said I unto him, suppose all you imagine were true, yet what Remedy is there? Only this, replied Abradates, to perswade the Princess, that she will please to command him not to despair. As he said so, Panthea came into the Chamber, and no sooner saw him, but she asked how Perinthus did? and what he thought of his sickness? Madam, said he unto her, Perinthus hath told me many things, and to so little purpose, that I conceive his mind is more sick then his body; and for my part, I think he stands more in need of some comforts then any physick. Yet I do not know, said she, that any misfortune hath happened unto him. It is most true (said he unto her) there appears none unto us; but perhaps there is some happiness which is befall another which much grieves him. Perinthus, replied she, is not of any envious disposition, no not of his very enemies, unless Mexaris, whose happiness indeed I think he would envy. However it be, Madam, said he, I am afraid Perinthus will dye, if you do not take a care of his life. Abradates spoke this in such a manner, as let the Princess see there was some secret meaning in his words: so that not knowing what to think, she changed colour and discourse. All the rest of the day her thoughts ran upon what Abradates told her: yet notwithstanding after he was gone, not daring to tell us what she thought of Perinthus, nor being willing to give over her cares of him, unto whom she was obliged, she desired Doralisa to go and visit him, and appointed me to accompany her, hoping to be better informed at our Return then she had been by Albradates. Doralisa and I were glad of this employment, and went with joy, thinking we had so much power over the spirits of Perinthus, as might move him to cheer up his spirits, and use all Remedies to live: but alas, Madam, we found our selves extremely deceived; for the visit of Abradates had so incensed his sorrows, and augmented his disease, that we could not look upon him without extream compassion: yet was he something satisfied that he might talk with us, and commanded all to go out of the Chamber, that he might with more freedom express himself: But as soon as we began to chide him for refusing all helps; No, no, said he unto us, I ought not to think upon life; and provided I might but dye before the King of Susiana married the Princess Panthea, I should not at all think my self miserable; but I fear I cannot avoyd this misfortune.

It is so far between Sardis and Susa, replied I, that I hope it will be perfectly cured, both of your miseries of mind and body before they can get thither; or before they can be married. Sure you do not know, replied he, that there arrived within this hour a Messenger from the Queen of Susiana, who hearing of the affection which the Prince her Son did bear unto the Princess Panthea, sent unto him to continue his Love, and that she consented unto his Marriage: So that Abradates having now no rub in his way, will infallibly marry her, and make me absolutely despair, if death do not speedily deliver me. Doralisa and I did much wonder that Perinthus considering his condition should know the news before us, yet we imagined it not impossible but Andramites might be his Intelligencer, and therefore were doubted not of the truth. And after this (said he unto us) I hope you are not so inhumane as to wish me live any longer; but if the Princess did command you to perswade me, I pray you do not obey her: yet if the Princess did know my passion, and after that had so much goodness or cruelty (for I know not which of these two Epithites to use) as to bid me live, perhaps I should strive to obey her, and use some vain remedies to prevent death: but alas, you know very well that she is ignorant I love her, neither dare I desire she should know: yet if you shall think it expedient to let her know it when I am dead, and that she will not hate my memory for it, I conjure you to tell her, and beg my pardon for not rejoicing at her happiness: But since I limited all my hopes to endeavor she should love none, and see all those hopes ruined, do not think it strange if I tell you, that I cannot endure to live: Nor is it less expedient for the tranquility of Panthea, then my own, that I dye: For how is it possible I ever should be Master of my Raptures and of my Passion: 'Tis true, I have been hitherto, but it is because I did not see Abradates in his happiness, nor in possession of the Princess; Far better then had I dye, then disturb her happiness which I prefer before my own. Did ever any see more lamentable destinies then mine (did he say unto us,) for I desire no other favour of Fortune to compleat my contentment, but that one of my Rivals may not be in favour, and I cannot obtain so much as it: I did resolve to hide my passion as long as I lived; I mastered my self so far as not to desire she should love me, but satisfied my self with the bare esteem of Panthea: but though I confined my self unto more narrow limits then ever any Lover was able to do, yet I perceive Abradates becomes as happy as I am miserable. Page 72 However (said I unto him) be satisfied with this, that you have no cause to complain either against your Rival, or your Princess whom you loved. Ah Pherenice (cried he out) that which you think should satisfie me, is it which sends me unto black despair, since certainly I should have less cause to complain, if I could complain with Justice of any but my self. But since you are so full of Reason, replied Doralisa, why do you not follow it? Because I have eyes, replied he, yet am such a slave as that I cannot see: I see the way which I ought to take for the recovery of my Liberty; but alas, I am chained too fast to follow it; and nothing but death is strong enough to break those chains: And therefore if you be as much my friends as I belevee you are, you will not blame me, nor desire me to live; yet have I one favour to beg of you (said he unto us in such a manner as would have moved a heart of stone) which I conjure you not to deny me, and that is, to find out some expedient if it be possible, that my adored Princess may not marry Abradates until the day after my death: The term will be but short, said he, for if I be not much deceived, four days is my longest limits. I should desire, said he, a sight of my diivine Princess before I dye, but that were to desire to be more miserable, and is too much for a despicable Lover.

I confess Madam, when Doralisa and I heard Perinthus speak thus, we were so exceedingly moved unto pity, that we could not refrain from tears; and so we wept with him, since we could not work any more upon him, and so left him with a promise to see him again: yet we used all possible arguments to cheer up his spirits before we parted, yet all in vain. Then did we return unto the Princess extremely melancholy, and in the way considered what we should say unto her, but could not resolve whether or no it were best to tell her that she was the cause of Perinthus his death. But the truth is, we were eased of that trouble, for she her self apprehended as much by the discourse of Abradates; so that when we came unto her, and related the lamentable condition of Perinthus, I perceived she understood the matter as well as we did: for when I told her, it would be very well if she her self would be pleased to go and bid him live; I know very well (answered she and blushed) that I am obliged to take care of his life; but I know also, that if Perinthus have a Soul so full of sorrow, he will not obey me. He will obey none then, replied Doralisa; but however Madam, if you go unto him, and use your best endeavors, then there is no fault in you if he dye. After this, Panthea excused her self as much as possibly she could from seeing Perinthus, not telling her true Reason, because her modesty would not permit her to speak her thoughts: But at last Doralisa, using her accustomed freedom with the Princess, told her all we knew, and with so much art, and obligingly for Perinthus, that the Princess was no less sorry then angry to hear of his passion to her. Panthea at first seemed to hide her resentments from us; but afterwards she confessed that the death of Perinthus would trouble her, and would seem so bad an omen unto all the rest of her life, that she durst not hope to pass it happily. Then did she chide us a hundred times because we did not cure Perinthus of his passion, thinking that Reason were sufficient physick to cure that disease. Afterwards, since we did importune her unto a visit of this languishing Lover, she was as far from consenting unto it, as we were urgent: Madam, said I unto her, he knows not that we have revealed his secret; and questionless you would have done him this charitable favour, if you had not suspected his Love. It is sufficient that I now know it, said she, to keep me from seeing him: not but that I should be extremely sorry for the death of a man unto whom I am much obliged for defending me from the power of Mexaris; yet I cannot do as you desire me: Moreover, if he do love me, my sight will rather hasten then prevent his death, since he cannot see me but with abundance of sorrow. Since he desires it (said I unto her) methinks it would be too inhumane to deny him that favour. You do not apprehend what Abradates might think (replied she) if he should know Perinthus loved me, and that I should visit him. You may ask him leave if you please, replied I, for I see him enter: And Doralisa, in pursuance of what I said, no sooner saw Abradates with the Princess, but she addressed her self unto him; Is it not true Sir, said she, that the Princess is obliged to visit Perinthus? There is no question of it, replied he; and if to induce her unto it there want only an addition of my petition unto yours, I shall most willingly make it unto her; and I am verily perswaded, that if he will not mend upon the sight of her, he will dye within a few days. Since the Princess would not tell Abradates the true Reason which restrained her, she spoke so faintly, that he perceived she might be perswaded, so that he became very importune vvith her: But at the last his urgency and ours together prevailed, though it put the Princess to the blush, to Page 73 think how Abradates would take it, and certainly none could carry it with more generosity then he did upon this occasion: For since he had a high confidence of Panthea's heart, and her virtues, he was extremely urgent with her to visit Perinthus, and to use her best endeavours to save his life, yet he made this condition with her, which if Perinthus had known, certainly would have furthered his death, which was, that if he recovered, she should never see him again. After this, she desired Abradates would be present with her at this charitable visit, but he would not upon any terms. To relate unto you Madam all the passages of this visit, is impossible; let it suffice to tell you, that Perinthus did strive to die twenty times whilst the Princess was present; sometimes one might see him in the depth of sorrows; presently after, some sparks of joy would glance in his eyes, as neer death as he was; then in an instant, despair would so stifle his Spirits, that one could not understand what he said; but for all this, he still kept a most profound reverence unto the Princess, he thanked her for the honour she did him, telling her, that since he had this honour once more to see her, he had nothing else to do in the world but die: And when she commanded him to take some helps, he stayed a while silent, then upon a suddain lifting up his eyes unto her: Madam, said he, If you did but know what you wish me, when you desire I should live, you would unwish it again: For indeed Madam (added he in a languishing tone) when Doralisa thought me to be in Love, she was not mistaken: I am in Love Madam, and I should not die at this time, but because I am in Love: And since you were ignorant of my miseries, you are excuseable in wishing me to live, because you thought I might perhaps be happy. This is all Madam, that the respects I owe you will permit me to speak of my miseries and misfortunes.

Perinthus pronounced these last words so weakly, that one would have feared he would immediately expire, for his sorrows did so overwhelm all his faculties, that for a quarter of an hour together he was speechless; but yet since he did not lose his sight and understanding, he had the consolation to see some tears drop from the eyes of the Princess, yet did she hide them as well as she could, and not being able to stay any longer in sight of so sad an object, she went forth: After she had appointed all the Physicians, both of Croessus and others to come unto him, they did unanimously conclude he could not escape, but indeed would die within a short time, and indeed it proved so: It was conceived, that the sight of the Princess, which we procured as a remedy, was his dispatch, and he died that night following, and was as universally lamented, as ever was any in the world: The Princess was so grieved, that she could not hide some part of her sorrows, lest Abradates should imagine that she knew something of Perinthus his passion, before she told him: But this Prince had a greater confidence in her, then to entertain the least unjust thought; and therefore he did not think it strange, she should grieve for a man unto whom she was much obliged, and for whom he grieved himself. Thus the poor Perinthus, had the honour to be lamented by his Mistriss with her tears, to be grieved for by his Rival, and his Master, who did visit him in his sickness, and had all imaginable care of him; his death did for a time defer the Marriage of Abradates, for it did so exceeding perplex Panthea, that she was not well eight daies after, during which time, news was brought, that the Prince Mexaris was dead of his wounds and sorrows, so that the Court went into mourning, though his death did not much trouble us: Howlever, so many sad accidents in so short a time did disquiet the Princess, yet notwithstanding her causes of joy were sufficient to sweeten all these sorrows; and fifteen daies after her Marriage with Abradates was accomplished without any ceremony, because of the death of Mexaris, and all magnificence was deferred until vve came to Susa, vvithin vvithin a fevv daies after vve vvvent, in an equipage suitable to the quality and liberality of Abradates: The Princess had the comfort to carry Doralisa vvith her, notwithstanding all the endeavours of Andramites, and the Prince Myrsiles, though the reasons of this Prince vvvas unknownn vvnto us: So this pleasant Lady did never forsake her, but could not meet vvith this accomplished Gallant vvvhich she had been so long in quest of, in Susa no more then in Sardis. I shall not need to relate unto you Madam, how the Princess Panthea was received by her fair Mother in Law, nor how Abradates lived with her since she was married, until the day that Fortune parted them, and the fate of Arms brought her under the power of the illustrious Cyrus: For if I should relate the whole story, perhaps I should not find belief, at least in setting forth the King of Susiana's passion, which certainly was more violent then any expressions can set forth, yet not more then hers to him; and therefore I will say no more, but most humbly beseech your pardon, Page 74 for dressing the story of two illustrious persons of such extraordinary virtues, with such mean and common language.

The pardon you desire (replied Araminta unto Pherenice) is easily obtained, and as just to deny it (said Cyrus) since she needs it not. Pherenice replied unto the complement of Cyrus with much civility; after which, Araminta and he began to discourse of Panthea's virtues, of Abradates his liberality, and of Doralisa's pleasant humour: But since by this time it was late, Cyrus took his leave of this Princess, and went to Panthea's Chamber, to take his leave of her also, and to thank her, for that she was pleased to let him know her adventures; he assured her, that Pherenice had made an elegant relation of them, and asked her pardon, that the Laws of War, his fidelity to Ciaxaires, and his interest in Mandana, would not yet permit him to restore her unto the King her Husband, beseeching her to believe, that it was not without extream sorrow he should so long separate two such illustrious persons; after which, passing towards Doralisa, unto whom Araspes was talking, he bestowed a complement upon her, telling her he wished for the honour of Araspes, that she might find him to be the compleat man she sought after: At least, said he, he never yet was in Love with any: I assure you Sir, (said she, and smiled) If you do think as you say, you do not know him so well as I do, for I never saw so many signs of Love in Perinthus, since the first time I knew him, as I have observed in him, since this short acquaintance. Araspes blusht at this reply of Doralisa, and made but a poor defence for himself: But since other things came into the mind of Cyrus, he stayed no longer, but departed with Ligdamis, and all the rest of his company. Crisantes at that time came unto him, and rendred an account of all those Warlike Engines, which by his orders were preparing; and since he assured him, that all the works were closely followed, he was exceedingly pleased in his conceits, that ere long he should be in a condition, either to vanquish his enemies, or die for his Princess Mandana.

ARTAMENES, OR The Grand CYRUS. The Fifth Part. BOOK. II.

Cyrus was no sooner come unto the Camp, but he sent to tell the King of Phrygia, that the Queen of Susiana, and the Princess of Pontus had writ so effectually in behalf of the Prince Artamas, that he hoped for a happy success of Aglatidas his voyage: The day following, he dispatched an Envoy unto Cixares, to acquaint him with all passages, and to beseech him to send me more Forces, to the end, that if Thomiris should attempt any thing against him, he might keep himself still in a posture of defence, until he had finished the War wherein he was engaged, and released the Princess Mandana: After which, he thought upon nothing but taking the Field, and by some memorable exploit to repair the misfortune which lately he received: And in order to that, his daily business was to see how the Warlike Instruments which he had given orders for went on, and in what forwardness they were; he went from Quarter to Quarter, taking private Musters of every particular Troop, before he came to a General Rendezvouze, waiting impatiently for that happy day on which he should set forward into the Enemies Country: Since he had made a promise unto Ligdamis, never to engage him unto any thing which might be against his honour and generosity, he would never motion it unto him, to move his Father for a passage over the River by the Castle of Hermes; nor would he in consideration of him, think of rendering himself Master of it by force of Arms, but resolved to force a passage neerer Sardis, at a place where there was a Bridg, and a little Town very well fortified, which he must of necessity take, before he could pass over the River. In the mean time, he had daily intelligence that the Army of Croessus did much increase: He understood also, that the Egyptians which Amasis had promised unto Croessus, were arrived by Sea; that the Thracians also joined with him, and indeed that his Army was grown very numerous, that the most fertile Country of all Asia would have much and to supply it. He understood also by his Spies, that this vast Army which was now upon the Banks of Pactolus assembled, would within this few daies advance unto a place called Thybarras, whither all the Subjects of Croessus had orders to bring their victual for the accommodation of the Camp, every City and Town being taxed and rated at a certain quantity, which they were required to furnish out. Cyrus then understanding that his Enemies would presently come unto him, if he went not Page 76 unto them, did forecast how to prevent them: And in order to that, he commanded a General Muster of all his Army, which he found to consist of about a hundred and forty thousand Men: he held a Council of War, to consult how he might assault the Town of Nisomolis, where he was to pass the River; The King of Phrygia: the King of Hircania, the Prince Tigran^{us} Phraortes, Persodes, Gobrias, Gadates, Hidaspes, Adusius, Chrysantes, Artabases, and many others, were of this Council: Where it was Resolved, That they should not make a formal regular Siege of it, but that it were better to lose some Souldiers in storming of it, than to lie lingering before it until the Enemy came to relieve it with his whole Army. This was no sooner resolved upon, but Cyrus thought how to execute it: so that the day following his Troops began to draw forth: yet the first day he made a false March, purposely to deceive the Enemy; and indeed they were much deceived: for making no question but Cyrus intended to pass the River at the Castle of Hermes, and thither therefore they sent away the greatest part of their Forces, contenting themselves with as many only as would keep the Garrison of Nisomolis.

As Cyrus never used to neglect any thing that was his duty, he went to take his leave of the Queen of Susiana, and the Princess Araminta; Most of the Princes in his Company did the same, and amongst the rest Phraortes, whose passion did daily encrease, though the coldness of the Princess should rather have lessened it. The Conference of Cyrus with these two Princesses was upon some things of concernment; he did yet comfort them as much as he could, always assuring them that he aimed at nothing but Mandana's releasement; and that if the Fate of Arms were so favorable to him, he would for their sakes remember the persons who amongst his Enemies were so dear unto them; After which he took horse, and went on his Journey. In the mean time, maugre the remembrance of so many angry Oracles and fatal Predictions which might well have made the heart of Cyrus to tremble, yet he did gloss his sorrows so well, that all the Souldiers who were ignorant of them did march with as much alacrity, as they were wont to do when they went unto a certain Victory: And when they saw Cyrus put on his Arms and take horse, there appeared a most noble Fury in his eyes; and indeed this Prince was so unlike himself when he prepared to fight, or give out Military Orders, that there was not a greater alteration in the countenance of the Pithian when she gave her Oracles, then in the face of Cyrus when the sword was in his hand: One would have said that a new spirit did animate him, and that he himself was become the God of War; his complexion grew high and lively, his eyes more sparkling, his action more free, his voice more clear, and every way more majestic: so that at his least beck, he struck terror into the Souls of all about him: Yet did there always appear a calm serenity in his Soul, maugre this heroic agility, which made him perpetually change his place, and be in every place to give Orders throughout all; and certainly he did it with so much prudence, as never any could ever tax him with commanding any thing to an ill purpose: Also, he was always obeyed with most exact diligence, and blind obedience; as soon as ever he spoke the word, all were ready to execute; and his presence had something in it so divine and terrible both, that when he was in the head of his Army, only with his all-commanding Truncheon in his hand, one might very well say, he made both his Friends and his Enemies to tremble, and wrought different effects in the hearts of both: for his Enemies out of very fear did often fly; and his Friends out of fear to displease him, became incomparably more valiant: and certainly that divine heat which warmed his heart, and sparkled in his eyes, did communicate it self throughout the Army, and begot such an ardent desire of fighting, as was often a great Cause of Victories.

Thus did Cyrus appear when he had a sword in his hand, and in the head of his Army, when he went to storm the Town of Nisomolis. Since it was very concerning to carry it in a short time, do what the King of Phrygia and Hircania could, he himself would needs be the first that fell on; and many have assured me, that he carried the first Ladder, and was first upon the Enemies Rampart: This is without all dispute, that had he not been there this little Town would have held out, maugre all our men, above eight days, yet by his incomparable valor it was reduced in less then twenty four hours, with the loss of very few men; though half of the Garrison was cut in pieces, and the rest listed themselves under Cyrus. Thus did the King of Lidia in a little time lose a most considerable Pass over the River Hermes, and at least three thousand of his best Souldiers. This good beginning put joy into the whole Army of Cyrus, and struck such a terror into all the Country along the River Hermse, as if all Lidia were conquered.

Page 77 In the mean time, after a Garrison was put into the Town, Cyrus caused all his Forces to pass over the Bridg at Nisomolis, so that in a day and half this great Army did over-spread all the Neighbouring fields, carrying with it such a horrid fear, that from the banks of the River Hermes, unto the River Pactolus, there was not a Lydian heart which did not tremble, the Army of Croessus it self was astonished; yet since it was much more numerous then that of Cyrus, it presently took heart again: But since some of their Forces were not yet come up. Croessus was not over-forward to take the field, but thought it most expedient, to let the fury of this storm which made such a noise to cool a little, conjecturing, that the Army of Cyrus would lessen, whilst his increased; yet he sent 20000. men under the conduct of Andramites to check the over-forwardness of Cyrus his Army, until such time as he was ready to march; and still confiding in the Oracle which he received from Delphos so much, that though his Army had been weak, as it was strong, yet should he hope for Victory, and that he should ruine the Empire which Cyrus was in expectation of. In the mean while, Cyrus possessed himself of all passages, became Master of the Field, and left not a Town on his back which could annoy him, but took all in his way, and terror was spread so far, that most did render themselves as soon as his Forces approached: That which did most move them unto it, was because Cyrus did treat all those who did not resist him with much sweetness, not permitting a Souldier to offer the least insolency unto them; but on the contrary, those who did resist the progress he intended to release his dear Mandana, they felt the weight of his Arm, and found too late, that it was no wisdom to undertake more then they were able to make good, and by consequence more then they ought to do: After then he had made sure of all places which could any way annoy him, he intrenched himself, advantageously, within a daies march and a half of Sardis, as well to rest his Troops, and refresh his Army, as to inquire concerning the Enemy, also to expect the return of Aglatidas, yet did not a day pass away without some skirmish or other; for since the 20000. men under the command of Andramites were intrenched upon the Banks of a little River that was within 300. paces of us, there was skirmishes continually, the success whereof was not always equal: Sometimes the Party of Croessus would have the better, yet commonly they were always beaten, so that prisoners were every day taken and brought unto Cyrus, who would always examine them himself, not only for better information of all advantages, but to ask them if they knew any thing concerning the Princess Mandana; for since sometimes there was some Officers amongst them, he pumped some things out of them which he desired to know; he inquired not only of Mandana, but also of his Rivals. He understood also by them, that there was a stranger, a gallant Cavalier, and an admirable handsome man, who of late came into the Party of Croessus, who then was with Andramites, and had made himself very eminent in many small skirmishes which had passed, yet could not any of these prisoners tell his quality, only he called himself Telephanes: And indeed every Party which went out, found that there was one man above all the rest of the Lydians which was of an extraordinary valour, and made always a most gallant resistance, so that the name of Telephanes was cried up, both amongst his friends and enemies: Though Cyrus was not capable of any envious thoughts, yet the fame of this Telephanes made him often desire to meet with him, so that he would often go out in these small Parties, in hopes to encounter him, but he could not meet with him: But afterwards, checking himself for any such thoughts, conceiving it a piece of weakness in him to desire combat with any but his Rivals, he gave over all his thoughts of Telephanes, and his mind was employed only how to hasten on his Victory or his Defeat, though he could not chuse but after so many dire predictions put some doubts of a good success. However, he understood the day following, that the King of Pontus was come into the Enemies Camp, and that it was he who was to command the Van-guard.

Cyrus no sooner heard that this Ravisher of his Princess was so neer him, but he had a much more hot desire of fighting, which prompted him to act something, before it came to main Battel: And though he knew that all these petty advantages which every day they got, were nothing to decide the matter, and that under a general defeat of this great Army, he should never release Mandana, yet he thought, that if he could either kill or take the King of Pontus, it would conduce much unto a Victory, and to the liberty of the Princess: So that to do both, he attempted the day following to force his Enemy, and make him quit that quarter wherein he was intrenched: But the Enemy was Page 78 so advantageously seated, that it would be a most difficult task to drive them out under 10000. men, yet nothing was impossible to Cyrus, whose valour nothing could resist, and if the night had not impeaded his Victory, he had carried it: His Enemy did lose such a number of men in this assault, that he might well be satisfied, though during the combat, he met neither with the King of Pontus, nor Telephanes, who was reported to carry one dead painted upon his Buckler, with this Motto, I have deserved it; yet was Cyrus much perplexed that he could not meet with his Rival, and he was considering which way he might the next morning enforce the Enemy out of his Trenches, when he saw Aglatidas returned, and coming to him, he was no sooner entered into his Tent, but with open arms he embraced him: Well my dear Aglatidas (said he unto him) How does my Princess? and how do they treat her at Sardis? Sir, replied he, they guard her so strickly, that it was impossible for me to give you an exact account how she doth, yet I know she is in health, and that they wait upon her with much respect: But since she is in the Cittadel, as well as the Princess Palmis, whom they guard as strickly as the Princess Mandana, it is not in the power of Feraulas, as witty as he is, to find out any means of sending any message unto Martesia, yet for all that I have seen the Princess: How, said Cyrus, have you seen her, and not spoke unto her? I saw her Sir, replied he, upon the top of a Tower in the Cittadel, where she came every evening to walk with the Princess of Lydia; but the ditches were so very broad, and the Tower so high, that I could only see her, and perhaps unseen my self, yet methought one of her Women which waited, made a sign unto me with her hand, but I durst not answer it. However Feraulas sees her every day in the same place, for the place where the prisoners of War is lodged, is over against that Tower: Then it seems the King of Assyria (replied Cyrus very hastily) does see my Princess, as the rest do? And more then any of the rest, said Aglatidas, for he is perpetually in the Window of his Chamber, which opens that way. Ah Aglatidas (cried Cyrus out) What sad news is this you tell me? Sir, replied he, Let it not at all trouble you, since certainly that Prince is not any thing the happier for it, because by special Orders from the King of Pontus, who is in high favour with Croessus, he is so strickly guarded, that this Prince cannot possibly have so much liberty as to send any Letters or message unto the Princess Mandana. Cyrus then, calming the agitation of his spirits, by hearing a thing so agreeable to his wish, commanded Aglatidas to make an exact relation of all his journey, first asking him of the health of the Prince Artamas, and of all the rest of the Prisoners, especially of Feraullas in particular. After that, Aglatidas had told him, that the Prince Artamas was out of all danger, and that the stranger Anaxaris, Feraulas, Sosicles, and Tegeus were all well, he told him, how he found Croessus at Sardis, who treated him very civilly; that after he had read his Letter, he told him, that his recommendations were dear unto him, excepting what related unto the Prince Artamas, assuring him, that he should have his answer in the morning; that afterwards, he desired permission to present a Letter unto the King of Pontus from the Princess his Sister, and another from the Queen of Susiana unto the King her Husband, unto which he accorded, causing him to be conducted unto those two Princes by some of his guard: But I pray tell me, (said Cyrus,) Were not the King of Pontus and Abradates in the Camp? No Sir, replied Aglatidas, for they were at a Council of War, which was held near the Town, and the King of Pontus was ready to set forward to command the Van-guard: But to tell you Sir, how Abradates received me is impossible; but I am most certain, he loves the Queen Panthea with a most extraordinary affection, and he had no sooner read her Letter, but he assured me, that he would be a Protector, not only unto all such prisoners as were taken during the War, as well as those now at Sardis, but he would be ready to do any thing that generosity would permit him, with a hundred obliging and sweet expressions unto me: After which, being desirous to execute the orders of Panthea that very hour, he went unto Croessus, as I shall tell you, after I have related unto you how the King of Pontus did treat me: I am confident (replied Cyrus) that he hath not forgot to be generous: Certainly Sir, replied Aglatidas, I was much surprized at this manner of behaviour; for Sir, you never did any favour which he does not exactly remember, he calls you his Protector and Liberator, he protested that he hated ingratitude, and swore unto me, that he would protect the Prince Artamas, and all the Prisoners, more for your sake, then for the Princess his Sister: Then he carried me unto Croessus, and I was a witness of all that the King of Susiana and he did plead in behalf of Artamas and the rest: Croessus did Page 79 obstinately affirm, that the Prince of Phrigia ought not to be treated as a Prisoner of War, but to be proceeded against as a Delinquent to the State: And these two Princes did most zealously maintain the contrary, telling him, that he had no Right at all unto that Prince, but what the Fortune of War did entitle him unto.

However, the matter could not be that day resolved, no nor the next day, though Cressus promised to dispatch me: During which time, by the Kings permission, I visited all the Prisoners: I understood from Feraulas, that the King of Assyria was known before he came into Sardis; and that since his Imprisonment he is extremely melancholy, that he should not have the glory of ayding you in the Princess Mandana's Releasment, and that he was forced to be obliged unto you for his Liberty; and he charged me to express his sorrows unto you, that he was not to be Partaker with you in the dangers of this War, and desiring me to put you in memory of your Promises. As for the Prince Artamas Sir, he charged me with a hundred obliging Messages unto you, as well as Anaxaris, Sosicles, and Tegeus. Whilst I was with these illustrious Captives, Abradates and the King of Pontus finding Cressus very resolute, told him, that there was two persons who were infinitely dear unto them in your Power, and that they had great Reason to fear their usage if Artamas was treated otherwise then as a Prisoner of War: Unto which he answered, that as long as Mandana was in his Power, there was no fear of either the Queen of Susiana or the Princess Araminta. As Abradates was more earnest in the business then the King of Pontus, he spoke something home unto Cressus, telling him that he saw he was much deceived; for he believed that if he had desired Prince Artamas to be exchanged for the Queen his Wife, he would not have denied him that favour; but it seems he was so far from granting him that favour, as at his request he would not let him be in the ordinary Conditions of War: Adding many other things, unto which Cressus answered so roughly, as I am very much mistaken, if the heart of Abradates was not much exasperated against him: For when I came to receive his Answer, I heard him relate the business unto one of his friends in a low voice, and in such a manner as I conceive as much. However, at last the King of Pontus and he did bend Cressus unto their desires; so that I received as good an Answer as I could wish. In taking my leave of Abradates, he charged me with a Letter unto the Queen his Wife: and appointed me to tell you Sir, that if he were absolute Disposer of Affairs, he would not only protect the Prince Artamas, but release him: Adding unto all this a Chain of Gold with a Medal, on which was the Picture of Panthea, which he desired me to take, to put me in remembrance (as he said) to tell you Sir, That there was one man amongst your Enemies, who infinitely desires the honour to be your Friend. Sir, said I then unto him, I beseech you excuse me from receiving such a magnificent gift, as may render me suspected unto the Prince I serve. Since your Masters merit, replied he, is a stronger and more precious Chain to tie you unto his service then any I am able to give, he will never suspect such a man as you of any subornation. At last, there was no remedy but I must submit unto the liberality of Abradates, and accept it. Afterwards I went unto the King of Pontus, who gave me his Answer unto the Princess Araminta his Sister, and who charged me to tell you Sir, that you may ever expect any thing in the World from him which was not prejudicial unto his Love. After this, Aglatidas presenting the King of Lidia's Letter unto his hands, he there found these words:

CRESSUS unto CYRUS.

What cause soever I have to treat the Prince Artamas as a Delinquent against my State, yet I assure you, that at your instance, and the desires of those two Princes who did second you, I shall treat him only as a Prisoner of War; and that with much civility and sweetness. I wish I may often be in a condition to do you the like offices; and that I may never be necessitated to receive the like from you.

CRESSUS.

Fortune shall then forsake me (said Cyrus in answer to his own thoughts, and the King of Lidia's Letter:) After which embracing Aglatidas, he asked him whether he had heard of a stranger of high reputation in Sardis, whose name was Telephanes? Oh Sir, said Aglatidas, I had forgot to tell you, that the talk in Sardis is of nothing else but his valor and gallant importment; yet none knows who he is: However, added he, if the Medians are to be believed, their Army is so vast and strong, that Victory is made sure of: However, Page 80 they will give us leave to dispute for it with them, replied Cyrus. After which sending Aglatidas unto the King of Phrigia, to give him an account of the success in his Voyage, he spent the rest of the day which he had designed for his own rest, upon contemplation of the present state of his fortunes; and to contrive ways how to release his Princess. Doubtless it was a great consolation unto him to hear that the King of Pontus was in the Army, and that the King of Assyria could not send unto Mandana. Nor am I altogether unfortunate, said he, since my Princess is in a place where she may think upon me with freedom: But how do I know, said he, whether or no she thinks well of me? Have I not more reason to fear that she thinks upon me as the cause of all her misfortunes? and remembers me with horror in lieu of tenderness? Perhaps the same Gods which promised the King of Assyria that he should see an end of all his misery, and that he should have the glory to hear Mandana sigh for him, did make him a Prisoner purposely to hasten his happiness; and it may be she pities him whilst she accuseth me, and at this very hour as I am speaking of her, he has a greater share in her thoughts and affection then I have. But most unjust man that I am (said he, and reprehended himself) why do I accuse the most perfect person upon Earth of any inconstancy? She, I say, who hath given me a hundred most obliging testimonies of her unalterable constancy? She hath seen the King of Assyria, who was Possessor of a great Empire, and could command an Army of two hundred thousand Men, lie prostrate at her feet, and never be moved at his tears: Why then should I now ever think, that since he is deprived of his Kingdom, and in fetters, and never speaks to her, he can alter his mind? yet notwithstanding, pity hath much power in it; she can mollify the most obdurate hearts, and soften the most fierce Souls, especially such as suffer for her; also she delivered me, and retained the King of Assyria. Then afterwards when he began to consider how the Gods had promised Victory unto Cressus, and yet since he entered into Lidia he had nothing but good success against this Lidian King, he knew not what to think: Sometimes he feared the Gods did raise him only to throw him down again; and in a moment after, he thought that perhaps they did never intend it: So that when one glimpse of any hope did but shine upon his heart, then all his thoughts were of fighting, and vanquishing his Rivals. After he had relished the sweetness of this last thought, he fell asleep, and slept on with more tranquility then usually he was wont, but his sleep was not long since he awaked by break of day. He was no sooner up, but the King of Phrigia came to thank him, and express his joy, that the Prince his Son was not exposed unto the fury of Cressus. Afterwards this Prince understanding from Aglatidas how infinitely Abradates loved the Queen his Wife, did advise Cyrus to carry her unto the Army, telling him, that such an occasion might present it self, that her presence and the presence of the Princess Araminta might happily much advantage him: At the first, Cyrus did not much harken unto the counsel of the King of Phrigia, thinking that he was to employ nothing but his courage in the Releasment of Mandana; and remembering what small effects the last meeting of the Princess Araminta with the King of Pontus produced, he could not fancy any advantage by them. Yet since the King of Phrigia, Chrisantes, Aglatidas and Ligdamis, were not of his opinion, he yielded unto them. Then the very same hour he sent Aglatidas unto the two Princesses, with the Letters which he brought for them, and to beseech them they would be pleased to come unto one of those Towns which he had taken, and which was close by the place where he was encamped: But for more civilities sake, he writ unto them both; and the more to oblige Ligdamis, he desired him to go with Aglatidas, and conduct the Princesses, with whom was his dear Cleonice; giving orders unto Aglatidas for Araspe, that he should take his Troops unto Nisomolis. In the mean while Cyrus, whose constant custom was to conquer all opposers, resolved to enforce the Enemy, and to drive them from that quarter which they possessed, before all their Army came up; so that this being his full resolution, he intended to assault them in so many places at once, that they being forced to divide their Forces, he might more easily vanquish them: yet this could not be executed in the morning, because he thought it most expedient to fall on in the night, thereby to spare his Troops, and to avoid the arrows which they who guarded the Trenches might with more judgment aim if it were not in the dark. On the other side, the King of Pontus desiring to put nothing to the hazard, would not fight until the whole Army of Cressus was arrived; and desired that the Battel might be fought neerer Sardis, to the end that if Cressus was beaten, he might more readily retire into the Town to defend his Princess, so that he resolved to disencamp the night following; and in order to that, the day was no sooner Page 81 done, but causing many fires to be made as usually was wont, he marched away with all his Troops towards the plain of Sardis. Cyrus was much surprized when going to assault his Enemy, he found none there: he made ready a great body of Horse to follow them; and himself being in the head of them, he pursued a long while, yet the Enemy made such haste, that he could not overtake them: so that conceiving it not safe to engage himself too far, he returned back, and possessed himself of the same quarter which the Lidians quitted: Yet was he extremely sorry to understand by the sick and wounded Enemies which the Enemy left behind in their Camp, that the King of Pontus was gone to quarter on the other side of the River Halis, which runs along the Plain of Sardis, over against Pactolus, which bounds the other side: And judging by this that the Enemy intended to protract the War, he fell into such sad despair as is unconceivable: so that without imparting his design unto any but him he sent, he dispatched Artabases unto the King of Pontus, to tell him, that since it was not just the Princess Mandana should continue so long a Captive, he conjured him to obtain permission from Cressus, for a Duel between them two, and so to end all differences betwixt them concerning the Princess Mandana, offering that if he were Conqueror, to restore the Queen of Susiana and the Princess Araminta upon condition he would restore the Princess Mandana unto Cixares if the Fate of Arms went on his side; adding further, that if Cressus would prolong the War, he might the better satisfy his desire. In the mean time, since Cressus and Abradates did advance, as the King of Pontus retired, both met at the River Halis: so that when Artabases came to the Enemies Camp, he was carried immediately unto Cressus, in whose presence he must needs acquit himself of his Commission. At the first, the King of Pontus was much amazed; not but that this Prince was as valiant as any ever breathed; but when he remembered how he owed his life and liberty unto Cyrus, and that he unjustly retained the Princess Mandana from him, he was extremely ashamed; and all his love and valor could not move him to accept this Combat without extream repugnance: But he was not put unto the trouble of it, for Artabases had no sooner ended his speech, but Cressus told him, that he would not suffer the King of Pontus to fight with Cyrus for the Liberty of Mandana; and bid him tell his Master, that before this Princess was released, he should conquer him in ranged Battel, he should take Sardis, subvert his Throne, and ruine his Empire.

The King of Pontus, even ravished that he was not put to answer, and seeing with what resolution Cressus spoke unto this Proposition, beseeched him that he would permit him leave to see Cyrus; for Sir, said he unto him, though he be my Rival, yet I would preserve my self in his esteem and I should be extremely sorry if he should think it want of heart, that I will not fight with him; Also I should be very glad to ask him pardon for my ingratitude, and to tell him my self some part of my thoughts. At the first Cressus was unwilling to consent: but after Abradates told him that it could be no ways prejudicial, Artabases was sent back with one of the King of Lidia's Heralds to know whether Cyrus would consent unto this meeting. Since this Prince did expect Artabases with much impatience, because he hoped to obtain his demands, it may be easily conceived that his return did aggravate his sorrows, since the Liberty of Mandana was yet deferred: yet he did consent to see the King of Pontus, hoping still to persuade him either to restore Mandana, or to fight with him. The day of this Interview being appointed, it was resolved by both Parties that Cyrus should come in the head of a thousand Horse unto a place where ran a little deep River about three paces broad; and that the King of Pontus should meet him there with the like number; That these two Princes should solemnly engage themselves by Oath, not to assault each other, but to speak unto each other only. The thing being then resolved upon, the time and place appointed, and the hour come, each prepared to be at the place appointed: That which was most strange, was the great desire which every Commander of the Enemies Army had to know Cyrus; so that they were all importunate with Cressus for permission to wait upon the King of Pontus: so that in lieu of common Troopers, all his Company to prevent discontents were Colonels and Captains.

You easily imagine, that Cyrus when he saw this, suspected a surprize, and that faith would not be kept, for he had all his men (except some forty or fifty men of quality) out of common Troopers only: But with the King of Pontus it was otherwise, for Albradate; himself was one, having asked leave of Croessus to give Cyrus thanks for his generosity in treating the Queen his Wife so civilly: However, Cyrus wished, though Page 82 he knew no reason for his curiosity, that Telephanes who was so cried up, would be there also. These two bodies of Cavalry, appeared then at an equal distance from this River, and advanced foot-pace to the side of it, where they, when they were within eight paces of each side, they both made a halt. In the mean while, Cyrus and the King of Pontus, leaving their Troops both at a time, came as neer each other as the River would permit, and without alighting from their horses, they saluted each other with equal civility, yet their eyes did so sparkle the agitation of their hearts, that they both stood silent a while, and could not speak; and indeed Cyrus could not look upon the King of Pontus, but he must needs remember the care he formerly had of his preservation, when he sent to acquaint him with the conspiracy against him, and also how he had saved the life of his Princess; yet he could not chuse but remember at the same time, how he was the Ravisher of Mandana, and the ruiner of his felicity; nor could the King of Pontus look upon Cyrus without remembrance, how he owed both his life and liberty unto him, and how he had offered to reinvest him in his Throne; so that both of them infinitely esteeming each other, and so demeaned themselves, as the greatness of their souls did sufficiently appear. After all tumultuous cogitations of heart were allayed, and reason assumed Region in their minds: I am infinitely grieved (said the King of Pontus unto Cyrus) that Fortune has so much obliged me unto you, and that Love should make me so ungrateful: It is not for any ingratitude or obligations (replied Cyrus) that I accuse you, but only because you are extremely unjust, in detaining a Princess unto whom neither Nature, nor Fortune, nor Love, hath given you any right: As for that which relates unto my own particular, I was first obliged unto you, and all that which I have or would have done for you, ought to be considered only as effects of my acknowledgment: But that you should desire to obtain that by force, which ought to be acquired by submission, services and prayers, this is a thing most horrid; yet if the captivity of the Princess Mandana had any limits set unto it, then hopes of liberty in the end might sweeten her imprisonment: but to wish that she should not be released, until I have defeated a puissant Army commanded by three great Kings, and by the conquest of a great Empire, this is such a piece of high injustice, as I cannot believe you capable of; on the contrary, I think you ought rather to endeavour my defeat by your own peculiar valour, then by the blood of two hundred thousand men which are in the Army of Croessus; and therefore I hoped, that you would have accepted of that offer of combat which I sent unto you: How infinitely does it concern the King of Lydia, that we should terminate our differences our selves before a bloody War become the Arbitrator? Since if I have the good Fortune to vanquish you, I shall demand no more but the Princess Mandana, and if you vanquish me, the Queen of Susiana and the Princess Araminta shall be restored. Oh ye Gods (added Cyrus) I beseech you infuse reason into the soul of this Prince, and let him help me to release that Princess whom we adore. Would it were the pleasure of those Gods, whom you invoke, (replied the King of Pontus) that I were able to follow the Dictates of Reason; for if I could, I should then resist my passion, and overcome it: I should then set the Princess Mandana at liberty, and then I should make my Love submit unto my ambition, and accept of all those generous offers which you have made me, and by consequence hope by your valour to regain my Kingdoms: Then though I could not conquer my passion, yet I should at least endeavour to overcome my unwillingness to fight with my Deliverer, and by fighting with you, I might find an end of my misfortunes, either by a glorious Victory, or an honorable death. But to speak sincerely unto you, I cannot do it, since I am neither Master of my own person, nor of Mandana's: When I came first unto Croessus, after I had lost my Kingdoms, I brought him no Forces; all that I had, whereby to oblige him unto my protection, was to put the Princess Mandana into his power, so that since she is not mine, I have no right to demand her of him again: She is so precious an Hostage, that it may be said, that she almost keeps his Empire and person in security: Judg I beseech you after this what I am able to do, you have been my Deliverer, I confess, and such a one, as unto whom I owe all I have; nor can it be denied, but Croessus is my Protector also, and by the same reason, I am as much his debtor. Never consider, (said Cyrus) what your debt is unto the King of Lydia, or unto me, but consider what your debt is unto the Princess Mandana: Is it just, that since the Gods have destined her to wear the prime Crowns of all Asia, you should make her die in Prison? Can your Love consent unto that? And do you think, that to Love Mandana Page 83 truly, is to make her the most miserable Princess alive? Recollect your self generous Rival, hear what reason says unto you, and strive either to overcome your self, or me, I give you the choice of these two; if you make choice of the first, and will move Croessus unto a peace, to shew you that I desire it not to save my self the labour of a War, I do solemnly engage my word to establish you in the Throne of your Fathers, and to do as much for Croessus if he have any need of my assistance; but if you make choice of the other, then persuade him that it would be very much more advantageous unto him to vanquish or intrap me, then to hazard it in a Battle; for truly, I cannot endure Mandana should be thus a Captive, and I wonder how you can suffer it: I do not know (replied the King of Pontus) but there is such a discord in my own thoughts, that every day I do both love and hate you, and am my own greatest Enemy; yet there is not one minute in my life, in which I do not most desperately love the Princess Mandana; I cannot fix upon any reasonable resolution, but am always both unjust and miserable: No, no, (cried out Cyrus) it is not so; for since you see Mandana every day, either angry, or with tears in her eyes, your heart must needs melt, or dispair, whereas I never see her; therefore in all likelihood I am more unfortunate (and not you) then ever I imagined. However, I beseech you be so sincerely as to tell me, upon what terms you stand with Mandana? I beseech you do not deny me every thing; and since you will neither release your Mistress, nor fight with your Rival, however speak free and sincerely unto a Prince who would be your friend, if you would permit him: Alas Sir, (cried out the King of Pontus) your rigour is too sharp, in desiring me to tell you with my own mouth, that you are as much in the Princess Mandana's esteem as I am little; and content your self with this, that though I cannot part with her, yet have I no hopes of ever being loved: What then do you hope for (said Cyrus unto him?) To die, replied the King of Pontus, before you shall enjoy her. There is not a better way to hinder me from enjoying her, (replied Cyrus) then to fight with me: Sometimes I think upon nothing but that, replied the King of Pontus, when I look upon you as my Rival, and my Rival beloved; and sometimes when I look upon my obligations, I cannot think of any such thing: Forget them all for ever, replied Cyrus, since you will not render me the Princess whom I adore: However do thus much for me at the least, said he, that you will induce Croessus not to draw the War out at length, but that a deciding Battle may speedily be resolved upon, and let Victory fall where it please the Fates. This I will promise you (replied the King of Pontus) though I am angry with my self, that I can grant no more, unto one that is not only my Deliverer, but also a protector of the Princess Araminta: Do not make the respects which I pay unto that illustrious person any obligations unto you (replied Cyrus) since I pay them only in love of her and my self, and not of you.

After this, these two Princes talked together of many things, with sometimes generosity, and sometimes in anger, but Love did always appear in them both: When they were ready to part, Abradates advanced, and the King of Pontus naming him unto Cyrus, that Prince saluted him with much respect, as made appear how he treated Panthea. This first complement being over, and Abradates rendered him thanks for his so generous and civil treatments of the Queen his Wife, Cyrus began to speak, and looking upon the King of Pontus, Have you no pity upon the King of Susiana? (said he unto him) and will you not put me into such a condition as will make me restore him the only person which can make him happy? Oh I beseech you, let me enjoy so much happiness, as that I may break the Chains of these two great Princesses in pieces, by your breaking the Chains of the Princess Mandana. As much interested as I am, because I know too well what it is to be deprived of her I most love (replied Abradates) yet I cannot joyn my prayers unto yours Sir; and therefore without any insulting upon the miseries of a great Prince, I endure my own misfortunes, without any addition unto his; yet thinking my self most happy, in meeting with so generous an Enemy as you Sir are. As Abradates was speaking thus, and the name of Telephanes coming into the mind of Cyrus, he began to look amongst the Lydian Cavalry if he could spy the Buckler, which they said he used to wear; for though there was no design of any fighting that day, yet every one had their Arms. Cyrus then looking very circumspectly amongst them, whilst Abradates was speaking unto him, he saw a man of an excellent garb, and well mounted, in the first rank, who turning his head then to speak unto another which was in the second Rank; would not at first permit him to see his face, yet his Buckler Page 84 was plainly to be seen; so that he longing to have him look towards him, he hearkened unto Abradates, but still kept his eye upon Telephanes, and though he knew no cause for it, yet his soul swelled with extraordinary agitations, and much more when this pretended Telephanes turning his head that way, he saw him to be either the Prince Mazares, or his Ghost; for since he had often seen this Prince at Babylon before, he saw him in a dying posture neer Sinope; and since the Idea of a Rival is alwayes rivited in ones memory, he knew him at first sight; yet since he certainly believed him dead, this sight did so surprize him, that he could not chuse but interrupt Abradates. I beseech you (said he, and pointed towards him) how long hath that Cavalier been amongst you? and why doth he name himself Telephanes? The King of Pontus being very desirous to know more of a man who had done so many gallant feats since he came into Lydia, answered, that he came to Sardis a little before the Princess Mandana; but as for his name, he knew no more of it then what himself told us: No, no, said Cyrus, Telephanes (if my eyes be not much mistaken) is not his name, but it is Mazares, one of the Ravishers of my Princess, whom the Gods have raised from the dead to torment me the more. Mazares hearing himself named by Cyrus (for it was really he) came neerer the river, and looking with a more melancholy then furious aspect: Since you have discovered my right name, said he unto him, I will not any longer conceal it: I do confess, that I am Mazares, the most culpable and miserable man alive: But Sir, since I am not revived, but only to die a second death, do not repent that you left me alive: I left you alive (replied Cyrus in such a tone, as manifestly spoke the turbulency in his heart) because I could not then take it from you with honour: But now, since I see you in a condition able to answer him that shall call you to an account, I am resolved not to do it as I did before: We shall meet perhaps (replied Mazares coldly) before this War be ended, or else I would look for you all over the world (replied Cyrus;) and did I not know the rights of men to be inviolable, we would this very hour end all our differences. Abradates fearing that Mazares would reply something that might make Cyrus not a Master of his own resentment, broke off this discourse, telling them both, that it was not permitted them to speak unto each other at this time, since Cyrus obtained leave from Croessus, only for the King of Pontus himself and to part, yet did Mazares answer in such a manner, as made both his courage and prudence to appear. In the mean time, the King of Pontus, who loved him very well as Telephanes, yet now did not know how he should look upon him; yet considering, that if Mazares had not carried away Mandana, she had not now been in Lydia, then he had thoughts of him different from those of Cyrus: And on the other side considering, that but for him, Mandana had been now either in the King of Assyri's power, or in the power of Cyrus, he could not have any such resentments of hatred against him, as usually is against a Rival; yet was he so busied in himself, what to think of Mazares, and how to behave himself towards him, that he medled not with their discourse, which by the prudence of Abradates ended, every one retiring to his own party with different apprehensions. Cyrus yet was the last that retreated, so unwilling was he to part from two men, whom he had such a desire to be fighting with, even both at once, rather then not at all; he was very sorry, that he did not a little better inform himself, how it should possible be that Mazares should still live, and why he should take the King of Pontus his part, who was his Rival, and why he should conceal his name: However, return to the Camp he must, but he returned with such furious resentments of Spirit, that he was never seen so little Master of himself as at that time. When he came to the Camp, and had given all necessary orders, he had a longing impatience to be alone with Chrisantes, that he might with freedom descant upon this odd accident. Well my dear witness of all my misfortunes (said he unto him) what do you say unto what you have seen? (for Chrisantes was with him at this interview) I say Sir, (replied he) that since Fortune has been so forward in forging so many prodigies to torment you, she will at last work as many miracles to ease you: For my part, (replied Cyrus) I am not of your opinion, but on the contrary, methinks I have cause to fear, since this accident, that Astiages as well as Mazares may revive to torment me; and that so many millions of men as have lost their lives in the Armies of my Enemies in so many Battels as I have won, will also revive to recruit the Army of Croessus unto an incredible multitude, and that all those whom I have so often vanquished, will at last become my Conquerours: For truly, why should I not think all these as possible as this I see? Did I not see Mazares dying in the Fishers Cabin? Or to say better, Did I not with these eyes see him dead? Page 85 Did not these ears hear him pronounce with a feeble and weak tone those sad words concerning my Princess, when he gave me her Scarf, which remained in his hands after the shipwreck with her? Then did he lose his tongue, and could not speak one word more, when I left him, and they assured me most confidently the next morning that he was <...> d; yet for all this, Mazares I see is living; Mazares is in the same place where Mandana is, and fights for one of his Rivals: Was ever such a prodigious passage known? Did the King of Assyria whom he betrayed know he is in Sardis, perhaps he would find out ways to know how all this came about, and hereafter acquaint me; but alas, certainly the Gods are resolved to overwhelm me with all manner of misfortunes; and have I not good reason to think so? The Oracle assures the King of Assyria, that he may hope for the enjoyment of Mandana: The Oracle does affirmatively promise Cressus the Ruine of that Empire, which in all likelihood I should hereafter possess; and the Sibils answer pronounce my death; yet did they conceal one part of my misfortunes, since they tell me that Mazares was alive.

But Sir (said Chrisantes unto him) it is not Mazares who now keeps Mandana Prisoner, nor is it the King of Pontus, but it is Cressus. 'Tis true Chrisantes (replied Cyrus) but they were my Rivals who put her into his Power: The King of Assyria began my misfortunes in carrying her away from Themissira: Mazares increased them in carrying her away from Sinope, and first from Babylon, both which I was ready to take and become Master of: But the King of Pontus exceeded them both, in saving her from shipwreck onlly to cast her into a Sea of miseries: 'Tis very true, that without laying the fault upon others, I ought to accuse my self the first: for indeed if Artamenes had known Philidaspes when he met him in the Wood and saved his life, Mandana had been at liberty, the King of Pontus had been upon his Throne, Mazares had been innocent, and I had been the most happy man upon Earth. However, since things past cannot be revoked, I must think upon the present and future; and endeavor my own satisfaction so far as to sacrifice some of my Rivals unto my Fury and Revenge, before all these menaced miseries do fall upon me: Yet this Prince could not execute his design so soon, because his Enemies were on the other side of the River, and he could not easily come at them: Also, having caused some Chariots of War to be made which were not finished, he was forced to stay a while before he could attempt any thing considerable: yet there happened every day such Encounters between Parties, as did sharpen the violent desires of both sides to vanquish: For since Cressus kept one Pass over the River Halis, and Cyrus another, both sides were continually sending out Parties.

In the mean while Aglatidas and Ligdamis did punctually observe the Orders of Cyrus, and waited upon the Queen of Susiana and the Princess Araminta unto the Town which that Prince desired they should stay in, until the Battel was fought, which as he hoped would be very shortly: They were no sooner there, but Panthea sent Ligdamis to entreat Cyrus that she might have so much liberty as to come and speak with him, about a business which did much concern him: Cyrus then asked Ligdamis if he knew what it was? and he answered, No, but said, he found Panthea so sad and altered, that he was perswaded she grieved exceedingly: Cyrus, who had a natural disposition to compassionate all in any misery, without any longer delay, or putting her into the trouble of coming to him, he went unto the place where she was, which was not above thirty furlongs from his Quarter. When he was come into the Castle where she lodged, he asked Araspes very privately whom he perceived very melancholy, how the Queen of Susiana did since he saw her, and whether he knew of any new misfortune or distate which had befallen her of late? Araspes blushed at the question, and answered Cyrus in such a manner as made him think that he had promised fidelity unto Panthea, and would not confess all he knew: so that commending his discretion in lieu of hiding him, he went into the Queen of Susiana's Chamber. Araspes would have entered also as he used to do when Cyrus came, but he forbade him: When he was entered, he saw Panthea, and none but Cleonice with her; but saw her so sad, that he was surprized: Sir, said she unto him, I ask your pardon, for putting you to so much trouble. 'Tis my part rather to beg a pardon Madam (replied he) for making you so melancholy, though I do not know the cause of it: And truly Madam, I think my self responsible for all the miseries which chance unto you, as long as I continue so unfortunate, as not to release you. Sir, answered she, I should be very unjust if I should charge you with the faults of another; and I have so much respect unto you, as not to aggravate the crime of one whom you honour with your affection: Therefore Page 86 without telling you against whom I complain, I shall only entreat you—No, no Madam (said Cyrus, and hastily interrupted her) you must not conceal either the Crime nor the Criminal, whosoever he be; and I do protest unto you, that if there be any who hath offered you the least cause of complaint, I will punish him so severely, as you shall see I am as sensible of any injuries offered unto those I honour, as if they were done unto my self. I ever did beleve Sir, replied Panthea that your generosity would prompt to as much; and therefore, though it be not the custom for Captives to chuse their Keepers, yet I most humbly beseech you to forbid Araspes from seeing me again, and to put some other whom you shall please in his place. You shall be most exactly obeyed Madam, replied Cyrus; but if Araspes hath been so bold as to offer you any displeasure, he deserves not only to be banished out of your presence, but out of the society of men as a most barbarous and wicked man; therefore I beseech you, to tell me a little more precisely what the crime is which he hath committed. It is enough I tell you Sir (said she and blushed) that Araspes is fitter to be in the head of an Army then to guard one of my quality and virtue: After this Sir, ask me no more for this is as much as my modesty will permit me to tell you: It is enough Madam (replied Cyrus,) and without putting you to the trouble of relating what his crime is (which cannot be little since committed against you) I shall make himself confess it, and proportion his punishment accordingly: In the mean time Madam, to testify that it is not my intention to expose you unto any dislike of those which are about you, be pleased to chuse whom you will to serve you, but not to guard you; for I desire no other security from you then your Princely word, and I give you absolute authority to displace any which you dislike to have about you. Ah Sir, said she, your generosity extends it self very far. No, no, Madam, replied he, I will do any thing to serve you, and therefore I beseech you accept of my humble offer; and since my impatience to punish him that hath offended you doth earnestly invite me, I beseech you give me leave to depart sooner then I intended. Panthea ravished at the magnanimity of Cyrus, rendred him a thousand thanks for his goodness to her, and asked him pardon for causing any new displeasure in him: But Sir, said she, since it is one of those Crimes which Virtue will not permit me to relate, I hope you will excuse me. Cyrus answered unto this with unequalled generosity, and then retired: but meeting with Doralisa and Pherenice in the outer Chamber, he stayed a while with them, to know more exactly what was the Crime of Araspes, knowing that she was pleased to impart her secrets unto them; and taking them aside, I beseech you tell me (said he to them) what Araspes hath done, which hath given the Queen some cause of complaint after so many commendations of him? for I would gladly know wherein he hath failed before I punish him. Sir, answered Doralisa and smiled, you may remember how I told you one day that Araspes was not so insensible as you thought him; and that Perinthus seemed once as obdurate as he. I remember it very well, replied Cyrus, but is it possible that Araspes should presume to look so high as the Princess Panthea, and so insolent as to express any signs of his passion. It is most certain, replied Pherenice, that he hath been so bold as to love her, and so unfortunate as to let her perceive it. This Sir, is the Crime of Araspes, which questionless is great enough to move you unto so much satisfaction, as to remove him from the Queen: Yet it is certain that of late he hath lost his Reason, but it was apparent he did not shew his passion with any design that she should know it: A Virtue less scrupulous then hers might have dissembled it, but the Queen was so incensed against him, that she cannot endure his presence. She shall never be troubled with it, replied Cyrus, and I shall so fully satisfy her, that she shall have as much cause to commend me, as to complain against Araspes. After this, Cyrus went out, and made a short visit of the Princess Araminta, whilst Araspes was sought for, but could not be found in any place of the Castle: for when he heard that Panthea had sent unto Cyrus, he thought she would complain against him, knowing better the crime he had committed then either Doralisa or Pherenice, because Panthea out of her modesty and greatness of Soul, did partly hide it from them. Araspes then was in a terrible perplexity; but considering with himself that he could not long avoid the sight of Cyrus, he resolved to go and confess his fault, and submit himself unto his goodness: Then did he present himself before him, but with such a bashful countenance, that he was scarce knowable: Cyrus was then in a Gallery at the end of Araminta's Chamber, from whence he came: As soon as he saw Araspes, he made a sign as if he would be in private with him, so that every one did withdraw, and left him the liberty to speak his mind.

Page 87 Since Cyrus loved Araspes, and was well inclined to excuse all errors of Love, and since both Doralisa and Pherenice did not much aggravate his fault, he did not at first break into any anger; so that Araspes not doubting but Cyrus did exactly know his crime, grew something more confident, and resolved to confess ingenuously all that he should ask him: Is it not enough Araspes, said he unto him, that I should be persecuted by my Enemies, but my friends must also lay their loads upon me? And must you whom I ever loved, contribute your Faggot to the fire of my anger? Might you not well apprehend by those respects which I rendred unto the Queen of Susiana, what your duty was, which I would have you render her? I took you for a wise and stayed man, and yet you were so considerate, as to express signs of Love unto so great a Queen, who is more illustrious by her virtues, then her high quality: 'Tis true Sir, replied Araspes, I must confess my self culpable, if it be a crime to do that which is not possible for me but to do: However (said Cyrus unto him) tell me ingenuously how it is, and why you did not accord her presence as soon as you perceived your self first in Love with her? You may remember, that once when I observed you very sad, and thinking that employment was some unto you, I offered you another: Why then did you not accept of it, if you perceived in your self any inclination to such an unsuitable and unreasonable passion? 'Tis true Sir, replied he, I ought to have done so; but it is as true also, that this imperious passion would never permit me so much power over my self, as to be far from Panthea; and my hopes were, that I should only love her, and she never perceive it: Why would you carry it so? replied Cyrus, for as long as she had been ignorant of it, I should never have known it; or if I had perceived it, I should have pittied in lieu of accusing you: Ah Sir, (cried Araspes) it was chance that made my crime, for truly I did repent of my intention to discover my passion, and the Letter which she saw was much against my will.

Cyrus then conjecturing that there was something which the Queen of Susiana had not told him, and which Doralisa and Pherenice did not know, or else seemed ignorant, he urged him to relate all the passage betwixt her and him: Then he told him, that he loved her ever since he first saw her; that he resisted his passion as much as he could, and not being able to overcome it, he concealed it with great diligence; but of late, he could not possibly chuse, but much against his will discovered it, by a hundred unthought of passages which escaped him; that he had an intention either to speak or to write something unto Panthea, but of the two, he rather fixed upon writing. How Araspes? (said Cyrus) Did you write a Letter of Love unto Panthea? Yes Sir, (replied he) but afterwards I repented, and intended she should never see it, yet notwithstanding I kept it, not knowing any reason why, and carried it in my pocket, reading it very often, and found some comfort in reading that unto my self, which I durst not speak unto Panthea. A while after, this fair Queen having a great desire to have a sight of the Oracle which Croessus received from Delphos, and which she knew I had, she sent a servant one evening when she was retired unto me for it, I being all zeal to obey her, unhappily mistook papers, and sent that Letter, which I repented of, and resolved she should never see: He unto whom I gave this Letter, was no sooner gone, but I found my error; it vexed me to the soul, I sent my servants to call him back, but presently a rapture of Love seduced my reason, and I recalled them; then commanding and countermmanding them four or five times, my last order was to call him back in good earnest, but it was too late, for he was entred into the Queens Chamber. It is impossible for me to relate unto you Sir how I passed away that night, but I assure you it was with the most restless agitations of mind that ever any had. Has she the Letter yet? replied Cyrus: Although she have, replied Araspes, I can easily relate it, for I think I have read it a thousand times, and it was in these terms.

This is not to beg a pardon for my presumption in loving you, nor is it to ask you any recompence, that I let you understand how Love has made me more your captive, then the war hath made you; but it is, because I think it just you should not be ignorant, that in your captivity you have an absolute Sovereignty over my heart: If I do not ask a pardon for my rashness, it is either because I am sincere, then because I am presumptuous, since certainly I cannot repent of loving you: and if I do not ask any recompence, it is because I know very Page 88 well, that I rather deserve punishment: Thus Madam, pretending unto nothing but to die in your Fetters, be so good I beseech you, as not to ruine me, in making them so intollerable, that I cannot wear them. This Madam I have had a longing desire to tell you, and maugre the violence of my passion, I should think my sufficiently favoured, if you could without hatred only believe, that I love you more then ever any did.

ARASPES.

This Letter (replied Cyrus after he had repeated it) had been reasonable, if it had been addressed unto Doralisa or Pherenice: But to speak thus unto a Queen, and a Queen in misery, is a boldness so unexcuseable, that I cannot express how infinitely you have disobliged me: I was most cruelly punished for it the next morning, replied Araspes; for when I came unto her Chamber, according to my usual custome to wait upon her un|to the Temple, she told me I should not go that day: But the most cruel torment of all to me, was, when she sent for me in the evening, and causing me to come into her Clo|set: Araspes (said she unto me, with such a Majesty as made my heart tremble) Since it concerns my honour not to publish how you have failed in that respect which you ought to have unto me, I will not let my resentments against you appear, until I meet the illustrious Cyrus in such a place where I may entreat him to remove you further from me. In the mean time, since I cannot endure the sight of you after your extream boldness, I pray come no more into my Chamber, unless you have a mind to exasperate my resolutions of hatred. Then I had a mind to protest unto her, that I was infinitely sorry for what I had done, that I repented of ever writing the Letter, and that it came into her hands contrary to my intention, but she would not hear me, and expressed so much anger in her aspect, and such an odious aversion to me, that I retired with an unconceivable sorrow in my soul; Since this Sir, I never had my reason clear, and this Sir is my crime, do unto me as you please; and yet methinks, a Prince who is so well acquainted with the power of Love, should be something indulgent towards a man, whose crime is only being in Love; and so I am very much (replied Cyrus) for I pity you infinitely, and I would do any thing to revoke what's past if it were possible, and that you had not offended Panthea: But for all that Araspes, satisfaction must be given, it concerns my honour as well as hers, therefore, though I esteem you never so much, I must banish you, not only from her, but my self also. Alas Sir, replied Araspes, Is not the separation from her I adore punishment enough, but I must be deprived of the honour to die for you in the head of your Army? Consider Sir, that Panthea will be better revenged in my death, then in my Exile: So shall not I, replied Cyrus, for I rather wish your Exile, then your death. But Araspes, resist me no more, retire your self, and say nothing, but go either into Medea or Capadocia, or any other place you like best, until the Queen of Susiana be out of my hands: Araspes would have replied, but Cyrus seemed angry at his refusal, and spoke in such a tone, as intimated he would be obeyed; and so Araspes departed the same hour, though Cyrus was very loath to want a man whom he loved so well: He sent then unto Panthea, to tell her that he had banished Araspes; and that if she approved of it, Artabases should wait upon her in his room. Panthea was ravished at the generosity of Cyrus, and sent him thanks; and not content with that, she dispatched one of her servants. (which came from Susa with her, and whom she esteemed very much) unto her dear Abradates, giving him a Letter to deliver unto him, which intimated her great obligations unto Cyrus: As for Araspes, before his departure, he writ a Letter unto Cyrus, and sent it by a Souldier, but this Prince did not then, shew it, and it was a long while after before any knew he had writ unto him: The disgrace of Araspes made a great noyse in the Army, the cause also was quickly known, and there was none which did not commend Cyrus, and pity Araspes. In the mean time, this illustrious Conquerour, being perswaded that those who seek their Enemies, have the advantage of them who wait for them, though inferiour in number, he quitted the Quarter where he was, and took up another so neer the Army of Croessus, that if the River Hal|lis had not separated them, doubtless he had forced that Prince to a Battel. There was not a day passed, but Cyrus knew by his Spies what his Enemies did; but that which perplexed him worst was, that he did not perfectly understand what they intended to do: He knew, that by reason of the great number of Aegyptians which were in his Army, they must change the order which they were used to observe in drawing their Troops into Batt|lia: Page 89 so that he had an extream desire to know precisely what form they would use, but he conceived it a thing impossible: yet he sent out every day fresh Spies, and took new Prisoners; he understood by them, that Croessus found himself not well, and returned to Sardis, which was not far off, and that the King of Pontus went every day thither: Since Cyrus thought it a more glorious sight to see Mandana then himself victorions, he resolved rather to lose many men in forcing a passage over the River Halis, then to linger away any longer time: Yet notwithstanding, the King of Phrigia, the King of Hircania, Gobrias, Gadates, the Prince Tigranes, and Phraartes, perswading him that it was better to wait a few days for a Victory, then to hazard it, he resolved upon a course of patience: yet he was every day on horseback; sometimes to stop victuals from going to the Enemies; sometimes to face them; sometimes to skirmish in Parties: But what ere he did, or where ere he was, Mandana or his Rivals were always in his thoughts, especially Mazares, whose Adventure seemed most prodigiously strange unto him.

Some days being thus spent, he had intelligence that Croessus was well again, and was resolved to give Battel: Cyrus then burning with impatient fury to shorten this War, and to be at handy blows with his Enemies, resolved to send a Herald unto Croessus to tell him. That if he would, he would retreat from the River as far as was necessary to give him room and time enough to pass over his Army, and to draw them up into Battalia, upon this condition, he would resolve not to decline fighting, as hitherto he had done. This Project was no sooner resolved upon, but Cyrus did put it in execution: and Cressus no sooner heard this Proposition, but he accepted of it; and sent back the Herald which Cyrus sent, with a promise that within four days he would look the Prince his Master in the face, and exchange some blows with him according to his desire: After this, Cyrus assumed fresh vigour, and hoped for Victory, in spite of all the angry Oracles: This hope also was infused into the hearts of all his Souldiers; who at this time did resemble the Sayers which followed a famous Pilot, who never were astonished at the fury of any surging Waves, but when they saw him astonished: So likewise the Troops of Cyrus did never consult with any thing but the face of their General to prognosticate the Victory: so that they always finding there a serene tranquility amidst the greatest dangers; they fought like Souldiers who thought their General could commit no fault, or ever be van|quished: but whilst this Prince prepared himself for fight, many things fell out which did for a while keep back that glory which he expected, and which did extremely puzzle Croe|ssus. When this Prince returned answer by the Herald which Cyrus sent unto him, he was at Sardis; and the King of Pontus and Abradates were at the Camp: so that these two Princes hearing of this Answer, thought strange, that Croessus should so peremptorily de|termine upon the day of Battel without ever acquainting them: Since it was they principally who were responsible for the good or bad success of this great Enterprize. The Prince Mysriles being by reason of his imperfection incapable of any service but his person; and the Prince Mazares thought it was known who he was, yet he had no authority to do any thing but shew his valor. These two Princes then being much incensed, did highly complain against Croessus, especially Abradates, who at the same time received a Letter from Panthea, which did so highly extoll Cyrus, that it did dispose him more to complain against the King of Lidia: Also considering with himself, that it would be a greater difficulty to get Panthea out of the power of Croessus, after the Battel, what e're the success be, then before, he resolved to entreat Cyrus, that the Prince Artamas might be exchanged for Panthea: But for the more expediency of his Design, he did communicate his desires unto Andramites, whom he knew to be in love with Doralisa, who was with the Queen of Susiana: So that Andramites interesting himself in the De|sign, did promise Abradates to be present and urgent with Croessus when he should motion it unto him: As for the King of Pontus, he never opposed his Project: for since Abradates did not demand the Princess Mandana in exchange for Panthea, but only Prince Artamas, he durst not be seen, he approved of it: Abradates then went unto Croessus in the morning; and after he had acquainted him with his discontent, that he should fix upon the day of Battel without acquainting him, he desired him, that he would suffer the Prince Artamas to be exchanged for the Queen his Wife before the Battel was fought. If we get the Victory (replied Croessus) we shall release her more gloriously, then by any negotiation of exchange. You may get the Victory, replied he, and yet I not get Panthea, since certainly the weaker a Party is, the more carefully they keep their Prisoners: The Page 90 truth is Sir, added he, since I do not fight to conquer Provinces, but chiefly to release Panthea, and next to oppose the over-swelling Power of Cyrus, I know not why I should hazard the loss of that Lady for ever, who is so infinitely dear unto me, for want of a reasonable Proposition, therefore I beseech you take it not ill if I be very urgent with you to make this Proposition unto Cyrus. Negotiations of this nature, replied Cressus, are not to be made in so short a time as we have remaining before the Battel. I have such hopes in the generosity of Cyrus, answered Abradates, that I believe he will not deny a Truce for some daies, if you will be pleased to ask it. I am not used unto any such compliance with my enemies (answered Croessus very sharply) and therefore I know not how to make any such motions, neither do I conceive your desires of an exchange just upon the very point of giving a Battel, to be very just, or much to any purpose, for you will bring a Princess into Sardis, and send one of the most valiant men upon earth into the Enemies Camp to fight against us: No, no, Abradates; I cannot consent unto this: He who can fear one single man (answered the King of Susiana) and is in the head of 200000. men, can never trust the valour of his Souldiers: However it be (said Croessus very fiercely) since Artamas is a Delinquent against the State, as well as a prisoner of War, he shall not be exchanged for the Queen your Wife: Then you shall fight without me Sir (replied Abradates:) Sir (said Andramites, and addressed himself unto Croessus) I beseech you do not deny this request which is made unto you: I will al|wayes deny any thing that is unjust, answered Croessus, and therefore press me no more. Andramites used many other perswasive arguments, but all were to no purpose: Then Abradates went from Croessus exceedingly unsatisfied, and fully resolved not to fight, unless this Proposition was first made unto Cyrus: Andramites after Abradates was gone, did speak many things unto the King of Lydia which did much offend him. The King of Pontus fearing that this disorder would make a mutiny amongst the Souldiers, did do all he could to perswade Croessus to consent unto the King of Susiana's desires, and also used his best perswasions unto Abradates, that he would not impead the main business, though Croessus should not satisfie him, but all his arguments & perswasions would not work upon either of them. At the same time, the Father of Panthea came from Clasomena unto Sardis, where he had been levying some Forces; so that finding things in this State, he joynd with Abradates and Andramites, and was more importunate with Croessus then they; and since he had a great considerable Province under his power, his solicitations did more perplex Croessus then any of the rest, out of his fears that his refusal might cause a Civil War in his own Dominions, at a time when he had his hands full of a very considerable Enemy upon him. The Prince Mysriles also, none knowing his true reason for it, did Patronize Abradates as much as he was able, expressing his earnest wishes that the Queen of Susiana were released by Treaty; and he made it known unto all his creatures, that they could not any way more sensibly oblige him, then by their endeavours of perswading the King his Father unto it.

Things then were in such a confusion, both at Sardis and in the Camp, that when Croessus would have given Battel at the day appointed, it was not in his power. However he would not consent to release the Prince Artamas; but seeing himself extremely importun'd, he purposed the exchange of the King of Assyria for the Queen of Susiana: But Abradates replied, that he would never consent unto that Proposition, because it would more incense Cyrus, then induce him to the satisfaction of his desires, to have any Pro|positions of releasing his Rival and his Enemy made unto him. Moreover, the King of Pontus did much rather desire the Prince Artamas should be set at liberty, then the King of Assyria.

Thus this contest growing so high, and fearing a revolt in an Army which was composed of so many several Nations, Croessus resolved to ask a Truce for some daies, in order to a Treaty for the liberty of some Prisoners, not yet telling who they were, because he was not yet resolved upon them. Then he dispatched a messenger unto Cyrus, importing as much, who was much surprized at the demand, and certainly had denied it, if upon serious deliberation he had not found, that he could not force his Enemy to fight, but with the loss of many men. Cyrus therefore consented unto a Truce for eight daies, upon condition, that such of his men as would go into Sardis, might go with as much security, as his Enemies might come into his Camp, and desired that this condition might be specified, for all the advantage which he hoped for by this Truce, was to hear how Mandana, his Rivals, and his friends did fare: And also knowing of the division Page 91 which was amongst these Princes, he hoped to make the gap wider.

So that this Truce being resolved upon, it was published the next morning, both in Sardis, and in the Camp: So that after this, there was a pleasant mixture of friends and enemies in both Camps and Town, and so that one could not make any difference of sides: All the streets of Sardis, as well as the Camp of Croessus, was full of Persians, Medes, Arminians, Assyrians, and Hircanians; and the Camp of Cyrus was as full of Lydians, Myssians, Grecians, Thracians, and Aegyptians. In the mean time, Cyrus sent Or|talgues into Sardis, to see if he could find out any possible means for him to have a sight of his dear Mandana. Ligdamis disguised himself to that intent also, having no desire to shew himself publicly in that Town, because he was very well known, but he was informed by them both, that it was a thing impossible, and that since the Truce, the Princess Mandana did not walk upon the top of the Tower as she was wont; so that if he were at Sardis; he could see nothing but the Walls which shut her up: Yet had this Prince much ado to forbear, and I believe indeed he had gone, if some of his friends, who observed him not Master of his reason, had not dissuaded him, not that they feared Croessus would violate the Publique Faith, but their fear was, lest if he should have met with Mazares or the King of Pontus, there might have been some jars between them, which might have caused a general disorder. In the mean time, Abradates sent unto Cyrus, to desire that he might see his Panthea, in the presence of whom he pleased, lest it should be suspected he spoke unto her concerning some affairs of War, or to know from her the affairs of the Camp, Cyrus, who experimentally knew, how sweet it was to see her one loved, and hoped that perhaps Abradates would retaliate the favour in letting him see Mandana, did very willingly consent unto his desire: So that giving all requisite orders for this meeting, which was to be the same day, Abradates was conducted unto Cyrus, who received him with extraordinary civility; after which, he himself conducted him unto the Town where Panthea was, and into her Chamber, where she alone, only with Doralisa and Pherenice: as soon as they entered, Madam (said Cyrus unto her) I hope you will pardon me for all the hardships which you have endured, during the absence of Abradates, since now I bring him unto you: But lest during your discourse, the sight of a Prince who was forced to keep you a Captive should molest you, I will leave you in freedom to discourse of all your misfortunes.

Panthea was so over-joyed at the sight of her dear Abradates, that she did not half understand what Cyrus said; yet after she had saluted her illustrious Husband with as much reverence as affection, she entreated Cyrus to be a witness of their conference, yet notwithstanding he left them together, and went to visit the Princess Araminta, telling her how he left the King of Susiana with Panthea. As soon as ever this Princess heard this, she had an extreme desire to be acquainted with him, yet would she not by any means interrupt so sweet a conference so soon; so that she kept Cyrus company, who to please her said, that she would one day be as much joyed to see Spitridates, as Panthea was to see the King of Susiana. Whilst they were thus entertaining each other, Panthea to publish the high generosity of Cyrus (after Abradates and she had expressed their affectionate souls to each other) called Cleonice, Doralisa, and Pherenice to witness her aggravations and obligations unto Cyrus, and grieved that it was the King her Husbands ill fortune to be engaged in so unjust a quarrel as that of Croessus, who was so ungrateful, as to deny him a Prisoner for her exchange. In conclusion, she expressed her self in such eloquent terms, as she moved Abradates earnestly to desire, that Croessus would disoblige him, and give him a just occasion of changing sides. Then did she again aggravate her obligations unto Cyrus in punishing Araspes. At the name of Araspes Abradates started, and told her, that he who she named was with Croessus, and well entertained, and that he much complained against Cyrus: If it be so, said Panthea, I have taken a valiant man from Cyrus, and given him unto Croessus: But however, I do conjure you, if you have an opportunity for it, to persuade the Prince my Father to incline Croessus unto a Peace, at least, that he would not engage himself in this War with him. Abradates loved Panthea so extreme dearly, that he could deny her nothing, and told her, that if he could not procure the Prince Artamas to be exchanged for her, he would then quit Croessus, and whatsoever became of it, he would engage his word to be presently with her: As they were thus discoursing, Cyrus brought the Princess Araminta unto Panthea, that she might see Abradates, who returned her such civil thanks for the honour she did him, as she perceived he was a man of no less Generosity than Courage. The Page 92 Conference of these four illustrious Persons did much augment the esteem each one had of another, principal between Cyrus and Abradates; for though they were never together before this day, yet there was no superstitious Ceremonies or Complements of Vanity passed between them, but they spoke sincerely to each other, and with a civility so full of freedom, as it was apparent Fame had before made them acquainted.

But whilst the Princess Araminta was congratulating the Joys of Panthea, Cyrus asked Abradates, whether he could obtain so much favour for him from Cressus, as that he might see Mandana during this Truce? I should not despair of doing you that service, if the King of Pontus and perhaps Mazares would not oppose it: However, I will pass you my word, that I will use all my arguments to persuade them that you may see her. If they be afraid that I shall speak any thing which may be prejudicial to them, said Cyrus, I will promise to stand silent all the while I look upon her: However, I beseech you, believe this of me, that if Mandana were not the cause of the War, you should not return alone to Sardis, for then I would freely give Liberty unto the Queen of Susiana: But since it is to do Mandana service that I came into Lidia, I hope you will not take it ill, if I take all advantages to do her service, and by consequence keep one that is so considerable as Panthea is: yet I do protest unto you, it is not without much sorrow that I should be any cause of your discontent. I shall not call to memory how you gave a Retreat unto the Ravisher of Mandana, and engaged your self in the side of Cressus: for as it is not fitting I should blame so gallant an Enemy for it, so it is rather fit I should think it the Will of the Gods that I should obtain the Victory at a dear rate: for certainly, if you were but engaged on our side, that of Cressus would not long hold out: But however, though it be the will of Fate to dispose otherwise of you, yet I conjure you not to deny this favour which I ask of you, since it does not at all contradict your duty unto Cressus; I will promise it as far as in my power, and I am very sorry that I cannot assure you of good success in my endeavors. After this, these Princess and Princesses were above an hour in discourse of their past and present misfortunes; and afterwards they parted: Cyrus waiting upon Abradates as far as the further quarter of his Camp, did shew him part of his Troop drawn up into Battalia: And it being a very gallant sight, Abradates told him, it was no wonder to see such good Souldiers under such a Commander: for truly (said he unto him) methinks your presence has infused such heroic sparks into me, that I make no question but I shall return more valiant unto Sardis, then when I first came to you. The case is not so with me, replied Cyrus, for as valiant as you are, you have infused an unwillingness in me to fight against you ever since I knew you. Abradates answered his obliging language with as much civility and spirit: And afterwards both these mighty Princes parted extremely well satisfied with each other. Abradates in pursuance of his promise beseeched the King of Lidia to let Cyrus see Mandana, as Cyrus had given him the liberty to see Panthea: Cressus at the first did make no difficulty of it, yet added such a condition unto it, as did render it impossible; for he consented unto the interview, provided the King of Pontus would approve of it: Abradates then went unto the King of Pontus to beg the favour; And what inconvenience (said he unto him) can it be unto you? You know he is in Mandana's favour as much already as he can desire to be, and therefore though this Princess should give him any obliging language, that makes him no more happy then he was before: But it may prove an advantage unto you; for if she tell him, how obsequious and respectful you are unto her, it may chance take off the edge of his Animosity, and make him fight with less fury. If I did not think you speak this (replied the King of Pontus) purposely to do that Prince a courtesy who may do her you love another, I should say you are the most unjust man in the world to desire any such thing from me: for I pray know (since I must discover the bottom of my heart unto you) that I am arrived at that pass, as I will never endeavor again to enjoy Mandana: I have sighed and wept a thousand times at her feet, but all in vain: she hath thus far confessed unto me, that she believes I love her, and that if I were not her Lover she would not deny me her esteem: But for all that, she hath so resolutely and constantly told me, that she will never love me, and hath without telling me, let me perfectly understand, how she will love Cyrus for ever, that I am fully persuaded Mandana is for ever inexorable to me, and for ever faithful unto my Rival: therefore I will strive no more to win her heart or to enjoy her; but I will, if it be possible, look upon her eternally, and keep her out of sight of all my Rivals; and will see them all perish in a long War, or else perish myself, before I will part from Mandana, the Princess of my Soul. I know very well, that I am Page 93 unjust in it, and that the act is contrary to reason and generosity, and that I deserve the blame of all the World: But on the other side, I know that it is not in my power to overcome my self: I must submit unto the sovereignty of Love and my evil destiny, and never think any more of any resistance: therefore I do conjure you, not to put me unto such a cruel necessity as to deny any thing unto that Prince who protects me in his Court: and consider, that I enjoy no other pleasure in my life, but only in that my Rivals are not blessed with the sight of my Princess: As for the King of Assyria and the Prince Mazares, since they cannot see but incense her, I do not much value them: But as for Cyrus, whose eyes do always attract affection and tenderness from her heart, I cannot endure he should have the least glimpse of her.

Abradates hearing these expressions from the King of Pontus, did think he should never obtain his desires: yet his obligations unto Cyrus moved him to be further importunate; I perceive (said he unto the King of Pontus) that there is some difficulty in obtaining my demands: But if you seriously consider, that I had not lost the only Object of my affections but for the love of you; and that Panthea had not been now a Captive but only because I received you into my Court; and that if you refuse me this request, Cyrus will revenge upon her the severity you use unto him, I conceive you may well think I have just cause to importune you unto a grant of my desires. Cyrus is so generous (replied the King of Pontus) that you never need fear any rigor upon Panthea. Why then do not you strive to be more generous then he (if it be possible) replied Abradates? It is sufficient that I endeavor to surpass him in Love (replied the King of Pontus) and not in Generosity, since I see it an absolute impossibility to strive against the stream of my Passion; I know very well, that since I am the cause of Panthea's Captivity, I ought to satisfy you in your request: But oh Heavens, how far am I from any capacity of doing what I ought? and therefore I beseech you pity me, and do not tax me with ingratitude if I deny you any thing, since it is not I, but the vigor of my insulting Passion. Abradates, seeing he could not persuade the King of Pontus, did leave him with a very cold Complement, and took it very ill, that since himself had lost Panthea only for the love of him, he should deny him such a favour as would not take Mandana out of his Power. He writ then unto Cyrus, and excused himself, that he could not obtain his desires: but before he sent his Letter, he put Cressus in mind of his word, and beseeched him to propound unto Cyrus, an exchange of Prince Artamas for the Queen of Susiana. Cressus answered him, that he would send Andramites to negotiate the matter, yet he said he would not release that Prince, but upon condition he should promise never to think any more upon the Princess his daughter: This Qualification seemed so strange unto Abradates, that he concluded Cressus would never have made that Proposition but purposely to break off the exchange: for what probability was there that Prince Artamas to recover his Liberty should engage himself to quit his affection unto a Princess whom he had long loved, and whom he was resolved to love as long as he lived, and from whom he had received some expressions of Love? Therefore beginning to speak very fiercely in the presence of the Prince Myrsiles and Andramites, who were both interested in the business; Sir (said he unto him) when you promised me to propound this exchange, it was to be according to the common Laws of War, and not according to politique shifts, to render the Proposition ineffectual: When you were to release the Prince Artamas, it should be as he was your Enemy, and not as a Lover of the Princess Palmis: Love had no share in this Negotiation, and I will never consent any such Proposition shall be made unto Cyrus. What doth it concern you who is released, or how released, so Panthea's Liberty be procured? (replied Cressus.) Doubtless it does not concern me, replied Abradates; but that which I most insist upon, is, that no such Proposition shall be made, as will only incense him unto whom it is made: Therefore knowing what a value Cyrus sets upon Prince Artamas, I thought him sooner then any other to be propounded in exchange. As for the King of Assyria, you may very well imagine, that Cyrus, as generous as he is, does not wish his Liberty so soon as the Prince Artamas: And as for any other of the Prisoners, they are not of fit Qualities to be exchanged against Panthea: Anaxaris is none knows who; Sosicles and Tegeus are your Subjects; and Feraulas is a servant unto Cyrus: And since so Sir, who should I propound in exchange for Panthea but the Prince Artamas? The Truce was concluded upon to that end, and yet it seems you will not release him, but stand upon consultation about it. I do consult upon it indeed, replied he, and that with good Reason; for except Cyrus himself, there is not a man in all his Army who would Page 94 be so advantageous to have in my power as the Prince Artamas, and you would have me to release him for your interest only: However (said Abradates, with such an aspect, as made it appear he was much displeased at roessus) I pray tell me directly what you resolve upon, and why you consented unto the Truce, if it were not to satisfy my desires? I consented unto the Truce, replied he, to endeavour the release of Panthea, by releasing the King of Assyria, or all the other Prisoners, or else the Prince Artamas upon such conditions as I told you.

After this Abradates retired, and so did the Prince Myrsiles and Andramites, and they went unto their Quarters, and the Prince of Clasomena went also with Abradates, inso much as Croessus fearing these three persons should make a mutiny in the Army, he resolved in the end to make the Proposition in exchange for the Prince Artamas, and sent in all haste to advertise Abradates of his intentions, who in the interim had dispatched his Letter unto Cyrus, to excuse himself in that he could not obtain his desires, and his expressions were so effectual, as Cyrus did really believe he had sincerely done his endeavour, and complained more against his own misfortune, then against any neglect in Abradates. In the mean time Croessus did send unto Cyrus; his desire was, that Andramites should be employed to go in that negotiation: He sent unto Abradates to move Andramites to go unto Sardis, but first he moved Abradates to go himself, yet he would not go, but stayed in the Camp, where he was much more terrible unto Croessus, then if he had been in Sardis, as well because he had a body of four thousand men, the best in all the Army, as because he was more considerable, and beloved of the Souldiers in general, then any other. Andramites then negotiated as a Lover of Doralisa, and by consequence as one much concerned in the liberty of Panthea, and therefore he omitted nothing that might render his transaction effectual; for he did not only address himself with much eloquence and prudence unto Cyrus, but he did chuse his time so discreetly, as that the King of Phrygia was present when he propounded from his Master, the exchange of Prince Artamas for Panthea: So that though Cyrus had a good pretence to retain that Queen until Mandana were released, yet he would not insist upon it, lest he should disoblige so great a King as he of Phrygia, and lest in striving to be very prudent, he should fail in point of generosity. Moreover, he thought that the exchange of Panthea for Prince Artamas, would be very advantageous to him in the sequel of the War, since he was as wise and valiant a man as any was in the Universe, yet could he not resolve upon this exchange, unless he drew some satisfaction unto his Love by it; so that he told Andramites in the King of Phrygia's presence, that though it was very advantageous for him to keep the Queen of Susiana in his power unto the end of the War, yet he so much honoured the King of Phrygia, and loved the Prince Artamas so well; also respected Abradates and Panthea both so very much, that he would consent unto the desires of Croessus, upon this condition only, that during this Truce, it might be permitted him to see Mandana. Andramites hearing him say so, beseeched him not to insist upon that, because the King of Pontus had so resolutely denied that unto Abradates when he was mo'ved in it, as it is thought impossible he should ever consent unto it: Since Croessus is Master in his own Dominions, replied Cyrus, he ought to be obeyed, and therefore I cannot conceive, that the consent of the King of Pontus is so absolutely necessary: Doubtless it is not, replied Andramites, but yet I have some reasons which induce me to think, that he will not make use of his Sovereign Authority in this business, but will rather break off the Truce: I consent unto it (said the King of Phrygia most generously) and had rather the Treaty were broke, then a Prince unto whom I am so much obliged should not receive this poor satisfaction: No, no, replied Cyrus, I cannot believe the King of Lydia is so weak a manager of his Interests, but that he must think it more dangerous for him to disoblige Abradates than the King of Pontus, since the one hath a Kingdom and Forces on Foot, and the other hath neither; therefore Andramites, I pray tell the King your Master what I say, and let me know his resolution. In the mean time, Andramites (added Cyrus, being very glad to perceive some sparks of his affection to kindle towards Doralisa, which might make him more zealous with Croessus) it shall be your own fault, if you carry no commendations from the illustrious Abradates unto his Wife the Queen of Susiana, for if you please, you shall be conducted unto her. Andramites hearing this acceptable offer, could not refuse it; so that he was conducted thither by Ligdamis, being ravished with joy that he should see Doralisa, who was with this Princess, and for whose freedom he did equally solicit: Andramites was welcomed by this Page 95 Queen with much civility and satisfaction; for since she was ignorant how Croessus did only seek for a pretence to break off the Treaty, she made no doubt but ere long to see her dear Abradates. Doralisa, for her part, was not uncivil towards Andramites, yet he found to be as much as formerly she used to be, very fair, infinitely lovely, and a little too subtil; and indeed, in lieu of thanking him for the pains he took for the liberty of the Princess, which included hers, she told him with a smile, that she could not set any great value upon this Proposition which he brought, since if it take effect, we shall but go out of one Prison into another: For to tell you truly, (said she, whilst Panthea was writing unto Abradates) I think we are more safe in the Camp of Cyrus, then if we were at Sardis, since in all probability Cyrus will ere long take it, for he having both Justice and Fortune on his side, he will infallibly be victorious over all his Enemies. But what then will become of the Oracle which Croessus received from Delphos (replied he) if what you say should come to pass? Truly Andramites (said she unto him) it is much rashness to think that men should so well understand the language of the Gods, since sometimes men cannot so much as understand the language of men: I do confess it (said he unto her) that sometimes you would not understand the language of men, but to tell you truly, I think the reason was because you had not a will to understand it; nor do I know very well whether you will understand me now, if I should in plain language tell you, that I never did nor shall love any comparably as I do you. I understand you Andramites, replied she, much less then heretofore; for since I hear of late no language but Persian, Hircanian, Assyrian, Arminian, and Medean Tongues, I have forgot the Lydian language; and therefore before you speak unto me of any thing which concerns your self, I must learn that Tongue, or at least be a year or two in Lydia. As Andramites was ready to reply, and beseech Doralisa to speak a little more seriously, Panthea having writ her Letter came to give it unto him, so that it being time to return, he could receive no other satisfaction from Doralisa, but that she was as fair as ever, yet did his flames of Love burn hotter then ever, and he returned unto Sardis, with resolutions to use his utmost endeavours to move the King of Lydia that Cyrus might see Mandana: And in order to that, he went unto the Camp before he went unto Sardis, and advised the Prince of Clasomena and Abradates not to stir, though Croessus should send for them, till the Treaty was accomplished, and to transact with the Prince Myrsiles, whom he knew was a well-wisher to this Treaty, yet did he not think this Prince had any other end in it, then the satisfaction of Abradates, and the releasement of Artamas, whom I allways wished might marry his Sister the Princess. These two Princes then taking his counsel, let him go unto Sardis alone, whether he was no sooner come, but he gave Croessus an account of his voyage: But as soon as he had ended his relation, Croessus told him, that Cyrus demanded a thing which was not within the compass of his will to grant, for he had resolved never to contradict the King of Pontus in that business: Then it is impossible to conclude this Treaty (replied Andramites) for Cyrus is so fully resolved to obtain his demand, that the King of Phrygia himself, to satisfy his desires, would persuade him to insist upon it, though Cyrus should otherwise be contented: Though Treaty should break off, replied Croessus, it should not trouble me at all: Yet believe it Sir, replied Andramites, it is something dangerous to incense the King of Susiana, and the Prince of Clasomena.

Croessus apprehending this reply of Andramites (whom he knew to be their friend) for a kind of threatening, was much offended at him; and without any direct answer, only told him, that he would ere long let Cyrus know his mind. Andramites also being angry at this, the King of Pontus came in, and did so importunately press not to consent his Rival should ever see Mandana, that he confirmed him in his resolution, to make his colour for rendering the negotiation of Andramites ineffectual; yet the King of Pontus was very angry, that he thus disoblige Abradates, unto whom he was so much engaged; but this tyrannical passion did so disturb his reason, and usurped power over his soul, that he could not do any otherwise, nor was he Master of his own mind. In the mean while, Abradates, and the Prince of Clasomena, hearing of Croessus his denial, and the King of Pontus his opposition, spoke high, and like Princes that could not brook such usage, Andramites and the Prince Myrsiles did also cajole with the people in Sardis, and gave out, that Croessus refusing this desire of Cyrus would infinitely incense him against them, if he should become victorious; and therefore it were but just to seek for their own security; So that both in Town and Camp, things grew into great disorder; for as it is the Page 96 easiest matter of a thousand, to make the herd of people do any thing; so upon this ground, divers that were very intimate friends unto Prince Artamas, whose virtues had purchased him thousands of secret servants who would venture life and all for him, began to speak very high, that Croessus never cared for the safety of his people, but would let all run to ruine, so he could satisfy his own private ambition? The memory of all the Victories which Artamas brought made all the Inhabitants of Sardis murmur extremely, and say one to another, that if he had never been a Prisoner they should never have cared for any foreign War: but to see an Army of above a hundred thousand men at their doors, and to have never an Artamas to defend them; this was such a misery as they could not endure without much murmur; and their thoughts were so forward, that they did both say and think, it would be more advantageous for them if the Prince Artamas were on the Party of Cyrus, then thus to be perpetually mewed up in a Prison: for they knew that he being in love with their Princess would never destroy Cressus, and that he was ever of a sweet milde disposition in all things; and they said openly, that the Injustice which was done him in his first Imprisonment, could be no way repaired but by releasing him from this second fetters: thus were Camp and Town all in division.

Cyrus knowing all this, was exceedingly joyed at it; for said he, If they do as I desire them, I shall see my Princess, and her looks will infuse fresh zeal into my Soul, and make me able to release, maugre all the fatal Predictions: If on the contrary they will not do as I would have them, then I shall have this satisfaction at the least, that their Souldiers will be divided, and so I shall get the Victory more easily: yet was he much astonished to hear that Mazares did not stir in the business; and every one who came from Sardis reported, that this Prince kept his Chamber by reason of some slight indisposition in his body: But he heard every moment that the disorder did increase both between Princess, and people, and Souldiers. In the mean time, since the Truce had a day prefixed, and Cyrus could not break his word, he was much vexed that he could not take any advantage by this disorder, and did with much impatience expect a positive answer from Croesus: yet sometimes he would go and visit Panthea; and as it is the custom even of the wisest men, especially those that are in love to discourse of all accidents which befall them, so Cyrus did speak unto Panthea and the Princess Araminta of nothing else but of this business now in transaction: Sometimes he would ask Panthea whether she thought her husband could brook this Injustice of Croessus? Other times he would desire the Princess Araminta to tell him, whether she thought the King her Brother would for ever obstinately persist in his resolutions of never suffering him to see Mandana? Yet he assured the Queen of Susiana, that though Croessus should deny him his desires, yet he would release her, beseeching her to pardon him if he deferred it until the last hour of the Treaty, in hopes thereby to obtain his desires; and he expressed himself in such obliging terms, that Panthea her self desired him to defer her Liberty as long as he could. As he was with these two Princesses, Orsanes came into tell him, that Orsanes was arrived at the Camp, and said he had some business of consequence to impart unto him: The name of Orsanes made Cyrus blush, since when he heard it, he could not chuse but think upon Mazares, and that he had sent him unto him, though he could not well comprehend how Orsanes, who went from Sin pe to return into his own Country, should be now in Lidia. This alteration in the face of Cyrus begetting a great curiosity in both those Princesses, they asked him the cause: yet he would not then tell them, not knowing what business Orsanes had with him: So that without giving them any direct Answer, he left them, and went unto him, wishing with all his heart that Mazares had sent by him to meet him with his sword in his hand. Since he was much beholding unto Orsanes, for the services he had done Mandana and Martesia he did not confound innocence and guilt together, but notwithstanding the agitation of his spirits, and his hatred of Mazare, he received Orsanes very kindly: After which, addressing his speech unto him; As I did at first receive you as a friend unto Martesia (said he unto him) I must harken unto you as a Messenger from my most mortal Enemy. Sir, replied Orsanes, before you know well what appellation to give my Master, I must beseech you to give me an hours patience, for if you did but understand the end of my Relation, perhaps it would strike you into wonder; and therefore it is requisite I prepare your spirits a little to hear of Miracles: Cyrus hearing Orsanes say so, began to devise with himself, what it should be he had to tell him; but being not able to imagine, he resolved to give him audience, and therefore carried him into a convenient place for that purpose. But since the Queen of Susiana and the Page 97 Princess Araminta had heard that he who came to speak with him was from the Prince Mazares, they feared lest it should be some Challenge, and the King of Pontus and Abradates engaged in it: So that they sent unto him, beseeching him that they might speak a word with him. As impatient as this Prince was to hear Orsanes, yet he went unto the Princesses; who expressed so much tenderness over him, and were so troubled to hear that Orsanes came from Mazares; as they importunately forced him to offer them to be partakers of what Orsanes had to say, since he perceived by the manner of Orsanes his discourse there was no fighting matter in it: So he sent for Orsanes, and told him he might speak with as much freedom before those two Princesses as if he were in private with him: After which, every one taking their places, Orsanes began his Discourse thus.

The History of MAZARES.

Where I to speak of my Master only unto the illustrious Cyrus, my Relation should then be much shorter then now it must: And before I entertain two great Princesses unto whom he is unknown (though Persons of their Quality do commonly know, though they have not seen one another) I conceive it is expedient to recite in few words the beginning of his Life, to the end they may better know the Sequel.

It is not at all requisite (said the Princess Araminta) that you should trouble your self in telling us any Adventures which have chanced unto the Prince Mazares since the time he came from Babylon, until the time he was left for dead at Sinope in a Fishers Cabin: for we know how he could not force himself to love the Princess Istrina, though the King of Assyria used all arguments to perswade him: and that he became in love with the Princess Mandana, whether he would or no, at the same time when she triumphantly entered that great Town: Nor are we ignorant how he demeaned himself when he was there: We know also how, prompted more by the dictates of his Love than either his Reason or Generosity, he invented to come out of that Town clothed in white when it was a Snow; and afterwards being in Sinope, how the same passion was predominate over his generosity, did prompt him to deceive her, and carry her away both from the King of Assyria and the illustrious Cyrus; and how to punish him for that rash act, the Gods permitted him to suffer shipwrack.

Madam, replied Orsanus, when you shall know what I intend to relate, I know not then how you will interpret the intentions of the Gods, since at the same instant when they brought him to the very brink of Ruine, then they rather saved him: But before I explain this Riddle unto you, I must tell you that it was the greatest and most admirable effect of the Princess Mandana's Beauty, so to disturb and pervert the Reason of this Prince, as made him capable of doing any unjust act; since certainly there was never any of his Quality, whose birth, inclination and education was better: Moreover, the dispositions of Nature drawn from his Parents could not chuse but be most excellently good; since it is most certain, that never Prince was more virtuous then the Prince of Saces, nor any Princess more heroicue then the Queen Tarina, my Masters mother: But since her virtue was famous throughout all Asia, I will speak no more of it; only say this, that if the Prince Mazares her son be not as victorious as any, it is strange: But as an addition to all you know or possibly can know of him, it is requisite I tell you, that the night preceding the Princess Mandana's shipwrack, and whilst the Prince Mazares out of his respect durst not come into her Cabin, he was sensible of as much sorrow as a generous heart could possibly comprehend: and let me tell the illustrious Cyrus, that I am most confident, if he understood the sorrows which he apprehended after that sad accident, he would sooner pity then accuse him; he repented of his crime, though he could not of his passion, above a hundred times, and resolved as oft to expiate it; afterwards when he looked her in the face, and observed what alteration in her complexion so short a time had produced, his heart was so stricken with remorse, as he went in all haste to the Pilot, for fear he should alter his mind, and commanded him to take the way of Sinope, with intentions to restore the Princess either into the hands of Cixares or the illustrious Cyrus: But oh Heavens, how fatal was this Order, as just as it was, unto him that commanded it, and unto her for whose sake it was intended? For as soon as the Pilot received it, and in obedient order thereunto, intending to carry Mandana unto Sinope, he turned the Rudder, but Page 98 overturned the Ship, and left us all in a perishing condition: Never since did I think it permissible to censure the intentions of the Gods, when they do either good or evil unto men: But that it is much safer to admire their Providence, then to dive too far into their Reasons: And indeed, to speak according unto meer natural Reason, who would not think that a Prince in love, who had her he loved in his power, and who had so much virtues as to repent the taking her away, and resolved to set her at liberty again, that such a one, I say, did rather deserve a Recompence then Punishment? and yet the Prince Mazares suffered shipwrack: he thought himself the cause of that Princess death whom he adored; and suffered more torture of Soul then ever any did; and the violence of his despair was much more like to be his ruine then his shipwrack; and doubtless it had been his death, had not the Gods most prodigiously sent him relief.

Be pleased to know Madam, that the owner of the Cabin (where the illustrious Artamenes saw Mazares dying, and where he received from his hand a rich Scarfe, which was the Princess Mandana's) being gone to fish a little before the storm did rise, and adventuring so far into the Sea that he could not recover the shore, he was constrained to let go his Boat unto the mercy of the Wind and Waves, was at last driven to the foot of a Rock which rise up in the Sea, and where a Ship had been split, but where his Boat being light did safely arrive, so that he got upon the Rock, and holding his Boat with a Rope, he resolved to rest there till the storm was over, and so he did, until the Tempest beginning to calm, he discovered an old man upon a plank which kept him above water, and who endeavoured to gain that Rock, but he was so weak, and so far off, that needs must he perish, unless the Fisherman relieve him. Plain pity then moving the heart of this Fisherman, he made unto his assistance in his Boat, and took up this man, whose name was Tyburtus, by Nation a Greek, who was always with Mazares as a Tutor to read all Sciences befitting his Quality unto him. He was no sooner in the Boat, but so weak he was, that ready he was to fall into a swoond: Yet when he was recovered, he told how he had been shipwracked, but told him not how it was in carrying away the Princess Mandana, lest it should abate his zeal to serve him: So that this Fisher-man cheering him up after his homely manner, he offered him his Cabin to retreat unto, which Tiburtus accepted of, in hopes to hear some tidings of some that were shipwracked with him, or whether his Master perished among the rest: The Sea being then smoother then before, this Fisher-man began to row about; but since he had lost one of his oars in the Storm, he was a long time before he recovered his shore, and so long indeed, that he came not to his Cabin until Artamenes was gone away. You may imagine Madam, how Tiburtus was amazed to find the Prince Mazares there, and in that case, for he was not yet recovered out of his swoond wherein the illustrious <◇> left him: as soon as he saw him, he was extremely joyed; but when he saw him in that pitiful case, his extreme joys were converted into extreme sorrows: yet since he was a man of an universal knowledge in all things, and reasonably well versed in Physick, he endeavored to try whether any life yet remained in that Prince, and whether there were any possibility of helping him: and upon his careful observance, he discovered his heart did beat: so that using all the helps which the poverty of that place would afford him, he employed them so well, that Mazares revived, but with a spirit so little of himself, that spying Tiburtus at his beds side, he asked him where Mandana was? Afterwards he pronounced the name of Artamenes four or five times; and being for an hour after in a confused distraction of Reason, he knew not whether or no Artamenes was his Rival, or whether Mandana was alive or dead, or indeed whether himself was living. But at last, Tiburtus endeavoring by his discourse to reduce his Reason into its right Region, he began by degrees to know things as really they were, and by consequence to fall into his first despair: Yet had he the comfort to see Tiburtus near him, whom he ever loved: In seeing him, his hopes revived also, that happily Mandana might escape as well as he, but his hopes of so much happiness were so weak, that they could not induce him to take any care of himself, or to receive any thing: In the mean while, Tiburtus considering how near he was unto Sinope, and in a place where the illustrious Artamenes had been, and might come or send again, he took the Master of the Cabin aside, and conjured him, that as he had saved his life, so he would do him another good office, without which the first was all to no purpose: But lest there should not be prevalency enough in his prayers, he charmed him with a great Medal of Gold hanging in a Chain of the same Mettel, which the Queen Nitocris gave him when he was waiting upon his Master at Babylon.

Page 99 The very sight of so rich a Present, so dazzled the eyes of the poor Fisher, that he did absolutely promise to do what ere he would have him, though it were with most desperate hazard of his life: So that Tiburtus without any loss of time caused him to take the Prince Mazares into his Boat, and to clothe him very well, lest the sharpness of the ayr might do him harm. The Prince Mazares at first was very unwilling unto what Tiburtus desired, saying he was loth to part from that place near which his Princess perished, and that he had rather dye there then in any other place: But Tiburtus promising he should not be carried very far; and that it was to such a place as where it was more probable to hear of his Princess, and where he was in less danger of falling into the hands of Cixares, he began to submit unto his will: Yet not at the first; For Tiburtus (said he unto him) since death is that I look for, why may not the King of Medes or Artamenes give it me as well as any other way? Although it be all one to you (said Tiburtus to him) yet it concerns the King your Father, and the Queen your Mother, and all the people over whom you are destined to Raigin; therefore I beseech you, follow my advice, and harken unto Reason. Alas Tiburtus (said he) that man who cares not for life, cares not for a Kingdom: Howleever, replied Tiburtus, though you do not care for either, yet grieve not them that are interested in you, and who would be much concerned if you should fall into the power of a Prince who would treat you as a Delinquent: And truly I am such a one, replied he, upon whom they would act no injustice, though they proceeded never so rigorously against me: but Tiburtus, do what you will with me. After this Mazares was carried into the Boat; and all the people in the Cabin had orders to say, If Artamenes sent to enquire of him, that he dyed as soon as he left him. In the mean time, the lamentable condition in which the Prince Mazares was, would not permit Tiburtus to carry him far off, and all their provisions in the Boat were so small, as they would not last above two or three days. This wise old man being not of that Country, knew not what Course to steer; and since he was far off his own Country (for he pleased to know it is a great distance between Sinope and the Country of the Saces which borders upon the Asiaticque Scythians) he could not tell where he should recruit himself any neerer: He had about him but small matters to subsist upon, the shipwrack having left him only that Chain of Gold which he gave the Fisher-man, and one other Jewel of a very considerable value; yet the Prince Mazares by chance had some rich things about him, so that by them he hoped to find subsistence for a while, but the difficulty was where to land in a safe place: Not knowing then what to resolve upon, they put off from Sinope, unresolved what course to steer: Yet the Fisher-man seeing Tiburtus in such a perplexity, told him, that if he would trust him, he would carry him into such a place where none should find them: Then acquainting him how he was not born at that place where he dwelt, but in a little Isle which was inhabited by none but Fishers, amongst whom he had many kindred, Tiburtus consented he should carry them thither: And this Fisher-man promised my Master, to tell him in that place, whether any news was heard of the Princess Mandana, or whether they had found her body: So not being able to take any other Course, they came to this little Isle, which indeed was no more then a huge Rock, not above a days journey from Sinope: He who was their Guide, lodged them with a sister of his, whose husband was a Fisher like himself, and who entertained them very humanely: In the mean while, since it is the pleasure of the Gods to preserve Mazares whether he would or no, he lived when as he hated life, since he beleaved Mandana dead, but it was a life so lamentable, that death was much more sweet then it unto him: The little hopes he had of Mandana's escape, did now begin to dye; for the Fisher-man, according to his promise, went the day after to enquire, but could hear no news either of her or her Corps: yet this last circumstance leaving some far-fetched hopes in him, which induced him not to depart from that barbarous place; Tiburtus desired the Fisher-man to tell him once more that the Corps of Mandana was found: For as Tiburtus did verily conjecture, that this Princess was really dead, and that though she were living, yet it were good to wear her out of Mazares his memory; therefore he conceived it expedient not to leave any more such uncertain hopes in him, which might aggravate his sorrows, and much multiply his perplexities. The Fisher-man at his request did tell this officious lye, and the Prince Mazares grieved so, as it was easie to see the difference between an undoubted misfortune, and one in which there was some incertainty: When the first raptures of his despair were past, he told Tiburtus, that he would go and dye over the Tomb of Mandana, and continued in this mind many days, but at last the perswasions of Tiburtus did alter his mind; Page 100 but all his perswasions could not prevail when he moved him to return unto the King of Saces his Father: No, no, Tiburtus (would he say) you shall not have your mind in every thing, nor will I live as you would have me: It's well I satisfie you so far as not to kill my self, without publishing my crime and my misfortune unto all Asia: Live I will Tiburtus, because you would not have me dye, but I will live only to lament that Princess whose life I destroyed: Oh unfortunate Prince (would he cry out) if thou hadst any design to betray any one, why didst thou not betray the Assyrian King in favour of thy Princess? and why didst thou not really release her? Why didst thou not convey her into the hands of the invincible Artamenes, who only is worthy of her? Then would she at the least have had an esteem or friendship for thee: and though thou wert the most unfortunate man that ever breathed, yet it is better being so, then being her Ravisher. Oh most insensible Sot that I was, couldst thou ever hope to be loved by doing that which was most likely to procure hatred? Had I not an illustrious Example of this before my eyes on one of the greatest Kings in all Asia? who carried her away, and got nothing by his violence but her hatred: and yet I must carry her away also, but the Gods have most severely punished me for it: If my death would have satisfied that Justice, certainly I should have perished in the same place with her: but since they knew that her death would punish me most severely, they keep me alive to punish me with most horrid torments. Thus Madam, did the Prince Mazares argue with himself: It was in vain for Tiburtus to tell him he must submit unto the Will of the Gods; for his sorrows were too great to suffer him: All endeavors to put him in memory of honour and glory were also in vain: Ambition was dead in his Soul, and he thought nothing in this World now more glorious then eternally to lament the death of Mandana: yet did Tiburtus still importune him to return unto his Father, and did speak of it so much, that this unfortunate Prince seeing he could not perswade Tiburtus to let him live an unknown solitary life, resolved to steal away from him, and to go into some Cell, and lament his miseries alone: In order unto this, he hired a young Fisherman to let him pass in the night time over the Water, which was not above fifty furlongs from the Isle, and left a Letter with him for Tiburtus, to this effect.

The unfortunate MAZARES unto the wise TIBURTUS.

Since I see all your sapient admonitions cannot infuse Reason into my Soul, which is sensible of nothing but its own sorrows, I thought it best to part from you, lest my miseries should infect you: But to the end that you may justify your self unto the King and Queen, let them see by this Letter, that since I do not think my self worthy to be their Son, nor to write unto them, I will for ever renounce all civil society: yet tell them, that it was Love only which made me a Criminal; and that if I had never loved the divine and unfortunate Mandana, I had never done any thing unworthy either of them or you, who have given me a million of good advices, which this passion only did keep me from following.

MAZARES.

This Prince then having given this Letter unto the young Fisher-man who carried him over the River, and bought him a Horse, also caused a very poor sute of Clothes to be made for him at a little Town whither he used to go and sell his Fish, he took the next way that he found; for his sorrows made him not care which way he went. In the mean while the young Fisher-man returned to the Isle, and gave Tiburtus the Letter which the Prince did send him, and which did drive him into such excessive sorrow, as never was greater: But all unprofitable Lamentations were but loss of so much time, and therefore he immediately left the Isle to seek his Master, and went unto the next Town to buy a Horse, and to take that way which the young Fisher-man told him he took: but it being a good while since the Prince did go away, he could not overtake him; yet had he the comfort as he rid on a day and a half together to hear two or three times that he travelled that way; but his grief was, that they who saw him pass, reported that he kept no high ways. Tiburtus being very old, was not able to travel so long without rest, unless he should fall sick, so that age and weariness compelled him to stay twelve or fifteen days. As good fortune was, he found a little Church, dedicated unto Ceres, standing in the midst of a field, without any other building about it but only the Priests house which joyned unto it, so that finding himself very ill he stayed there, and desired help: Indeed the Priest had a Page_101 great compassion and care of him; for Tyburtus being a man of great ingenuity and parts, made himself soon known unto this charitable Host to deserve relief, yet could he not recover any health; all that could be done unto him, was only to prolong his miserable life until a prodigy conducted me to the place where he was, as I shall relate unto you. You know Sir (said Orsanus unto Cyrus, that when you went from Sinope into Armenia, I asked leave of you to return unto the King my Master, though I was extremely sorry I could not carry the Prince Mazares with me; so that parting from you, loadned with your gifts, ravished with admiration, and charmed with your virtues, I took the best way to go unto the place at which I aimed. The third day of my journey, when I was wandering out of my way, I discovered a great Plain, in the midst of which I saw a little Church, and a very pleasant house: It being not very late, and I weary, I went thither, not only with intentions to inquire of the way, but to desire the favour of a nights lodging, and I was received in with as much humanity as I could either expect or desire: The Priest made some excuses; that his accommodation was not so good as other times it might have been, telling me, that those few servants he had were so busie about a stranger that was sick in his house, and so ill, that they thought him a dead man, as his entertainment would not be so good as he wished it were.

As he was thus speaking unto him, one came to tell him, that the stranger was very ill, and desired to speak with him, that he might impart a secret of some concernment unto him: I hearing this, did desire to see him, and not knowing well why, I went unto the Chamber of this sick man: But oh heavens, how was I amazed, when I saw him to be Tyburtus, whom I thought down'd with the Prince our Master? My wonder was so great that I could not express it by my words: But after a little recollection of my self, I went unto his Beds side, and the sight of me surprized him no less then he did me: The Priest also perceiving by our actions that we knew each other very well, and that we much rejoiced at the sight of each other, was amazed as well as me: Tyburtus holding out his hand unto me, gave thanks unto the Gods for affording him so much happiness as to imbrace me before he died; then did I endeavour to perswade him his disease was not so bad as he thought it, but he knew the greatness of his pain better then I did. No, no, Orsanus, said he unto me, let me not flatter my self, the Gods do not work miracles every day, and I have rendred my self so unworthy of them, that I ought not to murmur at their wills; I know that all remedies are in vain, and I perceive the end of my doleful daies is at hand, therefore I sent unto this wise and charitable Clergy-man to receive a secret from me, which was not fit to be buried with me in my Tomb; But since the Gods have so fitly brought you hither, I shall not trouble him with it, since it does not at all concern him to know it, but shall in few words reveal it unto you. The Priest hearing Tyburtus say so, did withdraw, purposely to leave him liberty to speak what he pleased: Tyburtus first assuring him, that he changed his mind not for want of any esteem of him, but only because the business concerned one which I did know, and which he did not. After that the Priest was gone, I began to condole with him the death of our dear Master; but Tyburtus stopping me very short, told me all that I have told you: After this (said he) you may well know, that the Gods in bringing you hither did intend I should acquaint you that the Prince Mazares is not dead, to the end you may go and seek him, as I intended all the daies of your life, until you have found him out. This Orsanus was my design, and this ought to be yours, if you love your Master, if you had not happily arrived, I had engaged the Priest by oath to acquaint the King of Saces, that the Prince his Son was not dead: But since you are here, I thought it not expedient to let any Subject of the King of Medes know that he was living; for he hath procured unto himself such terrible enemies in the persons of Ciaxares, the King of Assyria, and the invincible Artamenes, by carrying away the Princess Mandana, that I think it good none know it but your self. Tyburtus having done speaking, and I promising him to seek our illustrious Master throughout all Asia, he seemed to be a little more cheerful, so that we talked at least two hours concerning the Prince Mazares. And as he understood, since he came to that place, that the Princess Mandana was not dead, but that she was in the power of the Pontean King, and that it was thought he carried her unto Armenia, he gave me advice, that after I had sought a while in Cappadocia, to go thither also, it being to be supposed, that Mazares would either be there, or else be near the Princess whom he adored. But Madam, why should I trouble you any longer with relations of Tyburtus, who only languished in life till he saw me? For as soon as he had imparted his troubled Page_102 soul unto me, he grew worse, and the next day died: I took his loss with much grief, so that my joyes at my Masters being alive were mixed with sorrows. In the mean time, after I had payed my last duties unto dead Tyburtus, and rendred a thousand thanks unto the Priest for his charitable cares of him, I went and wandred I knew not well whither, yet I conceived it my best course would be, to be near the place where Mandana was said to be, since in all probability that Prince who was in Love with her, and believed her to be dead, would seek all opportunities to see her risen from the dead as soon as he should hear of it: I resolved therefore upon two courses, the one, to send a servant which vvaied upon me, who vvas both faithful and witty, unto the Queen of Saces, to comfort her with her Sons being alive, and to tell her, that I thought it expedient not to publish it until he vvas found. The other vvas, that after I had vvandred a while about Sinope, where I feared he remained sick, I vvould then vvend towards Armenia, where it vvas reported the Princess Mandana vvas carried: and according to these resolutions, I dispatched my servant, then inquired with all possible diligence whether I could hear any thing of Mazares, but could not meet with the least intelligence of him in all Cappadocia: After which, I went unto Artaxates, whilst the Army of Ciaxares believed Mandana to be kept up close in a Castle upon the River Araxes: And as I believed as others did, that if the Prince Mazares were alive, he would be also at Artaxates, I went from place to place, and from Temple to Temple in quest of him: Then when I heard of any general Muster of Souldiers, I looked every Souldier in the face, in hopes to find him: Then it came into my phancy, seeing I could not hear any thing of him, that perhaps he vvas so subtil, as to find out means to get into the Castle, where the Princess Mandana vvas supposed to be, and the Princess of Pontus, before whom I speak then vvas; so that I resolved to stay in that place, and wait for the event of the War, having no manner of other hopes to find him I vvas in quest of. And indeed Sir (said Orsanus unto Cyrus) I stayed there, until you by your incomparable valour did take that Castle with a few Forces, in the sight of an innumerable umber of armed enemies. It is impossible for me to tell you how sad my soul vvas, when I saw that the Princess Mandana vvas not in the Castle; and I may say it without any dissimulation, that you Sir vvere not more grieved not to find Mandana there, then I vvas not to find my Master, nor knew vvhere to search either for her or him, for I sought for her only in hopes to find him there: Howver, patience is my best remedy; and since I knew you took all imaginable care to discover where that Princess vvas, I resolved to follow the same course you steered: But since I vvould not be known unto you, though you treated me very favourably at Sinope, because I vvould not acquaint you with the true reason vvich brought me into Armenia, nor had any mind to dissemble with you; therefore I shunned your sight with a possible care, I remained therefore kept close in Artaxates, till I understood you thought the Princess Mandana vvas at Susa, and that she vvould cross the Country of Matenes, vvich joyns upon Armenia and Cicilia, and then I designed to take that way: And having found a guide, who vvas very well versed in the vvayes, he conducted me so short a cut, that I overtook Abradates; and the King of Pontus, as they conducted this Princess, before they separated, and by consequence before you fought with the King of Susiana: 'Tis true, I did not think it convenient to shew my self unto the Princess Mandana, but contenting my self with looking upon her, and the Troops which passed by and guarded her: But since I could not find him I sought for amongst them, I thought that happily he might follow at a distance; and understanding that this Princess was to imbarque at a Cicilian Port to sail unto Ephesus, I got thither before hand, inquiring in every house where strangers used to lodg, whether such a one was not there. I went also into every Ship which was to put forth, whether any Passengers were to imbarque; but do what I could, both before the Princess Mandana came thither, and when she was there, and after she was gone, I could not meet with the least knowledg of him; so that I stayed still by the water side, after I had seen the Princess Mandana imbarque, as sad a soul as ever lived; and truly my fear was, that he had either took some desperate course with himself, or at least was dead of extreame melancholy, in some obscure place where none knew him; for since I understood by several persons which I had seen in the Armenian Army, that the Prince Mazares was not returned unto the King his Father, and since I could not find him about the Princess Mandana, I could conclude no other but that he was dead; all hopes being then quite extinguished of ever meeting with him, I resolved to return into my own Country; for though Page_103 I promised Tiburtus to vvander all my life long until I found him, yet since no hope vvas left of finding him, I thought it vvas in vain to be over-strict in keeping that promise: Thus then I resolved to return, and in order to that I enquired the best and safest Ways: and I vvas informed that the shortest and best vvay vvas to go along the River Cydne, and to leave that great Mountain in Cicilie, vvich is called the black Mountain, on the left hand: That afterwards I must pass into Armenia, and get into the River Araxes, where I should need no Guide, since I knew the Way very well from thence into my own Country.

But as the Gods are sometimes pleased to make a Tempest drive a Ship unto a Port, in lieu of dashing it against the Rocks, so they caused me to wander out of my way most happily; and in lieu of taking that way which conducted unto the River Cydne, I took another Rode, which led me so far into that prodigious Mountain whereof I spoke, that I knew not which way to go back again: Yet since it was extrem hot Weather, and all other parts of Cicily was an open Country, I was not at the first sorry I had mistaken my way for another where the tops of the Rocks which did hang one over another was a great shadow unto me in my travel: But at last, when I saw no living creature but a sort of little wilde Beasts, which the Inhabitants of that Country call Squillaques, which naturally are apt to stealing, and which follow all them that pass this way to filch something from them, I confess that I repented my going so far in this Way, principally out of fear lest I should wander so far in this hideous Mountain, that I could not get out again when night came on: so that conceiving easier for me to turn back by the paths I came, then to follow an unknown Rode where I could meet with none to enquire of, I faced about, and returned the same way I came: but coming unto a place where there was several beaten paths, I mistook the right, and went into one by which I did not come: I went straight forward a long while, thinking I had been right, and yet methought I saw many things which I observed not before; and other times methought I knew where I was: but sometimes hoping I was right, and sometimes fearing I was wrong, I still went forward, impatiently desiring to be from amongst those Rocks: for often I had a huge high Mountain on my right hand, and a horrid Preceipe on my left, and the best way I had rough and rocky. I ask you pardon Sir, for insisting so long upon a description of these things: But I must needs confess they made such a deep impression in my mind, that I could not chuse but describe them as they were. After I had travelled in this manner a long while, and came unto a place where there was no track, I was forced to stay, because the night coming on apace, I was in some danger of falling into some Precipice, if I had continued on little longer: I lighted then from my horse, and putting the bridle upon my arm (for there was no tree in that place to tie him unto) I sat down under a Rock; and leaning upon another little one, I resolved to take up my Inn there, and to keep my self if possible from sleeping, lest my Horse should break loose, or some wilde beast come unto me; And indeed I passed away almost all the night without a wink of sleep, or having any desire unto it, as well because the obscurity of that desert place, which carries a kind of terror with it, that moves not much unto sleep, as because I heard a great multitude of those filching Cattle continually pass by me: But at last, being a little us'd to the noise which they made, and being very weary with travelling amongst these rugged Rocks without one bit of meat, about an hour before day I fell asleep against my will, and waked not before Sun rise, and I believe I had slept longer, if one of these crafty beasts, following their natural inclination, had not awaked me, by drawing out of my pocket the Table-book, in which I had writ down the Ways by which I was to go; so that though they say these Squitaques are commonly as cunning at theiving as are any I acedemonians, yet he that which stole my Table-book did awake me: I no sooner opened my eyes, but seeing this Animal, running away with my Table-book in his mouth, I got on horseback and rid after him, crying as loud as I could to affright him and make him let it fall, and after I had chased him a long while, he turned short behind a great Rock, and I made all possible speed lest I should lose the sight of him, and when I turned where he did, I saw he had let fall what he had stoln from me, and ran away as fast as ever he could. But Sir, I was strangely amazed, when following this little Animal, I found it had conducted me into a little Plain about 15 or 20 furlongs in length, and ten or twelve broad, bounded with the most pleasant Wood that is in the whole World; beyond which was a huge and sterile Mountain, which seemed to touch the Clouds, and made the most terrible and most pleasing object both that ever was beheld; for Nature had so moulded it from top to bottom, that without a Page 104 sight of it, it is impossible to conceive how well the greenness of this pleasant Wood, opposite to this ragged Mountain, did please all beholders: When I first espied it, I stopt, not knowing whether I should venture into a Wood whose paths were unknown unto me: yet since I knew no safer way then that, I thought it better to wander in a pleasant shade, then amongst a heap of rubbish Rocks, where not a pile of grass did grow. I went over then this little Plain, in the midst of which I spied an Arbour, which the rays of the Sun could never penetrate though never so hot, and the Trees of it were perpetually green, being composed of Cedars, Pines, Mirles, Evves, as such like Trees, who keeps those leaves all Winter green which the Spring time gives them; and the Wonder of the Object was, that these Trees did grow amongst the Rocks, and all the Rocks were covered with such variety of all sorts of Moss, and of as many several colours, as that the Rainbow had not more nor more delighting: The variety of these Trees, and the perpetual freshness of the leaves, made this Wood incomparably pleasant. I wandered then through this great and pleasing Wood, where a thousand several sorts of pretty birds did make a most harmonious echo, testifying by the little fear they had of me, that the place was but seldom frequented: After I had gone five or six hundred paces, I espied on my right hand a very pleasant Fountain, which boyling up amongst a heap of Pibbles, covered over with a pretty Moss of Emerald colour, did make a little Rivolet, and ran turning and winding it self along the side of the Wood, opposite to that aspiring Mountain of which I spoke before. As I stood by the side of this Christal Fountain, I observed a little path which parted from the great Rode, and did lead towards the thick of the Wood; and after I had rested my self a while by this Fountain, I followed that path, which always ascended, sometimes inclining towards the right hand, and sometimes towards the left, because the hill was too steep to go straight up: When I was in the midst of this Woody Rock, O Heavens, how I was amazed, when I discovered a great Cave which went into the Rock, and by it the Prince Mazares sitting upon a stone! who at the noise I made turned his head towards me, and presently knew me, and gave me demonstrations to know him: I was so exceedingly startled at the sight of him, that I was a while and knew not what I did, nor alight from my Horse: my eyes were so full of tears, and my heart so full of sorrow, that stood I like a stone, and knew not whether what I saw was real. But at last, my dear Master rising up, and naming me with a great cry, I revived out of my astonishment: so that lighting from my Horse, and tying him unto a Tree, I went and cast my self at his feet: But he immediately took me up, and embraced me with extraordinary tenderness; My dear Orsanus, said he unto me, is it possible I should ever have a sight of you again? and will you force me whether I will or no to have some minutes of consolation in my life? Sir (said I unto him, with eyes swimming in tears, to see the melancholy in his looks, and to imagine how sadly he had lived since I saw him) I do not intend to add minutes; but an age of consolation unto you, The sight of you indeed is most dear unto me (replied he,) but Orsanus, since I have been the cause of my divine Mandana's death, no consolation can comfort me. But Sir (replied I hastily) if I should tell you that the Princess Mandana lives, would not that be a comfort unto you? No Orsanus, replied he, it would not, since I could not believe you: I should think it only your plot to draw me out of this sad solitude, wherein I live, and in which I am resolved to dye. Yet let me tell you, replied I, that what I say is most certainly true, for this Mandana, who both you and I thought dead, I saw her alive with my own eyes. Ah Orsanus (cried he out) I would I could believe this, and dye immediately after; that I might not be deluded by so pleasing a lye, and be for ever delivered from all the miseries which I endure. But Sir (replied I) is it possible this Desert should be so little frequented, and this Cell in which you inhabit so unknown unto all men, that not one of them should come and tell you how all Asia is in Arms for the Princess Mandana; that the illustrious Artamenes is no more Artamenes, but known to be Cyrus, Son to Cambises King of Persia; That Ciaxares after he had imprisoned him, did release him, and made him General of his Army; That the King of Pontus, after he had lost all his Kingdoms, and flying away in a Ship, did save the Princess Mandana's life, immediately after the fury of the boisterous Waves had separated her from you; That the invincible Cyrus, thinking that Prince had carryed her into Armenia, drew the War thither, and became Master of it; That in lieu of releasing the Princess Mandana, he released only the Sister of his Rival, that is, the Princess of Pontus; That afterwards the King her Brother being reported to be at Susa with the Princess Mandana, and that she was to imbarque for Cicilie, conducted Page 105 by the King of Susiana, and by the Queen Panthea, Cyrus followed Abradates, defeated him, and took the Queen his Wife a Prisoner, in lieu of releasing the Princess Mandana, that the King of Pontus, according to his design, imbarqued with the Princess of Medea, and steered towards Ephesus.

Whilst I was speaking thus, the Prince Mazares hearkened unto me with extraordinary attention, and by his quick and piercing looks endeavoured to penetrate through my eyes into the bottom of my heart, to know whether what I spoke were sincere and really true; so that I perceiving that fain he would, but could not believe me: No, no, Sir (said I unto him) do not suspect me of any falshood, since the truths which now I tell you are so generally known, that there is not so much as a Shepherd in all Asia who knows not that Mandana is living, and that there is two hundred thousand men in Arms ready to release her. This Princess (added I) hath also passed so near you, that certainly she hath seen the Cedar tops which grow in this your Desert: I am confident that I am not mistaken, for she might discover them as she went to imbarque: How Orsanus, said he, can I possibly believe Mandana not dead? Can I think those eyes of yours, which now look upon mine, hath seen her alive, and that she looked upon the tops of these Mountains? Ah Orsanus, if this be true, I am not so miserably unfortunate as I thought my self.

As this Prince was thus talking, I spied coming out of the Wood a man admirably handsome, of a pleasant physiognomy, but seemed something melancholy, who being also as much surprized to find the Prince Mazares in conference with me, as I was to find my Master in such a solitude, we gazed upon each other with equal amazement: But the Prince Mazares calling him, Come Belesis (said he unto him) help to know whether Orsanus (of whom I have spoke so much unto you, and whom I reckoned amongst the losses which I thought I had sustained) do really tell me the truth. Then he whom my Master called Belesis, hearing my name, came forward, and saluting me with such civility as let me know that all which Mazares loved was dear unto him, I returned him a salute with much reverence; after which, my Master commanded me to relate all that I had before told him, obliging me very often to assure him, that I would speak in all sincerity: Afterwards, asking me how I escaped the Shipwrack? how I came into Sicily? how I found out his Desert? and whether I knew what was become of Tyburtus? I fully satisfied his curiosity in all things, and acquainted him with the death of that wise old man Tyburtus, conceiving that he would apprehend his death with less sorrow at this time when he heard Mandana was alive, then if I should have deferred it; yet was he much perplexed at it, and did exceedingly lament him: And since Belesis and he did nothing else, since they were together, but make relations of their lives, and continually discourse of their misfortunes, he lamented the poor Tyburtus as much, as if he had been perfectly acquainted with him, though he knew him not at all, but only by the report of the Prince Mazares. In the mean time, since I had a great desire to know how my Master came unto that place, and to learn who that stranger was; also when they met, I took so much freedom upon me, as to ask him, beseeching him to pardon me if I were too bold, and to believe it proceeded from my very great affection to him: It is but just Orsanus, said he unto me, that a Prince of whom you have had so much care, and sought so long, ought to render you an account of himself: But that I may the more conveniently do it, follow Belesis and me, and we will shew you our habitation: Alas Sir (said I, and followed them) I believe your Palace is more beautiful without then within, and that there is a great difference between your Grot and the Wood, besides it. You shall be a Judge of that presently; answered Belesis, and entering in with them, I was exceedingly astonished at the sight: For Sir, all Art and Nature together did never make a place so beautiful in any place of the world, as Nature alone did in this: I found this Grot to be very deep and large, and yet not obscure, for the Mountain being very steep, there were several Windowes pierced through it, and gave light enough to discern all the rarities both without and within it; a thousand admirable congelations were the ornaments of this place, where one might behold Pillars, Arches, Trees, Flowlers, Leaves, Mosses, Urns, Tombs, and a thousand other such things, all of a substance, as clear and transparent as ever was any Christal in the world: At two sides of this wonder I saw two Fountains, which neither swelling nor diminishing, kept constant at the same level, the water certainly having some undiscernable course through some crannies of the Rock, according to the measure they received from others. When I seriously Page 106 had viewed these rare and delightful wonders, I could not chuse but admire at the providence of God, who had brought the Prince Mazares into so pleasant a Wilderness. Well Orsanus (said Belesis unto me, and seeing my admiration) Do you think the Prince Mazares did erre when he called this Grot a Palace? No Sir (said I unto him) But I must confess, I do not understand how you live for want of Victuals: You shall know that immediately, said he unto me: Then going unto the entry of this Cave, he called a servant which he had there, who came out of another little and less beautiful Room which joyned to the other, and commanded him to give me something to eat, to let me see their garden, and to have a care of my horse, which was set in a little Cave further off, for all this Mountain was full of them; and accordingly, this servant unto Belesis, whose name was Arcas, after he had given me a good Dinner, did carry me some fifty paces further unto the foot of the Rock, and shewed me a garden so full of all manner of Herbs, Roots, Pease, Beans, and such like, and Arcas told me, that sometimes he went to Hunt, that I wondered how men who sought for death should find subsistence in such a place. Arcas also told me, that his Master by reason of several disasters, had renounced all civil society, and having found out this admirable place in the black Mountain, he resolved to dwell in it all the remainder of his life: So that he, whether his Master would or no, had provided such things as were absolutely necessary for the life of a man. Afterwards he told me, that after they had been settled a while here, the Prince Mazares came accidentally into this solitary place, and Belesis and he became such intimate friends, as they promised never to part, but die together in this Desert: But (said I unto him) How do they employ themselves every day? In conding, walking sometimes single, sometimes together (replied he) Some books they have also, for I told you already, that at first when my Master made choice of this Cave for his habitation, I brought hither every thing which I thought might be serviceable unto him; and truly I think these two illustrious melancholy companions are now so accustomed to the life they lead, that they would hardly change it; yet truly, I do not think they can live long thus, or rather indeed I wonder they have lived so long, considering the extream melancholy which possesseth them.

Arcas having told me all these things, and shewed me his Garden, I went unto the place where I left my Master with Belesis, and he went to take care of my horse which was put with another, which my Master brought into that Wilderness. I was yet unsatisfied what they did when night came upon them, but was not long so; for when it began to be dark, I perceived in divers places about this vault there were several pieces of transparent Rock in divers places, all which were filled with a kind of Oyl which Arcas had extracted out of Fir Trees, which grew in great abundance within that Wood, and that faithful servant of Belesis, with the help of a kind of Cotton, made abundance of Lamps that gave a most glorious light within the Christal Grot; so that it seemed incomparably more lustrous and splendant when all these rustique Lamps were lighted, then it did in the day. The Beds of these two retired melancholy men, were suitable to the rest, and were made of Moss, Reeds, and Rushes, for they did not seek for any Downy Beds of ease. The Prince Mazares was grown to such a habit of melancholy, that he could not rejoice at any thing; and Belesis as sad as he was, had a greater share in that satisfaction which he ought to have in hearing Mandana was alike, then he himself had such a customary habit of sorrows had seized upon his soul; yet finding some satisfaction in relating sad stories, he told me what his thoughts were when he stole away from Tyburtus; how having a design to seek out some place where he might pass unknown, he resolved to imbarque for Sicily, and so to pass into Arabia the Desert, and there end his daies: Yet having consulted with an Oracle, the Gods did by their answer forbid him that course, and directed him to dwell in the black Mountain in Sicily, where he should find some consolation: Thither I went then (said he unto me) and at first believed that the consolation which the heavens had promised me was death: For passing a day and a half in these Mountains without seeing any body, I made no question then but death would soon be my lot. But at last, the Gods being my Guide as well as Commander, I met Belesis walking in the Wood, and spoke unto him; presently we grew acquainted, and the same day did begin so great a league of friendship, that we promised never to part from each other: Yet I am very ready to disengage you from your word (said Belesis, and interrupted him) for since the Princess Mandana lives, it is not just you should be tied unto the fortunes of a miserable man, who is out of all hopes to better himself; yet I shall Page 107 have this advantage, that the end of your miseries will shorten mine, since certainly I shall dye as soon as I am deprived of the sweetness which I find in your company. Alas, alas, Belesis (said the Prince Mazares) you are not acquainted with the malignity of my fate, if you imagine I can ever be happy: I must confess it is an extraordinary comfort unto me to hear that Mandana is alive, and that though I was her Ravisher, yet I was not her Executioner: But for all that, since I cannot leave loving her, and knowing it to be impossible I should ever get my self so high in her esteem as I was before, it may be said that I do nothing but change misery for misery; and which way soever I look upon the matter, I find my self the most unfortunate Prince upon Earth: for since I was the cause that this Princess fell into the power of the Pontean King, that she hath been hurried from Kingdom to Kingdom, and that all Asia is in War about it, I am most confident she hates my memory every minute in the day, and thinks the Gods most just in drowning me as a punishment of my crime: And I may assure my self, that as soon as she hears I am not dead, she will be as sorry for it as I am glad to hear she is living: Moreover, I am so unfortunate as to have such Rivals, as in any reason I cannot hate them, but such as I ought rather to lament: The King of Assyria is cruelly betrayed by me, and I carried away from him, her whom he infinitely loved, for whose sake he hath lost the greatest Kingdom in all Asia: As for the King of Pontus, how can I complain against him? Since I ruined Mandana, and he saved her, must I not rather accuse my self then him? Can I in any justice quarrel with a Prince who rescued my Princess from her grave which I layd open for her? What can I alledge against the illustrious Cyrus? What Crime can I tax him with? or to say better, How may he accuse me? for I made use of his Name to deceive the adored Mandana; under that illustrious Title I seduced her, and have eternally lost that esteem and friendship which I might have for ever enjoyed: Do you remember Orsanus (said he to me) the time when this illustrious Princess was at Babylon? how she called me her Protector: alas, how undeserving was I of that glorious Title? I have just cause to believe that of all her Lovers and Adorers, she hates me the most: The King of Assyria, as violent as he is by Nature, has not so much affronted her as I have done: The King of Pontus, in keeping that only which fortune gave him is not so culpable as I am; for I, miserable I, am not only an unjust, rash and insolent Lover of this Princess, but also a perfidious Friend and wicked Cheater, whose memory she may justly hate: Why should I trouble my self about her Liberty? (said he,) for if the illustrious Cyrus do not recover it for her, none else can.

The Prince Mazares was so vehement in such expressions as these, that I thought it not convenient to contradict him, lest I should more confirm him in his resentments by too much opposition; But granting him some things, and disputing others, our Conversation lasted till faithful Arcas brought in Supper, which was more neat then magnificent, as you may well imagine: After which, my dear Master asked me, how I came to see Mandana, whether Martesia and Araminta were with her? and as in my answers I phrased Abradates King of Susiana, Belesis interrupted me, asking how it was possible Abradates should be King, since when he entered into his solitude, the King his Father and the Prince his elder Brother were alive, and he himself was an Exile at Sardis? The Reason is (replied I unto him) because those two Princes are both dead, and consequently Abradates is King by succession. The Gods are worthy to be praised for it (replied Belesis,) for Abradates is much more worthy to wear a Crown then the Prince his Brother, who has been my greatest Persecutor.

Pray Orsanus (said Panthea and interrupted him) is this Belesis of whom you speak the same I have so often heard spoken of at Susa when I came there, and one who of all men living is one of the most accomplished Gallants, whom Love hath punished with all his tortures? I know not whether he be the same you mean (replied Orsanus,) but I know that Belesis is of Mantiana, and hath dwelt at Susa a long time; That Love hath been the misfortune of his life, and that the Prince of Susa elder Brother of Abradates hath made him complain much of his violence towards him. There is no question (said Panthea) but he is the same I mean; so that I can assure you the Prince Mazares is in company of one of the best loved men in all Asia, as those who have known him tell me, even by her whom he most loved, though since she most hates him: But Sir, said she to Cyrus, I pray pardon me for interrupting him in his Relation, and therefore I beseech you let him continue it: Cyrus then returned a Complement unto Panthea, and commanded Page 108 Orsanus to proceed, and accordingly he went thus on with his Story.

You see Sir, how the first day of my being in the Wilderness was spent; Trusty Arcas giving me his bed, and making another for himself as well as he could. It was so late before I went to bed, that the Birds at break of day did awake me within three hours after I began to sleep; yet was I not so soon awake as my Master; for though he was unimagably joyed that Mandana was alive, yet was it a kind of an interrupted joy, and mingled with so many perplexed thoughts, as he could not sleep that night: As soon as I came out of my little grot, I found him gone out of his, so that finding Belesis alone, I beseeched his help in perswading the Prince Mazares to quit this kind of life which then he lived: But alas Sir, said I unto him, the better to move him unto it, It were requisite you did quit it your self, and to perswade him rather by your Example then your Reasons. Ah Orsanus, cryed Belesis, the destiny of the Prince Mazares and my self are much different, and that which is good for him, is not for me. Sir, replied I, since I am ignorant of your misfortunes, and dare not be so bold as to ask what nature they are of, I cannot so well convince you as perhaps I should if I knew them; but to speak in general, there can be no misfortunes so bitter, but a man of your spirit and Wisdom may sweeten them. 'Tis true, replied he, those miseries which Fortune doth cause may be overcome, but such as Love doth load a man withall, there are no comforts so cordial as to sweeten them, especially such as mine are; however, I will promise you to use my best arguments to move the Prince Mazares unto a removal from hence in the morning, I would say to day (said he and sighed) if my affection unto him did not need some time of preparation before I be separated from so dear a friend. Whilst I was thus talking with Belesis, the Prince Mazares was rather wandering then walking in the Wood; and the disorder of his mind was so great, that he talked as he walked, and in lieu of walking far off from the Grot, he was turned upon it again ere ever he was aware: he found Belesis and me together, as we were going out to look him: No sooner were we met, but Belesis in pursuance of his promise, began to entreat him that he would stay this day with him, seeming as if he made no question but that he had intentions to leave him: As soon as he said so, my Master looking upon Belesis, told him, that the alteration in his fortune should not alter his maner of living; for said he unto him, It is misery enough unto me that I can never pretend unto Mandana's esteem, to make me forsake the society of men, although she be not dead; yet it was the despair which her death did cause in you, and that made you take up a resolution of forsaking the sight of men. 'Tis true, replied Mazares, but why would you advise me unto a life which will bring more bitter sorrows unto me then this I live? Consider well Belesis what you advise me unto, and tell me truly what you think to be my best course. Sir, replied he, a man that is not in love would advise you to endeavor to forget the Princess Mandana, and to return unto the King your Father and the Queen your Mother, who would infinitely rejoyce at it: But since I too well know the power of that Passion over those who are captivated with it, I must ingeniously tell you, that though I think it expedient for you to quit your Desart, yet I know not what to say, therefore I advise you to be your own Counsellor, and to follow your own inclination. I have mused away all this night (replied the Prince my Master) in contemplation of my present condition, but cannot resolve what I ought or what I would undertake; yet I must confess I find in my Soul such a violent desire to see the Princess Mandana, that I cannot tell whether or no I am able to resist it: And yet at the same time, I find my self so extremely ashamed of my Crime, that I think I shall never be able to shew my self: so that my fears and my desires will not suffer me to resolve what course to take: Moreover, though I should resolve to see her, yet how can I bring it to pass? If I go into Lidia where she is, and present my self unto Cressus, who fights against Cyrus, then it may be said that I fight for the King of Pontus, against a Prince who would release the Princess: If I should go into the Army of Cyrus, and think to have the honour of fighting for Mandana, then perhaps I should only fight for Cyrus and the King of Assyria, and dye before I have expiated my Crime by any considerable service. What shall I do then? I cannot resolve to fight neither for the King of Pontus, nor for the King of Assyria, nor for Cyrus; and yet my destiny is so odd, that I cannot engage my self on either side, but I must serve some of my Rivals; and it is absolutely impossible to imagine any way which can be advantageous to me. Moreover, since the Princess Mandana loved Cyrus when he was only Artamenes, and in her fidelity to him did scorn the greatest King of all Asia; what likelihood is there, that now Page 109 since Artamenes is become Cyrus, the King of Perseas Son, who since hath conquered many Kingdoms, that she should change her affection to him: No, no, said he, she will never change; and I must needs confess, she has no reason to change; nor can I ever hope to obtain the Love of this Princess, the height of my ambition is, That she would not hate me: Yes Mandana, said he, could I but let you see my real repentance, and could do you any such considerable service as would force your generosity to pardon me, and admit me unto your esteem again, I should desire no more, but take all my miseries with content: But alas, how is it possible for me to obtain this my desire?

Sir (said I unto him, in hopes to make him quit his Desart) you may obtain what you desire, if you will contrive ways how to release the Princess of Medea, and restore her unto the King her Father: But to effect that; you must renounce your solitude, and go where Mandana is, and seek all occasions of doing as I advise you: Oh Orsanus (said he) you would not advise me thus, but only to make me leave this Grotto; for you know well enough, that what you advise me unto is not easie to compass: If you were once in the way, replied I, I should then answer you more affirmatively; but this is most certain, that as long as you bury your self alive in this Wood, you can never do any service unto the Princess whom you love, who yet hates the very thought of you, and who cannot know how you repent the carrying her away as long as you are here? Moreover, if things so fall out that you cannot effect what I advise you unto, and that you absolutely resolve to renounce the world, and enter into your Tomb alive, you may when you please find this Cave alwayes open to receive you, and alwayes find Belesis there (replied that other illustrious solitary man who over-heard us) if death have not put an end unto all his miseries before your return: No, no, Belesis, replied the Prince Mazares, We will never part, and if Orsanus do perswade me to quit this Wilderness, it shall be upon condition that you shall quit it also, else I will never quit it. Belesis hearing my Master say so, answered him as one that was extream unwilling to quit the place, and there grew a most generous contest between them; Belesis desiring him to depart and leave him in his solitude, and Mazares resolved not to depart, unless he would with him, and so the matter rested that day without any resolutions upon it. The next morning I had induced my Master to leave this Salvage habitation if Belesis would go with him, and with my prayers and tears I had prevailed with Belesis to accompany my Master, until he was in a more happy condition. Both of them being thus resolved, I imported them to depart immediately least their minds should alter, yet we were forced to stay a while, because neither of them would be seen in such habits as then they did wear. Since I had enough left of what Sir you were pleased to give me for our equipage; and moreover Belesis had good store of Jewels, which his trusty servant kept carefully for him, we sent him unto the next Town with my horse to buy another horse, and to provide cloaths for my Master and Belesis. Within three daies after he returned with all things necessary for our voyage, which we undertook in an odd kind of manner, for I observed that the Prince Mazares and Belesis did leave their Desart, as men that had a design to return again, yet I seemed as if I did not observe any thing, hoping that time and company might happily make them change thoughts. In the mean time Arcas was to be our guide out of this Woody Mountain, and indeed did very happily conduct us: For my part, though the place was the most beautiful of any in the world, yet I was very glad to be out of it: Alwayes when I looked upon Belesis, I saw him look upon this Mountain with a sigh: But since we wanted yet many accoutrements for our voyage, we stayed at the first Town we came at to furnish our selves, where my Master caused a Buckler to be made, which he hath carried ever since, and whereby you may see Sir, (if ever you observed it) how severely he censured himself, since therein he expresseth himself unworthy of death for carrying away Mandana. Belesis also furnished himself with such arms as suited best to his liking: And during all the voyage, I used all my best arguments to perswade the Prince Mazares rather to return unto the King his Father, then to go unto Mandana, for he could never hope for the least favour: But his answer was, that he would never have left his Cave, but only in hopes to release her, and with full intentions to return thither again if he could not effect his design. When I saw then with what resolution he spoke unto me, I thought it better to yeeld unto him, then to contest any longer. Then we inquired concerning the state of things, and were informed that your Army Sir had quitted Armenia, and made towards Cappadocia, to go from thence unto the Frontiers of Phrygia which joyned upon Lydia. We understood also, Page 110 that Abradates would shortly depart from Susa, and engage himself in the behalf of Croesus. Then did we consider whether we should go unto Ephesus by Sea or by Land, but the Prince Mazares had no phancy to trust himself unto the inconstancy of the Winds and Waves, since it was further by Water then by Land; and the King of Pontus would not have carried Mandana that way, but because he feared the illustrious Cyrus would then follow him, therefore it was resolved we should not go by Sea; adding further unto other reasons, that we should never hear any news of the Princess Mandana in a Ship until we came at Ephesus; whereas on the contrary, we should hear all by Land, since there was not a place in all Asia which could not inform us. I shall not trouble you Sir with a relation which wayes we went, for that would be too tedious, only this, that we were compelled to make long journeys, and not to stay in any part of Paphlagonia which joins upon Cappadocia: But so it was, whether by change of Air or Diet, Belesis fell sick, and so very sick, that the Prince Mazares thought he would have died there. Belesis did intreat him a hundred times to let him die there, and follow his journey, yet he would not by any means; but on the contrary, protested he would never forsake him as long as he lived. In the mean time, the sickness of Belesis was not only dangerous, but like to last long: The greatest comfort to Mazares was, that he heard the Princess Mandana was in the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, and that as the season of the year was, you Sir could not draw into the field; and also, though he were at Ephesus there was no seeing of Mandana: nor any thinking of getting her out of such a sacred place as that was, yet did he endure the sickness of Belesis with much impatience; but at last he began to grow better and better, and made us hope he would escape, and indeed so he did. When he was quite out of all danger, and had quitted his Bed, his Physician advised him to walk and take the fresh Air: Belesis being very desirous to be in such a condition as he might not be any stay unto Mazares, took his Physicians advice; so that after he had walked some daies on foot, he found himself so strong as to ride; then for a trial whether he was able to travel, my Master and he design a journey of fifty Furlongs to walk in a great Wood, and I waited upon them: But Sir, we had no sooner entered a hundred paces in the Wood, then my Master riding alone by himself, some twenty paces before Belesis and me, who were talking together, and returned with much alteration in his aspect, and addressing himself unto me, Come hither Orsanus, said he, and tell whether my eyes deceive me not, for since I never saw Cyrus but once, and then I was not in a very good condition to observe his face; therefore I dare not assure you, that it was he who saluted me, and asked me whether I met not such a man as he described unto me; yet certainly if my imagination do well retain the memory of his Idea, he who I saw was Cyrus: Sir (said I unto him) Do we not hear every where as we pass, that Cyrus is in the head of his Army? Yet I am the most deceived that ever man was, if I do not see him yet at the root of yonder Tree, replied he. In saying so, he shewed me the Tree where you Sir was leaning.

Oh Orsanus, replied Cyrus, I must needs interrupt you in your story, that I may undeceive you, and tell you that I was not in Paphlagonia when you passed through it. I esteem you so much (answered Orsanus) that I will rather believe your words then my own eyes: Your eyes (replied the Princess Araminta, and blushed) are not so as you think them, since in all likelihood it was the Prince Spiritridates whom you saw, who resembles the illustrious Cyrus so much, that it is no wonder if you were mistaken. But I beseech you tell me the direct time when you saw him you speak of. Orsanus in obedience to the Princess Araminta did tell her the exact time; so that by the computation of Cyrus and her self, it was concluded that Orsanus met the Prince Spiritridates three weeks after the stranger Anaxaris left him wounded in Paphlagonia, and in such a Wood as Orsanus prescribed; so that by this, the Princess Araminta had so much consolation as to know certainly that he was not dead of the wound which he received; but on the other side, she wondered to hear no news from himself. After she had received all the satisfaction which Orsanus could give her, he continued his discourse in these terms.

The Prince Mazares had no sooner shewed me him whom I thought to be the illustrious Cyrus, but I told him, (out of prudence, lest an angry accident should happen) that it was not Cyrus, though he much resembled him. Mazares yet had much ado to believe me, and I think he would have asked this supposed Cyrus whether it was he or no. Page 111 had not Belesis (whilest we were in this Contest) told Mazares, that certainly I must needs know him better then he could, and therefore by consequence he ought to believe me: mean while, he who was the subject of our discourse, rushed presently into the thick of the Wood, and was quite out of our sight: So the Prince Mazares was forced to continue on his Walk. It is impossible for me Sir, to relate his thoughts unto you; for they were so tumultuously disordered, that he could never tell them unto us: Sometimes he was glad it was not you, and sometimes again sorry, without any reason either for his joys or sorrows: But since all his pretensions were only to release Mandana, and obtain her pardon, we never met with any, but he enquired both concerning her and you Sir.

That which wondered me most in the business was, that all those with whom we spoke, told us, that you Sir was towards the Frontiers of Lidia; and comparing my belief that it was you I saw, with these reports, the thought of it did so take up my mind, that I could not chuse but express it unto my Master two days after the sight of him who resembled you; I told him that I dissembled my real thoughts before, and that I did believe it was you which we saw in the Wood: So that we travelled a whole day reasoning why you should be there; and not being able to reconcile our own sights and these reports, which were so contrary to each other, we still passed on unsatisfied: But since I could not give my own eyes the lye, I conceived, that you had made some secret Voyage unto some neighbor Prince, to negotiate some business or other; and that though reports went you were in your Army, yet it was not impossible but, you might be some days absent: Thus believing that we had seen you, and that you knew not my Master, we arrived at last at Ephesus. The Prince Mazares then changed his Name for that of Telephanes; but Belesis never altered his, because it was unknown in Lidia. I shall not relate unto you Sir, what agitation of Soul was in the Prince Mazares (whom now I will call Telephanes for a while) when he saw the Temple wherein Mandana was; for I would (if possibly I could) conceal his Passion from you, lest I should too much exasperate your spirit against him: yet since the greatness of his Love does make his Virtue appear, I must needs have so good opinion of you Sir, as to believe, that at the end of my Relation you will admire, and perhaps become a friend unto such a Rival as he is, although I do set forth his Passion unto Mandana to be infinitely high: And the truth is Sir, it is impossible a Passion should be more violent: but the Wonder is, that since he came out of his Desert, he never entertained one thought but how to make satisfaction for his fault, and obtain a pardon for it, and I am most confident, that never any poor Peccant fuller of repentance then he, nor did I ever see more cruel remorse of mind: As oft as he considered, that it was through his treachery that Mandana was now inclosed within that Temple, his Soul was so sadded with sorrows, that I wonder he dyed not; and I verily think, that had not the King of Pontus been so ill when we came to Ephesus, that he kept his bed by reason of a wound in his thigh, so that he was not able to oppose those who would have taken away the Princess Mandana and the Princess Palmis; I am confident, I say, that if he had been there, though he had saved the life of the Princess, yet in the first raptures of his sorrows, my Master had then assaulted him: But afterwards considering that the King of Pontus his death would not have released Mandana, since as the state of things were, Cressus would not part with her, he conceived it more expedient to break her Chains by Policy: And considering that it was impossible to make any attempts upon that place for her Releasement, he thought it better to go unto Sardis, whither she was to be conveyed as soon as Cressus and the King of Pontus were agreed upon their conditions; which were not yet concluded upon, though the Negotiation had not been transacting ever since the King of Pontus came to Ephesus: for as soon as he came thither, he sent to demand protection from Cressus, upon condition that what Treaties soever there were between him and Ciaxares or you, Mandana should never be restored. Since this Proposition seemed very hard, because by granting it, such a War would ensue, as would never be ended till one side was ruined, since it was not probable that Ciaxares would ever cease unless his daughter was declared, therefore the negotiation was very long before it could be concluded; and nothing was done in it, till Crassus having received a smiling answer from the Oracle, and then he consented unto the King of Pontus his desires: yet to find out a plausible expedient wherewith to colour Justice, he engaged himself never to render the Princess Mandana in any Treaty without the King of Pontus his consent; so that after several sendings the one to the other, the business was concluded between them when we came to Ephesus.

Page 112 Then did we resolve for Sardis, and when we had put our selves into a handsom equipage we went unto that stately Town, where the Prince my Master never feared being known: For though Croessus had heretofore been on the King of Assyria's side as well as himself, yet they never saw each other, as well because Croessus was not in Babylon, as because they were always parted in several bodies, so that he went boldly unto him, and offered him his service, Love telling him, that it was not directly against the Rules of Generosity, to conceal his design of releasing Mandana, by such assurances of fidelity, which he would never have failed in, but only for her: And since Towns are commonly taken by craft, he thought he might without any baseness deliver Mandana by subtilty, since I could not by force. To get some reputation with Croessus, he made himself known unto him for what he was, to wit, a man of a great spirit and able parts in Martial matters; so that his design taking effect, Croessus received him very well, and treated both Belesis and me with much civility; and the better to disguise our selves, there seemed to be no difference of quality between us all, but yet the inclination of Croessus did prefer the supposed Telephanes; First, though Belesis was very handsome, of much spirit, and a gallant deportment: It is very true, that since he did only surmount his sorrows out of his affectionate friendship unto the Prince Mazares, and since that Prince did surmount his own sorrows only to release his Mistress, therefore they acted differently, the one seeming much more forced then the other: However it was, in a few daies Telephanes was well known both in Court and Camp, Croessus offered him employment, but he would take none upon him, lest then perhaps he could not lay hold of any fit opportunity which might offer it self; his only care was, not to be suspected, and to insinuate himself with divers persons: When he understood that they would lodge the Princess Mandana within the Cittadel when she came to Sardis, his design was to make him that was Governour his friend, and he brought it so handsomly to pass, that he got a great stroke with him. In the mean time, since the negotiation between Croessus and the King of Pontus could not be compleated without an interview, it was resolved they should meet neer Sardis, and since all conditions were agreed upon, and they feared that in conveying the Princess Mandana, and the Princess Palmis, something might be attempted for their releasement; therefore Croessus would have them depart from Ephesus, whilst the King of Pontus was not there, purposely because the Spies which Prince Artamas might have amongst them, might the sooner be deceived. The King of Pontus was extremely against it, saying, That since the River Hermes was between your Camp Sir, and the way which these Princesses was to go, there was no fear at all: But Croessus told him, that the Prince Artamas had so many creatures in his Dominions, that he stood in fear of his own Subjects as well as of his Enemies, and therefore the King of Pontus was forced to consent, that orders should be sent unto Andramites to guard these Princesses, and convey them with those Forces which he had unto a certain place where the King of Pontus would meet him with others, and accordingly it was put in execution. In the mean time, since it was the will of Croessus that my Master should wait upon him when he went to meet the King of Pontus, he was then put to an extream puzzle, since that Prince intended to present him unto his Rival, as a man from whom he expected great services: And the King of Pontus perceiving by the proceedings of Croessus, that he valued this Telephanes at a high rate, and his handsome presence speaking him to be a man of much merit, he received him with great civility, and my Master did answer it with so much turbulency in his countenance, that I have admired a hundred-times, Croessus and the King of Pontus did not perceive it: It is true, that presently after he recollected himself, and carried the matter with as much cunning as a man in Love could, who had a plot to deceive his Rival, and release his Mistress.

The King of Pontus then was as well pleased with my Master, as my Master would have been with him, if there had not been some secret reasons which took the edge off all those civilities which that Prince expressed unto him, and disoblged him; yet sometimes when he considered him as one that saved Mandana's life, he could not chuse but acknowledg himself obliged in his heart. In the mean time, as much as Telephanes desired to see the Princess whom he adored, yet he durst not go with the King of Pontus, who as I told you Sir, was to meet Andramites that guarded her: For since it was not so easie for him to disguise his face as his name, he made no question but if she saw him she would know him; and if she knew him, before she was informed of his real repentance for carrying her away, her extream aversion to him would discover him, and so his design of restoring [Page \[unnumbered\]](#) her that liberty which he had taken from her would quite be defeated; therefore he made a handsom excuse for not accompanying the King of Pontus, as he desired him, but returned unto Sardis exceedingly disquieted, because he was not able to regulate his desires; for when his repentance and his generosity had the upper hand in his heart, then he wished that the Prince Artamas might attempt something for the liberty of these Princesses, and in lieu of conducting them to Sardis, they might be brought unto your Camp Sir: But then when Love was Queen-Regent in his soul, he could not chuse but desire a sight of Mandana, and zealously wish that it might be himself who should release her, and restore her unto you, rather then any other should have that honour from him; yet notwithstanding he had no mind to be ignorant of all passages between the King of Pontus and the Princess Mandana at their meeting; so that for better information of himself, he desired Belesis to accompany that Prince, not daring to send me, because the Princess knew me. But since he could not accord being seen by the Princess, because she was to pass into the Town where he was, he designed to see her out of a Window as she went through the Town unto the Cittadel; so that he waited for the return of the King of Pontus, and the Princesses Arrival with much impatience. About two daies after, the news was brought, that the Prince Artamas attempting the liberty of the Princesses was taken prisoner, and wounded in several places, and that all his Party were either killed, defeated, or taken prisoners. About two hours after this, another Post came from Andramites, who told Croessus, that the King of Assyria was amongst the prisoners, being known by a Captain that was in the Babylonian War.

This news, which extreemly rejoyced Croessus, grieved my Master; for though the King of Assyria was his Rival, yet to see so great a King <◇> such a case, moved much sorrow in him, especially considering that this last accident had not been, if he had not carried away the Princess Mandana: Also fearing that this Prince might know him, as well as the Princess might, he was moved to conceal himself with much care, lest all his designs should be spoiled; and indeed I did much confirm him in his resolution of keeping himself unknown, especially as the Princess and the prisoners passed through the Town, and that day he kept in the place where I lodged, and as good luck was, the street where we were, proved to be that through which Mandana was to pass, and so she did. It is impossible I should tell you Sir, what operation this sight had upon the heart of my Master; the truth, and the wonder is, that it did not so much augment his Love as his repentance; for when he saw her so fair and so sad both, he imagined himself to be the cause of that sadness, his sorrows were such, as I can describe them no otherwise, then by telling you that I cannot describe them. As soon as the Chariot wherein both the Princesses were was out of sight, and as he was ready to go from the Window, he saw the King of Assyria appear, guarded with Souldiers, who conducted him and all the rest of the prisoners, except the Prince Artamas, who was not brought unto Sardis until some daies after, by reason of his wounds: My Master then seeing at the same time both the Prince whom he had offended, and the Princess whom he carried away, fell into such an extasie of sorrow, that it was long before he was able to answer unto what I said unto him, and I believe he had not so soon given over his sad thoughts if Belesis had not entred; his inquisitive desire to know the meeting between the King of Pontus and Mandana was quite cooled, and the sight of this Princess had so troubled his spirits, that he heard Belesis, but understood him not: I should have thought Sir (said I unto him) that since your belief of the Princess being dead did move unto such a desperate sorrow, the sight of her alive should move you to a sensible consolation, and yet I perceive you are as much grieved as ever: Do you think Orsanus (said he to me) that I can look upon Mandana as a Captive, and see her sad, but I must be so also? Alas, alas, Orsanus, I am not capable of any joy until I have made some reparation for all the injuries I have done her; methinks when I looked upon her, I saw her sigh, and saw in her heart that just measure of hatred towards me by her sorrows: I perceived in her innocent soul such a horrid memory of the Prince Mazares, that I am perswaded she thinks upon me perpetually, and her hatred of me reigns in her resentments, according to the measure of all fresh disgraces which befalls her: Judg then Orsanus, whether I can look upon this Divine Princess without disturbed joyes, yet I would not but have seen her, and seen her sad; for since I see her fair eyes so full of tears and melancholy, I am become an absolute Master of my Love, and I would release Mandana only for her self, and not for me; whereas if I had not seen so sad an object, my virtue is so weak, I should perhaps Page 114 have thought only upon my own interest: No, no, imperious Passion (said he) thou that prompted me to commit the greatest sins of my life, yet thou shalt never move me to commit any more, my virtue is now too strong for thee, and thou canst not vanquish me: But what do I say? (added he;) Let me not ascribe that unto Virtue, which ap[er]tains only unto Love; and to say the very truth, it is my being extreemly in love, that prompts me to act as I intend: Hitherto (said he unto us) I loved Mandana only for my self; but now I will begin to love her for her own sake only: Indeed I know not whether I am able to love her without any desires; but I am certain I will love her without any hopes, and by consequence without offence. Let us then labour my dear Belesis (said this generous Prince) to release my Princess, and for our greater encouragement let us never think of releasing her for our selves, but for a Prince much more happy then we are; and though I know he deserves all his good fortune, yet perhaps I shall have much ado not to murmur; but I am most absolutely resolved never to molest him.

These Sir were the thoughts of the illustrious Mazares, who spent the rest of that day and all the night following in the extremity of sorrows: yet not to consume himself in unprofitable sights, he began to observe very circumspectly what Guards they kept about the Cittadel, and to nourish that friendship which he had obtained with the Governor, and all with design to see what ways might be devised for the Releasement of the Princess Mandana: The better to procure friends and creatures unto himself, he was always ready to do any good office for the meanest Souldier, either unto the King of Lidia, or the King of Pontus, or unto Abradates who loved him very well: He courted Andramites also for his favour, whom he oblige <...> ently after the Princesses were brought from Ephesus to Sardis; For reports being sp <...> bout, either by the Prisoners, or some other unknown way, that he had taken you Sir as well as the King of Assyria and the Prince Artamas, and that at the request of the Princess Palmis he had released you, Croessus was so angry with him, that he was a while in some disgrace: But since it appeared clearly that Andramites did it ignorantly, every one lamented him: And my Master, who in order to his design did endeavor to ingratiate himself with all men of Quality which were both powerful and male-contented, did do Andramites very good service in this business, since Croessus did harken more unto his Reasons, then unto any others that were alledged in his behalf, which service did so sensibly oblige him, that he vowed eternal friendship. But though Croessus did restore Andramites into his former favour, yet there rested in his heart a secret grudg against that Prince for suspecting him who had given so many testimonies of his fidelity. As for the King of Pontus, he was the saddest man in the World that you Sir was not taken; conceiving that if you had been a Prisoner, then the consequence would have been most happy for him; because he could have payed the debt which he owed in restoring you Sir your liberty, and have satisfied himself and his passion in keeping the Princess Mandana.

As things were in this condition, we understood that Tegeus son unto the Governor of the Cittadel was amongst the Prisoners of War which were taken: And as we understood at the same time that he was in love with a Lady called Cylenise, who was in the Cittadel with the Princess Palmis, the Prince my Master desired Belesis, who had a quick wit to find out an opportunity of seeing him, and to know of him whether or no he had any intelligence with any in the Cittadel, and whether there was no possibilities of releasing his Mistress, and perhaps himself. Belesis undertook this employment, for my Master could not employ me (because Feraulas being a Prisoner with Tegeus did know me) and he would not go himself, lest the King of Assyria should see him; so that Belesis was the only fit man for the service, and certainly it was a difficult matter to make a better choyce; for he transacted the matter admirably well, as you shall hear by the sequel of my Discourse. For my part, I endeavored to tamper and gain some Souldiers of the Cittadel, not telling them wherein I intended to employ them. Thus every one of us being busie, though we yet saw no great likelihood of any happy success in our enterprize, yet we lived in a little less anguish of mind. In the mean time, since the King of Pontus did infinitely esteem the supposed Telephanes, he courted him and his friendship very much, although he found but cold returns: yet since Telephanes durst not but keep within such terms of civility as were fitting for a man of his Quality, the King of Pontus perceived it not, but loved him exceedingly, and so much, that meeting him one day in the Kings Gardenas he came out from a Councel of War held in the Closet of Croessus, he began Page 115 to speak unto him of his misfortunes, and of his Love: But amongst all the rest of his sad disasters which ever had happened unto him, he did not grieve so much for any thing as that he had such a Rival as he could not chuse but love, and as he was infinitely obliged unto: For truly (said he unto him) it is not a most miserable condition to be unjust and ungrateful unto the greatest Prince in the World? unto whom I am a debtor both for my life and liberty; unto whom I am beholding for that Scepter which belongs unto me, if I would take it from him: but yet I cannot; my Love to Mandana is so violent, that I am not Master of my Reason. Telephanes hearing the King of Pontus speak thus, did think it best to confirm him in his generosity, so that perhaps he might induce him to release Mandana: So that being prompted by the spurs of Love which would not let him lose a minute of time, he repeated unto him all that he had so often hinted unto himself since he repented the carrying away of the Princess Mandana. Do you not consider Sir (said he unto him) that every moment you retain the Princess whom you love, she hates you the more for it? I know it very well, replied the King of Pontus; but Telephanes, if ever you were in love, I pray you imagine how difficult a thing it is to part with a Princess, who as soon as she is at liberty will be in the Arms of another? Alas Telephanes, if you advise me to part from her, certainly you were never in love. I wish the Gods Sir (re)he and sighed, having so much disorder in his spirit, as it was to see he spoke as he thought) that what you say were true. No Sir, I know what Love is; and I speak as I do, because I know the power of that Passion; for if you love, should you not do any thing to procure the love of her you love? Yes doubtless (replied the King of Pontus.) Why then do you take that course (replied Telephanes) which will procure her hatred? Because I can do no otherwise (replied he,) for what course can I take to avoyd her hate? By giving the Princess whom you love her liberty (answered he,) sin <...> is not possible but she must needs infinitely esteem you, if your Virtue do surmount <...> our Passion: Then Sir would your glory spread over all Asia; all your Subjects, w <...> d rebel against him that usurps your Kingdom; every Prince would arm in your behalf, and reconquer your Dominions for you; Cyrus himself would set you upon your Throne: And indeed Sir, I find so much glory in the act I advise you unto, that I would do it, though I were sure to dye the next day. Ah Telephanes, cried the King of Pontus, alas, you do not know the sovereignty of that Passion which commands my Soul, although you have been in love; Love is either great or little, either according to the beauty which doth cause it, or else according to the sensibility of that heart which is touched with it, and therefore all the world does not love alike: But Telephanes, I have a Soul the most sensible of all men living, and Mandana is the fairest and most ravishing Beauty upon Earth: Come Telephanes (said he, and would have carryed him by the arm towards the Cittadel) come and see the Justification of my Crime in the eyes of that Princess whom I adore: for though they are always incensed when they look upon me, at least very melancholy, yet you shall see it is impossible to be deprived of them and live. Telephanes was much surprized at the Proposition, and so much disordered, that if the King of Pontus had not been blinded with his over-zeal, he would have perceived it: And what desire soever my Master had to see Mandana, yet he would never see her with the King of Pontus; so that to excuse himself, Sir (said he unto him) If there need no more to justify you but the sight of her Beauty, you shall be so in my opinion; for I saw her when she came first to Sardis; and the more sad I saw her, the more I accused you: all this would not satisfie the King of Pontus, but he still importuned my Master to go with him unto the Princess. Pardon me Orsanus (said Cyrus) if I interrupt you in your Story, to ask you, Whether the King of Pontus did see the Princess Mandana every day? Ever since she came to Sardis (replied he) none had the liberty to see her but himself, but truly he is not at all the more happy; for I have heard one of his servants say, that he never visits her but both his Love and Despair is augmented, for he finds her always more fair, but more rigid every day then other. Cyrus then asking pardon of the two Princesses, Orsanus went on with his Story thus.

The King of Pontus being very importunate with my Master to go unto Mandana, did press him so far, that the poor Telephanes could find but bad Reasons to excuse himself; but he was forced to leave him, and go into the Cittadel without him, and went by a great Walk of Cypress, close by the ditch of that place, and opposite to the Garden door: After Page 116 Mazares saw him enter, he walked above two hours in that Walk, thinking upon the adventure which had happened: By chance Belesis and I found him there, and he acquainted us with the passage: Afterwards making a stand, and looking earnestly upon us; Must it not needs be confessed (said he unto us, that Fortune is very ingenuous to torment me, since I must be continually both culpable and miserable? For I see, that to do one good act, as to release the Princess whom I took away, is, I must commit a hundred bad ones; I must, I say, dissemble and deceive them that trust me; I must always speak contrary to truth, I must be of one side, and seem to be of the other, and all this to put the person whom I most love and adore into the power of a beloved Rival: For my dear friends (said he unto us) with tears in his eyes) to put Mandana into such a condition as she would be, is certain to deliver her unto Cyrus: This I have promised unto my self, and this I will either do or die. Sir, replied Belesis, I do not question but to find out wayes how to do the first of those two, for by suborning some of Tegeus his Guard, I can speak with him as oft as I please, and can dispose him to endeavour the utmost of my power that the Cittadel may be surprized: He hath given me a Letter unto an old Officer in it, who he saith is very covetous, and who indeed I have found very ready to receive gifts, and by consequence ready to do what I would have him, so I will feed him with gifts. Moreover he told me, that when I had found out wayes to release the Princesses, and his dear Celenice, he knew how to escape his prison without trouble to any; for he who commands the Guard over the prisoners of War is so absolutely his, that if he desired it, he could get them all released, except the Prince Artamas, who hath a particular Guard by himself: But why is Tegeus still a prisoner (said my Master) if it be in his power to have his liberty? Because in the condition he is in (replied Belesis) he is not suspected, and he hath a design to find out ways how to release the Princesses, and thereby ingage two great Princes, and also to release Celenice for his own satisfaction; so that I perceive it sticks but upon two things, to wit, some men for the execution of his design, which I have promised him, and one to acquaint the Princesses that their liberty is ready for them, and that they would prepare themselves to follow their Releasers; and this is the effect of that Letter which I have unto the old Officer whereof I spoke, that he shall let the Princesses understand how there are preparations for their releasement: But he told me, that this would be difficult for him to do, and that it would be much more easie for him to deliver us a Port, and we to carry them away; then for him to speak unto them: But Belesis, replied Telephanes, Why did you not tell me any thing of your negotiation? Because I I would have the business more ripe, replied he, and had it not been to comfort you a little, I should not have told you so much, because the business cannot be executed so soon. Moreover, a Captain of greatest power in the Cittadel, next the Governour, who is an intimate friend unto Tegeus, is not in Sardis, nor will he return this fifteen dayes. Telephanes perceiving then, that Tegeus was Master of the Guards, that he had very powerful intelligence in the Cittadel, that I had gained many of the Souldiers, and that there wanted nothing but a Convoy, and one to acquaint the Princesses, did not think upon any thing, but how to remove these two obstacles. A while after, news being brought to Town that Nysomolis was taken, and that your Army Sir struck a terror into all Lydia, it was requisite that Telephanes, (to keep himself unsuspected, and to preserve that advantageous opinion which they conceived of him) should go into the Wars, and shew that he deserved it; he went out therefore with Andramites, and in several small encounters did notably behave himself; yet his mind was, that Belesis and I should stay in Sardis, to keep Tegeus and all those of his correspondency in a disposition to execute the enterprize, when it was ripe, with orders to advertise him speedily of it when the time came, to the end he might find out a pretence for his coming to Sardis. Thus Sir did things stand at Sardis, whilst you were taking Towns; and forcing the Lydian Troops to quit their Quarters.

But to shorten my discourse as much as I can, upon these terms Sir did the enterprize concerning Mandana's releasement stand, when after you desired combat with the King of Pontus, there was an interview between you and that Prince, when you knew the Prince Mazares amongst the rest which came with him. I doubt not Sir but you desire to know why my Master would come unto that meeting, for I wondered at it my self, but he would give me no other reason, then that since you had met him, and spoke to him in Paphlagonia, yet then knew him not, he thought that certainly you would not know Page 117 him in Lydia, and therefore he might boldly, without fear of discovery, accompany the King of Pontus, who was very importunate with him, and also might satisfy his desires of being present at an interview, wherein he had a secret interest, which none knew of but himself: For indeed he told me in going to that place, where you and the King of Pontus were to see each other, that sometimes he wished that your persuasions might not prevail with the King of Pontus, concerning Mandana's releasement, but that he himself might have the glory of it: And sometimes again, when he suspected the happy success of his enterprize, he wished the King of Pontus might be moved by your reasons. However it was Sir, the Prince Mazares, (who I will now call Telephanes no longer) did go with the King of Pontus, upon reasons so different and opposite, that he could never reconcile them himself. In the mean while Sir, I beseech you do me the honour to confess, that there is never any true judgment to be given upon appearances; for indeed I know Sir, that when you saw the Buckler whereon my Master represented a dead man, and his Motto, testifying, that he thought himself worthy of it, and knew him who bore it to be the Prince Mazares: Then, I say, you were angry, and hated him, and that you expressed as much by such visible marks, both in your words and actions, as alyne one might see the thoughts of your heart: Yet Sir, this man whom you thus hated, was then thinking upon nothing else, but how to render the Princess Mandana unto you, and for ever to deprive himself of her, and indeed he answered you with as much moderation as a man of courage possibly could. I shall not need to tell you Sir what his thoughts were upon that occasion, for you may easily imagine them; but give me leave to tell you, that after (by the prudence of Abradates) this dangerous conference was ended, and that every one took the way unto his own Quarter, the King of Pontus knew no more how to behave himself towards Mazares, when Mazares knew what to say unto him. After they had marched forty or fifty paces without a word passing amongst them, Abradates came to my Master with much civility: Generous Prince (said he unto him) I am sorry that I must render you more respect then hitherto I have, for since it was your pleasure to be unknown, I suppose you had rather have still been Telephanes, then the Prince Mazares, since you have made that name so famous, that you cannot leave it off unless you wrong your self: Sir, replied he, I have been ever so unfortunate under the name of Mazares, that it is no wonder I should desire to leave it off for a time; but for ought I see, the name of Telephanes is not more prosperous unto me.

All this while the King of Pontus spoke not a word; but calling to memory how Mazares lived at Sardis, and how he refused to go with him unto Mandana, though he importuned him, and considered that he had insinuated himself into the friendship of the Governour in the Cittadel, and with all the men of Quality in Court, he thought that he would at last put all these into some design; but not being able to comprehend the mystery, yet being very desirous of further satisfaction, without any further delay he went to the King of Susiana, and the Prince Mazares, and looking upon my Master; I beseech you Sir, said he unto him, though you be my Rival, yet deny me not one favour which I shall ask you, as if you were Telephanes my friend, and my extremely loved friend: Although I am your Rival Sir (replied the Prince Sacas) and by consequence Telephanes could never be very much your friend, no more then Mazares could; yet let me tell you, that there are very few things which you are not able to obtain of me: For truly, since you saved the life of the Princess Mandana, whom I most unfortunately caused to perish, your prayers must needs be very prevalent with me, and indeed so they shall be for ever: If so, replied the King of Pontus, tell me what opinion I ought to have of you, for I profess unto you I do not know; when I call to mind all I have seen you do, I know not where I am, and I yet doubt whether you be Telephanes, or the Prince Mazares: Certainly I am the last of these, replied he: If you be, said the King of Pontus, Why do you ingage your self on the side of Croessus? Why did you conceal your name? And what motives had you to act as you have done? Is it for your self, or for me, that you have fought? It was neither for you nor for my self (replied my Master, with as much subtilty as wit, to disguise the reality of his thoughts) but it was against Cyrus: Yet it does not seem to me, replied the King of Pontus, that you spoke unto him with any such Symptoms of hatred as should induce you to fight in favour of one Rival to ruine another. But tell me ingenuously I beseech you, What ought I to think Page 118 of your Actions? and how must I consider you? As a man (replied Mazares and sighed) that does not pretend unto the least hopes or aims of ever enjoying Mandana; and I would it were the pleasure of the Gods, that I could inspire you with the same bitter repentance which I have for carrying her away, and causing the greatest parts of all the miseries which have befallen her. How's this Mazares (said the King of Pontus) do not you pretend any thing to Mandana, and yet come disguised unto the place where she is? You fight against the forces of the other side; you engratiate your self into friendship; you seem to be my friend, and is all this without any pretention? No, no, it is impossible, you can never persuade me to believe it. It is not an easie matter to imagine (said the King of Susiana) what the intention of the Prince Mazares should be: Yet he hath one (replied the King of Pontus) of what nature soever it be. That which doth most trouble me (added he in speaking to Abradates) is, that he hath used all his endeavors and arguments to persuade me to render the Princess Mandana unto Cyrus; and indeed how is it possible (added he, and spoke to my Master) if you yet love her, you should advise me to put her into the power of a Prince adores her, and for whom she scorns all those that love her?

To testify unto you, said Mazares, that I have no secret interest at all, I shall give you the same counsel now, when you know what I am, and conjure you, with all the faculties of my heart and Soul, to give freedom unto the Princess Mandana: And I will engage my word, that in acknowledgment of your saving her life, and giving her liberty, I will divide the Kingdom which hereafter I shall possess, and give half of it to you, if you cannot reconquer your own. No, no, said the King of Pontus, you wish not what you say; for if you did, I must not look upon you as my Rival, but as my friend. I know not well, replied Mazares, whether I am your Friend or my Rival, my reason is so ruffled: but yet I know that I love Mandana more perfectly then you do, since I know how to limit my hopes, and to seek no further then her satisfaction: Did you know how to love so well as I, you would be more sensible then you are of the sufferings which the person beloved endures: But in the name of the Gods Sir, let me persuade you to repent as I do, and let not one of your Rivals have that advantage over you: Moreover, I beseech you do not think, that I only say I will not pretend any thing unto the Princess Mandana, out of any fear to make you my Enemy, as valiant as you are; for I care so little for my life, that if I considered none but my self, I would seek such an occasion to dye the sooner and more gloriously: but I do really speak as I think; and it is not more true, that you do love the Princess Mandana, then it is true that I pretend nothing unto her, but I wish with all my heart and soul that you would set her at liberty, and put her into the hands of Cyrus, rather then let her continue miserable still. If what you say be true, replied the King of Pontus, of all men living you are the most virtuous, or else the least amorous; and I should much wonder if it should be the last of these; and that a corner passion should cause you to carry away the Princess Mandana, and forget your duties to the King of Assyria. As the greatest Crimes, replied my Master, does cause the greatest repentance; so it is no wonder if since I have committed a double injustice, I should be extremely ashamed. It is true, replied the King of Pontus, but yet it is very much that, one should love, and yet be able to render his Mistress unto a Rival whom she loved, Yet truly (said the King of Sasiana) the Prince Mazares does express himself so emphatically, and with such an air as is apparent that his tongue speaks the very thoughts of his heart; and therefore I conjure you both, what ever both your designs are, not to disjunct. For my part, said the King of Pontus, if the Prince Mazares will engage his word, that he will never pretend any thing unto the Princess Mandana, and that he has no concealed design to carry her away both from Cyrus and my self, I shall carry my self towards him as if he were not my Rival. Abradates then asked Mazares whether he would engage himself unto such Conditions as the King of Pontus desired? since he himself professed he had no pretensions unto Mandana. Whilst this Prince was speaking thus unto him, Mazares did consult with his mind upon the matter; and finding that if he should promise what was required, yet he did not thereby engage himself unto any thing which was contrary to his design, since his intentions were not to carry away the Princess Mandana for himself, therefore he consented unto those Conditions though with much repugnancy: and I verily believe, that if he had not certainly known the death of the King of Pontus would not have furthered the liberty of Mandana, in lieu of making this Page 119 promise, he would have decided the controversie by Sword, and fought with this Prince.

Thus Sir did this conference pass; after which, Abradates acquainting Croessus with my Masters condition when he came to Sardis, and relating all passages as much in my Masters advantage as I could, Croessus had not so many jealousies in his soul as the King of Pontus had, who after did circumspectly observe all my Masters actions, so that we had much ado to hold those intelligencies which formerly we did without discovery. In the mean while, the Prince Mazares had such an extreme abhorrence of all dissimulations, that if Belesis and I had not persuaded him that the glory of an enterprize of this nature, did consist only in the execution, and not in the means by which it was concealed; and that the Conspirators, the more they dissemble in a just cause, the more commendations they deserve: I think, that rather then he would have done as he did to conceal his design, he would have undertaken a more violent resolution. After this Sir, you know how high discontents were grown amongst all the Princes, concerning an exchange of Prince Artamas; and the Queen, before whom I speak; and how Andramites, and the Prince Myrsiles took the King of Susiana's part: But you do not know Sir, how my Master making use of these divisions, did secretly and frequently visit the generous Abradates and Andramites, and so wrought upon their Spirits, as they promised him, that if matters were further exasperated, they would attempt nothing without him; but yet my Master still kept his design close unto himself. After this Sir, the Truce being published, and the Captain who was friend unto Tegeus, being returned unto the Cittadel, my Master did make a shew as if he were not well, to the end he might the more conveniently endeavour to speak with Mandana, or at least with Martesia; and we did negotiate the business so happily, that by the assistance of this friend unto Tegeus, who had the Guard of the Chamber where the Princesses did lye, we had permittance to enter into the Cittadel in the night, and he promised to help me to the speech of Martesia. As I knew that Martesia had a very friendly opinion of me ever since I was her guide in bringing her to Sinope, so I hoped to effect my business very well; but do what I could, I could not persuade my Master to stay behind, for he thought that I could not so well aggravate his bitter repentance, as himself could do; so that I was forced to submit unto his desires, and I had so ordered the business, that just at nine of the Clock, the friend of Tegeus would let my Master and me enter, undiscovered by any; and so bringing us by a back pair of stairs into his own Chamber, he went unto Mandana's, where finding Martesia, he desired her that she would be pleased to let him have an hours discourse vvith her; so that Martesia being as complaysant as any judicious person would be unto one, that kept them prisoners, consented; and passing from the Chamber of her Mistress unto her ovvn, vvhich vvas very neer, the Captain came to us, and according to the plot between my Master and my self, I only vvnt un|to Martesia, to the end I might the better deceive her, as aftervvards I shall tell you; for vve knevv very vvell, that the Princess Mandana did not think my Master to be alive, or that he was at Sardis, because Croessus and the King of Pontus had given express charge; that no news whatsoever should be carried unto the Princesses, and therefore we feared not that Mandana could know of his being there.

Then did this Captain conduct me to Martesia's Chamber, and left me there; she no sooner saw me, but she broke out into a hundred expressions of joy and tenderness. Ah Orsanus (said she unto me) Can you not carry me once again to Sinope, and bring the Princess with me? Yes sweet Martesia (said I unto her) that I can, and I came hither purposely to make the Proposition unto you. Alas, replied she, I see so little possibility in it, that I fear they will sooner keep you a prisoner with us, then you can set us at so much liberty; and therefore to consume no time in telling me any pleasing lies, I pray tell me, how the state of things in general does stand? For we know nothing here but what pleaseeth the King of Pontus, who will tell us nothing but that he is in Love; there|fore pray tell how the illustrious Cyrus does? And where is his Army? Tell me whether Artamas be recovered of his wounds? For the Princess of Lydia is much grieved for him, and if it were not too much to ask you at once, you would do me a pleasure in telling me what is become of poor F-ra las? Martesia having put all these questions unto me, I satisfied her curiosity in them all; after which, I assumed the discourse wherewith I began, and assured her confidently, that I knew of an infallible way to release the Princesses, and Page 120 to put Mandana into the hands of Cyrus; so that she believed there was some truth in my words: But she told me, that as for the Princess Palmis she would never go out of prison, but by the hand of the King her Father, especially since the Prince Artamas would remain a prisoner of War; and lest this should keep the Princess Mandana from going out, I pray tell me (said she unto me) What are the best courses to be taken: First it is requisite, said I unto her, that I have the honour to see the Princess; and secondly, the same honour is desired for him, that is the chief actor in the enterprize, who is now in the Captains Chamber, who brought me hither, and who desires to receive his orders from her own mouth: There is no difficulty in all this (replied Martesia) pro|vided you will have a little patience, for I believe the Princess of Lydia will leave her presently: But in the interim (said she) I pray tell me who is this generous Liberator? How can he get us out from hence? And when shall it be? For I wish it were this very hour, if it were possible: You shall know the two first of your questions in good time (replied I) and as for getting you out from hence, it shall be within this three daies, if the Prin|cess please: If she please (replied she) Ah Orsanus, I warrant you it will please her, since though the King of Pontus be as respective to her as he is unjust, I am confident she would do any thing to get out of his power. In the mean time, said she, that vve may the sooner see vvwhether the Princess of Lydia be retired, and the sooner see our Delliverer, I pray you followv me.

In saying so, she carried me unto a little Closet over against the Princess Chamber, but so neer it; and the partitions so full of crannies (for you must know the places of War are not built like Palaces) that any thing might be heard which was spoken. Being then in this place where we could hear all the discourse which passed between the two Princesses, we began to hearken, in hopes they would end their discourse quickly, and presently I heard a voice which was unknown to me, and which Martesia said was the Princess Palmis, who complained extreemly against the malignity of her Fortune: For my part, replied the Princess Mandana, I hardly dare complain against mine; for since the conformity which is in our misfortunes did make you love me, and in some sort caused the friendship which is between the Prince Artamas, and the illustrious Cyrus, methinks I ought to indure it patiently: Ah Madam, said the Princess Palmis, I beseech you do not give so bad a foundation unto the affection which I bear you, and seek not for that in the suitableness of our miseries, which cannot be found any where but in your rare merits; and if you please to look a little neerer into things, you will find a notable diffe|rence, between the misfortunes of Cyrus, and those of Artamas, and also between yours and mine: Yet in many things they resemble very much, replied Mandana, for as one hath been exposed to many dangers, so hath the other; as one changed his own name for that of Artamenes, the other assumed the name of Cleander in lieu of his own, both of them are brave and gallant, both of them have been Conquerours, both of them in Love, and if there be any difference, it is in that the Prince Artamas loved by reason, and Cyrus only by inclination: Had you changed the name of Artamas for Cylrus, said the Princess Palmis, your discourse had been just: I beseech you let me end it (said the Princess Mandana) and see whether I have not reason to attribute unto the likeness of our miseries, the pity which you have of mine: Besides all that I said before, these two Princes have had the favour and affection of these two Kings whom they served, they have both of them been imprisoned by them, for whom they have hazard|ed their lives a thousand times; as Croessus was displeased with you because you favoured Cleander; so Ciaxares hated me, because I esteemed Artamenes: Indeed what should I say? Cyrus and Artamas brought us hither; Have they not persecuted you as well as me? And as Adrastus and Artesilias died for you, did not the unfortunate Mazares perish for me? Are we not now both prisoners together? And must it not needs be confessed, that since you cannot love me for any resemblance of those admirable qualities which are in you, and not in me, Heaven has a design to make you love me, because I resemble you in your misfortunes: To shew you (replied the Princess Palmis) that the Love I bear you proceeds from nothing but your merits, and not at all from any resemblances of our adventures, I must needs let you see that they are infinitely different; so that in reason it cannot be said they have any resemblance, and by consequence you ought not to believe, that the affection I bear you hath any such cause: The adventures of Cyrus and Artamas are much different; for when Cyrus was only Artamenes, he knew that he was Cyrus,Page 121 and was not ignorant of his own Quality: whereas on the contrary, the unfortunate Cleander did not so much as know who himself was, but thought himself so far below my Quality, that he did condemn his Love no less then I should if I had then known it: Artamenes had nothing else to make his condition known to be equal unto yours, but only to say he was Cyrus: But Cleander for a long while durst not so much as wish to know who he was, lest his condition should prove disadvantageous unto him if it were known: These false Names under which both of them did pass was given them variously, for Cyrus took the Name of Artamenes upon him to disguise himself; and Artamas not knowing his true Name, received that of Cleander from Thimettes, who gave it him, not thinking he should ever leave it: 'Tis very true, both of them are most gallant men, and both Conquerors, but with a notable difference, since Fortune hath almost confined the Victories of Artamas to the Kingdom of his Father, whilst she hath stretched the Conquests of Cyrus over all Asia. The original of their Passions is also as different as the merit of those two persons who caused them: The Prisons also in which both of them were, are very unlike, and proceeded from several causes: The jealousy and wickedness of Artesilas caused the Imprisonment of Cleander; and the prejudicate opinion of Ciaxares was the cause of Artamenes his Imprisonment; though I must needs confess there was equal injustice in them both. Moreover, the hatred which Ciaxares bore unto Cyrus, proceeded only from a misunderstanding of the Menaces of the Gods; but the King my Father hated Artamas because he thought I loved him, and by consequence the cause of his hatred cannot cease, as the cause of Ciaxares his hatred did. Moreover, you cannot in reason say, there was any equality in their last Imprisonment, since that of Cyrus lasted not above an hour at most, whereas that of Artamas lasts yet, and he was dangerously wounded besides: But I beseech you let us close up all these resemblances which we find in our fortunes in this one, which is, our Imprisonment: Is there not a vast difference between us? for you know there are two hundred thousand men in Arms for your Liberty: That the most valiant Prince upon Earth and the greatest Captain commands this Army, and fights only for you: Moreover, it is just in you to wish him Victory, and to make prayers unto Heaven for it: But as for me, I am not only deprived of all hopes of relief, but of all other consolations, except your friendship Madam, which truly is a great one: For truly I must not desire my Liberty, since it cannot be but by the Conquest of the King my Father, by the loss of his Crown, and by his being a Slave: All which will be, if Cyrus be a Conqueror; and if he be not, then Prince Artamas will perish in Prison, and I dye where I am: so that since I can|not desire any thing which would be advantageous to me, I must endure my miseries and never wish for an end. After this I beseech you judg whether I am at all a deb|tor unto my misfortunes for your affection, but rather for your pity. However it be, replied Mandana, I am confident, that the Gods have a design Prince Artamas shall love and do Cyrus good service, and that Cyrus shall protect and comfort Ar|tamas. After this these two Prisoner Princesses spoke much more unto each other which I could not understand, because Martesia hindered me, and I had much ado to get her let me hear as much as I have related to you, for she was continually asking me questions, unto which I returned short answers, and sometimes only with my head; because, since she named my Master once, I desired to hear whether she would name him any more: But if I did not certainly know, that the Prince Mazares my Master would never pretend any more unto the Princess Mandana, I should not have been so perfidious unto him, as to acquaint the illustrious Cyrus with all those advantageous expressions which she used towards him.

But to return unto my Discourse, Be pleased to know Madam, that at last the Princess of Lidia left Mandana and went unto her Chamber, which was separated from his only by a withdrawing Room which was commune to them both. She was voo sooner gone, then knowing there was none with her but Arianita, I went unto my Master to bring him unto Mandana's Chamber; the Captain who let us enter into the Cittadel brought us to the door and there left us, to the end he might take more care that none should discover us. As Martesia prepared the Princess to receive a man who would release her, and told her that it was I who would conduct him, she Page 122 wondered who it should be that would be her Deliverer: And I knew afterwards by Martesia, she did think it no other then the illustrious Cyrus: So that her extraordinary fears, in thinking what dangers he exposed himself unto for her sake, did cool all her joys when she thought upon her hop'd-for Releasement. Then Madam, you may easily imagine how infinitely the Princess was amazed, when in lieu of seeing the illustrious Cyrus enter, she saw the Prince Mazares casting himself at her feet, whom she imagined to be dead: She turned hastily towards Martesia, to ask her, whether what she saw was real? and if it was, why she did deceive her? Martesia, who was no less amazed then the Princess, looked upon me with so much Wonder, that she could not ask me why I dissembled with her? In the mean while, my Master, who was upon his knees before the Princess, he began to speak thus unto her: You see here at your feet Madam a man that is risen from the dead; but risen as innocent, as he was culpable before your shipwreck; Therefore I beseech you do not treat me as I deserved when I was so unjust as to carry you away, since I am not the same man now as I was then. I do not beg of you Madam, to let me love and adore you; for I am most fully resolved in the very reality of my heart, never to have any such thought as long as I live: All the whole sum of my Petition is, that you would be pleased to pardon my Crime, and give me leave to lessen it a little, by procuring you that Liberty which I took from you. Ah Mazares, said the Princess, I will not be deluded at Sardis as I was at Sinope, and I have no such thoughts of you at this present as I had at that time. Yet I am now less worthy of your friendship (replied he) then ever I was; for truly Madam, when I was at Babylon, I did nothing but strive against that Passion which you had created in me; and truly though I did resist it with all my force, yet it was far too weak; for I was overcome by this impelrious Passion; all the Virtue I had submitted unto it: it expelled all Generosity and Reason out of my Soul; and at Sinope forced me to commit the most unjust act that ever was: I carried you away Madam; I deceived you and carried you away, in telling you that I would deliver you into whose hands soever you pleased: But my divine Princess, I was not long culpable, since my repentance was almost as soon as the Crime was committed; and the Command which I gave unto the Pilot to steer his course towards Sinope, was that which put us in a perishing condition. No, no, Mazares, said the Princess, you can never persuade me to trust you, since you so extremely deceived me: For to let you see how horrid your Crime seems in my eye, I do profess, that, excepting Cyrus, I will not trust any man upon Earth: I esteemed you as much as I could esteem any, and more then that, I loved you as well as I could do my Brother: Then I pray you judg, whether I have not reason to pass from one extremity unto another, since you have so cunningly deceived me, and have caused so many miseries to fall upon me. Truly Mazares, I do admire at the pleasure of the Gods in saving your life, since you have not only been the cause of my miseries, but of all Asia, which had not been up in Arms if you had not carryed me away. Cease Madam (replied this sad Prince) cease I beseech you from any further aggravations of my Crime, since I see how great it is; for without the consideration of the mis|eries of others, I need think upon none but what I have caused unto you: But Madam my repentance is so sharp, that if you did but know the bitterness of it, I believe you would pity me; and though it be not proportionable to the greatness of my Crime, yet I cannot impose a sharper penance upon my self, then that I should my self put you into the hands of Cyrus, that happy Rival, whom the Gods do favour in so high a manner, that his very Rivals themselves are ready to release unto him that Prin|cess whom they love as well as he doth: For this Madam, I have quitted my Desart, unto which I had confined my self: To this end I came into Lidia under a disguised Name; and it is my real resolution to get you out of Prison: And the Gods have so far smiled upon my Project, that if you will Madam, you shall be released from hence, and carryed into the Camp of Cyrus.

As soon as Mazares had spoke these vvords, he sighed so seriously, and in such earnest manner, as one might see his repentance was real: But yet for all that, the Princess Mandana could not believe it; yet sometimes the feeling expressions of this sorrowful Prince would something stagger her thoughts, but then immediately after, Page 123 diffidence would wholly seize upon her heart, and she could not possibly believe, that the design of Prince Mazares was really to set her at liberty: She perceived he had a great and powerful intelligence in the Cittadel, and she was well enough perswaded, that he who could so cunningly come in, could as vvell get out: But her belief told her at the same time, that his end was to carry her away the se|cond time, and not really to release her, so that all his persuasive arguments could not move her, but she resolutely told him, she had rather stay where she was a prisoner still, then to be fooled in following him: Alas Madam (said he unto her) Will you not believe me when I protest repentance, and to explate my crime, would set you at liberty? I must ingenuously confess, that I have not power to say I do not love: And Madam, I am resolved not to make a mixture of any lyes and truths to|gether, but I do most solemnly protest in the presence of those Gods which must make all my projects prosperous, that this passion is without the least spark of any hope, or any pretention unto you in the world: I desire no more but a pardon of my crime, and to set you at liberty, if it be obtained, I shall not murmur at my death: It is but just that this tormenting passion be still in my soul, as a more se|vere penance for my fault, and so be pleased to look upon it, and questionless you will allow it, especially considering that I sue for no other recompence: However, be not so preposterously resolute as to believe me, vvhen I told a prejudicial lye, and not to believe me when I tell you a most real truth, which shall set you at liberty: No, no, Mazares, said the Princess, neither you nor any else shall deceive me twice; I trusted you before, because I thought you incapable of deceiving me, but since you have deceived me once, I will never trust you again: Do not think Ma|dam, replied he, that it is now possible I should have any ill design upon you: How if I had any such? How could I put it into act? 'Tis true, I can get you out of prison, because the Camp of Cyrus is neer, and a safe place of retreat: But should I have any design to carry you for any ends of my own, how is it possible I should effect it? Sardis would be no safety to hide you in it, all the Country is full of Forces belonging unto Cyrus, what therefore could I do with you? I know not, said she, neither where Cyrus is, or what course you would take, but I know ve|ry well I cannot trust you: Why Madam, said he unto her, Will you refuse your liberty, because it is offered by a Prince whom you do not love? The reason why I love him not (replied she) is because I do not believe he has any intention to re|lease me, and designs no further then to make me change my Chains; and truly I had rather (since I think you only intend to remove me from prison to prison) be with the Princess of Lydia, then with you. To make it apparent Madam, said he, That I have no ends of my own in it, be pleased to know, that my design is not on|ly to release you, but the Princess Palmis also, and that it is by a devoted servant unto a Woman of hers that I have this intelligence in this Cittadel; and therefore Madam you need not doubt the sincerity of my intentions: I doubt all, replied she, For I had rather suspect your words, then that they should deceive me again: But Orsanus; (said she, and turned towards me) I did not think it possible that you should second your Master in such a piece of service as this, and I have alwayes known so much virtue in your mind, that I rather will think he deludes you, then that you have any intentions to delude me, as he hath: Madam, replied I, give me leave to assure you, that the Prince Mazares hath no intentions to deceive you.

Alas Orsanus (said she) it seems you are not so wise as I am, if you think so: Truly Madam (said Martesia, speaking to the Princess) Since Orsanus sayes it, methinks credit ought to be given to his words, because he is not in Love, and by consequence more to be believed then the Prince Mazares: To testifie unto you Ma|dam (said my Master speaking to Mandana) I will remain in your prison after you are gone out, and an illustrious friend, who I met with in my solitude, shall con|duct you to the most happy Cyrus, whil'st I stay here, and patiently indure the death which Croessus shall give me, and I promise you to accept it with much joy, so you will promise me a favourable memory: And I will do more then that also if you please (said he, being transported with the violence of his Love and despair, to see she would not believe him) for I will kill my self before you go out of that prison Page 124 which I will open unto you: If I could believe what you speak, (replied the Prin|cess) I should tell you, that your death in that manner would extreamly trouble me, but in truth I cannot believe you: However, I beseech you acknowlegd thus much at the least, that if hereafter you once believe me, you will then lessen your hatred towards me: I shall do more then that, said she, For if ever I once believe you, I shall be able to forget what's past, and to pardon you, and I think liberty so sweet, and your act so generous, that I should afford you my esteem and friendship: But the worst is, I neither do nor can trust you; and looking upon you as a Prince, who would deceive me once more, I look upon you with anger and hatred. Was ever misery comparable to mine? (cried he out) You tell that you vvould pardon me, and afford me your friendship, if what I speak were true; and yet you are so unjust, as to look upon me with anger and hatred, though truth it self is not truer, then that I would release you: I beseech you tell me what I should do to perswade you of this truth, and to lay open my heart unto you: I know not, replied she, but I am sure I cannot believe what you say; therefore go and move those that let you in, to let you out presently, and content your self that I am so generous as not to ruine you, by advertising the Guards who I am sure you have not corrupted, that you are here: Do not think that the reason why I do it not, is because I make any doubts whether what you say be true or false; but my reason is, because I am not cruel, and because your first services were so considerable, that I will not be the cause of your death: For Heavens sake Madam (said he unto her) do not drive me to despair, but believe me: For Heavens sake, replied she, trouble me no more, but leave me in quietness: I beseech you deare Martesia (said this Prince) perswade your illustrious Mistress to credit my words: Sir (replied the wise Lady) I profess unto you, that for my part I do believe you, but truly I dare not advise the Princess to do so, because it is not fitting for me to give her counsel in any thing: What shall I do then? replied he, Or indeed what can I do but die? For since I quitted my solitary life only to deliver you (said he to Mandana) and so to obtain my pardon, and am not able to obtain either, I will never look for a|ny thing but death, and I will seek for it upon all occasions in all places, where there is any possibility of finding it: Indeed Madam, since you cannot indure me, neither as your Lover, nor as your friend, nor I am able to make you believe my repentance, I must and will find out such dangers, as shall certainly rid you for ever from the sight of that Prince whom you hate, and from whose hand you vvill not receive your liberty.

The Princess hearing my Master speak so violently, did believe this peril and dan|ger whereof he spoke, was, that he would fight with the illustrious Cyrus; so that she expressed some fears that he would make some attempts against this Prince: He no sooner understood her meaning, but not giving her time to express her thoughts: I understand you Madam, said he unto her, I understand you very well: You would have Cyrus have the advantage of me, because you would not have me fight with him: But never fear Madam, that I will ever entertain any such thoughts against him, I owe more respect unto you then so, and I am so obliged unto that Prince, as I cannot do it with honour: Therefore Madam if it be my fortune to die by the hand of illustrious Cyrus, he must seek me out, and kill me without any defending of my self, which I know is infinitely below him. These Madam are the thoughts of him, whom you think would deceive you: And I beseech you believe, that when I meet Cyrus, I shall beg my death from his hand as a recompence for that service which I would have done you, as the only remedy against all those evils which I in|dure: And when all this is done Madam, will you hate Mazares both alive and dead? Whil'st this Prince was speaking thus, the Princess looked seriously upon him; and sometimes I was in hope his perswasions had wrought upon her, but yet they did not; yet notwithstanding she used such sweet expressions to him after he had decla|red himself concerning Cyrus, that if the conference had lasted a little longer, I know not whether this virtuous Princess had not been overcome. But the Captain who let us enter, coming to tell us that it was full time to go out of the Cittadel, a necessity compelled us to retire, without any further perswasions upon the Princess Page 125 Mandana, and with deep sorrows, that so great an enterprize so neer execution should be uneffected: And when my Master came to his own Lodging, and related the story unto Belesis, I could not chuse but admire at the greatness of his Passion by the horror of his despair: Death and nothing else was his thoughts; he could not imagine why he should or how he could live: so that Belesis and I had much ado to moderate the fury which he conceived against himself.

My greatest admiration was, that the sight of Mandana should more augment his repentance, and confirm him in his generous design: The Guards upon the Princess; her Lodgings, and a thousand other circumstances, which he observed at his entrance and coming out of the Cittadel, though it was very dark, were so many additions to his sorrows: 'Tis I, would he say, only I, that am the fatal cause of her Imprisonment; that she meets with all these horrid objects, and that she enjoys not a minutes rest; and she hath rightly proportioned her hatred, according to those miseries which I have caused upon her; for I think it is impossible to be hated more then she does me; if she did not, she would never chuse an Imprisonment under a Prince who hath a potent Army to oppose Cyrus, rather then hazard her self upon that danger which she fears: Certainly she hates me more then she doth the King of Pontus; for if she did not, though I should carry her away the second time, yet it were a easier matter for Cyrus to force her out of my hands, then from two Princes who have all Asia engaged in their Interests: But questionless it is the Will of the Gods, that she will not only not love me, but infinitely hate me: Yet for all this, I understand, or think I understand (for my Reason is so ravelled, that I dare not credit my own in|tellectuals) that if Mandana could beleeve me really penitent, she would then esteem me, and be my real friend: For Heavens sake (said he) go to Martesia once more, and solicit her to do more then I myself can: Bid her perswade her incom|parable Mistress, not to refuse her Liberty, and let her contrive what security I shall give her, that my only end is her Releasement: The matter requires haste; for if our enterprize be not executed while the Treaty lasts, it will never be effected, since if it do break off, I must go into the Army, and consequently cannot stay here unless suspected: The counterfeiting my self to be not well at this time, that I may have more liberty to negotiate the business, does already begin to perplex the King of Pontus; therefore dear Orsanus, try once more what may be done, that our enter|prize may not be frustrate. You may imagine, that I was not able to deny such a request unto a Prince who had so much prevalency with me, and who required no|thing that was unjust: But for a more colourable pretence of the business, I took the Letter which Belesis was to deliver unto Celenise, and intended to desire Mar|tesia to deliver it unto her: so that solliciting the Captain who was of our Intelligence, he permitted me the next night to enter into the Cittadel, and helped me to the speech of Martesia, unto whom I used my best arguments, that she would let the Princess know how much she did prejudice her self in refusing her Liberty: and in|deed I was so importunate with her, that I am confident she beleaved me: but as for the Princess, she told me, that she was very mistrustful still. Afterwards, when I told her I had a Letter for Celenise, she replied upon me, that it would be to no purpose, because the Princess Palmis would certainly never go out of Prison but by the hand of her Father; and that Celenise would never leave her Mistress; yet I beseeched her to send for her, to the end I might give her Tegeus his Letter, which Martesia did. When she came, she told me with fears in her eyes, that she was much beholding unto Tegeus, but she could not perswade her Mistress to go out of the Cittadel, nor could she possibly leave her. When I found that the assistance of these two Ladies, Martesia and Celenise, were ineffectual: I was so urgent with Martesia to let me speak unto the Princess Mandana once more, that at last she per|mitted me; and I followed her into her Chamber, after she had asked leave, and assured her Mazares was not there: But all my Rhetorical Reasons were not able to raise one grain of credit unto what I desired she should beleeve; all that I could possibly obtain from her, was, that I brought her to make a doubt upon the matter, which she never did till this last time: yet since she would not hazard her going out upon doubtful terms, it did not alter her resolution. Madam (said I then unto her) Page 126 suppose that what I say be true, were it not a piece of injustice in you not to accept of his intentions to repair the fault which he hath committed? For my part Madam, methinks it is not suitable to your usual goodness; for what would you have my Master do? I know his very thoughts; and do assure you, his coming unto Croessus was only with a design of releasing you; and that his only aym in fighting for him, was only to set you at Liberty: But you Madam will not accept of that Liberty which he offers you, he will not stay any longer on that side which is not yours, nor dare he go on to the side of Cyrus unless he carry you with him: What then Madam should he do? I beseech you suffer not so great a Prince to perish, as que|stionless he will, unless you afford him some hopes of being justified in your opinion, and beleeve that his Virtue transcends his Love, and his Repentance his Crime. Truly Madam, I am in more then half a mind to tell you, that I will never go from this place, until my humble prayers have obtained what I desire in my Masters be|h|alf. Orsanus, said she unto me, your expressions do both trouble and affright me; for how can I think you speak sincerely? and yet how can I think you can de|ceive me? and how can I ever imagine that a Prince who was so unjust as to carry me away, should afterwards be so generous as to repair his faults? yet to speak sin|cerely unto you, I begin to think it not impossible: But my greatest difficulty is, that I cannot credit the Prince Mazares: I perceive there is a way to get out of prison, but all perswasions cannot move me to follow it: and the truth is, the act of the Prince Mazares, and the act of the King of Pontus, makes me to suspect every thing, and dares not trust any thing; therefore I pray you importune me no more unto a thing which I cannot do. What then will become of my Master (said I unto her) if you be not pleased to shew him a way how he may manifest it unto you, that his real intentions are to release you? I beseech you Madam, think upon it, and procure not unto your self hereafter the name of a murderer of the most virtuous Princess upon Earth. To shew you Orsanus, said she unto me, that I will not deny you every thing, but that I should be glad the Prince Mazares had some opportunities to express some convincing testimonies of his real penitency, and an infallible way to recover my esteem and friendship, tell him, that I would have him go and fight for my Liberty in fighting for Cyrus, which if he do, I shall then believe that his real intention was to release me. But Madam, said I unto her, Cyrus perhaps will not give my Master any good entertainment. Questionless he will receive him as his friend, replied Mandana, if he be perswaded that his design was to release me. To make a better way for his acceptance, I will write a Letter unto Cyrus, which Mazares shall give him, which shall testify how I esteem him if he become as virtuous as formerly he was. Then did I accept of her offer; not only because I had a great desire my Master should be out of Sardis, lest our plot should be discovered by Croessus or the King of Pontus; but also because I conceived it would be an infinite advantage unto my Master if he were once the friend of the illustrious Cyrus. In conclusion Madam, this great Princess did write her Letter unto Cyrus, and told me in good earnest, that if Mazares took this course, she would think his aims were honest, and she would let him have her esteem and friendship; so that in this assurance I left her: yet I did attempt a little further in my Masters behalf: but do what Martesia and I could, this was all we could obtain. After this, I went unto my Master, who expected me with great impatience, though he had no hopes in the world of my effecting any thing; and truly it was happy his hope was so low, for it induced him to accept of this Proposition which the Princess made with better resentments: and when I assured him that if he took this course, the Princess would then freely pardon him, and remit him into her esteem, he could not chuse but rejoice: yet was he sorry to see he could not obtain any thing from the Princess but by turning on the other side without any colourable pretence: and he made a dorr, whether or no he should deliver this Letter unto Cyrus; but after a strong contest of two hours with his own heart, his Virtue did at last overcome his Passion: and after all this time of contemplation on with himself, he returned unto Belesis, and me with much melancholy in his face, but yet with more tranquility in his eyes, then we had seen of many days. Well my friends (said he unto us) my Passion hath submitted; I have Page 127 got the Victory, and since I cannot release my Princess, I am resolved to do whatsoever she commands me: But since I am a Delinquent to the King of Assyria, as well as unto the Princess, and desire to expiate that crime as well as the other, I wish we could by the means of Tegeus, and the rest of our friends release him.

As he was speaking this, Andramites came unto him, and said that things were all in a mighty confusion, that Croessus and Abradates were quite out, and that Albradates and the King of Pontus were declared enemies, that all the Princes and people also began to side, that one whose name was Araspes, and who had formerly quitted the party of the illustrious Cyrus, and came unto the King of Lydia, did most cunningly foment these divisions; that according to his promise he came to tell him, how the King of Susiana (knowing Croessus sought for nothing but a pretence to break off the Treaty, concerning the exchange of Prince Artamas for you Majdam) was resolved to quit his side: And moreover (said Andramites) I am sure for my part that I shall be clapt up in prison, so that I am absolutely resolved to follow your fortunes, which will be, (and the best course) to go unto the party of Cyrus: Nor am I to be blamed, if for the security of my person, and releasement of my Mistress, I go and take side with the Enemy. The Prince Mazares hearing Andramites speak thus, was very glad of it, because he saw a convenient way for his revolt, and that it would be much more easie for him to get out of the Camp of Croessus with others, then if he went to Cyrus by himself, for the King of Pontus did keep many vigilant eyes upon him, as long as he was at Sardis. After then he had lent an attentive ear unto all that Andramites told him, who did aggravate the injustice of Croessus with as much zeal as possibly could be in a man, who longed to be with his fair Doralisa, he told him, that all his interests should ever be his, and that he would do whatsoever pleased him: Yet (said he unto him) If we could devise a way to release the prisoners, we should be more acceptable to Cyrus, and I have a most infallible way to effect it, if you will leave the whole matter unto me: In conclusion Madam, Andramites consented unto all my Masters desires; and Belesis and my self did so negotiate with Tegeus, that the business was ready for execution the next day following: But we could not possibly devise which way to release the Prince Artamas, because he had a particular Guard over him, with whom those of Tegeus had no acquaintance; and the reason why he was more strictly guarded then the rest, was, because he had a hundred thousand friends in Lydia: So that the same which was his happiness, turned at this time to his misery. And thus we were contented to endeavour only the liberty of the King of Assyria, of Sosicles, of Tegelus, of Feraulas, and of the stranger Anaxaris: Since he who commanded the Guard over them was an intimate friend unto Tegeus (though Croessus was ignorant of it) there was no great difficulty in the business; therefore about two hours before day, the Prince Mazares, Belesis, some other of their friends and my self, went unto the Captain who stayed for us, and as it was agreed amongst us, he carried us unto the King of Assyria's Chamber, who waking at the noyse which we made at our entrance, was extremely amazed to see, (by the help of a great Candle which hung in the middle of the Room) that it was the Prince Mazares (whom he thought dead) which approached towards him. This Prince being naturally of a violent temper, knew not well whether he was awake, or dream't, or whether it was a man or a Ghost: But he raised himself upon his Bed, and drawing the Curtain which was of Trian Purple; What do I see (said he in a furious and loud tone) Did you come from the shadows of death to pronounce the end of my life? Or are you yet amongst the living, that I may punish you for your Treason against me? Sir (replied the Prince my Master without any turbulency) you shall know from whence I came when you are out of your prison, from whence I came to release you, that I may thereby make some satisfaction for the wrong which I have done you: How Mazares (replied he) Must I be beholding unto you for my liberty? You must Sir (replied my Master) But I beseech you make hast and follow us: No, no, (replied that violent Prince) I will never owe my liberty to that man, who took Mandana from me: When I have released you (replied Mazares) I Page 128 shall never think you beholding to me for it, since in giving you liberty, I have given you nothing but what I took away from you: Yet if you will help the illustrious Cyrus to release Mandana, you must accept of that liberty which I offer you, and accept of it presently, for time is precious. Ah Mazares, said the King of Assyria, Have you found out way to release me? Yet if I do accept of it, I will not promise you to forget what's past, because then I should forget Mandana and my self both: All that I will say is, That I will use all the faculties in my power that my friends, my Rivals, and my Enemies shall not exceed me in generosity; and therefore it may be supposed, that I am not less generous then you are, and that I shall be Master of my own thoughts: However Sir (replied the Prince Mazares) I beseech you make all the hast you can: Then the King of Assyria's Guards, who were all of our intelligence, helped to dress him: Then Mazares offering him a Sword with the same respect he used to him when he was in Babylon: Here Sir (said he unto him) take that, and punish Mazares with it when you have released Mandana, if you think your self not satisfied: Oh, I wish to the Gods (replied the King of Assyria, in accepting the Sword very civilly) that we could release that Divine Princess whom we have made so miserable, and against whom both you and I have been so culpable and unfortunate.

After this, striving with himself, be cooled his fury and anger, and thinking Andramites, whom he knew to be the same which guarded the Princess, and brought him to Sardis, he followed Mazares and him, or to say better, we all followed Tegeus and the Captain, who guarded the prisoners, who by a back pair of stairs did let us out so secretly, that those Souldiers who were not of the Guard never perceived us. After this we met with no rub in the business, because Andramites, who was Lieutenant-General of Croessus his Army, had caused a Captain, who was his creature, to guard a Gate of the Town, towards Abradates his Quarter, whether we intended to go, and as we did, without any obstacle at all. As soon as we came unto the Tent of Abradates, we advised upon our best course, and it was resolved Sir (said Orsanus, addressing his speech to Cyrus) that to prevent all danger, these Princes should not yet come into your Camp, because the day began to break, and because the Brother of Andramites, who kept the pass over the River Halis, would not have been to order things so suddenly to let us pass. Also since the Quarter of Abradates was in a very advantageous Trench, he did not fear that Croessus would fall upon him. Moreover it was imagined, that Croessus could not so soon recover his astonishment, into which the departure of the Prince of Clasomena, and the escape of the King of Assyria had put him: And in the mean time, lest you Sir should be too much alarm'd, and that you might give order that the Forces of Abradates might pass with less difficulty, I obtained leave Sir to come and acquaint you, that your Army was to be strengthened with three of the most valiant Princes upon earth, with many other men of Quality, and with four thousand of the best Souldiers in all the Army of Croessus. Feraulas did think to have the honour of this employment from me; but since he was not able to make so perfect a relation of all things unto you Sir, as I could, therefore I opposed his design: He will not long be deprived of the honour of seeing you Sir, for the King of Susiana resolves to disengage this evening, as soon as it is dark, to pass over the river Halis before day, and to be with you at Sun-rise.

This Sir is the substance of what I have to tell you, most humbly beseeching you to believe, that I have truly related the generous alteration that is in my Masters mind; and therefore I conjure you to look upon him as your friend, and not as your Rival: But since my prayers are too inconsiderable to obtain my desires, I most humbly beseech these two great Princesses to intercede for me, making no question, but they are able to obtain them for me.

Orsanus having ended his Speech, Panthea and Araminta did second his desires, and intreated Cyrus to bury all past passages in the pit of Oblivion, and not to doubt of the Prince Mazares his repentance. Cyrus would not let them go on: I Page 129 beseech you, said he unto them, Do not take from me the glory of vanquishing my self, and let not Mazares be a debtor unto your generosity, for that which he expects from mine: Though I must confess it is no small difficulty to admit a Rival for a friend, and such a Rival especially as carried away the Princess Mandana; and therefore by virtue may be beholding unto such examples as your selves: But since the Prince Mazares is not now my Rival, and can become my friend, I shall easily admit him so, and by his example, shall perhaps become as generous in forgetting the wrongs he hath done Mandana, as he hath been in his repentance: But Madam (said Cyrus, and spoke unto Panthea) doubtless it is to you I am a debtor for these great Auxiliaries which the valiant Abradates brings, since he would never have so sharply resented the injustice of Croessus, but for the love which he bears unto you: I would it were as you say Sir (replied she) for I should be glad that I were able to pay any part of that debt which I owe you: I would it were the will of the Gods (replied the Princess Araminta) That I had the same advantage you have, and that the King my Brother would be moved unto repentance by the excellent example of the Prince Mazares: However it be Madam (said Cyrus unto this Princess) I beseech you do not let it trouble you to see the Forces of Croessus weakened; and mine strengthened, since I will engage my word, that the sooner I am Conquerour, the sooner shall the misfortunes of your house end. In the mean time, since it is requisite some orders should be given for the reception of those who are coming to help us to conquer, I beseech you give me leave to depart from you.

After this, Cyrus retired, leaving the heart of Panthea full of joy, and carrying Orsanus with him, of whom he asked a thousand questions, in returning to his Quarter.

As soon as he came there, he made choice of some Troops which he would send to receive Abradates, and the rest, with whom Orsanus returned, to assure his Master that Cyrus would protect him. After this, Cyrus ordered all things himself, even to the very lodgings of the King of Susiana, of Mazares, of Andramites; of the rest of any quality who came with them, and of all the rest of the Regiments which they brought, for he would not fail in the least circumstance of what was fitting: In retreating to his Tent, he met Aglatidas and Ligdamis, and carried them with him to acquaint them (as men of tender and passionate souls) with what had happened: Do you not admire (said he unto them, after he had related the substance of what Orsanus told him) at the oddness of my phantastical fate, which allways differs from all other destinies in the world? Do you not see how I have found a Rival whom I cannot look upon as an Enemy, nor hate, unless I go against the Law of generosity, but I must admit him into the degree of a friend, and protect him in my Army, who perhaps will help me to release Mandana, that he may carry her away the second time? Not but that I do believe all Orsanus told me, whose honesty I cannot suspect; yet for all that, I have much ado to understand how it is possible one should love, and never pretend to be loved again. If you had offended as Mazares hath (replied Aglatidas) as amorous as you are, I believe you would think it enough if you were pardoned, and be contented with it: I think so too, said Cyrus, But I think also, that as soon as I was pardoned, I should desire something further, for the very Nature of Love is to desire it; and it must necessarily be concluded, that if Mazares desire no more, he is not in Love: However, I know it is impossible to leave loving Mandana, and therefore I am certain Mazares will be my Rival for ever: Yet it appears plainly (replied Ligdamis) that generosity hath at this present a great power upon the heart of this Prince, otherwise he would never have released the King of Assyria, who is his Rival as well as you are: What would you have me say, said Cyrus, but that all accidents unto me are so full of wonder, that they deprive me of my reason. After this, Cyrus was very sorry that Mandana would not let Mazares release her: and immediately after he would be very glad of it that he had not, thinking it a shame any should release her but himself: yet however he was very unquiet in his thoughts, but his unquietness lasted not long, for the constancy which he found in Mandana's mind did dissipate all manner of other fears or doubts or perplexities. 'Tis true, he had many causes of vexation other|wise; Page 134 yet he found his Party so considerably strengthened, that his hopes of Victory did sweeten every thing else; so that he passed away the rest of the night with Alglatidas and Ligdamis in much serenity of mind: Yet he slept very little that night, as well because the sight of Mazares would trouble him, as in expectation of his new addition of Forces. He was no sooner advertised by his Spies which he had purposely set, that Abradates had passed over the River Halis with his Troops; but he took horse, after he had sent to acquaint the Kings of Phrigia and Hircania, and other Princes of his Army: so that in a very short time having abundance with him, he went to meet these Princes some thirty furlongs from his Camp. He was no sooner come on to a little rising ground, but he saw the Troops of Abradates appear, and those which he had sent out meet with them; so that marching forward with about five hundred Horses only, he met Abradates and his Rival: When these two Bodies were so neer, that the first Ranks might know each other, the King of Assyria, Abradates and Mazares (out of the respect which they owed unto Cyrus as their ancient Conqueror, and as now to be their Protector) did leave their main Body, and advanced towards him: Cyrus no sooner saw their action, but he did the same, both sides alighting from their Horses at the same time some twenty paces from each other. Abradates, as it was agreed between the King of Assyria, Malzares and himself, did advance the first, and presented the rest unto Cyrus. Sir, said he unto him, If I had come alone unto you, I should have feared my reception; but since I bring with me two such valiant Princes, and so many gallant men which follow them, I dare hope you will not deny us protection, especially when you consider, that I have brought a Prince, who would have brought the Princess Mandana to you, if she would have given credit to him, and who would have brought the Prince Artamas also if it had been possible. Upon his saying so, the King of Assyria and Mazares saluted Cyrus: the first of these with a kind of angry civility, and the other with a most melancholy respect: Cyrus returned these salutes very civilly, though with more coldness then he resolved; yet he spoke unto them with incomparable generosity as soon as he had overcome his natural repugnancy to embrace his Rivals and the Ravishers of Mandana; and as soon as this averse Ceremony was over, I make no doubt at all of Victory now (said he unto them) nor can Fortune as powerful as she is prevent the Releasement of Mandana. You may see by this Sir (said Mazares unto him, and gave him Mandana's Letter) that the adored Princess you speak of might have been out of Prison had she pleased, and that I did my best to obtain my pardon. Cyrus then taking Mandana's Letter from the hand of his Rival with as great an agitation of spirit as Mazares had in giving it, he opened it, and after a civil Complement unto the Princess, he read these words.

MANDANA to the Invincible CYRUS.

IF the Prince Mazares be so generous as to give you this Letter, and will fight for you, then receive him as if he had released me, since it was long only of my self, that I was not released by him; Render therefore unto his Virtue that which I have refused him; and be assured he will merit your friendship if it be true that his repentance be real: Therefore without any remembrance of his carrying me away from Sinope, think how he protected me at Babylon, and would have released me out of Sardis: Live therefore with him as if he were always your Friend, and as if he had never been your Rival; And be assured that you will sensibly oblige her who is the most just and most acknowledging person in the world. Adieu; Extract out of the last words in this Letter all the consolation that she can give you, whose Name is with a true Epithite, Unfortunate MANDANA.

Whilst Cyrus was reading this Letter, the King of Assyria's mind was full of unimaginable torment; and speaking unto Mazares in a low voyce, You are a happy man (said he unto him) that can with such a calm and moderate Passion give Page 135 Mandana's Letter unto your Rival. I do not think my self to be in any condition of envy (replied Mazares sadly) and I believe you would think so as well as I, if you did but know my heart. As they were thus talking together, Cyrus having read this Letter which infused much calmness into his spirit, he looked upon Mazares with much mildness; and assured him most obligingly and generously both, that he would esteem him as the Releaser of Mandana, and never remember his act at Sinope: So that Mazares, maugre the Passion of his Soul, was ravished with admiration as well as the King of Susiana. But since the King of Assyria did impatiently resent this discourse, Cyrus did end it very handsomly: And Abradates did present Andramite unto him; Also Mazares presented Belesis, telling him, that this his illustrious Friend could well testifie his Repentance: Also Anaxaris, Sosicles, Tegelus, and Feraulus coming up towards him, Cyrus embraced them with much joy, especially the last of these: After which, taking horse, he rid towards the Camp; where Cyrus was no sooner arrived, but according to the Orders which he had given, a Council of War was held in his Tent, to consult whether the Truce should still be observed, or whether this accident ought to move them to break it off: Mazares gave there his voyce as freely the first day, as if he had been an ancient Friend of Cyrus: The question was a while in doubt: some gave their votes to break off the Treaty, and take advantage of the disorder in the Army of Croessus; and others affirmed that it did not suit with the glory of Cyrus to do so: Those who were of this opinion, said, that this which happened was an advantage which could not be attributed unto Cyrus, since he had yet done nothing but receive his Prisoners, and give retreat unto an ill treated Prince, and unto some other Malecontents of Quality; that therefore patience was to be used, since the Truce would not last above three days. In conclusion, the business being well debated, how great a desire soever Cyrus had to fight, especially having now got the Pass over the River Halis free by the means of Andramites his Brother, yet notwithstanding he would never violate the Laws of War: So that this being the Result of the Council, all the Princes retired unto their Tents which were prepared for them, except Abradates, whom Cyrus did wait upon unto a little Town where his dear Panthea lodged, giving Orders unto Artabases to withdraw, to the end there might be no sign of any Captivity. Cyrus would have Andramites also to follow Abradates, that he might have a sight of Doralisa, thinking the Gods would one day reward him for having comiseration upon unfortunate Lovers like himself; and for his care in sweetening the bitter Pills of their miseries, though he saw no remedy for his own.

ARTAMENES, OR The Grand CYRUS. The Fifth Part. BOOK. III.

AFTER Cyrus had done every thing, that the dignity of his Place; expediency of affairs; Civillie; generositie, and tendernesse of soule could exact from him in such a Juncture of accidents, he had a great desire to talk in private with his beloved confident Feraulus concerning Mandana, for he understood by the relation of Orsanus that he saw her walke upon the top of the Tower where she was kept Prisoner: so that Commanding him to be called for, he welcomed him with as much tenderness as an Amorous Prince could possibly expresse unto the only Confident of his passion, and unto such a confident as had done him many extraordinary services, and given him much comfort in his miseries. He talked with him above two hours, and could not get any thing out of him concerning his Princesse; for Feraulus had seen Mandana at such a distance, that he could not draw any satisfaction from any thing he could tell him. But Love hath such a qualitie, that those who are Captivated by it, cannot discourse of any thing but what concerns the Person Loved. Therefore, though Cyrus had spoke as much as could be thought upon of the Last accidents of his Life, yet he repeated all the first also with as much earnestnesse, as if they were yet to fall upon him. 'Tis very true that at that time there was no need of far fetched things to help out discourse: for the King of Assyria's returne, and the Arivall of Mazares, was subject enough: Moreover, Mandanas Letter was enough to talke on for him; since he thought it was a Piece of great difficultie to indure, that the Princesse should write so obligingly in behalfe of Mazares. But yet the last words of her letter, did make amends for all the rest: and when he considered how she allowed him to explaine her words in the most favorable sense for himself, the Joyes of his soule were easier to be imagined then expressed: Oh my divine Princesse, would he say, will you permitt me to interpret your words unto my owne advantage? Do you know, most excellent Princesse, how farr a Lover may flatter himself; and do you not fear that I will make your words speake more then ever you intended? when you say that you are just, & full of acknowledgement, do you not think to shut justice & acknowledgement within such narrow limitts, that you cannot understand what I have done to release you? Page 138 No, no, divine Mandana, this is not the glosse which I will put upon your words; Ne|ver reckon, I beseech you, upon the combates which I have fought, Nor the Townes which I have taken; nor the Battles which I have won, but I beseech you reckon, my violent and respected passion for something if you please. It is for that only, for which I desire you should be obliged unto me, and do me justice in: never make any account of the dangers which I have run into, nor of the wounds which I received, but I most humbly beseech you to set a value upon my sighs which I have oft sent out of a sad soule; and upon my teares which I have shed since first I began to love you: and I beseech you (said he, as if she were present to understand him) Let the raptures of my love, make me put such a favourable interpretation upon what you have writ, as may make me believe, that when you say you will be just, you mean by it, you will love me, as well as I love you, but alas, what do I say? were it not injustice to wish Mandana should love me as well as I love her? yes doubtlesse, it were; and therefore let us call that grace which we have very improperly Called Justice. For my part Sr. (said Feraulus and interpreted him) I do not think the Princesse Mandana will doe as you desire she should; for your victories are as great signes of your love as your sighes and teares are: and therefore if she joyne all these together, as I make no question but she will, I am perswaded she will one day love you as well as you do her: Ah Feraulus, said he, how far is that day off? and how many things have I to do before I can be so happy: A battle must be fought and won, afterwards a considerable siege will continue: and after that, I must fight with the King of Assyria. These Feraulus are but the least of difficulties that I am to meet with, before I must come and cast my self at the feet of Mandana, and beg so much favour as to be loved. Judge then whether I have not more cause of feares then hopes, especially after so many ominous Oracles. Whilst Cyrus was thus entertaining himself, the thoughts of his Rivals were no smoother then his: Belesis and Orsanus did Cheer up the Prince Mazares, as much as they could, and commending the generosity of his resolution, did endeavour to confirme him in his repentance: They had also so much Courtship as to flatter his passion though they would not cure it; and therefore they told him, that Mandana would infallibly give him her friendship and esteem, if he continued his course as he had begun: were I so happy as to obtain that (said he) I should never desire more: and certainly I shall endeavour my utmost for it: But if I cannot obtain that happiness, then I know my course, which is to return unto my Desart again, and there hide my sufferings, and sigh out sorrowes till I die. No, no, Sr. replied Belesis, 'Twill never come to that, for Mandana will restore you to her former esteem, and your virtue shall for ever be mistress of your passion. It is therefore I that must return into my solitude, I who can never hope for any thing. The hopes I have, replied Mazares, are of such a shallow nature that they can never afford me any sweetnesse; because they are such only as my reason adviseth my will unto, and not such as my heart doth really wish for: and since (Belesis) felicity doth chiefly consist in the satisfaction of desires, I am certain to be the most miserable man alive; since I must never enjoy mine: yet I beseech you do not think I speak this, as if I did repent of my repentance: No, Belesis I do not, but am absolutely resolved to fight for Cyrus till the Princesse Mandana be released, and never to aske any other favour from the Princesse Mandana, but her esteem and friendship, and I do not think it possible that all the force of my love and despaire can make me alter my resolution. yet for all this, my heart will be full of tumultuous cogitations, and I must prepare for a continuall war with my self, and let me tell you further, that I am not like unto most men who out of loves resentments do think all their Rivals unworthy men, how accomplished soever they be: But on the contrary, me thinks I see Cyrus so much above the rate of other men, and so worthy of Mandana, that I think it a strange Injustice if he did not love her, and she him: so that Judging by the greatnesse of that Princes merit, and the greatnesse of the affection which that Prin|cesse ought to bear him, I must conclude, that no other ought to pretend any thing unto her: and therefore I have nothing to do in the world, but to seek for a handsome death, as doubtlesse I shall if I cannot obtain my pardon. On the other side, the King of Assyria, he is not without his perplexities; yet was he glad to be released, because Cyrus should not have all the glory of fighting for Mandana: but it vexed him that he should be obliged unto Mazares for it. Yet since the sight of a loved Rivall did set a sharper edge upon his spirits, then a Rival hated could: all the King of Assyrias malice was against Cyrus. Yet did he much esteem him maugre all his malice; and the virtue of this Prince did shine in so much lustre, that this malignant Jealous Prince could not chuse but looke upon him as Page 139 one of the greatest Princes of the world, and the most worthy of Mandana. But whilst these three illustrious Rivals were entertaining their melancholy thoughts, Abradates and Panthea did solace themselves in the joys of each other. Andramites also was pleased with the sight of his adored Doralisa, whose *ocund and indifferent humours, did yet not a little perplex him. Ligdamis and Cleoncel thought their houres sweet, since they were together: But the Prince Phraortes thought time more tedious, since he thought it im[possible to see the Princesse Araminta not incensed. The Prince Tigranes bewailed the ab[sence of his dear Onesila, as Aglatidas did of Amestris: Tegeus and Feraulas also gree[ved at the captivity of Celenes, and Martesia. The truth is, one would have said, love was the very soul of this Army, since there was not any considerable person in all the camp of Cyrus who had not a sence of this passion. But whilst it tooke up the thoughts of so ma[ny illustrious persons on the party of Cyrus, the King of Lydia and his side was all thoughts of anger and revenge, the escape of his prisoners of war much troubled him. The depar[ture of the Prince of Classomena did trouble him more; and the King of Susiana and An[dramites revolting sides, did put him into a strange fury; The Prince Myrsiles also see[m]ed malecontent, and was much troubled that Andramites should do as he did: though he did much aggravate all discontents, none knowing his reason why. As for the King of Pontus, he had variety of apprehensions upon the matter, for he was very angry that Abradates, the Prince of Classomena, and Andramites should adhere unto Cyrus; but he was not sorry that the king of Assyria and Mazares were out of Sar[dis: for though the first of these two was a prisoner, yet he feared least he should have some secret plots also; a naturall antipathy against a Rivall, made him glad of his absence, and he was not angry at both their departures: And not being so much perplexed as Croesus was, he did what he could to perswade him that the loss was not so great as he did apprehend it: The worst was, that the trace was near an end, and since there was no negotiation in hand because the King of Susiana had changed sides, they not knowing upon what ground to desire a prolonging of the treaty. In the mean time, this alteration had put all Sardis in such a fright, and so much disordered the Army of Croesus, that there was an absolute necessity of more time to appease both people and souldiers. Moreover, since the passage over the River Halis was in the power of Cyrus, he might be forced to give battle if that Prince pleased: and he plainly saw, that if he did fight before things were better composed, the day would be lost: Therefore, as extream maladies have alwayes recourse unto ex[tream remedies, so Croesus resolved to begin another negotiation, though he had no inten[tion to end it; but only to gaine time. He told then the King of Pontus, that He inten[d]ed to propound unto Cyrus an exchange between the Princesse Araminta, and the Prince Artamas: but it was upon such odd conditions, as was apparent he aymed more at drift of time, then any reall exchange, since one qualification was, that the Prince Artamas should promise never to pretend unto the Princesse Palmis: and demanded further a releasement of all the prisoners which had been taken since Cyrus entered into his dominions. The King of Pontus approved of all that Croesus did propound unto him: for though in reality he was very willing to get his sister the Princesse out of the power of Cyrus; yet he durst not tell the king of Lydia, that all his propositions could never take effect; because being his prote[ctor, it was fit he should comply with his opinion: Croesus therefore; because he had no other way, sent to desire a prolonging of the Truce for eight dayes more, to the end there might be a treaty concerning the releasment of the Prince Artamas, and the Princesse Araminta. As soon as ever this proposition was made unto Cyrus, he knew very well: the re[all] designe of the Lydian King: and if he had followed his own inclination, he would absolutely have rejected it, and tooke advantage of the disorder which was in the Army of Croesus: But since it was propounded in the presence of the Phrygian King (who hoped to have his son at liberty by this negotiation) Cyrus perceiving the thoughts of this king, would by no meanes disoblige him, nor make the Princesse Araminta, whom he highly esteemed, to think that he was more carelessse of her liberty then of Pantheas. And since he thought it concerned Croesus more to keep the Prince Artamas, then it did himself to keepe the Princesse Araminta, he consented unto the Truce desired; and the sooner, be[cause, being assured of the passe over the river Halis, he could force Croesus to fight when he would; So that not insisting upon eight dayes, he resolved to satisfie the King of Phrygia, and not to incense the Princesse of Pontus. Moreover, these eight dayes, were as expedient for him as for Croesus, for since the Lydians had made great waste in all the Coun[try along the river Halis towards Sardis, he could in that interim provide ammuniti[on] and Page 140 provision enough for his Army in all the neighbour Townes. The Truce then being renew[ed], the Prince Phraastes began to plot how to render it ineffectuall: not out of any dis[affecti]on unto Prince Artamas, but because he was deep in love with Araminta, and could not consent she should go into the Country of his enemy, so he might lose the sight of her for ever. In the mean time, since the first dayes of this treaty were spent only in receiving Propositions from Croesus, which passed under the name of the King of Pontus, Cyrus was not so busie but He went to visit Panthea, and partake of her joyes in Abradates: the King of Assyria also went thither sometimes, and so did all the rest of the Princes in the Army; so that during this Truce, the Court of Panthea might very well be called the most glorious Court in the world, since no place upon earth had so many gallant men together as it had. The stranger Arexaris, (during this little peace if I may tearme it so) did make it appear that he was a man of Civility as well as Courage. The Prince Mazares, though very melancholy, yet his solitude had not rendred him uncivill, but he also visit[ed] the Queen of Susiana: He saw: the Princesse Araminta also: but all his visits, were visits rather of Civility, then any pleasant Company. In the mean time the King of Susia[na] considering the severall interests of Cyrus and Mazares, and of Mazares and the King of Assyria, did so prudently compose their spirits, that they agreed together almost as well, as if all past passages were forgotten. Yet the King of Ayssria, did often let slip such lan[guages as spoke his memory of them, but the wisdom of Mazares did so discreetly tem[per] the impetuous humour of the Assyrian King, that there happened no disorder amongst them. All three would discourse together of their passions, and not quarrel, but it was in the presence of Abradates: for an extraordinary care was taken, never to let them be alone together, lest some violent passion of soul should produce some sad event. In the mean while Belesis, though in the midst of an army of 150000. men, and in a Towne wherein were two great Princesses, and many Ladies of quality besides, yet melancholy did sit so heavie upon his soul that he never saw any but the Prince Mazares with whom he lodged. Things standing upon these terms, upon a day when Cyrus was with the Queen of Susiana, with whom the Princesse Araminta was present, Belesis went to a little towne with the Prince of Sa[ves], to get something mended about the case of a picture which he prized infinitely dear, and would not trust it with any one: as he was speaking unto the workman, and tooke out the picture which he would not forsake, the workman having some knowledge in that Art, and finding it to be a rare piece, Could not chuse but look upon it; whilst he was thus looking upon it both with admiration and delight, a stranger of a ha[ar]some garbe lighted from his horse close by the house where Belesis was, and accidentally casting his eyes upon this picture, he knew it: and did so wonder to finde it in Lydia, that he could not chuse but ask him who held it, and how he came by that picture, telling him, that it was his, for he could speak the Lydian language: he had no sooner said so, but Bellesis understanding him, and knowing the voice, he turned and hastily took the picture: and turning towards the stranger, he perceived that he was not mistaken, but that it was really him whom he thought it to be, so that falling a pace back, Oh Hermogenes (cryed he out being transported with grief and despair, and drawing his sword) du[st] you follow me as far as Lydia to take the picture from me, whose original you did so cruelly steal away? Hermogenes was so surprized to meet Belesis, and so many severall things comming into his thoughts at once, it was a long while before he could get himself into a posture of de[fence]; or consider what he saw was possible: But he had not leisure to deliberate upon the matter: for Orsanus passing by chance by, as Belesis stood upon his guard, and as Hermogenes knew not whether what he saw was true or false, called company to help him, and he seized both upon Belefis and Hermogenes as two men that were quarrelling, sending imme[d]iatly to acquaint Mazares with it, who as soon as he heard of it, beseeched Cyrus to take order in the businesse: The Queen of Susiana hearing the name of Belesis did add her praylers unto his, accusing her self of forgetfulnessse, since Orsanus spoke unto her of him: yet to repair her fault, she acquainted the King of Susiana with the merit of the man, and assu[ring] Cyrus that he was a man of great quality and much spirit, all the Princes went into another chamber to see Belesis and him who quarrelled with him, but the Queen of Susiana having an earnest desire to see Belesis, entreated Cyrus to let them be brought before him: so that he commanded them to be brought in. As soon as ever they entred into the cham[ber], Panthea did know Hermogenes to be of Susa, and of good quality, and who intending to get into Sardis, did by good fortune hear that Abradates had changed sides, so that he altered his course, and came to this little town, which was the same where the Queen of Page 141 Susiana quartered: Abradates and Panthea highly esteeming Hermogenes did much wel[come] him and Belesis both; after they had spoken unto these two quarrellers with all possi[ble] civility, they beseeched Cyrus to favour them, and oblige them to tell what their difference was: It is of such a nature, (said Belesis) that it is impossible it should ever be rightly told, and therefore I think it better to leave us enemies still, then to consume so much time in troubling two great Princes with relation of such things as are indifferent un[to] them. The Interest of persons of such merit (answered Cyrus) ought never to be in[different] unto the greatest Princes upon earth; Therefore if to render justice, nothing be wanting but a hearing the relation of your lives, we shall hear them with much delight; Also, I cannot think we can better imploy our vacant time during this truce, then in ma[king] Hermogenes and you friends: and I shall have some advantage by it (added Cyrus with a smile) since if I do reconcile you, I shall hope you will fight with more courage in the day of battle, therefore I most humbly beseech the Queen of Susiana, that she would be pleased to command Hermogenes to tell me his adventures, if Belesis will not do it himself: Hermogenes (replied Belesis) is too much interested in the businesse, to relate his story and mine; For Sr. he must needed make a partiall relation, since he would perswade me that I am in the wrong and he in the right. To make it appear that I stand not in need of any disguisements of the truth (said Hermogenes) I am contented that he himself relate al the passages betwixt us: I cannot do it (replied Belesis) for it is impossible I should make a relation of all my sad adventures, and not return into my first despair. To compose the matter betwixt them (said Abradates unto Cyrus) It must neither be Belesis nor Hermogenes that must relate their adventures, but some one who is an equall friend unto them both, and who is acquainted with the perfect story: oh Sr. replied Belesis, there is none in the world can do it, but Alcenor: 'tis he whom I intend to speak of, replied Abradates, and I wonder you saw him not, since he came to Sardis two dayes before I left it, and therefore did certainly follow me hither. It is rather to be wondered, if he did see him, replied the Prince Mazares; for Belesis almost never stirred abroad since he left his desart, but when he thought to assist me in the delivery of the Princesse Mandana: After this, Cyrus desired these two enemies to refer the relation of their difference unto him whom Abradates named, since they could not agree to do it themselves: and they consented un[to] it: yet desiring to see Alcenor before he spoke; so that without losse of any longer time, the Queen of Susiana sending to looke for him, he was immediatly found and was shewed unto both those his friends, who joyntly willed him to speak the truth, both of them sup[po]sing there needed nothing else to justifie themselves: after which, retiring unto another chamber, Alcenor began the relation in these termes: Panthea appointing him to addresse his speech unto Cyrus as Judge of the controversie, for she had already been informed of the adventure, though she was desirous to hear it over againe.

The History of Belesis and Hermogenes, and of Cleodora, and Leonisa.

DOubtlesse Sr. It will seem very strange unto you, that I should be so equall a friend un[to] two enemies, as I should even to the least circumstance, know the events of both their lives even to their most secret thoughts; and that both of them should have such a good opinion of my sincerity, that they are contented I should relate the adventures of their lives in their own presence, though they are of that nature, that the least circumstance omitted doth extremely alter the case: yet notwithstanding I hope to render my self worl[th]y of the favour which they do me, being fully resolved to disguise nothing, but will ingenuously relate, all their imbecilities as I found in them. But Sr. since I conceive it re[qui]site you know who they are: (give me leave to tell you Sr. that Belesis is a Mantianian, and of the Prime quality in his country, and that Hermogenes is a Susanian, and of a very high quality also, besides the advantages of birth, they had that of excellent education, not only in such arts as are essentially requisite to make compleat men; but also in other in[feriour] trifles which yet do infinitely polish the spirits of them who know them, and are delightfull to those that know them not: It was the pleasure of their Parents they should travell together at one time: and as if the Gods designed their meeting, and that they should love each other, they met both at Babylon not only at the same time, but also in the same house though one of them came from Susa; and the other from Mantiana, so that though both of them were of such a garbe, as might move equall curiosity of knowing who they were, yet they sought for occasions of beeing talked of, and they easily found them. For since they had got most of the Asiatick languages, before they set out to travel; and since the Susian and Mantinian tongues resembled one another, they discoursed familiarly together, the first time they met; & went together to view the wonders of this proud and stately town: they were so well acquainted at this very first encounter, that they affected the same pleasures, practised the same Arts: knew the same things; a first, their intentions were to associate together as long as they stayed in Babylon, where they journeyed about a month: But since in that time they grew more intimate, and loved each other better, they could not part so soon, and in conclusion agreed to travel together; those two loving friends kept close together a whole year in travelling from Court to Court, and from Country to Country, in much delight, not the least contest ever happening between them: after they had seen all that was worthy of sight, Hermogenes moved Belesis, in lieu of returning home, to spend some time at Susa: and certainly his curiosity to see so stately a town was grounded upon good reason, for I do not think there is a town in the whole universe, so full of all delights: Belesis then being easily persuaded to see the most goodly place of the world, and to go with a friend from whom he could not part without extreme grief, arrived at Susa a little while after the illustrious Abradates was banished: But that he might not repent of his coming thither; Hermogenes who was well acquainted with all the Advantages, did so guide him, that they entered in at the most pleasant quarter, which indeed is one of the most delightful objects that eye can behold. For Sir. in coming to Susa this way, there is a little hill from whence one views a great valley containing above a hundred furlongs, in the midst of which passeth in a serpentine manner the river Choaspes, the water whereof is so clear and pure, that the most crystal fresh spring is not comparable to it, upon the banks of this River, stands the town of Susa; and the great number of magnificent Fabricks makes it seem as fair without, as it is within; That which makes the place most pleasant, and dwelling there most healthful is, that all this great valley is diapered with a million of several colours in flowers, which by their admirable enamel does charm the eyes with variety, and perfume the Air with odour: infinitely surpassing the Rainbow or any other prospect whatsoever: Also, from this abundance of Fragrant Flowers, the town of Susa takes its name; for in that language they signify alike; and therefore this valley or meadow is called the Rainbow of Susa, throughout Page 143 all Asia. Moreover in coming that way which Hermogenes did bring Belesis, there are along that pleasant River four great walks, so large, so straight, so even, and so shady, by the height of the trees which grow by the sides (though wood is very scant in all that Country) that a more Pleasant walk cannot be imagined. Unto this place all the Ladies every evening resort in their Coaches, and where the Men Rendezvous on horseback: so that having Liberty to go sometimes into one walk and sometimes into another, it is a Place of the greatest pleasure in the world. Hermogenes intending to let the first time of Belesis his coming unto Susa, to be a time of Pleasure, and the more to surprise him, he never told him that he would bring him this way: yet because he would not displease his friend, by bringing him into a place of so much resort in a negligent habit: desired him that morning to dress himself as one that was to Lodge in a house where he should see many Ladies, as indeed there was at the house of Hermogenes; his mother and his sister being there: So that Belesis not foreseeing the harmless deceit of his friend, did habit himself in a very rich handsome suite, above the custom of travellers: But he easily perceived the cunning of Hermogenes, when he found all these great walks full of Gilded Coaches in which were all the Prime Beauties of Susa; and after them, an infinite number of men of Quality, admirably well mounted, and Richly habited who came and saluted them. Then did Belesis thank him for his Pleasant fallacy in letting him see so many beauties together in one place and in such a Gallant manner. After which sending all their traine another way, Belesis & Hermogenes began to enter into the walks, as if in lieu of travel, they were newly come out of Susa. For my part: I being an intimate friend unto Hermogenes, before he was acquainted with Belesis, I was extremely surprised to see him arrive whilst I was talking with some Ladies: for I did not yet expect him. I no sooner spied him, but shewing him those unto whom I talked, (to the end, they should not take it ill, that I left them so abruptly) I went to meet him: and since it was not the custom of that place to alight from horses, because it would interrupt the walk of Ladies; we embraced each other on horseback: After the first raptures of joy to see one another, Hermogenes desired me to love Belesis, as he desired Belesis to love me: after this Belesis and I saluted each other with much Civility and so much freedom, as made it apparent we were both of us disposed to obey Hermogenes in his desires. All our Complements being performed, Hermogenes desiring to divert Belesis, and desired his travel unto Susa might please him, asked me whether all the Beauties of the Town were that evening in the walks? Wishing that his friend should all at once see what Susa had fair. And as he named all that were there, and all that were not there, it chanced that one Lady of Quality called Cleodora, who doubtlesse was one of the brightest stars in all Susa, was not there, whereat Hermogenes was very sad; and as I asked why he should be so sad, since I knew he was not in Love? the Reason is Alcenor (said he unto me) because I would have all the Beauties in Susa here, to the end some of them might Captivate Belesis and stay him here amongst us: If so, replied Belesis, you would not be obliged at all unto me for my stay in Susa, and therefore I had rather stay here upon termes of friendship than Love. After this we began to look upon the Ladies, and to salute them. Every one wondering to see Hermogenes bidding him welcome home, and asking who Belesis was. After many turns, well Belesis (said Hermogenes to him) do you find any of our beauties worthy of the honour to Captivate you? I finde their beauties to be admirably rare, replied he: but to tell you truly, I have not met with any yet who makes my heart and my spirits to tremble, as commonly beauties use to do unto one that is destined to Love, and which ever precedes that Love he owes her: So that if this Cleodora, who you say is not here, have no other Charms than these have, you and none else shall thank me for my stay in Susa: since in all likelihood, I shall not fall in Love. As Belesis said so, we saw a Coach appear at the end of the walks towards Susa, which seemed to be Cleodora's Aunts with whom she lived: I no sooner spied it, but I shewed it unto Hermogenes, who knowing it as well as my self, told Belesis and smiled, that he would go meet his Captivator: I am not yet conquered, replied he, and smiled also however he followed, and Hermogenes carried him on that side which Cleodora was used to sit: But when they came near the Coach, Belesis found her the fairest that he saw. Since it was late before she came into the walks; and the Sun low, her face was unmasked, so that Belesis saw her as if Fate had a designe to Fetter him, as indeed really he was: Cleodora was that time in a white dress trimmed with Diamonds and Rubies, having upon her head many feathers of White and Carnation die, which hung down so low behind, that they reached to her Arms when she turned her head: As part of Cleodora's beauties was to have eyes admirably Page 144 faire: Complexion white and ruddie, and her stature tall, there did not need any search to be made for the discovery of it; for she alwaies seemed faire at first sight: and so that all beholders were persuaded they should find fairer feature upon further consideration: so that it was no wonder if Cleodora did that, which many others could not; Belesis no sooner set eyes upon this evening star, but he preferred it before all the rest, and desired Hermogenes to take the other turn: when we heard him say so we smiled, and asked him whether he found trembling of heart and spirit, which he said alwaies preceded Love? he answered us with a smile again, that he was not yet fettered, but feared he should be: if you fear it said I unto him, why do you follow your enemy, and not rather fly from her? It is because I had rather trust to my resistance (answered he) then to my flight: since he said so, Belesis, Hermogenes and my self met Cleodora the second time, who then knew Hermogenes, for at the first time she did not perceive him, because she fixt her eyes so fast upon Belesis, that she minded not any thing else for a long time; As it is very ordinary in such places to look upon strangers, more then upon their old acquaintance, though happily not so handsomely, and that's the reason she did not see Hermogenes; but knowing him this second time, she called him unto her, seeming to be glad to see him, but gladder of the occasion to aske the name of that stranger whom she saw was of his acquaintance. And therefore she no sooner saw him, but calling him as I told you before, How long Hermogenes (said she unto him) is it since you returned? It is so lately Madam, (replied he) that I need not make any excuse for not having the honour to see you before; although you be she whom of all the world I owe most respect unto, since I have not yet been in Susa. 'Tis very gallant, replied she to finish a years travels with such a walk as this: and if you had been thought in Love when you departed, I should have believed this to be the place where you had appointed to meet your Mistress; To tell you truly Madam, (replied he) the affection which I have unto this stranger whom you see here, is the cause that I have the honour of seeing you here this day, for since I had a great desire he should stay here amongst us, I did what I could to fetter him, and therefore Faire Cleodora I conjure you, to do me this favorable office. You are a wicked friend (answered she) to desire any such thing; but indeed I cannot think you do desire it: But Hermogenes, to speake a little more seriously, tell me this strangers Name; his Quality; and his Country? I shall tell you more then all this (replied Hermogenes) for when I have told you that his Name is Belesis, of a high Quality, and that he is a Mantianian, I shall tell you further, that he thinks you the fairest he ever saw; and if you will not believe me, I will move him to tell you as much himself. As soon as he had said so, not giving Cleodora time to answer, he turned towards Belesis and calling him aloud: Come hither Belesis (said he unto him) come and confirme what I have told Cleodora; Provided you have told her that I think her the fairest upon earth (said Belesis coming near the Coach which went very softly, and saluting her with a low Congie) I shall most Joyfully confirme your words, and that with an oath if need be. Doubtlesse Generous stranger (answered she and smiled) you think you do Hermogenes a curtesie in commending any thing he shewes you; and indeed I receive your flatteries rather as a mark of your friendship to him, then of any good opinion, you have of me. If it were so Madam, (replied Belesis) I should have commended every beauty which I saw in this place before you came, purposely to oblige Hermogenes, But I can assure you, I commended none but your self: and I must add, said Hermogenes, that if Belesis Love any in Susa, it must be the Faire Cleodora: for he told Alcenor and me, that he perceived in himself such a kind of heart-trembling as use to precede Love alwaies; as soon as Hermogenes had said so, so many Coaches mett in that Place, as of necessitie the discourse must break off; Belesis telling Cleodora with his eyes that all Hermogenes said was true, and Cleodora made such signes by the actions of her head and hand, as made her thoughts something apparent. After which, all the Ladies retired to their homes, and so did we. In our way thither, Belesis asked us of what disposition Cleodora was: and whether she had many Servants? Since I was better able to informe him then Hermogenes, who had been absent a whole year, I took upon me to answer and satisfie his Curiosity, which indeed was better grounded then he imagined: So that to content him I told him in general, that there was not one of her sex in Susa, who had more or a finer spirit then she had: I perceived that already (replied he) both by her Physiognomie, and the aire wherewith she spoke: But that which I desire to know is, of what kind of spirit that is? Since that is your desire (replied I) I must tell you that Cleodora hath in appearance more sweet affability, then ever any had; yet those who know the Page 145 bottome of her heart, do say she is a little more severe: but how ever it be, it is most certain, that very many strive to please her, though she dislikes all; yet notwithstanding all this, there is much tendernes and goodness in her spirit: and this third is a mixture of complacence and severity both in her soule, which makes her not alwaies of an equal temper, though she be alwaies affably pleasant. Moreover she is extremely nice and delicate in choise of her friends, which is commended by some, and much blamed by others: for if those who visit her, be not very compleat men of admirable Parts, she cares not for their company, nor whether they esteeme her or esteem her not. You do very much perplex me, said Belesis; for you tell me such a story as makes Cleodora very dreadful to me; and yet I cannot chuse but think it much pleasure to engage the heart of such a one as you describe her. If you dare attempt it (replied I) you are more bold then many compleat gallants of our Court, who questionlesse have a great inclination to love Cleodora, but dare not attempt it: Not but that as you see, she is civil and affable enough; yet it is so difficult a task to please her that few men have so good an opinion of themselves, as ever to go about it. Moreover this must be said in her commendations, that she is never deceived in her choise, and whosoever she esteemes, does certainly deserve to be so: yet for all that it were to be wished she would be more indulgent then she is to the imperfections of others; not that she doth ever speak of them; but because she will never speak unto them who have them; or if she do, it is with such a cold indifferency as makes them despair who have so much witt as to discern it: yet for all this Cleodora is admirably complacent, especially unto those whom she has a desire to be acquainted with: and therefore since you merit to be in the catalogue of those whom she esteemes, I advise you to see her, and see her often whilst you are at Susa. Though it be but out of mere curiosity (replied Belesis) certainly I will see her, let me give you this advice, said Hermogenes, for you must know that if Cleodora have not changed her humour, she is yet very fantastical, and puts a great difference between the compleat gallants of the Court, and others; therefore if you desire to please her, you must not live as a stranger that would never be known: perhaps the reason is (replied Belesis) because she is persuaded it is impossible to be compleat unless one have such a garbe and aire, as is very rarely gotten any where but in Court, besides that (added I) Cleodora knows not what to say unto such as are ignorant of the newes which is in the world, and which she knows admirably well. To please Cleodora then (replied Belesis) it seems I must furnish my self with a hundred thousand things of discourse: doubtlesse you must (replied I, unless you have a priviledge above others) if you would have her talk long with you: Thus Sr. did Hermogenes and I make Cleodora known unto Belesis: who was entertained at his friends house with much magnificence, The next day following Hermogenes went to the King, and to the Prince of Susa who then was, and carried Belesis with him, whose name was not unknown unto these Princes, for his father had formerly been a long time together at Susa. After this, two or three dayes were spent in receiving visits which were rendered unto Hermogenes, and in letting Belesis see the rarities of the towne. After this he asked Hermogenes when he would carry him unto Cleodora? for (said he) though I am not yet well furnished with such discourse as will divert her, yet I have a great desire to visit her. Hermogenes sent immediatly to know whether Cleodora was at home: and answer was brought, that about an hour since she was gone into the country, and would not return this fifteen dayes. Since I intend to stay three moneth▪ in this place (replied Belesis) to comfort my self I must imagine that it is a delight deser(ri)ed, not lost. During the absence of Cleodora, Hermogenes shewed Belesis all the beauties both in Court and Town, but his heart was not at all moved by them: and being of a pleasant and quick war, he made himself acquainted with all the friends of Hermogenes in a short time, and knew the severall interests and businesses of all the Court, as well as if he had been bred in it all his life: After the expiration of fifteen dayes, the fair Cleodora returned: and hap would have it so, that Belesia, Hermogenes, and I being in the walkes, we saw her return and saluted her: and knowing of her return before hand we were there the first; and since it was yet very timely, we might without any incivility visit her; but first we gave her time to consult with her glass, and make her self fit to entertain company. When we were come thither, Hermo|gens pretended Belesis to her Aunt and her also; and to compleat his civility unto his Page 146 friend, he kept the Aunt in discourse, and left Cleodora unto Belesis and me. In the mean while, as flatteries are seldome forgotten when they are handsomly applied; so the language of Belesis unto Cleodora in the walks, the same day he came first to Susa, did now move her unto more affability then she ordinarily used, and she spoke unto him much more then unto any one: yet she treated him as a stranger, unto whom she thought it not fit to speak of any thing but in general; therefore beginning her discourse, I do not aske you (said she unto him) whether Hermogenes hath shewed you all the beauties of Susa, for I make no question but he carried you to all places where you might meet with any delights; therefore I pray you do me the favour to tell me, what you think of our publike places, of our Temples; of our walkes, and of every thing in Susa: all these Madam (replied Belesis) seem admirably beautifull unto me: but to tell you sin|cerely (said he and laughed) I do not think these questions proper to divert you: therefore I beseech you do not use me like a stranger, unto whom nothing is to be tal|ked on, but the customes of his own country. If I had had the honour to have spoke with you the day after I first arrived, I should have been patient at such discourse as this: But now, Fair Cleodora, it is fifteen dayes since I came to Susa: so that if you think I know nothing yet, but that your streets be large and neat: your Tem|ples beautifull; your Palaces magnificent, and such things, you treat me too cruelly: but I beseech you, if you love me, do not force your self unto such discourse, but ask me what newes, as if I were a Susician and a courtier. Cleodora hearing Belesis say so, began to laugh, not thinking he could tell her any private newes: and imagining he would not have spoke so, but because he had known something of her humour; so that beginning to talke again, I see you know (said she unto him) that I am afraid of any new acquaintance, nor care for the company of men who are ignorant in the affaires of the world; But Belesis, I am not so unjust as they report me: for that which I wonder at, is at the men of Susa, who are ignorant in all things: but as for you, who are not so, nor have dwelt amongst us; I should be very unreasonable if I should blame you for not knowing all the secrets of our Court, and uncivill also, to speak unto you of such things as you understand not. For my part (said I and spake unto Belesis) I conceive you have reason to commend Cleodora: on the contrary, replied he, perhaps I have more cause to complaine of her, then you think I have: but however (said he, speaking unto her) will you be pleased to promise me, that you will not let me pass under the notion of a stranger, if I do tell you some newes? I do not mean such (said he and smiled) as is spoke aloud in the streets, or such as is whispered from eare to eare four dayes together before it bolt out. Ah Belesis (said she) you will make me the most ashamed, and do me the greatest favour in the world, if you can do as you say: yet I see no likelihood of it, for excepting yesterday, I have every day received letters from Susa, which acquainted me with all the newes that was stirring, (however, said he unto her) if I acquaint you with something since, you ought not to tax me with ignorance: After this he began to tell her of a hundred passages: and to speak unto her, as one that knew all the factions, and severall interests of every person of quality, whether it were his ambition or his love, or any thing else in all the Court and Town: so that Cleodora and he came to that pass, before the conference ended, that they often whispered unto each other, and induced me to change my place, and addresse my self unto the Aunt of Cleodora, and Hermogenes: And so that from this first day Belesis was very intimate with Cleodora, who openly confessed that he had told her many things which were never written unto her: Truly said she unto him, as they were ready to go away) I belevee you have doubtless concealed in Susa: for it is impossible you should come to the knowledge of all these things (which you have told me) in fifteen dayes. I know something more replied he, which doubtlesse, you do not know: oh I beseech you (said Cleodora unto him) go not away before you impart it to me: I will (said Belesis to her) then whispering in her eare, certainly you do not know, sweet Cleodora (said he unto her, that I am extreamly in love with you) I do not indeed (said she aloud and blusht) and more then that, I do not belevee it, or think it possible. Time will tell us both, more certainly answered Belesis, and retired: after which we went out, and went unto the house of Hermogenes. When we were with Belesis in his chamber, we asked him what he thought of Cleodora? I will not tell you, replied he, for perhaps you are not now the cause of my staying here; I do not wonder (replied I) that you should be well pleased with this Page 147 beauty, since she hath treated you otherwise then she used to do any that were not her friends, yet her behaviour (said he) would cost me many an angry hour, if I in earnest love her: for notwithstanding her sweet affability, I discover a kinde rigid pride in her, which would grieve me to the soul; and notwithstanding all this, she hath such attracts in her eyes, as I know not how to defend my self against them, though I have a great desire unto it: For my part, said Hermogenes, I ever defended my self against her: for though she have many alluring beauties, yet there are many things observable in her humour, which are so many antidotes against the poison of her charmes, so that I am in no danger of ever dying for love of her. It is not so with me, said Belesis, for I am afraid I shall one day complain against you for making me acquainted with her. These were the effects Sir, which the beauty of Cleodora wrought in the heart of Belesis: and now I will tell you what effects Belesis produced in the heart of Cleodora. But to let you see how even very trifles do often purchase great esteem amongst Ladies. Be pleased to know that Belesis understanding there was a great league of friendship between the sister of Hermogenes and Cleodora, he expressed much civility towards her, and she to him, her name was Prassilla: Belesis being one day with her, he entreated her to shew him what rare Gardens there was in Susa: I should have asked this favour of Hermogenes (said he) but I confesse unto you, I cannot think any gardens, or walks pleasant unlesse in the company of Ladies; and therefore you will much oblige me, if you will do me this honour. Belesis had no sooner pronounced the last word, but Cleodora entered, who came to visit Prassilla: she was no sooner set down, but Prasi|silla acquainted Cleodora with the desire of Belesis, who the sooner to compasse his de|sire, seemed to hinder Prassilla from ending that which she had begun to tell: I be|seech you, said he unto her, do me not so bad an office, as to make me passe yet for a stranger unto the fair Cleodora, with whom I am not yet thoroughly acquainted. The resistance which Belesis made, wrought his desired effect, and infused a great desire in that Lady, to know what Prassilla would tell her: so that being very urgent, Prassilla told her, and withall desired her assistance, in setting forth the glories of Susa. Cleo|dora being glad of an occasion to complement with Belesis, told him, that she was much pleased to see he was not like most travellers, who hardly use to know who it is that reignes in the Countrey which they passe thorow: and who content themselves onely with the memory of the temples which they have seen, of mountains, of rivers, and such things; but never enquire of the manners, customes, and people, which dwell in those Towns; whose streets and publike places, they onely use to observe: But I perceive you are better acquainted with all the gallants of our Court, then you are with our Gardens: and therefore I am very willing to assist Prassilla in letting you see them, and if she please, to morrow shall be the day, when with some other Ladies that are our friends, we will go unto the most pleasant place in the world, not farre off our river. I am very well contented with it, said Prassilla. And then Belesis could do no lesse then concur with the desires of two such pleasant Ladies; alwayes seeming to be sorry Cleodora should treat him as a stranger. The matter being thus resolved upon, and the morrow being come, Hermogenes, Belesis and I went to wait upon the Ladies, who were to be present at this walk: And Cleodora being in the pleasant humour, as soon as we came unto the place, and came out of the Coach, she held out her hand unto Belesis. Come hither generous stranger (said she unto him) come and see the beauties of our Countrey, that you may talke of them when you come into your own.

For heavens sake Madam, said he unto her, Call me not stranger: I must needs call you so this day, replied she, and laughed, since I shall shew you a thousand things you never saw before, and since you are in a place where you have no acquaintance. I am contented, said he, to be a stranger untill this day of washing be ended: and so am I said she. At the coming into the Garden she willed him to observe all the beauties in it: the rest of the company followed, and mixed discourse. At the first Cleodora car|ried him into a great walk of Cypresse trees, at the end of which was a Fountain, the waters whereof rising up in great spouts one upon another, seemed as if it were a rock of chrystall, unto which the rayes of the Sunne gave colours like to the Bowe of hea|ven. Afterwards we went to sit down in a great Arbour of Myrtle, wherein there were twenty four statues: In the midst of this Arbour there was a Fountain, whose wa|ters were cast out by twelve Sea-monsters, so that half of their bodies were onely visible; in the midst of which, was a Neptune with his Trident. Because this Arbour was ex|ceedingly Page 148 pleasant, and had severall seats in the midst, we stayed there a long while; Cleodora was alwayes disputing with Belesis, and would needs perswade him hee had such things as those he saw in his countrey: she named all the flowers, and herbs (that were generally known) unto him; and she was so witty upon every subject, that shee infinitely delighted all the company: Belesis did contribute as much as possible to aug|ment the mirth: But after we had been a long while there, Belesis told Cleodora, that to compleat all her favours, it would be a great addition, if she would be pleased to let him see the house unto which the garden belonged. You will not finde it so pleasant as what you have seen already, said she: for excepting one Parlour, and a vault, which are exceedingly cool in Summer, all the rest are inconsiderable: yet if you will, wee'l go: In saying so Cleodora rose up, Belesis continually leading her, and all the company following untill we came to the Parlor door: Then did Cleodora send unto the porter to o|pen the door: But Sir, there was no need to stay long for him; because as soon as Cleodora and Belesis came to the door, it was opened: and Cleodora saw that there was a very magnificent Banquet prepared. She was so surprized at the sight, and so little imagining it could be Belesis who prepared it, that shee retired, and would her self shut the door, supposing there might be some secret piece of gallantry of other men: But she was not long in that error, for Belesis thrusting open the door, there was heard a consort of rare Musique: after which, turning towards Cleodora, he beseeched her to excuse him as a stranger, if he did not treat her so handsomely as he would do. How, Belesis (said she unto him) do I shew you the garden, and is it you that gives us this costly Banquet: At least, confesse that Hermogenes and Aleonor have ordered the busi|nesse. I will not shame them so much (replied he) by telling such an untruth to ex|cuse my self withall for your no better entertainment: Then did Hermogenes and I declare that we knew nothing of it: So that after this, every one was ravished with ad|miracion, acclamations and commendations of Belesis: Cleodora asked pardon for treat|ing him as a stranger, and promising never to do so again as long as she liv'd. The truth is, we praised Belesis so much, that every one forgot there was such a thing as silence in Nature: And the company was so highly satisfied with this pleasant surprize, that it wrought no small effect in the heart of Cleodora: For there is nothing so prevalent with a growing affection, as to act some high peece of gallantry as may cause many persons to commend one in the presence of her he loves. Thus, Sir, did Belesis cease to be a stranger with Cleodora; who after this did visit her very often, and with whom he fell so deep in love as he intended to stay as long as he could in Susa. He car|ried it out so very well, that his parents sending him wherewith to put himself in Equi|page, that there was not one man of his condition in all the Court, who lived at a finer rate then he. In the mean time, he knew so admirably well how to take the height of Cleodora's spirit, that he was in very favourable esteem with her; yet durst never speak seriously of his passion to her: for he knew it was a dangerous businesse to speak unto her of any love: At first she declared, that she ranked him in the Cata|logue of her friends in general: A while after, she did him the favour to acknowledge publicly, that he was in the number of three or four whom she preferred be|fore all the rest: and a while after that, I belevee Belesis knew, without her telling him, that he was the prime of her friends. In the mean while he durst not discover him|self to be her lover, but onely her friend; for he being very intimate with her, she confessed one day unto him, that she should be the most satisfied woman in the world, if she could once see, how farre the patience of an ill treated lover would go: You may well think, said she unto him, that I am in no humour of any gallantry: but if ever I chance to run out of my wits so farre as to take any pleasure in the folly of another, and that the fantastical fate of love do ever send me a lover, certainly I shall not take any greater pleasure in the world, then in tormenting him. And truly I do not think any thing so sweet, as to make such a sort of men to suffer, as make little mole-hills to be great mountains of misery: But is it possible (said Belesis to her) that you should be capable of any such thoughts of cruelty? If I should (said she and laughed) cut the throat of a man with my own hand; poyson another; set a Town on fire, and a thousand such things, doubtlesse these would be horrow unto me, and I should rather die then think of any such things; But Belesis, since in making a man miserable, I am

onely a little partiall, a little angry, and a little insensible: I shall not much do^o at it, though it purchase me the name inhumane, inexorable, and cruell: yes a Tylgresse Page 149 if you please, or any thing rather then to come puling with finger in eye, and tell me that I am fair, that I am amiable, and that I am charming. Therefore it is a great happinesse, that I was not borne with beauty enough to make many Conquests: for certainly my Raigne would have been tyrannicall. Yet I can hardly beleeeve it, replied Belesis: for those who live under your power, me thinks have no minde to rebell: 'Tis then because I do not know they are my subjects, replied she; for if I did, I should quickly make them slaves, and slaves so loaded with irons, that perhaps they would endeavour to break them. Cleodora spoke this with so much earnestnesse of spirit, as Belesis was amazed, and durst not be so bold as to declare himself, as he once intended; because he thought she spoke it purposely that he should not engage himself to serve her: and indeed this thought did so damp his spirit, as from that day he became very reser|ved and melancholy; and so much that he never enquired after any thing: so that in lieu of furnishing Cleodora with news, and acquainting her with all passages before any knew it, he did enquire of her, for he did not know so much as the common news of the street. This lovely Lady, perceiving his change, began one day when he was alone with her, to chide him, and also to oblige him, for as good hap for him was, she was not then in an humour so to hide her anger, as none could discover it. Is it possible, (said she unto him) I should ever see such an alteration? for indeed, you do not lesse astonish me now you are ignorant of all that is done in Susa, then you did when you came first, and yet knew every thing: Is it because you are weary of your complacenc|ie towards me? Is the reason, because you are weary of Susa? or is it because you think news not fit for discourse, and intend to reforme the world by your example? It is not any of these you have named Madam, replied he; But the reason is, because there is something so choaks my mind, that I can think of nothing else for it. The only remedy for such an humour, answered Cleodora, is to frequent no places but where one hath some businessse, which may drive it out of your thoughts: The reason why I am now ignorant of every thing (replied Belesis) is, because I cannot go unto the place where I have my businessse: and in that place, I do not hearken to what people say. But Belesis, (replied Cleodora, not ghessing at what he would say) I see you continually here: 'Tis true Madam (answered he) but the reason why I am continually here is, because no other place pleaseth me: It seems then (said she craftily) that you have no desire to please your self: for of late you are alwayes musing, and never speak. The reason is Madam, replied he, because I am afraid to speak that which you have no desire to know. Provided you do not speak of any thing wherein I have any interest, answered she, there is nothing which you can speak that will offend me. Me thinks, replied Belesis, your curiosity would be more rationally, if you desired to know that which concerns you, then that which concerns you not: however it be, said she unto him, it is my humour, and all those that desire to please me, must conforme them|selves unto it. But Madam, (replied he, with a very serious countenance) if I should tell you there is a person who complains against you, a person whom I have heard you say, you esteemed, would you not desire to know of what he accuseth you, to the end you might justifie your self? No, (replied she) for if I be accused wrongfully, it is not worth my justification: and if I be culpable, it is as I would be, and be both incapable of repentance or excuse. I cannot beleeeve you so unjust (replied Belesis) but since you will neither justifie nor excuse your self, may I not think you would not have others justifie or excuse themselves? No, said she: for by the same reason that I would not give an account of my actions unto others, do I desire that others should do that which I will not do to my self. If this be so Madam, replied Belesis, then I hope, you will not be offended when I tell you, that the reason why I am ignorant of all the passages of the world is, because all my endeavours are employed to know your heart; and the reason why I speak so little, is, because I am afraid to speak too soon, especially when I shall tell you that I love you in such a fatal minute, as shall for ever purchase your hatred. I assure you, replied Cleodora, all times are alike for that, and there is one minute in which I should allow you to speak of any such thing, therefore, I pray you never do it; you are so farre engaged in an odde Discourse, but you may turn it into a Rallarie. No, no Madam, said Belesis, I speak most seriously: and I had rather incense you by discovering the violent passion of my heart, then that you should be for ever ignorant of it: I have heretofore heard you say, that you had rather be called cruell, inhumane, and inexorable, then be commended; therefore me thinks you ought Page 150 not to think it strange, that I had rather you would call me rash, presumptuous, and insolent, then that you should commend me onely as your best friend: Since you would have it so, replied Cleodora, I will do what I can to satisfie you, though till now I was never put to the necessity of it. I beseech you Madam, said Belesis) do not treat me with the extremitie of your rigour and anger. I was so far from it, (replied she and laughed) that if I had been now in an angry humour, I am confident you would not have spoken thus, but I should have imposed silence still upon you, though I must ingeniously confesse, that within this quarter of an hour, I indeavored to be angry with you, but could not: and the reason was, because I did not beleeeve anysuch thing as you speak of: Ah Madam, (cried Belesis) I will have none of your sweetnesse upon such hard conditions; yet what probabilitie is there, that the faire Cleodora should know what is done in every place where she is not; and be ignorant of what ^oseth in my heart, where continually she is? Moreover Madam, who is able to keep me at Susa unlesse your self? The friendship of Hermogenes (replied she) who brought you hither: 'Tis true, replied he, I came hither for the Love of him, but yet more true, that I stay here for the Love of you Madam. If what you say be true, (replied she) I advise you to depart from Susa as soon as you can; for Belesis, to tell you truly, I am a better friend, then I shall be a Mistris, though I should suffer you to love me: but indeed I cannot do that; and you cannot do me a more sensible displeasure, then to perswade me that you love me: for what inclination so|ever I have, to love newes, yet I do not love to be the newes of others: and when I consider, that if you take a fancy of doing such things for me, as men who would be thought to be in Love use; every one will begin to whisper, that Belesis Loves Cleodora, and perhaps they will add, that Cleodora allows of it without resistance; I shall be so extremely angry, that I shall go neer to hate you. Madam, replied Belesis, the only way to prevent all wiseprings that I am in Love with you, is to permit me the liberty of telling it unto you in secret, and that you do not force me to despair: for Madam, I conceive it an easie matter for an happy Lover to be secret: But if you will not beleeeve that I Love you, and let me speake of it somtimes unto you, then I shall be forced to perswade you of the truth by doing a thousand things which would discover my passion unto all the world.

Therefore, Faire Cleodora, Consider well before you Pronounce the sentence of my death, whether I do deserve it, if it be your Pleasure, none shall ever know that I Love you, and you your self shall only know what power you have over my soul. But if you will not allow me to speak of my Love in private, I Professe unto you, I will make every man a confidant of my Passion, not only to the end I may have some comfort in complaining against your Rigour, but to the end also that all the world may speak of you; you shall see (hard-hearted woman) whether it is better a 100000 Men should say I Love you, then that I my self only should tell it you, and that with a most unparalelled respect. I pray Belesis, said Cleodora, hold your peace, unlesse you have a minde to provoke me into very rude language: for if you continue any longer, the anger of my heart will so rise, that I shall raile against you. As Cleodora was saying so, I came in, and broke off their discourse: I easily perceived they had been in some private talk; for I saw such a lively colour in the cheekes of Cleodora, and so much anger in the eyes of Belesis, that I almost ghessed at the passage between them: after this, Cleodora put in practise what she had formerly told Belesis: For there was no kinde of severitie, which she did not shew unto him, though she esteemed him infinitely, and perhaps Loved him also. She did not only avoid all occasions of talking alone with him, but if in any company he came amongst them, she would talk to some other in his presence, yet truly she was all wayes civill towards him: for I beleeeve she did not strive to quench those flames which she had kindled in his soule, but did in her wishes rather blow the bellows and increase it: yet all her civilities towards him did much grieve rather then comfort Belesis: and one day finding her alone, he complained of his miserable condition unto her, I respect you so much Madam (said he unto her) that I will not complaine of all your cruelties and scornes, for indeed I think my self worthy of them, for Madam, what good will all your civilities do me if you have resolved upon my Ruine? is it because you love long torments, and because a violent death will not fully satisfie your crueltye? Civillitie replied Cleodora is debt a due even to our very ene|emies. Page 151 I know very well Madam, (replied he) that it is to be used in war, and combats, but I know also, that you ought not to use it to a man who importunes you for Love, and whose presence angers you. Ah Belesis (said she, and smiled) I must needs make a difference between Belesis & Belesis, (if I may say so) for truly I did infinitely esteeme that pleasing stranger who did so much invite my curiositie, the first time I saw him, and whose company was very delightfull to me in many entertainments, and pleasant walks. But I must confesse that this Belesis now, is not so sutable to my humour as the other was. Provided you will Love either of them (replied he, and smiled as well as she) I will promise the other shall not offend you, or complaine against you: Seriously Belesis (said she unto him) can there be any truth in your words? seriously cruell Lady, (replied he) can you doubt it? For indeed Cleodora, if you did not know that I Loved you, then your behaviour to me was unreasonable; and if you did know it, it was unjust and inhumane: Consider therefore with your self, I conjure you, or to say better, consider me, and force me not into despair. To shew you (said she unto him) that I would not absolutely disoblige you, I will make an ingenuous declaration unto you, but I pray you do not put another gloss upon my words then my meaning will beare. Never fear Divine Cleodora, (said he unto her) that I will flatter my selfe with any thing that you can say unto me; for I look upon my miseries through such glasse, as makes them seeme greater then they are, and my happinesse lesse. Since so, replied she, I will not fear to tell you, that I do infinitely esteeme you; and if I were capable of so much weaknesse as to love any, it should be you sooner then any other: But for all that, I must tell you, for your good both and my own; it is requisite I loved you but a little: for if I should proceed so far as to tell you that your passion pleaseth me, I should be so much ashamed, that it would make me extremely melancholy: and since melancholy begets vexation, and vexation anger, we should alwaies be quarrelling; therefore to compose things, and that you may not complaine of my injustice, I will make a proposition unto you: which is, that you shall Love me much lesse then you do, and I will Love you a little more then I do; to the end our affections may meet in the medium, and become a more solid and true friend|ship. When you begin to Love me a little more, replied he, I shall try if I can Love you much lesse: Oh Belesis, said she, it is you that must begin first and not I. Alas Madam, (replied he, and sighed) If you cannot Love me, when I Love you as much as I can: I doubt you will not Love me at all, if I Love you lesse. But cruell woman, my affection to you is not in my choice, as it seemes yours to me is in yours, for whether you would have me Love you, or not Love you; I shall alwaies love you; not only whether you will or no, but also whether I will or no: yes inhumaine heart that you are, you do often make me wish I could not Love; but I cannot drive out of my heart that Passion which tyrannizeth in it. Belesis had many other expressions of his soule, but could not ob|taine any more from her; yet he thought himself very happie, that he was treated no worse. In the mean time, the rare merits of Belesis, had a most powerfull influence upon the heart of Cleodora; yet was it long before she would give him any vol|untarie testimonies of it: But yet without any designe at all, she would often do such things, as let Hermogenes and me know, that she did not hate him: for though ordinarily she seemed very cold in the businessse, when he did earnestly seek for op|portunities of seeing her: yet when it chanced that he was not in any place, where she imagined he would follow her, she would alwaies twitt him with some piece of rall|larie or other: so that one may say (if it be lawfull to say so, of such an amiable person as Cleodora was) that her fantasticalnesse was the first favour which Belesis received from her: But at last, after a long contest between her lenitie, and her severitie, she yielded a little, and confessed unto Belesis, that she was well pleased, he could not love her lesse. It is a hard task to tell how joyfull this half despairing Lover was, when he obtained leave to talk of his passion unto Cleodora: the memory of all her rigour was pleasing to him: and though she granted no further favour, then suffering her self to be Loved, yet did he esteeme himself the most happie man alive: yet was his happinesse not long tranquill; because the more Cleodora, began to love Belesis, the more hard she was to be pleased. If he expressed much love, she would say he was imprudent, to expresse so many visible markes of his passion; if he offered to hide it, she would chide him for changing, and say he loved her lesse, If he were pleasant, she would think she had given him too many testimonies of her affection. Page 152 and would say she repented; if he were sad, she would accuse him for not being sufficiently sensible of her favours, by his expressions of joy: so that whatsoever Belesis could either say or do, there was some exceptions or other still against him, and continual Jarrs between them. However they knew that they loved and were confident of it, though they would often use such expressions as would make others beleeeve they loved not at all. Yet for all this, Belesis had many pleasant houres; For Cleodora would suffer him to write when he could not see her; and she gave him her picture, so that the unequality of her humours, would move one to say that Roses have alwayes thornes in them, and thornes bear roses. Thus Sr. did Belesis live a long time, whilst Hermogenes and I without any intended designes, did recreate our selves in the visit|ing of Ladies with all indifferency that could be: Yet Hermogenes went lesse to visit Cleodora then any other, to the end (as he said) that his friend might have more op|portunities of courting his mistresse alone. Things being upon these termes it chaunced that a sister of Cleodoras Aunt died in the Country where she had lived a long time: and having left only one daughter called Leonisa about the age of fifteen yeers: This young Lady came unto Susa, to dwell with her mothers sister, and consequently in the house with Cleodora. When she came thither Belesis, Hermogenes and I, were gone a journey of eight dayes before we returned; and then we went to Cleodora, who had already contracted a great friendship with her new-come Cosen: But Sr. we were all wonder when we saw Leonisa: for though we know she was to come to Susa, and had heard say she was very fair, yet wee could not chuse but be dazled, at the lustre of her eyes, and purity of her complexion: Nature never gave unto any one such lovely hair, pure collours, sprightly eyes, and handsome mouth: though her stature was not tall, yet it was not low; but so rightly proportioned in all parts and so noble, that she was a delightfull wonder; her affability was as admirable as her beauty: the lovely Aire of her Aspect was such, that her eyes never took any hearts without giving some hopes of moving hers, though yet as modest as possible could be. Thus Sr. appeared Leonisa, when Belesis first saw her with Cleodora, who presented us all unto her lovely Cozen, whose civillie to us appeared as much as she was sprightly and fair. Since Cleodora and Leonisa were of different beauties, envie took no hold of their soules, and they had this advantage, that they did not injure each other, though it must be confessed that Leonisa had more amiable sparks of youth in her face then Cleodora had: though there was but three yeers difference in their age. In the mean time, as it is civility to commend all beauties especially the first sight, Hermogenes and I did extreemly commend the beauty of Leonisa: Belesis also commended her, but lesse then we, because it was before his mistresse, for my part, since I had no such reason upon me, I did as much as I could extoll Leonisa: I asked her whether they had not already written of the death of many of her Lovers about that place from whence she came, whom very grief for her absence must needs kill: For said I unto her, if they were not dead, they would have followed you, and we should have seen them here. I assure you, said she and laughed, if I had as much beauty as to make any lover in the place from whence I came, and to make them follow me hither I should not have brought very good company with me, and therefore it is my happinesse that I have made no conquests. But you will make some here and that quickly, replied Hermogenes, and questionlesse she will not make many inconstants, added I: fie, fie, said Cleodora, I beseech you, do not presage so many misfortunes unto Leonisa at one time. It seemes (said Leonisa very pleasingly and blushed) that I have not yet lived, but came from a savage place where they know not what love is: For I should think it more glorious, to take hearts from other beauties who tooke them first, then to take such as were never captivated by any. It is merely *alice Leonisa replied Cleodora, to say any such thing; and much injustice and vanity also. Did I not tell you, replied Leonisa that I knew not how to argue rightly upon such a subject? yet whatsoever you say, I must needs think that it would be very pleasant. But would you be contented, replied Cleodora, that they should quit you for another? No (answered Leonisa) and because I do fancy how extreemly vexed I should be if such a thing should chance unto me, therefore I do perfectly fancy the pleasure of causing it to others: If the miseries of others do so delight you (said Belesis who had not yet spoken) I extreemly pitty those who are destinied to love you; I beleieve they are so small a number (replied she) as I beleieve I shall not give you any great subject of Page 153 compassion. For my part (said Cleodora only for arguments sake with her Cosen) I wish with all my soul that the first heart you captivate may be inconstant and cast off your fetters to punish you for your unjust opinion: I cannot yet repent of it (said Leonisa) for when I consider the pleasures I should take, in rooting the image of another out of the heart of him whom I have captivated, and forced this lover to let me see the picture and letters of his first mistresse, and how I should delight in looking upon the one, and reading the other, I assure you it is worth wishing I were so fair as to make some inconstant lover to be my votary: In good earnest (said Cleodora and laughed) you will make me beleieve you know not what you say: I do confesse, I do not, said Leonisa, but I know what will please me: and yet I do not say I will love this inconstant man, whom I would make, for my designe is only to laugh and make sport with him when I have made him so. Fie, Fie, fair Leonisa, said Hermogenes, you are now worse then your Cosen thinks you? for why should you desire to gain hearts, unless you were resolved to part with your owne? That resolution replied Leonisa, me thinks is too much: and I have so good an opinion of my sex, that I do not think there is one who is so liberrall as to part so easily with their heart: yet I must confesse said she and smiled, some men will vaunt how they possesse the hearts of many fair ones; But certainly they got them surreptitiously, by craft or violence. I assure you, replied Hermogenes which way soever one enjoys yours, he will enjoy a most glorious and heavenly happinesse. Though it were so, answered she, yet this heavenly happinesse you speak of should cost him some sorrowes before he enjoyed it, for I am resolved not to give him the least roome in my heart, and therefore farr from giving it all unto him; I pray you Leonisa, said Cleodora, do not speak so resolutely, since it is no prudence to triumph before the victory; you never yet heard any Courtship, but only Country complements, and have all your life been brought up amongst rustiques; and yet you are as confident of your self, as if you had made all the gallants of Susa, bow knees unto your beauty, and as if you scorned them all: Beleieve me Leonisa it is no discretion to have so good an opinion of your own strength, and I have known some as well conceited as your self, who slighting their enemies, are sometimes overcome, therefore do not brag that you are invincible: when you have been a yeer or two at Court, and when your beauty hath made an infinite number of slaves who have cast off their first Mistresses to enter into your fetters, and when you have defended your self against them all, we will then all ow you to speak thus boldly, but till then, I must tell you I cannot endure it. 'Tis better for me to say nothing replied Leonisa, then to dispute against you. Then, after a while of some other discourse, Belesis, Hermogenes & I, took our leaves, being all very well pleased with the beauty and wit of Leonisa, and concluding her to be the only starr of the Court or Towne. Belesis yet, did hardly consent unto this so clearly as we did, and only said that if Leonisa had not a colen in Susa, she had clearly transcended all that was amiable. In the meantime, since he could never see Cleodora, but he must see Leonisa also, because they dwelt both in one house, therefore he saw her every day: and as Leonisa was one of those beauties which the more one lookes the more one likes; so Belesis seeing her more then any other, did esteem her more then any, though she was generally esteemed of all: Leonisa also was more civil and complacentiall unto Belesis then she was to any other, not only because his merits did excell others, but also because she observed that her Aunt and Cleodora esteemed him very much; so that Belesis finding her to be of a very sweet and affable condition, used to seek for some comfort in her company, when Cleodora did at any time frown upon him, and so it chanced, that Leonisa against her will caused a quarrel to rise between them: For as her beauty was all the talke of the Town, she attracted abundance of gallants about her, and also some others that were not over well accomplished: so that Cleodora who was used only unto very choise company, grew weary of such a miscelany of many men, and her complacency to them was very cold: she told Leonisa diverse times of it: but she not being of her Cosens humour, and being something yonger then she, she could not finde in her heart to banish any that came unto her; and seemed to esteem her: so that she told Cleodora, that she could not be uncivil unto any, and more then that, she ought not to take so much upon her in a house where she is rather to obey their command: Cleodora durst not speak of it unto her Aunt, because she knew it would not please her that she should be of any smch criticall humour: and therefore not knowing what course to take, she entreated Belesis one day (since she observed there was a great confidence Page 154 between Leonisa and him) that he would tell her, that her universall civility did much offend her: and, if she answer you (said she unto him) that she does not love to disoblige any one, tell her that in all reason she ought rather to oblige some one compleat gallant to esteem her and not shew such equall civility unto all that come to see her: As Cleodora said so, and thinking none did hear her but Belesis, Leonisa was unknown in a closet, and came unto them laughing, and addressed her self extream sweetly unto Cleodora: I beseech you, said she, do not condemne me, before I may answer for my self: Cleodora perceiving that Leonisa had heard what she said, seemed as if she knew that she was in the closset, and spoke purposely that she might understand her: In the mean time I will seriously tell you Leonisa before Belesis (said she) who knowes the world very well: that there are two sorts of people, who without any choise use to affect a multitude which thus daily flock about you: I pray tell me, said Leonisa, in which Catalogue you rank me, and who are those two sorts of people, which so affect that which I must confesse I do not hate? They are, replied Cleodora, either Country people newly come to town, or else they are light headed huswives which love tattling. Surely, said Leonisa, I am not of this last number; I confesse it, said Cleodora, for if you be, you would make me much to wonder; yet I must say thus much for you, that you smell not at all of the country unlesse in this humour: But Cleodora, said Leonisa, is it not an undeniable maxime, that civility ought to be shewed unto all in general? and is it not by esteem only, that one ought to put a difference between those men we see? No, said Cleodora, for which way can one expresse esteem but by civility, when one would distinguish one of excellent qualities from others? you know it is not handsome to give men tender and obliging language. The word friendship is something too hard to pronounce; and it is dangerous to use it in speaking unto young and Courtly Gallants; and the truth is a man must give a thousand testimonies of his wisdom, or else do some very considerable peece of service, before it will be handsome to be tender and affectionate to him: after this, consider Leonisa, whether you be not too prodigall of your civility, unlesse it be shewed only unto such men as really esteem you: I shall be very reserved in my favours and my esteem, replied Leonisa, and be prodigall only of a thousand triviall passages and behaviours which indeed are nothing else but common civility, your prayses and commendations and esteem, replied Cleodora, are certainly of an inestimable value; But Leonisa, it is men only that must handsomly give commendations so frequently, when they speak unto Ladies, and surely you never told Belesis since you saw him, that you think him very handsome, that his wit doth infinitely please you, and that his company charmes you; Alas Madam, said Belesis, I beseech you do not Jeere me in your disputes, for it is not I who causeth the fair eyes of Leonisa to attract so much company that troubles you, I pray you said Leonisa to Belesis, let me answer Cleodora my self; I pray answer then directly, replied she; so I will replied Leonisa, and therefore I will confesse I never spoke any such thing unto Belesis as you mention; yet I assure you, that ma^rgre this universall civility wherewith you upbraid me, Belesis hath observed that I put a great difference between him and many others: speak Belesis, said Cleodora, does Leonisa say truth? have you perceived that esteem which she had of you from that which she had unto any else? Belesis was now much put to it; for he was unwilling to disoblige Leonisa, and fearful to anger Cleodora; so that carrying a level hand between them both, I have so little right unto fair Leonisas esteem, replied he, that I cannot imagine how she should put any difference between me and the lowest rank of qualified men: But as I am oft apt to flatter my self, and to beleieve things which I desire, I must confesse I have observed some land of civility used more obligingly unto me then unto some others to whom she hath done more reverence; so admirably well doth she know the art of obliging by little things. Beleieve not Belesis (said Cleodora unto Leonisa) since I assure you, he is no lover of multitudes; and certainly he hath good reason for it; So have you Leonisa; for what can you do with so many men? you cannot marry them all; You would not be thought a Tatler, you cannot esteem them all, and therefore how can you endure them all? Nothing is more sweet unto me, replied Leonisa, then to think that none doth hate me, but that every one on the contrary should esteem and commend me. Alaⁿ Leonisa (said Cleodora) what extream folly in it to say so? for what good will the esteem of a thousand men do you, when you esteem not them; and beleieve it, Dear Leonisa, it is very well if one can live so as none shall hate them, with Page 155 affecting that all the world should love them; I do confesse, that one ought to do all the good they can, and not to let a person drown for want of a hand lent to help him out. Yet for all this, one must love for themselves and their friends, and not altogether for the publike; The fittest places for expressions of civility is in the Temples, in the walkes, and in the streets; but in my chamber, if my coldnesse to those that trouble me would not drive them away, I should be then uncivil and perhaps go a little further sometimes, to rid my self of some such men as I know; And certainly all this, not without good reason, for one dull fellow may hinder me from enjoying the conversation of the compleatest man in the world. And truly I have so nice a spirit, that I cannot endure this kind of complacency, which will not purchase one real friend in a thousand yeers: 'tis very true, said Leonisa, that perhaps I have fewer friends then you, but perhaps I can brag of having fewer enemies: and do you not consider it is a hard matter to finde a man who will not thinke you of too mysterious and private a spirit? how many have you disoblighd by not speaking to them, or by speaking too much unto some whom you affect more then them. I know not what you say, replied Cleodora, but I pray take notice that the scorn or hatred of some men moves me not at all: nor do I value the blast of vulgar popularity more then an unconstant puff of winde. I care not for the esteem of the giddy multitude; when I began the world, and set lawes unto my life, I resolved never to do any thing which would draw odium upon my selfe: But I never resolved to trouble my self so much as to get the love of all the world: but on the contrary I am very desirous of the love of a very few, because I think a very few are worthy of reciprocall Returnes: moreover I consider that one single person cannot possibly love many men; And true happinesse is to live with one they loves, and to shun the sight of those they loves not. These Leonisa are my maxims, which never will be yours unlesse you change your humour. To testifie unto you, said Leonisa, how much I value your judgement, I do professe, that I would absolutely live as you would have me; I beseech you Madam after this (said Belesis unto Cleodora) do not chide Leonisa any more; For ought I see (said Cleodora unto him) you are very much devoted unto her, and would not any think who hear you speak, that I am in the greatest wrong in the world, and that Leonisa is in the right? you, I say, who have told me a thousand times that a multitude was as odious to you, as the company of one qualified person was pleasant: and that the conversation of above three or four at the most, was ever troublesome to you; and yet you have not put in one word to strengthen my side, but your silence hath so fortified Leonisa's, that she thinks in her heart your silence was only out of discretion, and because you had no minde to condemne me. Madam, (said he unto her) seeing Leonisa submits unto you, I think you intend to pick a new quarrel with me, for I did not think it just to meddle in a businesse wherein I had no interest, when one comes into a place (Replied she with a scornfull smile) where the person who talks is not sutable to their liking, it is an easie matter to make excuses and pretend businesse to decline the company. And Leonisa, be not deluded, for most of the men who come unto those houses which are as publique as the Temples, and frequent them, more do come only for their own ends; if it be winter, they seek out warme chambers; if summer, coole rooms; they are choise in their very seats; some talke of riding horses, others of some businesse: some not knowing whither to go, are there out of necessity; and perhaps of a hundred men that frequent these houses, there is not one has any honourable designe; For my part, I who do not desire men should seek me, I hate that kind of life, and therefore (said she in rising up) lest my company and discourse should seem too long unto you both; I will go unto my chamber, where none but such as please me enters, by that reason, said Leonisa, I hope Belesis and I may follow you. I am infinitely obliged unto you (said Belesis unto Leonisa) for speaking so advantagious for me: but I am afraid Cleodora will hardly consent unto part of your motion; I shall consent unto lesse then you imagine (said she) for I will not consent unto any part of it, since in the angry humour I am in, neither shall I please you, nor you me; in saying so, she went away and pulled the chamber dore after her, seeming by that action, she would not have Leonisa nor Belesis follow her; yet had they followed her notwithstanding, if at the very same time they opened the dore to go after her, abundance of company had not come in, which hindered Leonisa from executing her intended designe; However Belesis left her, and went to Cleodora's chamber, but in his way thither he met the Prince of Susa coming Page 156 to see Leonisa, and would by all meanes have him back, telling him he had some businesse with him: the respect Belesis owed unto this Prince, who was naturally of a very violent temper, moved him to obey; so that he went with him into Leonisa's chamber againe; yet he stayed not above halfe an hour there, for as soon as he saw a fit opportunity, he stole away and went to Cleodora; but he could not meet with her; for since she saw Belesis did not follow, not knowing the true reason, she went out at a back way to visit some of her friends which dwelt not far off, purposely that when Belesis came to her chamber he should not finde her there. He was so well acquainted with her, that he made no question but she went out of spite to him; in the mean time, I know not what temper his soul was in that day, but had not the same resentments he was wont to have when Cleodora was in her fantastical humours, for commonly he was alwayes very sad, and was never at quiet in his minde till he had made his peace with her: but now, in lieu of sorrowes, he was all anger, and resolved to expresse as much unto her the next time he saw her; And since so, it is no wonder if these two incensed parties had a sharpe and twitting conference the next morning when they met. Yet for all this, Belesis did not give Cleodora any disrespectful language, but he was nothing so obsequious as at other times to appease her: All his discourse tended to his owne justification, but never used any Prayers nor Conjurings, nor sighes: since Cleodora was not used unto such complements from him, she was so far from accepting of his justifications, that she accused him of cold hollow hartednesse; so that this little squabble, grew to be an earnest falling out: and they parted upon such tearmes that for many dayes Belesis durst not see Cleodora, and perhaps had no great minde to it. However, chance at last brought him to see her, and to speak to her: so that it seems love was resolved to torment Belesis more then ever any man which knew his power, and caused the sweetnesse of this Lady, whose heart was already much moved, to be now absolutely charmed, and much increased towards Belesis. Yet notwithstanding, thus much may be said in excuse of Belesis, that his vexation, to see he could never finde the affection of Cleodora to be solid and certain, was one of the main causes of his love to Leonisa. However it was most certain he loved her, and so excessively that his love to her encreased, and to Cleodora lessened. At first, he did not think he was in love with Leonisa, but thought that he was only angry with Cleodora: But he began by degrees to fear that Cleodora would not be appeased, and that he was disobliged from seeing her as her servant: yet was he in a great straight what to resolve upon, for if he did not reconcile himself to Cleodora, he could not see Leonisa: And he considered further, that admit he did reconcile himself, then it would be a piece of difficulty to make Leonisa beleieve he loved her: Also he was extremely ashamed of his inconstancy, and that he should so delude one whom he had so much loved, and whom yet he esteemed, maugre his new passion: yet Cleodora continued so violent against him, that though he knew his crime, yet he could not repent of it. But what troubles and sorrowes soever his soul had, he never acquainted Hermogenes or me with his new love, but only complained against the fantasticalnesse of Cleodora: in the mean time, this Lady whose heart was really affectionate unto Belesis, repented of what she had done, and seeing he fell off from his accustomed Courtship, as fierce as she was, she resolved upon the first opportunity to reduce him. And going one day with her Aunt unto the Queen without Leonisa, by chance she met him: as soon as she saw him, she had a great minde to speak unto him, yet she could not finde in her heart to use her tongue, thinking it enough if she looked upon him without anger, and to answer him mildly if he spoke unto her. On the other side, Belesis was in such a dump that he neither knew what to do or say: for the very sight of Cleodora did make him so much ashamed of his weaknesse, that one while he resolved to carry him|self as if he loved none but her: (this said he to himself) is perhaps more then I can do, and perhaps more then I ought, since it is not just to make her and my self miserable by telling Cleodora I love only her, when as I am ready to dye for the love of Leonisa: but how can I break off her chaines who has expressed a thousand testimonies of her affection to me, and whose very fantastical humours are signes of it? how dare I ever let her know that I am inconstant? how can I continually counterfeit? and what fruit can I hope for from my dissimulation? yet however, whether I resolve to devote my heart unto Cleodora, and chase Leonisa out of it; or whether I will court Leonisa and cast off Cleodora, I must at this present apply my self to the last of these; for Page 157 if I would have her take her first possession of my heart, I must approach her fair eyes, that they may kindle the flame which so long burned in my soul: and if on the contrary, I desire to be inflamed by the glorious light of Leonisa's eyes, yet still I must keep fair with Cleodora, since I cannot see the one without the other. Thus Belesis not knowing whether he should be inconstant or no; whether he should appease Cleodora or deceive her, he accosted her with such strange confusion as had a great operation upon the heart of that Lady, who was ignorant of the cause, but attributed the alterations in his face unto his repentance. He asked her in a trembling posture, whether her anger was yet over? It is so long since you spoke unto me, said she and smiled, that it were but just in me if I told you, it continued still: But Belesis, the manner of your asking makes me beleieve, that I ought not to tell you so, and therefore I do declare unto you, that I do with all my heart pardon all that is past. Oh Madam (said Belesis unto her and blushed) you are all goodness if you do not punish me. If you had spoke thus, replied she, at the beginning of our quarrell, it had not lasted so long: but the worst of it was (continued she and laughed) that we were both of us very humorous at once: therefore, I pray you, let us hereafter be so one after another; or if you please, let us not be so at all: and the sooner to oblige you unto it, I promise you to do my best in correcting my self: I leave you to judge Sir, in what a perplexed condition Belesis was: Then did he begin to renew his love unto Cleodora, but it lasted not long, for as he waited upon her home, and there saw Leonisa, all was quasht again: and Leonisa seeing him come with her Cousin, came unto her to rejoyce that she had brought Belesis with her, and gave him such obliging language, as quite damped all his intentions of continuing constant to Cleodora.

After this Belesis became so unquiet and reserved, that he was not knowable. All this while, he spoke not a word of his love to Leonisa, but addressed himself wholly to Cleodora, as if he yet loved her, yet with so much regret, that he was forced every day to colour the matter with some handsome invented lies: Sometimes he would say, he had received news of his fathers being sick: sometimes again he would say, he was ill himself; and sometimes not knowing what to say, he would put poor Cleodora in a miserable dump: for since she did really love Belesis, and considered she was ready to lose him in a fantastical humour, she gave him now no cause of complaint, but was as complacent as could be: and yet she saw he was as much out of tune as when she was the contrary. This being the state of things, Hermogenes with whom Belesis lodged, observed that now he was nothing so careful of Cleodora's letters as he was wont, for he found two or three of them upon the Table, lying loose and open; whereas before his inconstancy, he would never part with them out of his hands when he shewed them unto him, but would alwayes read them himself unto Hermogenes: Also, Hermogenes found the Picture of this Beauty, which he had lost, but did not restore it untill three or four dayes after, and all this while Belesis never missed it, which was quite contrary to his custome; for when he loved Cleodora, he used to look upon it every quarter of an hour: The greatest wonder to Hermogenes was, that he saw Cleodora did never treat Belesis so kindly as now, and yet Belesis was more melancholy then when she was most rigorous. Hermogenes having an extreme desire to know the cause of so great an alteration in his friend, he came unto him one morning to restore Cleodora's picture. But, as he would not speak of it seriously at the first, the better to discover his reall thoughts; so he began thus: If the vertue of Cleodora (said he unto him and restoring the Picture) were lesse known unto me then it is, I should think you had secretly married her, without either the consent of her friends or yours: for as it is the custom of many Lovers, to slight all the trifling favours which their mistresse gave them, when once they enjoy themselves: so I should think, that since you lost Cleodora's picture, and did not misse it three dayes together, and since you are grown more careless of her Letters then usuall, that you enjoy so much happinesse in the substance, that you need no shadowes, or pictures, or letters to comfort you: 'Tis true, I perceive you so melancholy, that it is evident you are not contented: And therefore since I cannot dive into the bottome of your heart, I conjure you to tell me, whether I must rejoyce or grieve with you; and if you will not open your thoughts unto me, I will ask Cleodora of them, who as I think, should know them. Oh I beseech you Hermogenes, said Belesis, do not tell Cleodora how I lost her picture, and never missed it, nor how I left her letters so carelessly that they might be seen: Then tell me, said Hermogenes, Page 158 from whence comes this alteration in your humour? Is it not enough you know the humour of Cleodora, replied he, without asking any further reasons? The humour of Cleodora, replied Hermogenes, is now so sweet, and complacent towards you, that Leonis* cannot be more affable to all the world, then Cleodora's to you. Ah, Hermogenes, (said this inconstant Lover, being transported by the excesse of his new passion) I would to the gods, Cleodora's humour had alwayes been like Leonisa's: Like Leonisa's, I say, upon whose face I never yet since I knew her, saw the least wrinkle of anger, and whose fair eyes are like unclouded stars, which shine alwayes alike, without one cloud of anger. I should have thought (replied Hermogenes, looking earnestly upon Belesis) that a Lover had never thought any eyes fair, but onely his Mistresses, but for ought I perceive Leonisa's eyes please you as well Cleodora's. Belesis blusht at the language of his friend, and let him apparently see there was a great alteration in his soul; so that Hermogenes went on; Confesse the truth to a friend (said he unto him) and tell me freely, whether Leonisa is not more in your heart then Cleodora: and whether if she have not already driven her out; she will ere long 'tis true, replied Belesis; But cruel friend, what delight can you take in maksng me to lay open my imperfections? However, (replied Hermogenes) then you do love Leonisa, and not Cleodora? I know not (answered he) whether I do not love Cleodora, but I am sure I am desperately in love with Leonisa: Then doubtlesse you do not love Cleodora, answered he, for one cannot love two at once. However, I must needs chide you, for truly Inconstancy is an unexcusable crime, unlesse it be caused through the infidelity, or excessive severity of a mistresse. But the case is farre otherwise with you, for you cannot take Cleodora with any infidelity, nor is she more severe then vertue and decency require. I know very well that I am culpable, though I could find some excuse for my crime, if I would: for indeed Cleodora, hath quarrelled with me without any cause in the earth, and hath so tired out my patience, that my passion is much weakened whether I would or no: Yet the gods are my witnesse, that I have endeavoured with all my possible power to reject Leonisa, and keep my heart wholly for Cleodora; but alas all was impossible, all too too weak; for all my desires, all my thoughts and faculties have changed objects: I do not see Cleodora with the same eyes I did, and by a fatal enchantment, that which I once thought would be my chief felicity, will not now afford me one quarter of an hours joy: what then would you have me do? Can I alter my destiny? Can I dictate rules unto my fate? and make love an act of my will? I know that Cleodora has a million of most excellent qualities, and that she is most admirably fair; But I finde Leonisa has pulled my heart out of her hands, and made mee change Mistresses: I am most horribly ashamed of my inconstancy I confesse, but I cannot keep my self from changing; therefore I beseech you Hermogenes pity me, in lieu of condemning me, second me in my affection to Leonisa; you, I say, who first brought me to Susa, and is the cause of all my miseries: and could ever lover be more miserable then I? For it was my fate to love a Lady of a difficult and fantastical humour; I endured as much as patience her self could do, to the end I might obtain her love; and when in all likelihood I was arrived even at the very Port of my happinesse, my angry fate would needs prompt me to cease my desires of enjoying Cleodora: All the time and pains which I employed in getting the affection of this Lady, whom I thought would have compleated my felicity, is quite, absolutely, entirely lost: since her affection makes me onely more culpable, and more miserable; and since I must fatally begin my sighs and prayers for another, against all which I know no remedy: therefore my dear Hermogenes, once more let me entreat your assistance. I beseech you first, said Hermogenes, upon what termes are you with Cleodora and Leonisa? Cleodora, replied Belesis, thinks I love her still; and as for Leonisa, I have not yet spoke a word unto her, onely in the language of eyes, and yet I imagine by her looks she understands me: How, replied Hermogenes, does Leonisa understand that language, and answer it? I do not think she understands me, replied Belesis, because she answers, but because she is very careful not to answer. But Belesis, replied Hermogenes, dare you ever speak of any love unto Leonisa? do you not fear she will upbraid you with inconstancy? and can you have the confidence to tell Leonisa you love her, in the sight of Cleodora? for my part Belesis, I wonder how you can have such a thought: If Cleodora lived at the other end of the Town, the matter would not be so difficult: but to love one Lady really, and to dissemble love unto another in the same house, and another who really Page 159 loves you, is a thing so strange, that I see no possibility of doing any good in it: For Belesis, you cannot possibly delude Cleodora long: indeed I do not think it impossible but one may persuade a Lady that he loves her, though he do not, provided hee does not really love any other: but to love another really, and to persuade a Lady whom he formerly really loved, that he loves her still, cannot sink into my belief. I see all these difficulties which you propound, replied Belesis, and conceive them to be as great and greater then they are: But since my tyrannical passion triumphs over all opposition, I must delude Cleodora, notwithstanding my secret repugnancy, since otherwise I cannot see Leonisa: I intend therefore (if I can speak it without blushing for shame) to continue my visits unto Cleodora, and to live with her as if I loved her still; unless at such times as when I can look upon Leonisa and Cleodora not see, and talk to her when she cannot hear. I have already told you, replied Hermogenes, that you cannot do this: and I am the most mistaken man in the world if Cleodora be not undeceived once in eight dayes, and if you do not lose both Cleodora and Leonisa at once. After this, Belesis began to walk about the chamber with the greatest agitation of spirit in the world: and afterwards addressing himself to Hermogenes; My dear friend, said he unto him, if you would do me one favour which I am thinking upon, I should owe my life and all my felicity unto you. Tell me what it is, replied Hermogenes, that I may consider whether I can and ought to do it: for your reason I perceive is so blinded, that I dare not trust you: I would have you, replied he, fain a love unto Cleodora, and become my Rivall, which you may easily do; and it is not impossible but you may persuade her to believe you, and therefore I conjure you dear Hermogenes to persuade Cleodora that you are her lover. But what advantage can you draw from this dissimulation? replied Hermogenes: My plot is, replied Belesis, that you shall make Cleodora inconstant, as Leonisa hath made me: or at least that you may give a colour unto my inconstancy, and by living in that manner with her as I may have some ground to accuse her of inconstancy, and that I may upbraid her with her change, as well as she me, with mine. Believe me Belesis, (replied Hermogenes) I shall never make Cleodora inconstant; all that I shall be able to do is to give you some colour of falling out. But if she prove more faithful then ever unto you, and all my endeavours cannot shake her constancy, you will then be more in fault. I do confesse it, replied Belesis, but I cannot cease, being lesse miserable: It will suffice if your company with her will give me a colourable quarrell against her, and that I may hereafter say, than the beginning of my love to Leonisa, was from my belief that she was persidious: whilst you are speaking to Cleodora, I shall sometimes have opportunity of speaking with Leonisa, and therefore I must say, that upon you and your assistance depends all my hopes. I must needs confesse, said Hermogenes, that I owe you all service; But I must needs confesse also, that I am extremely unwilling to do you this office which you desire. But Belesis was so exceedingly urgent with him, that he undertook is: and for the handsomer carriage of the business, he did not at first speak of his dissembled passion, but onely went to see her after their ordinary, and to court her much more then he did Leonisa: But the rarest passage was to see with what zeal Belesis wished Cleodora might use Hermogenes kindly, that he might have the better ground of a quarrell: In the mean time, be pleased to know, that though there was a very good correspondence between Cleodora and Leonisa, yet there was no such strict league of confidence between them, as to impart all matters unto each other: so that Cleodora never acquainted Leonisa with any passages betwixt her and Belesis, nor did ever any tell Leonisa that Cleodora did not hate him: she saw that they were kind unto each other, but she thought it was onely matter of friendship, and never suspected any matter of love between them: Being then in this opinion, upon a day when the sister of Hermogenes was with her, between whom there was an intimate affection, and <◇> infinitely esteeming Belesis, she began to speak unto Prassilla concerning him, as into her that was sister to his best friend: At first, she enquired of his house, of his hindred, of his estate, of his travels, of the friendship between Hermogenes and him, and of a hundred other things, which expressed her curiosity of every thing which related unto Belesis: After Prassilla had made an exact return unto all her Questions, and saw that <◇> prepared to enquire further, I beseech you tell me (said Prassilla and <◇>) why you have such a mind to speak of Belesis, and whats the reason you would so exactly know every circumstance which concerns him? is it love, or onely curiosity? I cannot resolve Page 160 you, (replied Leonisa in Rallie) whether it be Curiosity or Love, but I am sure it is not out of any hate to him that I enquire: nor is it credible it should be love, (replied Prassilla) though I asked the question, for you have more reason then to love one who cannot love you again, and you are wiser also then to make any conquest in prejudice of Cleodora, who would never Pardon you: is Belesis then in love with Cleodora (replied Leonisa, and blushed) I think he hath loved her so long, replied Prassilla, that it will not be doubted, and you are the onely one in all Susa, who is ignorant of it: But Leonisa, how comes it to passe that you change Colour, when I tell you Belesis is in love with Cleodora? The reason is, (replied Leonisa, and blushed more, not halving time to think of an answer) because I thought he was in love with another: and with whom? (asked Prassilla) you have so twitted me with my Curiosity (replied she) that I will not satisfie yours. Yet truly I would gladly know with whom you thought Belesis in love: I am so vexed to be thus deceived in my judgment (replied Leonisa) that I will die rather then tell you. Then will I never tell you any thing you desire to know (answered Prassilla); yet replied Leonisa, I do exceedingly desire to know more Passages Concerning Belesis and Cleodora: I know a thousand (replied Prassilla) but I will not tell you one, unlesse you will tell me first, with whom you imagined Belesis in Love: Since you will needs know (said Leonisa to her) I thought him to be in Love with you: fie, fie Leonisa (cried Prassilla) you are not sincere; do you think me such a fool, as to think you say truly: No, no, I am not so easily deluded, but to punish you for it, I shall tell you what you would not confesse unto me: Be sure you guesse truly, said Leonisa, and laughed, else I shall never Pardon you, especially since I am deceived my self, and would be revenged upon Belesis. Thus Sr. these two amiable Ladies, did understand each other without any direct telling; and thus did Leonisa first understand of any passages between Belesis, and Cleodora. However, the eyes of Belesis, had told her such things, as she knew not whether she should give more credit to the words of Prassilla or the looks of Belesis, yet she resolved to carry her self more coldly to him, as if she were desirous to punish him, because he was the subject of her discourse with Prassilla, which was not at all agreeable to her minde: you may well imagine Sr. after this which I shall tell you, that these four Persons were not without something to do: For Cleodora was very busie to discover from whence the melanchollie of Belesis should proceed: And Belesis had enough to do, in deluding Cleodora, and endeavouring to finde out wayes to discover his Love unto Leonisa. Hermogenes, having undertaken to dissemble Love, was not without his cares: and Leonisa being desirous to discover exactly the thoughts of Belesis, had such a kinde of unquiet Curiosity, as it cannot be otherwise named: When Hermogenes did begin to frequent Cleodora, after their ordinary manner, Shee made him a hundred welcoms, thinking thereby, more to oblige Belesis then Hermogenes, and imagining that his coming was onely to do some good office for his friend: and never dreamt of the matter as it was: Some dayes passed thus on, and none of these Parties found any great augmentation of sorrows: Belesis yet had his choice, for when he was alone with Cleodora, he could speak unto none but her, and when he was with Leonisa and her, he was so amazingly confounded, that he was not able to help out with Conversation. unlesse in things indifferent. In the mean time, Hermogenes to content his friend, did so accustom himself to speak to Cleodora, that he left much time unto Belesis to talk with Leonisa: yet this did exceedingly perplex Cleodora: for believing that Hermogenes was of Belesis his intelligence, she could not comprehend, why he should not give place to Belesis to talk unto her and why he should always talk to her himself, yet at last she imagined, that perhaps Hermogenes was in Love with Leonisa, and had desired Belesis to speak to his advantage, but still she thought strange Belesis should never talk with her: But what convenience soever Belesis had to talk with Leonisa, by reason of Hermogenes his holding Cleodora in hand: yet he had not confidence enough to discover his Passion to her, in the presence of one whom he had formerly loved so well, and one who loved him, and therefore he sought for an opportunity of seeing her, when Cleodora was not present. He never could finde her without Hermogenes, who at the last, was no lesse desirous to talk with Cleodora in private as Belesis was to talk with Leonisa: For Sr. be pleased to know, that since Hermogenes was more Conversant with Cleodora then he used to be, he discovered so many charmes Page 161 and rich beauties in her minde, that never any appeared more amiable in the eye of his Fancy, and he hath told me a hundred times, that whosoever does not see her in this free humour of familiarity which she useth to her real friends, cannot see half her beauty; nor can imagine the power of her charmes. Hermogenes discovering a thousand fresh Graces, and as many rare Qualities in the spirit and heart of Cleodora, which he was ignorant of before, was wounded a fresh with the darts of her fair eyes, and fell insensibly to Love her; at first he could not think it to be Love: for he did nothing else but blame Belesis for quitting Cleodora, and addressing himself unto Leonisa. But by degrees he left of telling his friend of his inconstancy, and fell so desperately in Love with this Lady, as Belesis never loved her or Leonisa more. Yet he did not acquaint his friend with his growing Passion, though he knew not why he should make a secret of it, unlesse because, Love in it's own nature is a mystery, and Loves secrecy, he never strived against this Powerfull affection which took root in his heart: For although he knew the heart of Cleodora was a little engaged to Belesis, yet he hoped that when he she knew his inconstancy, she would disengage her self, and then he might perhaps possesse that place in her soul which Belesis had made himself unworthy of. Hermogenes then having these thoughts, did visit Cleodora with such assiduitie, that Belesis not knowing the thoughts of his heart, did alwayes when they were together, ask him pardon for the trouble which he constrained himself unto, for his sake. But at last, hoping for some fruit of the plot, which he had invented, Belesis seemed to grow something jealous of Hermogenes, and did so negotiat with Cleodora, that he perswaded her she was deceived, if she thought he talked unto Leonisa in behalf of Hermogenes: for by some passages which he told her, she thought he talked with her, onely to spite her. At the first, since she imagined this odde and jealous proceeding of Belesis, was an argument of his love to her, she was not offended with him, and so much lesse, because not suspecting any thing of the love of Hermogenes, she imagined it would be an easie matter to cure Belesis of his jealousy when she would, by desiring his friend not to apply himself so much unto discourse with her, so that taking a kinde of delight to torment Belesis for a few dayes, she never troubled her self to remove that belief out of him which she thought he had, so that this did facilitate unto Belesis the designe which he had to discover his passion unto Leonisa. One day then when they were all four together in Leonisas chamber, which she kept, not being very well, Cleodora to vex Belesis, asked Her[mogenes], if he would go with her upon a visit which she intended to make, Leonisa hearing her say so, began to complain for leaving her, and threatening to use her with the like indifferency if ever she were sick: But Cleodora told her that she left her such good company as she had no reason to grudge hers. Belesis ravished with this, though heretofore he would have desired her presence, told her, that she might judge others by her self, who in carrying away Hermogenes would not regret those she left with her. After which Cleodora and Hermogenes going out, Belesis remained alone with Leonisa, who knew not what to think of this passage: for if she remembered what Prassilla told her, she should believe Belesis Loved Cleodora; and that this was onely a trick to hide his passion: but when she considered all his actions, she believed he Loved her and not Cleodora. Yet not knowing what to think, nor daring to wish any thing, she turned towards Belesis, and looking upon him with a crafty smile, I do extreemly pittie you Belesis, (said she unto him) that Cleodoras severity should engage you thus in a company, which cannot Countervail the losse of hers: I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) if you will pittie me, let it be because I have sought for an opportunitie of speaking to you in private, and could never meet with it till now: we have been so continually Conversant, replied Leonisa, that I can not think you have any thing to speak of, more then you have already told me; for have I not seen you every day, since you came to Susa? Tis true, replied Belesis, I have seen you every day and the reason was, because I would speak with you in private: for Divine Leonisa, had I seen you seldom, perhaps I should not have observed all the Riches of your minde, but should doubtlesse have been lesse in Love with you then I am. Fie Belesis, (cried Leonisa) I thought you would have spoken seriously, but I see you deceive me: No, no Madam replied he, you cannot imagine I will jest upon such a subject as this, and it is so certainly true, that I am in love with the fair Leonisa, that it is not possible she should doubt it. Since there is a kinde of Railly, Page 162 said Leonisa, whose subtilty consists in seeming to speak in earnest, I shall think that yours is now of that nature. But Belesis, that which Puzzles me most, is, that I cannot imagine what good it will do you, unlesse you would thereby blinde me from knowing you are in Love with Cleodora: but that you may not use your Language in vain by offering to perswade me you Love her not, know Belesis that I do know you have Loved her ever since the first day you came to Susa. I must confesse with some shame, replied Bellesis, that I did Love Cleodora: but that you may know the end of my passion, as well as the beginning of it, I beseech you know, that as I began to Love Cleodora the first day I came to Susa, so I ceased to love her the first day you came hither, and when I had the honour first to see you: Ah Belesis, cryed she, doubtlesse you remember how I told you that day, I should take great delight in making men inconstant, and to pull their hearts out of the hands of those who had subjected them; and certainly you do this to jeer me for this folly which I expressed unawares: No (replied he, with a most serene Countenance) it is because you have really made me inconstant unto Cleodora, and more constant than any man alive unto the Faire Leonisa. Inconstancy, answered she, is of such a nature, as those that are once capable of it, will be so for ever: No, (replied Belesis) not when it has reason, not humor, for it is foundation, and when the person one forsakes, is lesse faire, and lesse accomplished then the person whom one chuseth. However, replied Leonisa, before I give any farther eare unto you, you must give me leave to inform my self very thoroughly, whether I am fairer and more accomplished, then any in all Susa; For Belesis, if I finde it not so, but that there are an infinite number in Susa more amiable then I, I were a fool if I accepted of your affection this day, to lose it to morrow: Cruel woman, (said he unto her) I beseech you do not treat me so rigorously, but consider, that since I love you more then I love Cleodora, I shall never love any but Leonisa: since in pulling my heart out of her hands, you must needs have such a power, which none can ever surmount. However it be, replied she, I must needs tell you, that if what you say be true, you will be a most miserable man, since I will do all I can to punish you for your inconstancy, in forsaking Cleodora: However, said he unto her, I beseech you refuse not to give credit unto my words: I will refuse all that you can ask, replied she: How, replied Belesis, can I think you will not believe me? and can I imagine that though you did believe me, yet you would be alwayes inexorable? Doubtlesse you may, answered she, for I am most fully resolved, never to give you the least hopes, that I can take any delight in being loved. How Leonisa said he, will you refuse me every thing I shall desire? will you not allow me the least hope? as for hope, replied she, perhaps I cannot take it from you: Tis true, answered Bellesis, but it is in your power to give it; Since you can finde it in your self, replied Leonisa, you need not seek for it from another: I most humbly beseech you, do not absolutely deny me all things; but do only one thing for me; and to the end you may grant it willingly, I do professe unto you, that the thing which I shall ask, cannot be called a favour: upon that condition, replied she, I give you leave to speak what you will. After this, replied Belesis, I shall not fear to beseech you that you will believe as often as I speak unto Cleodora, I have a zealous desire to speak unto Leonisa: and that all the testimonies of affection which I render unto her, out of fear she should banish me from you, are so many testimonies of that violent passion, which I bear to the faire Leonisa. Do you not call this a favour? (replied she and laughed) No, said he, but only a means how to obtain it: I pray, replied she, what greater favour can one do then to hear you? to hear, replied Belesis, is certainly only a Civility: but to love is the real favour; It being so, replied Leonisa, you will do very well and wisely never to hope for any favour from me: for Belesis; I do tell you truly, it were a fond vanity in me, if I should offer to take any Lover from Cleodora: and indeed (if I may speak so of a man, who hath spoken so placentially unto me) I think of inconstancy, and inconstant men, as I do of Treason and Traitors: it is your part (added she, and smiled to take off some part of the wormwood in her words) to make interpretation of what I say: I perceive Madam replied he, that you would have me think you Love inconstancy, and hate the inconstant men; In the mean time, it is not very just me thinks to treat me more Cruelly then a Lover, who never loved any besides you, and who never quitted any other for you. But Madam, if you consider, what I lose for the love of you, I am confident you will confesse, that your beauty did never produce greater effects of its power, then in Captivating my heart: as Leonisa was ready Page 163 to answer, much company came in, so that the conference ended; Belesis not knowing whether or no, Leonisa beleived what he said unto her. Yet his hope was, that hereafter she would be more observant of his actions, and by consequence would better perceive his Love to her: All this while, Hermogenes who was gone with Cleodora upon a visit, having not found her whom they went unto, brought her back into her own chamber, having no will to go into Leonisa's: so that finding a free opportunitie of speaking to her, his passion did so spur him to acquaint Cleodora with his sufferings for her, that he resolved upon it, yet he could not find fit words wherewith to expresse himself as he desired: And I think if Cleodora, not thinking of it, had not furnished him with an occasion to discover his Love unto her, he would hardly have ventured upon it, out of his feares to incense her: But after a quarter of an hours silence, not one word passing betweene them: for Hermogenes was considering what to say, and Cleodora mused upon the proceedings of Belesis: But she rousing her self suddenly out of her fixed posture, and turning towards Hermogenes with a smile: if Belesis said she unto him, do not entertaine Leonisa better then you do me: and if Leonisa be not better company to Belesis, then I am to Hermogenes, we did them no very good office in leaving them alone, nor unto our selves neither, since if we were all four together, perhaps we should muse lesse then we do. I know not Madam what you do, replied Hermogenes: But I am sure as musing as I am, and as reserved as you are, I had rather be alone in your company, then with all the company in the world: and yet there is no great pleasure (said she) in the company of one whose spirits are so distracted, and thoughts so far off, when she speakes as if there were countrys, and seas between them: and I confesse when I revived out of my musing humour, and found you in yours, and as far off me in your thoughts, as I was off you; I thought my self very uncivil, and was ready to correct my self for it: Why Madam, said Hermogenes, can you think that my thoughts might not be of you, though I did not speake? doubtlesse they were not, replied she, and to be sincere with you, though you were near me, yet you were far off my thoughts. We are then very different, said Hermogenes, for you are alwayes in my thoughts, though I be far from you: I see you will repaire that incivillitie, whereof I taxed you with another excessive civillitie, but know, Hermogenes, that you need not use unto me any improbable truth, much lesse any possible lies, to get believe: I had thought that what I spoke, said Hermogenes, had been easie to believe; for Madam, it is very imaginable one may remember you, when he sees you not, and for my part I professe, that I can think of nothing else but you, in what place soever I am: had you told me, replied Cleodora, that you remember me very often, I should have thought my self obliged unto you, because then I should have thought you spoke sincerely; but to say you remembre me alwaies, this is too much to believe: and yet I tell you not all, answered Hermogenes, since if I should tell you all I think of you, I should tell you more then ever Belesis did: since certainly I Love you more then ever he did. Ah Hermogenes, cryed Cleodora, I cannot endure this affront, for would you have me lend an eare unto a declaration of Love from you, and another from Belesis? whosoever considers what you say, will find that you wrong Belesis, as well as me: for if you think Belesis loves me not, he hath reason to complaine against you, for thinking him capable of subjecting himself to so meane a beauty as my self: and if he do Love me, then you are a very bad friend to him, and an ill husband of, your own honour, to publish your crime so boldly: However it be Madam, (replied Hermogenes) I do Love you; and certainly Love's you without a crime, though there were no other reason to excuse my self, but by saying I must needs Love you and cannot chuse: No, no Hermogenes (said Cleodora) you cannot deceive me: I see this is only a compacted plot between Belesis and you; and therefore without any anger against you, I will only be revenged upon Belesis: for indeed I do not take it well, he should oblige you, to speake unto me as you do: and there are some things wherewith there is no jestings. I do protest unto you Madam, replied Hermogenes, that Belesis is ignorant of any thoughts of Love which I have to you; though I knew all his: you are then a very perfidious friend, answered Cleodora: I know not Madam whether or no I am a perfidious friend, but I am most certaine, that I am a most faithfull, and passionate Lover; in the mean time, I beseech you Madam, let Belesis complaine against my infidelitie, when he shall know it, and let me only beg this one favour only from you, that Page 164 you will be pleased to observe both the passion of Belesis and mine; and to promise me that if Belesis consent unto my happinesse you will not oppose it: you tell me such strange things, replied Cleodora, that I know not what answer to return: yet I know this, that I take it very ill you should speak unto me as you do: yet Madam replied he, I shall say the same as long as I live: then speak unto me no more, replied she, at least in private; yet once more Hermogenes I charge you to proceed no further unless by order from Belesis, & unless I may know his reason, for to speak sincerely unto you, if you be his rival, you are less his friend: But I observe you live & agree together as you used to do: therefore if you will really oblige me, tell me what benefit he hopes for by this plot: Since I am not so bad a friend to Belesis as you upbraid me with, said he, I will relate nothing unto you that concerns him. But shall only tell you that he is ignorant of my love to you, and by consequence cannot know that I have assumed the boldnesse to tell you that I love you; But Madam I beseech you do not charge me with any infidelitie to my friend, or rashnesse to my mistress; let time and your own reason finde out the truth of things: I need no time, replied she, to finde out that I ought not to suffer you to speak as you do, therefore be silent unlesse in lieu of my anger, you will incur my hatred: After this Hermogenes was so bold as to use many expressions more passionate then the first, and spoke with such an Aire, as let Cleodora know, he loved her in earnest: And in that belief, after she had well consulted with her self upon the businesse, and after Hermogenes had left her, she resolved not to acquaint Belesis with any passages between them, for fear some quarrell or disorder might grow between them, for though she intended to be very faithfull unto Belesis, yet she wished that no misfortune might happen unto Hermogenes for the love of her: and therefore she could not resolve to break off absolutely with him: but intending to avoid as much as she could his being alone with her: After Hermogenes was gone, she went into Leonisas chamber from whence Belesis was not yet departed: But since both their spirits were very busie in thinking upon what they had told them, and in endeavouring to know the truth, their conversation was some thing Reserved and Private. At first, when Cleodora entred, Leonisa spoke first, Though you were so cruell as to leave me, said she unto her, yet I pray tell me what newes you have heard in your visits: Since I did not finde any at home (replied Cleodora) and since I never stirred from Hermogenes out of my chamber, I know no more then I did when I left you, it is you rather then I that is likely to tell newes; I assure you, replied Leonisa, if you know no more then I do, you have met with no very good intelligence, for I saw no body but Belesis, who told me nothing at all: yet you have been a long time together, replied Cleodora: I have had never the more news for that, replied Leonisa as you might have with Hermogenes: But Belesis replied Cleodora is used to hear more news then he: yet he hath told me none (replied she) yet I would gladly know, replied Cleodora what you have talked on all this while: sometimes we talked of you (answered Leonisa) and the rest of the afternoon was spent in repetition of a hundred things which imprinted them selves so slightly in my memory, that I have forgotten them: But since I know you have a better memory, I pray tell me what discourse Hermogenes and you have had, since news was no part of your conversation? Truly said Cleodora unto her, I shall be a little more ingenuous then you are, for I must confesse that I remember very well all Hermogenes said unto me: but I professe I will not tell you, unlesse you will tell me what Belesis said unto you concerning me: cannot you Imagine replied Leonisa what Belesis and I might talke of? No, replied Cleodora, not in the humours he hath been in of late, and therefore I would gladly know, whether he complains of any thing which I have unawares spoken: it is not likely he should complain of you to me (replied Leonisa) what did he then speak of? (said Cleodora) sincerely I cannot tell you, answered Leonisa, I only know we spake of you, but know not upon what occasion. I should not so soon forget what's told me (replied Cleodora, and blushed for anger she should be so inquisitive to no purpose) after which every one of them began to muse upon the matter, and passed away the rest of the evening without any discourse, unlesse some odd word by chance. Thus was the state of things, when one of high quality, and of greater wealth, fell in love with Leonisa, as well as Belesis: his name was Tisias: But since he was a man of none of the rarest parts, she could not much brag of this conquest; Yet being then very young, and Rubies glistering in her eyes, she was pleased that a man of his ranke should think upon her; though she had no esteem Page 165 of him at all, but looked only upon him through his great birth, and through the magnificence of his troops, and because he was in favour with the Prince of Susa. Then did Belesis think himself very miserable, because since Tisias fell in love with Leonisa, he was almost perpetually with her, and did not only hinder him from talking with Leonisa, but forced him often to apply himself unto Cleodora, unto whom he could hardly speak: Hermogenes had also some share in this angry adventure, because he spoke lesse unto Cleodora then before, and his passion was arived to that height as he could enjoy no rest: Yet all his expressions of affection were in vain: for this Lady was so constant in her affection to Belesis that nothing could alter her: all the favour she shewed him, was not to speak unto Belesis, because she thought if she did, there might arise some quarrell between them; her greatest motive to that was, because she thought Belesis was jealous of Hermogenes, and because he dissembled a coldnesse to his friend, the better to delude Cleodora; and therefore she offered him to see Hermogenes no more, and denied that he was in love with her. But say what she could, Bellesis told her that he would endeavour to love Leonisa to be revenged of Cleodora, since she loved Hermogenes to mock Belesis and his passion: so that Cleodora believing Bellesis to be really jealous of Hermogenes, began to shun him with all care, and to treat him extremely roughly: Belesis on the other side was far from his happiness: not but that he knew Leonisa esteemed him, and was not sorry that he loved her, but it was because he had so few opportunities of talking with Leonisa in private, especially since Tisias became his Rival, that it was impossible he should make any far progress into her heart: Yet he watched his opportunity so well, that one day he spoke with her, when neither Cleodora nor Tisias were present, and in a place where none could hear what they said, Belesis laying hold on this precious minute, began to aggravate the grandure of his passion: But as Leonisa for all her sweetness had a kinde of imperious spirit, so she began to speak, and looking upon him with an angry aspect: Truly Bellesis (said she unto him) I wonder you dare be so bold as to perswade me you love me, when all the world knowes you love Cleodora; If I could cast off Cleodora, and not cast off Leonisa also, replied Belesis: the world should quickly be undeceived, for I would behave my self so toward her, as there should be no question, that I am not in love with her, though I would never fail in the payment of those respects which are due unto a person of her merit and virtue; But since my crosse fate will have it so, as I cannot let you know that I love you, unlesse I seem to love her also. Questionlesse it were injustice in the Fair Leonisa, to tax me with a thing which I would not do but for the love of her. I can tax you with one fault, replied she, unto which I think you cannot make any direct answer, and thats this; if you were not in love with Cleodora, why are you continually looking upon her picture? That you may know what I looke upon (replied Belesis, in giving the case unto Leonisa and letting her open it her self) I beseech you see and judge whether my crime be so great in looking upon that picture. Then Leonisa taking the case, and opening it, she was extremely surprised, when in lieu of Cleodoras picture, she had found her own. Ah Belesis (said she and blusht) your crime is greater then I thought it: for I cannot think it good you should have my picture: Belesis then fearing she would not restore it, did cunningly catch it out of her hands, before she could hinder him. I humbly ask your pardon Madam, for my incivility (said he unto her) but I am so miserable, that I ought to fear the losse of my only consolation which your rigor hath left me: do not deceive your self (said Leonisa) for it is not my intention to let you have it, nor to expose my self unto the danger of the worlds belief that I gave you the picture. I am not so vain, Madam, replied Belesis, to make my boast of receiving such a favour from you: but you may well think, that man who would so closely conceal a reall favour if he received it, will not falsely report that you gave him this picture: you have not been yet so discreet, replied Leonisa, but I know that you had Cleodoras picture: 'Tis true, answered Belesis, but you know it only by the sister of Hermogenes, who her self had never known it, if I had not been in love with you, for that was the true reason that I became so careless and left it once behinde me; Ah Belesis (said Leonisa, and interrupted him) I will never suffer my picture to remain in the hands of a man, who is used to lose it: hitherto I have not lost it (replied he) have you Cleodoras yet (replied Leonisa) 'tis very true, I have, said he, and under colour of that, I sometimes please my self in looking upon yours, even in her presence: Leonisa then importuned Page 166 him to tell her how he got her picture: And Belesis told her, that understanding she was to have her picture taken to send unto some of her Cozens in the province from whence she came, he suborned the painter and got it from him: afterwards he shew'd her how the case was double, which she did not perceive before, and there she found Cleodoras picture and her own both: So that by this fallacie Belesis did often look upon the picture of his new Mistressse, at the same time when the poor Cleodora thought it had been her own, because she knew the case, and because Belesis did sometimes shew her her own picture purposely, that she might think he looked upon it: For though Belesis was most desperately in love with Leonisa, yet he still feared and respected Cleodora. Leonisa knowing this trick, used all her rhetorique to get her picture out of his hands: but do or say what she could he would not part with it: But being desirous to be as safe as she could, and being also desirous to satisfie her self in one thing which she had much longed to know, and at least to make trial of Belesis his vertue. Truly Belesis (said she unto him after much talke) I cannot beleieve you love me, nor suffer my picture to be in your hands but upon one condition: which is, that you let me have in my keeping all Cleodoras letters unto you, and also her picture; for unlesse you do this, I do protest I shall not beleieve you love me: but shall think that you love Cleodora still, and that you carry my picture but the better to hide hers. All this is so unjust, replied Belesis, that I cannot imagine you should desire I should beleieve you: and truly Cleodora never did me so much honour as to write unto me: as for her picture, 'tis true, I got it by a slight as I did yours, and by consequence I were too simple if I let it passe for a favour; if so, said Leonisa and laughed, me thinks you should not think it strange that I do no more for you then Cleodora did, for I do intend to be no lesse severe then she. But for all that I know you had Cleodoras picture from her own hand, and I know also you received a hundred letters from her: if I had replied Belesis, I beseech you be as kinde as Cleodora was: I shall be what I ought to be, replied she when you have performed the condition which I desire: It is questionlesse my duty to do any thing which you desire (replied Belesis) except such things as may make me lose your esteem: and unto such things Madam, the love I bear you will not permit me to consent unto: and therefore I beseech you Madam take it not ill if I deny your desires; for how should you ever trust my discretion with the least favour; if I should lavishly confesse what Cleodora conferred upon me? it is sufficient Madam, that I forsake her for you without basely betraying her; also I do not think you have well considered what you demand; Really said he and smiled, if you should desire to see Cleodoras letters, and to know how far she favoured me, to the end you might go as far as she. I think I should invent a thousand lies and counterfeit as many letters which might be advantagious to me; but since I know that though I received a thousand reall favours from the greatest beauties in the world, yet you would not be the more favourable to me, therefore I beseech you, move me not to invent false ones; if you would have me relate any passages between Cleodora and me, I beseech you Madam let it be her Rigours and Cruelties, to the end that aggravating the miseries which she hath caused me to suffer, you may resolve to be more milde and sweet, and make me lesse miserable. Examples (replied Leonisa craftily) are things which much moves me, and powerfully workes upon my spirit; and therefore if you tell me only of Cleodoras cruelties, perhaps I shall easily have the same thoughts she had; I know Madam replied Belesis, that you are more reasonable then to do as you speak, or to speak as you do and speak sincerely; but though Cleodora had writ many obliging letters unto me, and though I had them in my keeping, yet I ought not to give them you; A lover doubtlesse ought blindly to obey the person whom he loves, but not, (as I said before) when he exposeth himself to the losse of her esteem; Yet there are some certain things (replied Leonisa) which if a Mistressse desire, and the servant obey, he will merit her affection; and I know not whether what I now desire of you be not in that number; for although I am forced to confesse that it is handsomer to do as you do, then if you did otherwise, yet I must let you know it is not so obliging, since you cannot deny me but for two reasons; the one, because you dare not trust my discretion; the other, because you would perhaps keep your self upon termes to renew love with Cleodora; and which of those towsoever it be, certainly it is not very advantagious for me. I must needs acknowledge, said Belesis, that whatsoever your discretion be I, do not think Page 167 my self obliged to trust you with any thing which might be prejudiciall unto the person whom I once loved, and who did not hate me: For truly if I did, I should give you a very fine example of indiscretion, such a one as I should think that you could not be more discreet then I am, unlesse you give me a just subject of complaint. But Madam, as to what you say, that perhaps I keep Cleodora's letters in my hands, purposely to close with her again; In answer to this Madam, I will tell you, that if you please, I will never speak unto her again, nor ever look upon her: I will go so farre as incivility, if you desire it: but I beseech you, let me not go so farre as treason: yet do not think I beseech you, that I speak thus, because my love to you is not violent enough, for though I do deny what now you do desire of me, yet I offer at the same time to undertake the most difficult enterprizes in the world for your service. At these words Leonisa interrupting him, It is enough, (said she unto him) it is a sufficient trial of your vertue Belesis: But to the end you should not have a lesse good opinion of my vertue, then I have of yours, know, that if you had consented unto what I did so urgently desire, I should never have trusted you with the least favour in the world: But since you have resisted me with so much prudent obstinacie, and denied me the picture of Cleodora, I consent you shall keep mine, though you stole it from me.

At the pronouncing these words Leonisa was silent, and blusht, and I know not whether Belesis was hastier to render thanks then she was to diminish the obliging sence of her language. But he was so ready to apprehend the obligation, that the words no sooner touched his ear, but they reached his heart, and his heart his tongue to thank her. Though you do nothing (said he unto her) but consent unto a thing which you could not hinder me from, yet am I infinitely obliged unto you, for creating it a gift, and not a theft; and I am most certain, I shall finde your Picture more resembling your fair self, since these three or four words which you have spoken in my favour, do so pleasantly sweeten my imagination, that I shall think my self much more happy every time I look upon it: I pray Belesis, said Leonisa, do not give me so many thanks, lest I should think I have granted you too much and repent: then I must shut up my acknowledgments in my heart, said Belesis, and content my self with shewing you, only my Love. After this Leonisa, desired to see her picture, which he presenting unto her; he had as great joy to receive it from the faire hand of his dear Leonisa, as if he had received it from her own gift. But first he observed unto her, by the distinguishment of the claspes, which was on that side where Cleodora's picture was, to the end she might know in opening of the Case, which side hers was on: for though it is not the custome of those that have the pictures of the persons whom they love, to look upon them in their presence, yet it was not so with Belesis, for whether it was Cleodora, or Leonisa that hee loved, he would look upon their pictures with such violent raptures of love, and such private thoughts, as if they were the very substances. Hee was never better pleased, then when he saw Leonisa in a great Closet at her Aunts, where there was on four great Pillars, four great Mirrours of polished steel: which way soever he turned he saw four Leonisa's, and sometimes many more Leonisa's, at least he said so, when he would aggravate his passion: and there also he looked often upon the Picture, though it was in the same Chamber where she was. Thus Sir you see upon what termes Belesis was with Leonisa. In the mean time, the poor Cleodora, thinking that the love of Hermogenes was the true cause of Belesis his manner of behaviour, resolutely determined to entreat him not to see her any more, seeing that all her roughnesse of behaviour would not repulse him. Since she knew he was very wise, and knew most of the passages between Belesis and her: She thought it best to speak unto him in all ingenuous sincerity: so that finding him one day, in her Aunts chamber, as she was busie in talking with others: she began to speak unto him: In the mean time, since she had a long while shunned him, Hermogenes was ravished at the alteration: but his joy was very short; for shee no sooner opened her mouth, but he knew that he should have more cause to complain against Cleodora, then to thank her. I pray you Hermogenes (said she unto him) do not murmur at the request I shall make, and take that confidence which I have in you, for the greatest testimony of my esteem and affection, which you can ever receive from me: For Heavens sake Madam (said Hermogenes) do not ask me any thing that will force me unto a denyall: If I thought I should be denied (said she) I would not ask, but having great confidence in your wisdom, I hope to obtain my request. But Madam, replied Hermogenes, what can you desire more of me, then what I have already given? Page 168 I would desire you, for some urgent considerations which nearly concern me, to forbear either seeing me or speaking unto me: Alas Madam, replied he, you ask me that which is not in my power to grant? But I pray Madam, is this the testimony of that esteem, and affection you spoke of? Doubtlesse it is (replied she) for if it were not, I should have banished you without speaking to you, and therefore me thinks you ought to consent willingly to my desire. If you will banish me, replied he, because the Person that hath Power over you, thinks it not fit, I should have the honour to see you, or because my passion makes too great a noise in the world: I could put a favourable sence of your act, and obey you: But fair Cleodora, I know very well, you only would pack mee away, to admit of Belesis: I crave your pardon Madam, (said he, seeing Cleodora blush at his answer) for taking the freedom to speak with so much sincerity, but yet the lamentable condition wherein I am, might serve, me thinks, for an excuse. Howlever, I must tell you, that though it be onely to recall the happy Belesis that you drive me away, yet you ought to let me love you, and that freely; for Madam, if jealousy do not bring him back, nothing will: Therefore, though you have no consideration of me at all, and though you consider onely your self, yet it is your best course to let mee live with you as formerly. No Hermogenes, replied she, you must not deny me, and therefore content your self that I am not angry at what you say: But I will ingenuously confesse unto you (said she, holding her hand before her eyes, and turning away her head to hide her blushes) that the jealousy of Belesis begins to anger me, especially since it discovers his folly unto some who else would never have known it. I beseech you Madam (said Hermogenes) do not disguise the truth, but consider, that Cleodora being my Mistressse, and Belesis being always my intimate friend, it is not possible but I should a little know how things are: Certainly, replied she, since Belesis is your rival, you cannot be his spie; Belesis carrying himself now, replied Hermogenes, as the lover of Leonisa, and not of Cleodora, I do not resent him as my rival: Howlever it be Hermogenes, replied she, do not deny me in my request, and do not force me to banish you with a noise. But Madam, I beseech you, (replied he) since Belesis is in love with Leonisa, is it not unjust in you to treat Hermogenes thus? Doubtlesse it is not (answered she) for I have such a horror to all men, that your self must needs be included: Revenge is very sweet replied he: I confesse it, replied Cleodora, yet there is no sweetness to be revenged upon ones self by desiring it upon another: And since Hermogenes, you have too many excellent parts, to owe your affection which one hath to you, unto the hatred which one hath against your rival; therefore it were more expedient you looked about for some better fortune: No, no Madam, replied she I am none of those delicate & scrupulous men, who are so precise as to observe which hand it is that gives a present: for so you will love me, I care not whether it be by revenge, or by inclination. However Hermogenes, said Cleodora, I will be obeyed. This is some favour yet, replied he, that you will absolutely command me, after you began with intreaties, 'Tis true, said she, but least you repent, do as I bid you. Hermogenes, seeing with what resolution Cleodora spake, thought it his best course not to resist her: so that to gain a little more time, for the execution of a designe which hee had: he conjured her to allow him six dayes onely to consider; at the end of which time hee would demand one hours audience. Since Cleodora did very much esteem Hermogenes, shee consented unto his desire, and so they parted: Cleodora hoping she had banished Hermogenes, and that Belesis would return unto her: and Hermogenes hoping, that as soon as hee obtained one thing of Belesis, which he intended to ask, he should make Cleodora change her mind. And to that end, he went to look him the very same hour, and as hap was, found him in his chamber: As soon as he saw him, Belesis came to meet him, and gave him many thanks for applying himself so closely unto Cleodora that day, for hee had thereby given him good opportunity to talk with Leonisa, to his exceeding delight. I am extremely joyed, said Hermogenes to him, that I was able to contribute any thing to your felicity: But my dear Belesis (said he unto him, and embraced him) you must do something also, to keep me from being miserable: You need not use any such conjuration, replied Belesis, for can you doubt, but that I will do any thing I can, to serve you? In good earnest Hermogenes your way of proceeding does offend me, since prayers are not to be made unto reall friends: 'Tis doubtlesse enough to let them know we stand in need of them, and that will oblige them to our service: Speak then I conjure you, and tell me quickly what you would have me do for you. You must, since Page 169 you will not have me intreat you, (replied Hermogenes) let Cleodora know that you love her not, and let her also know, that you love Leonisa. Ah Hermogenes, (replied Belesis) it is yet too soon to appear inconstant in the eyes of Cleodora: and why would you have me so soon discover my crime? is it because you are weary of talking so much with her? and does it vex you to be tied too long unto a business which concerns you not? if so, I had rather you would cease seeing her, then to tell her what I would not have her know so soon, and which indeed she will know but too soon. No, no said Hermogenes, you do not understand me: but to explain my words unto you, know cruel friend, that when you shook off the fetters of the fair Cleodora, you enchained me with them: and the truth is, you never loved that fair Person, so well as I love her, nor would I quit her for a thousand of your Leonisas. (How said Belesis in a great astonishment) do you love Cleodora? yes, replied he, I do love her, and thank the gods you love her not, but are in such a condition as to pitie me, and give me leave to do as I desire of you. Belesis seeing Hermogenes was serious, did not question the truth of his words, but the strangeness of the matter was, he was so surprised at them, that he walked up and down the chamber, and could not speak a word: so that Hermogenes wondering to see him so amazed, importuned him still to let his inconstancy be known unto Cleodora. For truly, said he unto him, if you will for my sake permit it; you will be a gainer by it as well as my self, since if Cleodora do not pretend any thing unto your affection, she will not then torment you, as she doth. Though her affection, replied he, will not torment me, yet her hatred will; therefore I intreat you heartily, not to tell her positively that I do not love her: and it will also reflect something upon Leonisa, and consequently it will augment your miseries, and not lessen mine. For I cannot see what advantage you can draw unto your self by letting Cleodora know that I am in Love with Leonisa. Since I must tell you, replied he, know that it is because Cleodora (who thinks you jealous of me, and who thinks you counterfeit love to Leonisa, to spite her) loves you a thousand times better then she should: so that my affection to her cannot have any influence upon her heart, unless I can expel you out of it: move her to hate me if you can, because she loves you (replied Belesis) but I beseech you do not endeavour to make her love you, because she hates me: me thinks (said Hermogenes and smiled) this is too much fantastical nicenesse, for you do either love Leonisa, or you Love her not: if you do not love her, then you ought to tell me positively, that you love Cleodora still, and that you are my enemy, because you are my Rival. But if on the contrary you do love Leonisa, I do not see any reason why you should not permit me to tell Cleodora, that which will advance me, and free you from her affection for I am fully perswaded, that though it be onely to revenge her self, she will treat me much better. However, not to dissemble with you, let me tell you truly, that if you do not consent unto this request, know, it is her will, I should neither love her, speak to her, nor see her any more: and then he told Belesis all the passages betwixt Cleodora, and himself; Whilst he was telling him the story, he observed a strange agitation in his minde, though he could not well conceive the reason, unless it was his shame to be known so inconst <...> But so it is (said he after he had related all unto him) that Cleodora will certainly ere long know you love her not, and that you love Leonisa; and since so, is it not much better she knew it now, when some advantage may be gotten by it, then to stay till none can be reaped by the knowledge of it? The more you hide your crime, the more Criminal you will appear: and therefore I conjure you let me endeavour to obtain that which you would willingly part with: Consider, that you have no reason to denie me, because you are the cause that I love her, since it was for your sake I undertook such familiarity with her: I saw her long before you, and never loved her, and certainly, so I should have done all my life: but since onely in your behalf, and for no interest of my own, I was so complacential as to see her, and am desperately in love with her, me thinks it is but just, you should contribute all you can to cure that wound which you have caused. I wish I could, (replied Belesis much amazed) But I must confesse unto you, I cannot so far prevaile with my self, as to suffer you should discover my Crime unto Cleodora, moreover I beseech you consider that since I am not upon absolute good terms with Leonisa, Cleodora when she knows the truth, will in a probability do me a thousand ill offices unto Leonisa; and therefore, though I should give way unto your desires, it should not be till I had absolutely gained, Page 170 the heart of Leonisa. But whilst you are obtaining that victory, replied Hermogenes, what would you have become of me? for Cleodora within this six dayes will neither let me speak unto her, nor see her again: Consider I beseech you, what you would do if the case were your own: I know not, replied Belesis, but I am sure I cannot consent you should discover my Crime unto Cleodora. But why I pray you, did you fall in love with her? did you not lay to heart what I told you of her humours? why were not you wise by my woes, and let her alone; Believe me, it were Prudence in you in lue of endeavouring to win her heart, to disengage your own from such a sad service: for the more in favour you are with Cleodora, the more unquiet shall your soul be: and therefore though it were onely in Consideration of your self, I ought to deny you what you desire in this business: No, no Belesis, said he, we ought not to serve our friends according to our own Palats, but according unto theirs: and when I first dissembled to be in love with Cleodora, I did not reason with you, so wisely as you with me, though perhaps, I had more cause then you have. However since at your desire in feigning love to Cleodora, I became really in love with her, I cannot see why you should so obstinately deny my request. But Hermogenes with all his Rhetorick could not perswade Belesis to consent. And Belesis having no good reasons wherewith to Colour his denial employed his Prayers, and in all Zeal intreated him not to tell Cleodora that he did not love her, but loved Leonisa. After this Contest had lasted a long while, these two friends parted, both complaining one against the other: 'Tis true, yet there was no bitterness in their complaints, but they spoke to each other as if they hoped still to perswade; but after they were parted, they did more sharply resent the bitter Consequences of the business. Hermogenes was so sunk with sorrow, that Belesis had refused to assist him in his service of Cleodora, that he came in lamentable dejection unto me, to relate the Passage, aggravating the injustice of Belesis his denial in such Language, as made the vehemency of his Passion appear plainly unto me: but that I should not be ignorant in any circumstance which was related unto either of them, the next morning Belesis knowing I was an indifferent friend unto them both, came and acquainted me with the passage also, and desired me that I would keep Hermogenes from telling Cleodora how he deluded her. So that I being the confidant of them both, I made use of that knowledge I had of their real thoughts, to keep them from falling out, and did so temper their spirits, that they complained against each other, in a much more civil manner. Yet the business could not stand long upon these terms, as you shall presently know. In the mean while Belesis was not a little perplexed when he went unto the Aunts of Cleodora, and Leonisa: for when he talked not unto the last of these, he was not pleased: and when Hermogenes talked with Cleodora, he was not able to endure it, imagining alwayes that notwithstanding all his prayers, he was discovering his inconstancy unto her: so that to deliver that inconvenience, he would often times leave Leonisa, and come to interrupt Hermogenes and Cleodora, intruding himself into their discourse, and excusing himself afterwards to Leonisa, as well as he could. Cleodora for her part seeing Belesis was so troubled and unquiet, and that yet he spake more unto her then he used, did interpret all his inquietudes unto her own advantage <◇> thought him to be still in love with her. On the other side, Hermogenes, told Cleodora in a low voice, that if eiver she would reduce Belesis, she must not banish Hermogenes, but as for Leonisa, she knew not what to think, but upon the perplexities of Belesis, she endeavoured to keep that which she had caused Cleodora to lose. The truth is Sir, I saw that at this time, which I assure you I never in my life saw before, and perhaps shall never see again: <◇> , a man to be jealous and not in love, since certainly Belesis did for some dayes behave himself both to Cleodora and Hermogenes, as if he did not love the one, but as if he were the Rival of the other: to wit, with many Perplexities, many alterations of Countenance, and with the very same impatiencies, that jealousy is used to infuse into those whom it most torments. In the mean time, he alwayes said that he did not Love Cleodora, and that he was desperately in love with Leonisa, I have heard say (said I unto him one evening when I was speaking unto him concerning his intimate thoughts) that it is not easy to be long in love without a little jealousy but I never thought it possible to be jealous, unless one were in love; And yet I see you behave your self as if you were; For truly you cannot endure Hermogenes should talk in private with Cleodora you interrupt their discourse as much as you can and Page 171 when you cannot, you look upon them as if you would look through their hearts, and guess their thoughts; and then you are so transported, that you never look upon Leonisa, though you are deeply in love with her: What would you have me do? (said he to me) I would have you hearken unto reason (answered I) and since you are not in love with Cleodora, not to hinder Hermogenes, but permit him to do whatsoever will be advantageous to him: No, no Alcenor, said he, I cannot prevail so far with my self: and there is such a fatal fantasticalnesse upon me that I cannot endure neither that Hermogenes should tell Cleodora I betrayed her, nor that he should love her, or be loved: I value not me thinks if a hundred others love her, but I cannot endure Hermogenes should: yet you are more obliged to endure him then any other, replied I, for he is more your friend then any other: 'Tis very true, replied Belesis, and if you did but know how much I am ashamed of my folly, you would Pitie me in the mean time it is so predominate, that I can ever return absolutely unto Cleodora, nor allow Hermogenes to love her, nor can I never forsake Leonisa. As we were discoursing thus together; Hermogenes came in, who in my presence spake as obligingly unto Belesis as possibly could be: He told him that his six dayes would expire that night, and that he came once more to solicit him for a consent unto what he formerly desired. Moreover I have one thing to tell you said he, before you give me my last denial, which is, that if you will repent of your fault, and quit Leonisa and return unto Cleodora, and become as faithful as you have been inconstant: I promise you, to cease my sure, and never to discover your Crime, protesting unto you that I will not onely leave Cleodora, but Susa also: but then I expect, that if it be so, you will love Leonisa still, and by consequence not pretend any thing unto Cleodora: I expect I say, you should assist me, and no longer oppose my desire. All that you say, is full of reason, replied Belesis, so that I am infinitely ashamed to return such an extravagant answer: But Hermogenes, if you love me you will pitie the imperfections of your friend, and excuse me if I denie you, and confesse that I cannot receive a more sensible displeasure then to see you love Cleodora, though I Love Leonisa, I know very well that it is extream folly to speak thus: But it must be you Hermogenes, who are wiser then I am, that must connive at my weakness: it was you that brought me to Susa, and caused all my miseries, and therefore it must be you that must comfort me. 'Tis true replied Hermogenes, I did bring you to Susa: but it was you first who brought me in love with Cleodora, and by Consequence it is our parts to comfort one another. After this, I took upon me to talk unto them both, but all to no purpose, and thus we all parted without any conclusion at all. And certainly it was very happy Belesis did not lodge neer Hermogenes, as he did when he came first to Susa: for if they had, matters might have been worse betwixt them. In the mean time, the poor Hermogenes was in a sad condition, because Cleodora observing the inquietudes of Belesis, and thinking he suffered them for the love of her, she resolved to banish Hermogenes; So that the six dayes which she gave him, being expired, she prepared her self for that hour of audience which he asked, and she promised, and taking hold of the opportunity in her Aunts chamber, they went both to a window, far enough from the rest of the company, to talk, and not be understood; Therefore Cleodora began to conjure him not to speak unto her any more, but by degrees to withdraw himself from coming to her. However Madam, said he unto her, you will confesse that it is for Belesis his sake that you banish me; and that if he were not in love with you, you would not banish me; Cleodora thinking that Hermogenes would be better satisfied if she spoke sincerely unto him, then if she should dissemble a truth which he was not ignorant of, told him in very obliging language, that it was very true, she desired to take from Belesis all causes of jealousy, and all complaints against her: assuring him, that if she had not some compassion upon Belesis, she would never deprive her self of his company, but should desire him to regulate that affection which he said he bore her. Hermogenes hearing Cleodora speak with more mildness than one that had any mind to banish another, or absolutely disoblige him, did believe, that if she knew of Belesis his inconstancy, perhaps he might possess that place which this inconstant man enjoyed in the heart of this Lady: so that being prompted unto it by the excess of his love, and perceiving that he must either quit Cleodora, or undeceive her in her belief that she had of Belesis his loving her, began to think of changing the sentence of his death: since he did extremely Love Belesis, he was extremely unwilling to tell her what he knew but Page 172 since it concerned the chief felicity of his life: and love surmounting all laws of friendship, his spirits began to be exasperated against Belesis. Whilst Hermogenes was thinking what to do, Cleodora looked upon him, imagining that the many alterations in his countenance, were caused only because of his sorrows, that he was not to speak unto her as he was used: but at last Hermogenes prevailing with himself: the gods are my witnesses Madam, (said he unto her) what an extreme unwillingness is in me, to ease my soul of those miseries which oppress it, by telling one thing which doubtless will much trouble you, and which is far from pleasing me. For the melancholy which I shall see in your faire eyes, when you shall understand, that Belesis is unworthy of those honours you do him, will infinitely grieve me. But Madam, though I should not attempt to revoke that fatal sentence, which you have pronounced against me; yet in consideration of your own interest, I think my self obliged to discover unto you, what I know: for I am fully perswaded, that when a Mistress, and a friend are in the scales, the weights are much uneven. Nor is it in my choice to deliberate, since as the state of my case stands, I must tell you that Belesis is an unconstant man: that his jealousy is counterfeit, and that he is in love with Leonisa. At the first Cleodora did not believe Hermogenes, but thought that all he told her, was his own invention: But since there is nothing more easy, then to infuse mistrust into an amorous mind, she no sooner had told Hermogenes, that she gave no credit unto his words: but she began insensibly to be jealous, and asked him upon what conjectures he grounded his belief? So that by little and little, and hardly knowing what she said, she asked Hermogenes of more things then he knew of: and also he told her more, then she desired to know: yet since there still remained some kind of doubts in her; Hermogenes told her, that to clear them all, she should get her picture out of Belesis his hands, and there she might see Leonisas also; Ah Hermogenes, said Cleodora: could I but see that, I should extremely hate Belesis: and certainly you may see it, replied he, if you go handsomly about it: but alas Madam, said he, it will not be enough to hate Belesis, unless you love Hermogenes: I assure you, said she unto him, if this you tell me be true, I shall not easily love any: and I shall so hate my self, that I shall not be in any disposition to love others, since to speak truly, none ever loves, but for love of themselves: but however I assure you, that I shall think my self eternally obliged unto you, for discovering the perfidiousness of Belesis to me. As she spoke these last words, Belesis entered, who seeing Hermogenes and Cleodora, separated from the company, went towards them, to interrupt their discourse; though Leonisa was in the same chamber. In going thither, his mind began to change, because he feared Hermogenes had already discovered his crime: yet since he had already stepped a pace forward, he went on, with a spirit so full of turbulency, as plainly told Cleodora, his mind was unquiet. On the other side, this Lady was not a little troubled, in dissembling her thoughts: But since there was a necessity in it, to the end she might clear all her doubts, she forced her self extremely, to speak unto Belesis as she used to do: yet she received him with a constrained civility, so as Belesis was much perplexed at it, not knowing whether it was an effect of her knowing his crime or that it was only to spite him: Hermogenes also was so damped, that he durst hardly look upon Belesis, and therefore it was not strange, that these three persons could not endure to be together, but came unto the rest of the company, as soon as they had done their first complements. In the mean while Leonisa seeing Belesis enter, turned her head continually, to observe whether he spake unto Cleodora: but since she saw, he said almost nothing, but that they all came towards her, the little spite she had against him diminished: yet for all that, she thought to be revenged, and was so, immediately after for Sir, you must know, that Belesis at his first coming into the chamber, did chuse rather to address himself unto Cleodora, then unto Leonisa, because she was alone with Hermogenes, and he no sooner saw that they were separated, and joyned to the rest of the company, but he addressed himself unto Leonisa; who to be revenged as I said before, did receive him with such a cold look, as did little comfort him, in his secret sorrows: for turning her self presently towards Tisias, she taught Belesis by experience, what it was to prefer another before himself, and he could not get her to speak one word unto him all that day: but whilst Leonisa was revenging her self in this manner, Cleodora was full of impatient desires, to be clearly resolved of every thing which Page 173 Hermogenes told her, and moved the company, to go and walk by the river, which runnes by Susa: for she had no mind to walk in the common walks, because then she could not so conveniently talk with Belesis, as she desired: since Tisias was with Leonisa, and being of the most considerable quality in all Susa, none did dispute with him for the place he would take, and therefore he led Leonisa to the Coach, and afterwards by the rivers side, to which all the company being come, they walked on foot in a great meadow, where there were many willows growing by the river side: Belesis seeing that he could not walk with Leonisa, and being desirous to hinder Hermogenes from presenting his hand unto Cleodora, he addressed himself unto her, though not with the same Aire, he was accustomed before he loved Leonisa: Cleodora spoke to him with much civility and sweetness, insomuch as Belesis assured himself, Hermogenes had not yet discovered his crime, and considering with himself, how Cleodora always loved him very dearly, his soul was stung with extreme remorse, for betraying so faire, so sweet a Lady: Not but that he did still turn his head continually towards Leonisa, to see how Tisias courted her; and it was apparent, that his heart was pitifully torne in pieces. In the mean time Cleodora, who had a secret designe in it, did so order her pace, whether Belesis would or no, that they were separated from the rest of the company, taking a little path neerer the river side, to the end, as she said, she might walk more under the shadow of the willows: after they had walked a while, Cleodora seeming to look upon the river that was very calme and smooth, and would needs look upon her self in it: Ah Belesis, said she, I should think my glasse to be a very bad one, or else I look very ill of late, yet I see it is not, for this river flatters no more then it: Belesis not suspecting her designe, did contradict her, and said she never looked more faire; thinking that she said so only to move him not to consent unto her. Belesis therefore told her, he saw none more faire, since the first day he came to Susa: yet I have been very ill, and much altered since then, replied she, and I am confident that if you will look upon my picture, it will accuse you of flattery, and make my alteration evidently appeare. To shew you (said he to the end she might not see it, lest she should see Leonisa's also) that I think you fairer then your picture, I will not look upon it now in your presence, because I had much rather look upon you, then it: setting flattery aside, said Cleodora, I pray you let me see it: I would gladly let you see what wrong you do your self, (said he unto her) in speaking so ill of your beauty, but I am so unfortunate, as I left it this morning in my cabinet, and forgot it: in saying so Belesis blusht, and so did Cleodora also, for she knew well, he spoke not truly: but to excuse the disorder that appeared in her face: I would not have given you my picture (replied Cleodora) to lock it up in your Cabinet, and forget me; Oh Madam (said Belesis unto her, extremely non-plust) I beseech you condemne me not, for so ill expressing my self: for it was not my intention, to say that I forgot it, but that without any intention, I left it in my cabinet: However it be, (said she) I would not have given you it for that, yet I pray you let me see it as soon as you can, and look well whether or no, you left it there; for since you tell me, you left it there, and never thought of it, perhaps without thinking of it, you have it about you: Belesis refused a long time to look for it, saying that he knew that he had it not about him: but at last, lest Cleodora should suspect him; he seemed to look whether or no he was deceived, and to that end he looked amongst many papers, and other things which he carried about him, having a great care not to put out that which he would not have her see. But as ill luck for him was, the clasps of his table book, caught hold of the clasp of the case, of the picture, and drew it out: so that Cleodora no sooner saw it, but she took it, before Belesis could hinder her; Cleodora had no sooner this picture, but fearing that Belesis would take it from her, she put it in her pocket; afterwards, turning towards him, hereafter, (said she, and seeming as if she did not think he told a lie) trust not too much to your memory. In the mean time, Belesis was extremely perplexed: for although he did not think, that Cleodora knew Leonisa's picture was in that case, as well as her own: yet he knew, that if it remained long in her hands, she would see it: And therefore it was made of such a fashion, that it was very hard for those that knew it not, to perceive that it opened at both sides, yet he thought, that Cleodora being suspitious, and witty, would easily finde it out, if she had any long time to consider it. And therefore he began to conjure her, to restore it presently, but durst Page 174 not for his life have recourse unto any force, against one to whom he owed so much respect: Madam, said he unto her, you asked me your picture, to see whether you were fairer then it, and to do Justice in restoring it againe the same hour: I will look upon it said she, when I am with my glasse: But Madam, said he, how do you think it possible, I should be all the rest of the day without it? Since you see the Person, whom it personates, (replied she with a crafty smile) you need not regret the want of the picture: promise me then I beseech you, replied he, that you will restore it before we part; perhaps I shall restore it to morrow, said she at least I will intreat you to come unto my chamber, and see the difference, betwixt my picture, and my self: After this Belesis used a hundred conjurations, and began to be very angry in his language: also he was very nigh; steeping his words in his tears: but at last he was forced to be silent, for Cleodora brought him into the company again, so that he could not talke any longer in private together: and to take all occasion of it from him, she went unto Leonisa, and parted not from her all the rest of the day: You may imagine Sr. how Belesis fretted, and how impatient Cleodora was to be in such a place where she might see whether all Hermogenes told her was truth: She did fit so upon thornes, that she complained it was grown late, to the end she might the sooner induce them homeward: on the contrary Belesis thinking to finde some remedy for the discovery which he feared, or at least finding some consolation in deferring it, did all he could to spin out time, telling Cleodora she was not very full of complacency, in desiring so much good company should be deprived of so much pleasure for her sake: but say what he could, they went home betimes: Yet his hope was, that when he came to her house, he might perhaps wait upon her to her chamber, and there importune her to restore the picture, but she very cunningly stayed in her Aunts chamber untill he was gone: and as soon as ever that was, she went into her closet, and shut her self up, and very hastily opened the case, where at first she found only her own picture: But since Hermogenes told her that the case was double, she begun to consider it very attentively: and looked upon it a long while, turning it on every side, that at last she found the way to open it, and presently found the picture of Leonisa: As soon as ever she saw it, she let it fall from her hand, Then taking it up, she looked upon it again: after which, throwing it upon the table with as much anger as sorrow: Ah Hermogenes cryed she out: all is but too true: but I wish it were not; well perfidious Belesis, hast thou betrayed me, and become inconstant? well, well, Leonisa, added she, did you come unto Susa, to make me the most miserable woman in the world? And you Hermogenes, did you only love me to acquaint me with the cheat of your friend? But what good can Belesis, Leonisa and Hermogenes get, by the miseries which I endure? since it is my self whom I ought to accuse for all my disasters. For indeed (added she, and addressed her speech as unto a third person) to what end is it, that she is so curious in the choice of her friends, since she is so ill a chuser of her lover? she could never endure above four or five in all the world, and out of that number she hath preferred one before the rest, and it is very he, that hath betrayed and forsaken her, she I say, who forsooke all the world for Belesis: she changed her own humours for him, and was neither choleric or imperious, yet he hath forsaken her, when she was most favourable unto him: Doubtlesse, said she, I must now treat him, as they use to do slaves and spaniels that are better for beating and ill usage; or to expresse my self a little better, I must neither be milde nor severe unto him, but for my own quiet sake, I must not see him at all: But alas it is but too true, that I have seen him; I have esteemed him, and I have loved him: Yet I am fully resolved, never to see him again in private, but once, and that shall be, to chide him for his perfidie, and I am most certain I shall never esteem him again. But for all my wise resolutions, said she and sighed, I cannot tell whether I can never love him again; me thinks I am fuller of sorrow and anger then I am of hatred: and me thinks I cannot chuse but wish he would repent; But I am resolved though he should repent, yet never to pardon him, but to be revenged both upon him for his crime, and upon my self for my folly: After this, Cleodora told me, that she spoke a hundred things more, which she could not well remember: and that she fixed upon a hundred severall resolutions contrary to one another, and that her mind was full of all, that love, hatred, anger, and jealousy could in the most violent manner inspire into her: And was so long in discourse with her selfe, that Page 175 her women were constrained to come & tell her it was very late, and that if she would sleep before it was day, she must go to bed quickly. Cleodora desiring to conceal her perplexities, took up the picture which she threw upon the table with much violence, and went to bed: but assured me that she never closed her eyes all that night; but after she had well thought upon what course to take, she resolved to employ all her wits to make Belesis and Leonisa fall out, and to make a way for Tisias to marry her: Yet since she could not bring this to passe by her self, but did stand in need of the help of Hermogenes, who could easily help on her designe, she resolved to endure him, and make him the confident of her revenge. Since she was one of an arrogant spirit, she had an apprehension that none could observe by her eyes that she had been crying, or that she wanted sleep: so that before the sun appeared, she wiped up all her tears, and shut up all her sighs, and did strive to set a glosse of that tranquility upon her face which was far from her heart: she would needs be dressed better then the day before, thinking her dresse would add gaynesse unto her looks; After that she had taken all possible care to hide her melancholy, she went from her own chamber to Leonisas, which was not far off, but since this Lady did not rise so soon as Cleodora, she was not yet ready; and not knowing why or what her businesse was, she did chide her for being so early, and earnestly asked the reason; for truly said she unto her, I did not think to see you so early, and so fine to day, (adding and laughing) that surely she intended to make some new conquest at the Temple, and told her it was prophane to have any such thoughts, and that therefore, she was too early up, though her complexion was as fresh, and eyes as sparkling, as if she had slept ten hours; Yet it is so early, said she unto her, that before we go unto the Temple, halfe the curls of your hair would be out, and hang down negligently. I assure you, replied Cleodora, with a blithnesse which was not very naturall, if I can but please you to day, I shall think the time employed in my dresse to be well bestowed. As for any conquest, my dear Cosen, I protest they are far from my thoughts, since if I should make any, I should endeavour to lose them again; After this, these two fair ones talked of a hundred such things as these, whilst Leonisa was dressing her self; and when she was ready, Cleodora assuming a more serious countenance, and having a minde to be revenged upon Belesis, I am very sorry said she unto her, that I am forced to give you any such testimony of my love, as will not be agreeable to your liking; and to reveal a secret unto you which perhaps you will not give me any thanks for, but since I am perswaded it is fit to be done, I am resolved upon it, entreating you first to beleieve, that I have no intention to finde that which I would advise you to lose. There is so much obscurity in your words, replied Leonisa, that I cannot make any answer, all that I can say is, that I am most willing to put a favourable construction upon any thing you shall say, and thankfully acknowledge any confidence you shall put in me; if so replied Cleodora, I shall confesse unto you, (though I cannot with|out a blush) that long before you came to Susa, Belesis did court me, and if I durst say it, did love me; but loved me in such a manner a• made too great a noise in the world; so that to hinder him from doing many things which might be prejudiciall unto me, I was forced to be a little lesse severe towards him then otherwise I should; Then did I suffer him to tell me sometimes that he loved me, lest be should otherwise •la• it unto others; so that having some esteem of Belesis, and slightly acknowledging the affection he had to me, I behaved my self with much confidence towards him. This was the state of things, my dear Leonisa when you came first hither• But since love is a passion which is hard to be hid, I confesse I was afraid lest you should per|ceive the love which Belesis profes•ed unto me; for since I never saw you since you were five years old, I had not experience enough in you to make you my confident: so that I hope in reason it will not offend you that I did at that time mis|trust you, and to tell you truly, since you had never been at Court, I thought you would interpret things of this nature as crimes, and that perhaps you knew not how to distinguish between an innocent passion and an unlawfull affection: So that extremely fearing you should discover the correspondency between Belesis and my self, I told him that I would not expose my self unto that hazard, and willed him never to <◇> in private with me before you, no inso much as to look upon me when you were pre|sent: For though I knew you not, yet I observed in you a notable spirit, which made me fear you: I being thus full of unquiet thoughts, add not effecting B <...> sis so Page 176 much as he did me: I absolutely told him, that I would not live in such continuall ap|prehensions of fear; and he seeing I was almost resolved to break off with him, rather then you should come to know the intelligence between us; he proposed (for the setting of my minde in quiet, and to hinder you from discovering the truth) that I would permit him to dissemble a love unto you: and I, not loving you then, as now I do, consented unto his proposition: Conceiving it would be matter of great joy unto a young fresh come Lady to think she had captivated the heart of such a gallant man as Belesis. I assure you (said Leonisa, and blushed, denying only she was deceived) Belesis hath very ill acquitted himself of his negotiation, for he never told me that he loved me, but I very well perceived that he loved you: Fie, fie, Leonisa (said Cleodora very subtilly) never deny it unto me, for I know it as well as your self; only pardon me I beseech you for consenting unto Belesis in that cheat which Belesis put upon you. But to shew you I had no intention it should go so far: You must lend me a patient hearing: and I shall tell you, that in consenting to his propo|sition, I declared unto him, that I would only have him addresse him in complements of Courtship and Gallantry: and not seem to engage himself in good earnest, for that would not be only a simple cheat, but a horrible Treachery which I would never con|sent unto: he promised me as much as I desired, and since that, my minde hath been in some serenity, knowing that you would imagine his affection was to you, and by consequence never suspect he loved me: At first I was used to ask him what he said unto you, and what you answered, but afterwards I gave over and enquired no more. Having since that observed, that he addressed himself with a strange assiduity unto you, I must needs confesse my dear Leonisa that your fair eyes struck a terror in|to me, and I feared his fiction was turned earnest: Then I resolved to tell Belesis of it, who swore a thousand oaths unto me, that he never loved you one minuite, and the more forcibly to perswade me, he offered never to speak unto you again. And that he would put into my hands all that ever he had of yours, even your picture: in saying so Cleodora did shew her picture unto Leonisa: I cannot represent unto you Sir, the astonishment of this Lady: for I have heard her self say, that her spirits were never in her life so troubled as then. Ah Cleodora, (cried Leonisa) I never gave Belesis, my picture, I will beleieve you replied she, but he told me you did, and that which makes me sooner beleieve you is, because I never gave him mine: and yet he told me, replied Leonisa, that your own hand did give it him and he did not only tell me, but I think he told Hermogenes as much, for I have heard his sister say so: However it be, said Cleodora, I thought my self obliged, to remedy the wrong I did, and undeceive you. But to let you see (said she unto her) that in discovering this truth unto you, I do it not out of any jealousie, let me tell you that my minde does so disgust the proceedings of Belesis, that I am absolutely resolved to break off with him, and the sooner because I have credible information, that he holds a secret correspondency with a Lady of the best quality in all Susa. Therefore if you will be|leieve me, and the advice of her who first consented to delude you, you shall absolutely reject him as I do, and let both resolve never to see him again: I know that if I should looke upon the matter as I might, I had some reason to complain against you, since your own words did signifie you beleieved that I loved Belesis, and yet for all, that you did as much as was in your power to engage him unto a love of you: but it was I who committed the first fault, and therefore will pardon you the second; offering my assistance to revenge your self upon Belesis, better then you your self can without me. Leonisa hearing Cleodora, say so, knew not what to think, nor could she doubt her words, because she found so much probability in them: So that her anger against Belesis for deceiving her did so exasperate her spirits; that she was not at all angry with Cleodora, but did very easily pardon her: After which, being very forward to incense her against Belesis, and told her all his passionate and obliging exp|pressions unto her: But since this was a better story to tell Cleodora wherewith to incense her: She told her another which was much sweeter: for as she told her how she beleieved that Belesis loved her, yet I know (said she unto her) that I was much too blame in suspecting it, for when I importuned him one day to let me have your picture and all your letters, the wicked man made his deniall of them, pass in my conceit for an effect of his discretion and virtue, and I had that day so good an opinion of him for it, that I shewed him more favour then ever I did since I knew Page 177 him: Thus Sir, the poor Leonisa, did second the designe of Cleodora to be revenged upon Belesis: yet Cleodora was not sorry that Belesis had so much respect of her as not to give her letters unto Leonisa: But he was so culpable so many other wayes that this did not make her change her designe, and shee still looked upon him as a man who was naturally very discreet, but yet very inconstant: Then she began to flatter Leonisa, and to confirme her in their resolution of banishing Belesis, seeking out for handsome pretences to move their Aunt not to take it ill. In the mean time, since Leonisa's soul was not strong enough to dissemble sorrow that day, she desired Cleodora to say she was not well, and that none could see her, and indeed shee went unto Bed, the better to hide those tears, which perhaps she could not hold: After which, Cleodora went unto the Temple, waiting for the afternoon with much impatience; for shee imagined, that Belesis would not fail to visit her in her chamber: yet hee came not so soon as she hoped, for hee apprehended that shee could not find out Leonisa's Picture, and therefore it was late before hee came to see Cleodora: and at last hee went, but it was with such thoughts as himself did not well know what they were: for as hee earnestly desired that Cleodora would not love Hermogenes, yet hee was still as deep in love with Leonisa as ever hee was, though hee bore much respect unto Cleodora. But for all those respects hee was extremely afraid, that she should know his crime, not out of any resentments of love, but of honour.

Thus being very unquiet in his thoughts, and fearing also that Leonisa should know he had talked so long with Cleodora the day before, and that he should go into Cle|odora's chamber before hers, he appeared before Cleodora very reserved and melancholy. As for her, since she hoped, that Leonisa did resolve upon a revenge, her face was full of joy, which raised a great confidence in him, thinking that if Cleodora had seen the picture of Leonisa, she would not have been so pleasant: Well Madam, (said he unto her) have you not found your self far fairer then your picture? hath not your glasse convinced you of an error? and are you not clearly of my opinion, that you are infi|nitely fairer then your picture? I know not whether you were in the right, or the wrong, in telling me so (said she unto him) but I am sure there is one in that Case which I took from you, whom you think farre fairer then mine, or my self either. In saying so, Cleodora blusht for anger, and Belesis grew pale with fear and astonishment: he had not power to open his mouth: so that Cleodora, seeing he spoke not: You do very well Belesis, said she unto him, you do very well, not to go about to excuse your self; for you would do it so scurvily, that you would but augment my anger. I know Ma|dam, (said he then unto her) that you have reason to think me culpable, since you have seen the picture of Leonisa: and I know, said she, that you can never perswade me to the contrary: for to spare you the labour of giving any scurvy reasons, or in|venting any lies, I know all the passages betwixt Leonisa and your self: you cannot tell me a word which I do not know, either from her self, or her confident which hath betrayed her: and I remember all that you have done against me also; and after all this, I pray, judge what thoughts I ought to have of you, and whether I have not reason to slight you so far as to hate you extremely: but yet notwithstanding, I cannot hate you without an Epithite, and therefore let me repeat it, and tell you, that I do most horridly hate you: I cannot endure the very sight of you: not onely as you are an inconstant man, which is an imperfection farre below a generous spirit, but because you are a close sinner, and would have concealed your inconstancy, in faining to be jealous, and so would have smeared me with your own crime. Pray Madam (said be unto her) why did you treat me so long, so cruelly? and why did you make me so mi|serable, that I was forced to make you jealous, and faigne to be so of you, thereby to obtain your love? Fie, fie Belesis (said she unto him) do not still dissemble the mat|ter, you did really love Leonisa, and never thought I loved Hermogenes. I know not, said he, whether I thought it; but I am sure I feared it extremely, and I would have done any thing to hinder him from being in your favour. Your language is so extra|vagant (said she unto him in great anger) that I cannot endure you should be a minute longer with me: But since it is the last time of all my life that ever I will speak unto you, I shall be glad to know what were your motives, and reasons of your change: for before ever Leonisa came to Susa, you saw there a thousand fairer then my self, or her either; yet you did not quit me for any of them: nor can it be my feverity which tired your patience, since when I was rigorous you loved•me, and when I was otherwise, Page 178 then you changed your thoughts: Nor could it be any of my favours which could glut your love, for thanks be to the gods, I did never load you with them: what then may be the cause of your inconstancy? Am I more stupid then I was? or of a more un|pleasing humour? Speak then Belesis, but speak to me as if I were not Cleodora, and tell me exactly, how came Leonisa to chase me out of your heart: for I should be glad to know whether I was violently thrust out, or came out with your good-will: whether it was through your own weakness, or my fault? Belesis being so extremely importuned by Cleodora, knew not well what to answer: for he was so horridly ashamed of his inconstancy, he could not for his heart confesse it: on the other side, he saw that he could not deny it: and that though he should seem to repent, and Cleodora inclinable to pardon him, yet it would be upon condition to forsake Leonisa, which he could not do: so that not knowing what answer to returne, he spake so ambiguously, that Cle|odora was almost as angry at it, as at his inconstancy: Sincerity (said she) is a thing which every one may have: I will beleieve then, that you cannot love me, and that you cannot but love Leonisa; all this is honest: But could you not confesse the truth unto me, and not adde a crime unto your imbecillity? What would you have me say Madam (replied Belesis) since at this present I know not what to think? I confesse that I have loved you more then I do, but you your self is the cause I do not love you as well as I did: since in the very heat of my passion, you put my patience to such rig|id triall, as any other besides my self would have hated you. Then it seems, (said Cle|odora sharply) according to your sence, that I am obliged unto you for passing from love onely into indifferency? But know, (weak and unconstant man) that indifferency amongst persons that once loved dearly, is much more offensive then hatred, and therefore I ought to hate you more, because you did not hate me: But alas Madam, replied Belesis, would you have me sincere, when as my sincerity does onely incense you more? Yet I should be glad you were, replied she, for I would know any thing that would not be advantageous unto you. All that I can do at this present (said he unto her) is to assure you that I never fail'd in my due respects of you, nor spoke one word against you to Leonisa, but I denied her your picture, therefore I conjure you, as you are generous, not to use hers ill. I understand you very well (said she unto him) you would have me restore it unto you: but since it will be more acceptable to receive it from her hand then from mine, I will restore it unto her, that she may give it you the second time. Oh I beseech you Madam, said he unto her, do not offer such a sensible displeasure unto a Lady who is not at all culpable: For suppose me to be an unconstant man, one that hath forsaken you, and betrayed you; yet Leonisa hath no other share in my crimes but in suffering me to see her. However it be, said Cleodora, it shall be as I say. I see then Madam, replied he, that you onely seek a pretence for doing mee an ill office unto Leonisa: But Madam, though you think I do not love you, yet I must needs interest my self in any thing which concerns you, when I see you are so ravished with joy that you can accuse me of inconstancy, lest I should tell you that Hermogenes hath made you an infidell. I would not advise you (said she unto him) to make use of any such ill policie, for it will not avail you; In the mean time, since you will have me know your reall thoughts, I must tell you mine: Know then, that it is impossible any should have more horrid hatred, then I have of your inconstancy; nor lesse regret for losing that which is so easily lost. After this, pray go and seek for some crums of comfort from Leonisa, after you have been a whole long night without her picture: neither is she well, and did bid me tell every one that they should not visit her this day: but since perhaps you have some peculiar priviledge, you may chance to see her: In the mean time, I pray prepare your self to go any whither, so it be out of my sight, for I have so much credit with my Aunt, as I can obtain from her you shall not have the liberty to look into her house: without doubt the reason is (replied Belesis, not well knowing what he said) because you would have a handsome opportunity of seeing Hermogenes: without doubt the reason is, replied she, because I would see Belesis no more, neither inconstant, nor so bold as to tell me such things as he never thought: moreover, I pray do not measure my anger by the little bitterness which is in my words: for if I should follow my own naturall Genius, I should tell you most strange things. But since you may imagine, that the greatnesse of my anger is a mark of the greatnesse of my affection which I had towards you: I will tell you see, that I have so much power over my self, as to be an absolute Mistresse of a passion which useth to be imperious, and hard Page 179 to be kept within the limits of Reason. Belesis would have said something concerning Leonisa's Picture, and concerning Hermogenes, but the patience of Cleodora would not permit him, and therefore away he went. As soon as he was gone out of Cleodora's chamber, he went to seek some consolation in Leonisa's, having a mind to prepare her, lest Cleodora should do her an ill office: But when hee came within two paces of the door, her woman told him, that none could see her mistris: but hee so tampered with her, that he perswaded her to leave the door open, to the end it might be said he entered without speaking unto any: and accordingly this woman went in, and left the door half shut, as Belesis desired her. Then presently after he entred, and went to Leonisa's bed-side undiscern'd by any of the women which were in the other side of the chamber, she who left open the door ran unto him, seeming to be very angry that he entred, and asking pardon of her Mistresse, who indeed was very angry. She would have desired him to go out again, but still he pressed forward, and Leonisa at last admitted of his visit: hee was no sooner set, but he asked her why shee should so cruelly drive him out of her chamber, at a time when he was most in need of consolation: The reason is, replied Leonisa very sharply, because resolving to drive you out of my heart, I began this day to drive you out of my chamber. Madam, said he unto her, I perceive Cleodora hath prejudicated your opinion of me. Ah Belesis, replied she, you see how she whom you named, repenting of her consent unto your cheat, hath discovered it unto me: Belesis hearing Leonisa speak so, was so astonished, that hee knew not what to think of her words: for he knew but too well, that it was Cleodora whom he deceived, and that he never deceived Leonisa: Then he desired her, shee would bee pleased to let him know whereof she accused him. Leonisa, as plausible as she was, was so incensed with this demand, that she gave him a hundred bitter expressions, letting him understand the crime which she thought he had committed: Belesis then offered to justify himself, but she would not suffer him to speak, No, no said she unto him, you are culpable, and more then is imaginable: for why would you put my Picture into Cleodora's hands, and refused to trust me with hers? Was it not enough, that to satisfie her, you should dissemble love to me, and conceal the affection which you had, and yet have to her, but you must also triumph over my innocence, and my credulity, in giving her a Picture which I never gave you, and which I did onely consent that you should keep, since I found you so discreet as not to part with Cleodora's? Alas Madam, said he, do you think that I did voluntarily give your picture unto Cleodora? I must needs think it, said she, for she could not take it from you by violence: Belesis then conjured her to admit of his justification. But she answered him, that she would sooner beleieve his eyes then his words, and say what he could, he could not obtain leave to speak; for Leonisa had such an extreme spite against him, because she thought he dissembled a love to her, that she could not suffer him to justify himself: yet had his importunity wearied her out, and he had obtained liberty to plead for himself, had not Leonisa's Aunt come in, who hearing that she kept her chamber, and would see none, came to see how she did: But she much wondered to see Belesis with her: I thought, said she unto Leonisa, to have found you sick by your self: and in lieu of that. I finde you well, in good, though not much company. I assure you, replied she a little troubled, that I am not a whit better for my company, and you would do me the greatest favour in the world, if you would move Belesis, who came in without permission, to go out without thanks, and leave me at rest, and in solitude, which is the best remedy against what I am troubled with. This grave Lady hearing her say so, and seeing both her eyes swelled, and her colour high, did easily beleieve that she was ill in her head: so that presenting her hand unto Belesis, she moved him to follow her, telling him with a smile, that she would acquaint him with a businesse which perhaps he knew not of; which was, that he should never visit Ladies at such times, when they had not a desire to be seen: for truly, said she unto him, I am very much deceived, if Leonisa pardon you this long time, for seeing her in her negligent dresse: and I know by the colour which I observed in her face, that she was very angry: Belesis then made a hundred excuses unto this Lady, desiring at least to be in favour with her, who had power either to admit him into her house, or to drive him out. But his spirits being in a strange disorder, he did not continue long in returning handsome answers, but did so rove in his discourse, that she thinking he was weary of her, and that he could not endure the company of any but young persons, she grew very angry with him, and played upon Page 180 him with a jeering kinde of Rallary: so thar poor Belesis went out of the house very ill satisfied with all that dwelt in it, and with him self also so much, that he complained more against himself then any of the rest. Sometimes he would upbraid himself with inconstancy, and repent that ever he quitted Cleodora: but he was no sooner in but out of that minde, and quarrelled with himself for being so respective of her: sometimes he would lay the fault upon Leonisas credulity, and afterward accuse Cleodora of her old fantasticalnesse: nor did he spare Hermogenes, yet had he no convincing proofs against him, but thought that Leonisas picture was it which discovered the truth unto Cleodora, who for her part was not without her share of inquietudes; desire of revenge did so transport her soul, that almost she did not value the ruine of Belesis, and hence it was that she received Hermogenes with extraordinary civillity, whilst Belesis was with Leonisa. The first time she saw him, thanks for discovering the deceit of his friend, was his first congratulation: she called him her deliverer, and gave him such obliging Language, that if he had been lesse in love then he was, he had thought himself deeply obliged: but because all Cleodoras candid favours were but so many symptoms of her affection to Belesis, though she did seem sore incensed against him, yet he could not relish them as favours to be rejoiced at, yet she told him so often, that she would never forget the service he had done her, that at last his hopes told him he might haply draw some advantage to himself by discovering his friends inconstancy: but since he saw much turbulency in her spirit, he durst not solicit for that place in her heart which Belesis deserved to lose, and lent an ear unto all her bitter exclamations against the Perfidie of Belesis without any expressions of his own passion, further then with the language of his eyes onely. After she had told him that she had the Picture of Leonisa, and her self; and had related all Belesis told her: Hermogenes (said she) I do not think it enough that you have revealed his crime: but you must also help me to punish him. Provided that you will give me but apart of those possessions where[w]ith you enriched him, replied he, I shall be ready to assist you in your revenge, and after that defend them against all the world. It appears that the possessions you speak of were of no great value, since Belesis did so willingly part from them: but Hermogenes, it is not now time to talk of such things, since I need no additions unto my misfortunes, therefore I conjure you to tell me sincerely whether you will assist me to be revenged upon Belesis; for unlesse you will, I shall quite forget your service in discovering his crime. I beseech you Madam, replied he, first tell me what kinde of revenge you intend before I promise you any thing? not that I think I can denie you any thing, nor that I do suspect you are capable of obliging me unto any thing which becomes not a man of honour: But I must confesse, I have already done Belesis so great a mischief, in taking from him your esteem and affection, by acquainting you with his inconstancy, that I have a great desire to know what more you would have me to do: I would have you, said she unto him, imploy that credit which I know you have with the Prince of Susa, and with the friends of Tisias, that the last of these may marry Leonisa, you know that he hath a great desire unto it, and there are some reasons why both families should forward the motion, and likewise some, why they should oppose it: and because I know you are able to surmount all obstacles, and bring it about, I conjure you to negotiate the businesse. I can assure you, that in the humour she now is, and wherein I will keep her as long as I can, she will marry who one will. I wish Madam, replied Hermogenes, that this desire of revenge would infuse into your soul, a favourable inclination to receive my services. I shall most willingly receive this service which I require, replied shee; But Madam, answered he, I see you do admirably well contrive your own revenge, and you could not do it more fully then by taking Leonisa from Belesis: but I do not perceive you have any consideration of the interest which I might have in this revenge: do not you consider divine Cleodora, that by putting Leonisa into such a condition, as she can never be married to Belesis, you put Belesis into a way of returning unto Cleodora: though he should, said she, he should return in vain: moreover Madam, pursued Hermogenes, I must tell you, that my love to you does so perfectly tel me what the sorrows of a man would be, from whom all hopes of enjoying his Mistris is taken away, that how great soever my desires are to please you, yet I am extremely unwilling to obey you, therefore I beseech you think of some other way to punish Belesis: As he is not my Rival, since now he does not love you, I must confesse, I cannot leave Page 181 loving him as my friend; not but that he hath denied me many things, which exceedingly incensed me against him, but for all that, I cannot commit this treason against him: I know well that I have revealed his crime unto you, but it was because in doing so I did not take from him that person whom he desired to enjoy. Therefore Madam, I beseech you once more, move me not unto a thing for which you will hereafter upbraid me, when the heat of your anger is over, and your reason free: revenge your self upon Belesis, in forgetting him: or if you cannot forget him, remember him onely to hate him, and to detest his inconstancy: and if you will punish him further yet, I beseech you make me so happy, that my felicity may create a horrid envie in him: in letting him know that he hath quitted Diamonds for glasse in forsaking Cleodora for Leonisa. No, no Hermogenes, replied she, I am not capable of this generosity which you would perswade me unto, and which perhaps proceeds not from your heart, but because there is in you a little disposition to oblige mee. Alas Madam, said Hermogenes, you do not know me, if you think it want of affection which makes me speak thus: you know me worse then I know you, replied she, if you think I can keep any measure in my revenge: and not see that you have no disposition to do me service: for the truth is, said she, if you will do me any, you must assist me with your transaction, that Tisias may marry Leonisa, or that Hermogenes never see Cleodora again. Oh Madam, said he unto her, for heavens sake have some care of my honour: and force me not to a thing which will render me odious in the eyes of all the Court: I do not intend, replied she, that you should publicly speak of a marriage between Tisias and Leonisa, but I would have you go cunningly to work, and negotiat it with all secrecy; truly Madam, said he unto her, since you force me to tell you my thoughts, I must manifest unto you, that I will not refuse you out of generositie onely, but out of love also: for Madam, what hatred soever you resent against Belesis, or what love soever he bears unto Cleodora, I shall never be at rest as long as I see any possibility of your uniting together: after this Madam, you may imagine, that it is not for want of affection that I refuse what you desire of me: what ever it be, replied she, it seems you refuse me, and refuse to do the thing which I most desire of any thing in the world; But for all that, since I have no right to force your will, I will dispenise with you from your obedience: and the rather because I do Fancy another way to bring my designe to passe without your help, and I am not sorry that I shall not ingage my self unto you by it. Hermogenes, thinking Cleodora was incensed against him, began to give very obliging Language; protesting unto her, that what ever he said, yet if it were her Positive pleasure, he would obey her, though his honour and life and all would be at the stake: so that Cleodora took him immediately at his word. But Madam, said he unto her, that I may have some Colourable excuse wherewith to answer those that know my Crime, I beseech you what recompense may I hope for

if I do as you desire me: even any thing, answered she, for I must confesse unto you, that if I could prevent Belesis from obtaining Leonisa, I should be fuller of joy then I am able to expresse, and by consequence so obliged unto you, that I will put no limits unto your hopes, provided they be just. Then Ma|dam replied Hermogenes, since I see so much sweetnesse in your expression, I shall conjure you, that if I hinder Belesis from Leonisa, you shall give Cleodora unto Hermo|genes. No, no Hermogenes, said she unto him, I will not capitulate with those I would have do me any good office; and I wonder how you dare be so bold as to ask me any such thing: otherwise Madam, answered he, how can you conceive, (since I am so deeply in love with you) that I can hinder Belesis from marrying Leonisa, since I ought so earnestly to wish the marriage? and how can I chuse but suspect and fear that you have some secret designe in it, if you will not engage your self unto any thing, and therefore Madam, since if I break off that marriage, it is not impossible but he may repent, and you may pardon him; I beseech you take it not ill, if I be very unwilling to hinder that match which may cause yours with Belesis. Then I see Hermo|genes, (said she unto him) that you will not do this good office which I would have you; and the lesse to disoblige me, you pretend a resentment of love, though indeed it be onely a resentment of generositie: I will not much blame you for it, for I have not yet absolutely lost my reason: neither have I any great reason to commend you, since you have denied that which I did most desire. In the mean time since you can|not satisfie my desires, unlesse upon such a condition, as I will not engage my self into: Page 182 yet I pray you let the same generositie, which will not permit you to betray your friend, keep you from betraying her that trusts you with her secrets, and her revenge. Her|mo|genes seeing Cleodora would not promise what he desired, did beleeve that she would only have Tisias marry Leonisa, to the end that Belesis might thereby be out of all hopes of enjoying her, and so return unto her again: and therefore resolving not to do a thing which he thought prejudicial both to his honour and his love, did excuse his denial with a hundred expressions of sorrow, and in such a sensible manner, that she plainly saw he was full of vertue as love, so that they did not part upon very ill terms. Hermogenes had one imagination which proved very advantagious for him; For since he perceived the minde of Cleodora was filled onely with thoughts of revenge upon Belesis, he did cunningly hint unto her, that though his jealousy was but counterfeit, yet he could not be more sensibly vexed then to hear that Belesis did visit her, and that she did not slight him; Tis true, he used much art in his expressions, fearing Cleodora should attribute his thoughts unto jelousie, and he applied his words so ingenuously, that Cleodora called Belesis a hundred times fantastical, as well as in|constant. So as in that humour she was then in, she would not neglect the least thing that might displease Belesis, and therefore she resolved to speak offer unto Hermogenes then she used, and also to treat him incomparably better. In the mean time, since she had one friend that was much in favour with the prince of Susa, and had a prevalent power both with him and Tisias, she plotted how to make use of him, though at first it went against her minde to trust her self unto any one who knew nothing of her secrets. But as sweet revenge will surmount all obstacles, she transacted with this friend, who was able to accomplish her desires, and managed the matter with so much subtilty, that the Prince of Susa, and Tisias did earnestly de|sire this marriage. The first of these, for some reasons of state which required this alliance, and the other, because so many impediments being now removed which ob|structed his love, he was hotter then ever to marry Leonisa. As for her, since she had been foiled with the deceits of Belesis, her heart began to lean after ambition, and hearkened unto a marriage with Tisias: Tis true, the counsels of Cleodora did much prompt her unto it, and so much the sooner, because she saw Cleodora resolved never to see Belesis again, and because she saw her treat Hermogenes much better. Thus think|ing her self disinterested, she thought she might do as she pleased: so that when the poor Belesis came to visit Leonisa, he was in a perplexed condition, for since it did extreemly concern Cleodora that he should have no private conference with Leonisa, also Leonisa thinking Belesis to be in love with her Cozen, she was not sorry he did not speak unto her; They promised not to leave each other until the marriage with Tis|ias which was plotted in secret was solemnized: so that when Belesis waited for an opportunity to Justifie himself unto Leonisa, and appease Cleodora, he found them continually together, and could not speak with them asunder. But that which did most stick upon his stomach, was, that Tisias commonly was continually talking with Leonisa, and Hermogenes with Cleodora; and indeed Sir, the poor Belasis did fret with no lesse impatience to see Cleodora speak so civilly unto Hermogenes, then to see that Le|onisa would not speak unto him at all, or if she did, it was but some interrupted word, and that in anger: so that though he had equally loved Cleodora, and Leonisa, yet he could not have done more then he did, and to speak sincerely, I verily beleeve that the love of Hermogenes to Cleodora did inkindle in his heart some embers of his first love: he grew to that height, as almost to hate his friend: they never saw one ano|ther unlesse at Cleodora Aunts, whither Belesis could not chuse but go, and whither he never went but he received a fresh discontent. For since Leonisa thought her self deluded, she began to hate him: and since Cleodora saw that her favouring Hermogenes, perplexed him: she doubled her civilities to Hermogenes; the businesse was so car|ried, that Belesis and Hermogenes were ready to quarrel two or three times: and if I had not been present one day by accident, certainly some hurt had ensued: but that which ruined Belesis, raised the designs of Hermogenes; For Cleodora imagining how Belesis would be incensed if she should marry Hermogenes, she permitted him secretly to ask the consent of her Parents, to the end that Leonisas marriage and hers might be published both together, conceiving it would overwhelm him with sorrows, to hear of such a shoure of perplexities all at once. And indeed the businesse was carried so se|cretly, and went on so prosperously in a few dayes, that all their kindred consented, Page 183 and all seemed to be made up: Tisias, and Hermogenes, were the only favorits, in somuch as Hermogenes, having one day found the picture which Cleodora gave Be|lesis, and which she took from him againe, he desired it of her, and she gave it unto him: as for the picture of Leonisa, she had taken it out of the case, and restored it unto her. Thus was Hermogenes enriched, with the ruines of his friend: Not that Cleodora did love Hermogenes, but because revenge relished so sweet in her minde, that she reflected upon nothing but what might hasten it: Whilst things were thus carried, Belesis led the most miserable life of any man in the world: for his soul was so sunk with sorrows, that he never thought either of Cleodora or Leonisa, and he hated both Hermogenes and Tisias: at first his thoughts and desires were very different concerning these two Ladies: for he desired to enjoy Leonisa, and only de|sired that Hermogenes might not enjoy Cleodora: but afterwards, according to the measure that Cleodora favoured Hermogenes, so did the thoughts of Belesis grow more tender towards her; His shame of his inconstancy augmented: and his love to Leonisa did not lessen: So that he was the most miserable of men: This being the state of things, two passages above all the rest, did swell his sorrowes; the one was, he heard Hermogenes had the picture which once was in his possession, and the other was, that the Prince of Susa solicited for the marriage of Tisias with Leonisa, and that the match was as good as made up, and the marriage would be solemnized within two dayes. I shall not need Sir, to relate all the raptures of his soule upon this newes; for my story is too long already: and because you may easily guesse them, I shall only tell you Sir, that since the marriage of Tisias most pinched him, and his love of Leonisa was was the Predominate passion of his heart, he resolved to quarrell with Tisias upon some other pretence, before the businesse went any further: so that meeting him at the temple the next morning, he went out with him as if without designe; they fell upon a discourse of newes and war, and Belesis did obstinately contradict all that Tisias said; for his designe was to move Tisias to begin the quarrell, because knowing the hasty humour of the Susanian Prince, he apprehended he should be banished, if it appeared that it was he who assaulted the man whom he loved. But since Tisias was a man of more heart then spirit, it was a long time before he would be provoked, yet Belesis urged him so far, that Tisias drew his sword first: but it was so little be|fore Belesis, that notwithstanding it, he received the first blow. Their fight was furious, and if by-standers had not parted them, they had died both upon the place: yet do what all could, both were wounded: and yet Belesis so slightly, that he ne|ver kept his bed for it, since it was only upon his left arme. But Tisias was much worse. for he received two dangerous hurts, and had much the worse of the combat: for besides his two wounds, Belesis seeing company come in to part them, he closed with him and disarmed him by force: In the mean while, though this quarrell was conceived to be only casuall in heat of blood, the Prince of Susa was much incensed against Belesis: for though he loved Belesis well enough at his first coming to Susa; yet Tisias being his great favorit, all matters were made worse against Belesis: so that there was none, but such as were altogether uninterested persons, or such as were very generous, who came to visit him: but all the croud was upon Tisias, as the man that was the Princes favorit. But as for Hermogenes, since he was very Generous, he went to visit him, and offer himself unto his friend. Chance was, that I was there when he came, and I was a witness of their meeting: 'tis true, I much wondered to see with what hollownesse Belesis, received Hermogenes: so that fearing a long discourse might draw on some quarrel, I told Hermogenes, that I desired to talk with him upon some businesse; and car|ried him away with me, extreemly wondering at the proceedings of Belesis: In the mean time, this combate did highly incense Cleodora against him, and confirmed her in her designe of revenge, by hindring him of Leonisa, and marrying Her|mo|genes, especially when she understood with what coldnesse he received his visit. On the other side, the Prince of Susa did expresse so much displeasure against Belesis, that his friend told him there was no safety for him to stay in court, and they advised him at least to keep his lodging for some dayes. Yet all could not perswade him not to go out, because needs would he go and be satisfied; whether Cleodoras picture was in the hands of Hermogenes. And as he went one morning unto Cleodora, whom he hath incensed by that combate: when I fought with Tisias (replied he) I knew not that Hermogenes was to marry Cleodora: then it seemes (replied Hermo|genes) it is more out of hate to me, then love to her, that you oppose my good fortune. No replied Belesis, but it is because as to my misfortune I did in an instant leave my love of Cleodora, for the love of Leonisa, so now I leave my love of Le|onisa, for the love of Cleodora. I know not whether the losing my hopes of enjoyling Leonisa, will contribute any thing to the extinguishing of that fire which flamed towards her, to enlighten another in my heart: but I am most certaine that I no sooner knew Cleodora was to be yours, but my old passion which was lurking in my heart, began to break forth into a flame againe, and that with most violence; as I think I shall lose my wits, unlesse you have pittie of me. I must confesse Sir, that I was never in my life so amazed, as when I heard Belesis speake so. Hermo|genes, as you may well imagine was in the same condition, and knew not well what to answer; for though he knew Cleodora had consented to marry him, yet it was rather out of revenge upon Belesis, then out of any intention to make him happie: and therefore he had strange apprehensions, lest Cleodora should come to the know|ledge of his repentance, and repent her self also. Therefore, beginning to answer, I know very well, said he unto him, that what I shall say will much trouble you; but since it is necessary that you know it, both for your tranquillitie and mine own; I must tell you, that though I should consent, yet it is a thing impossible for you, ever to be happie in the enjoyment of Cleodora, since she is so incensed against you, that it may truly be said she now hates you, as much as she loved you before: it is because she hates me, replied Belesis, that I hope she will love me; for if her soule were only upon termes of indifference, or that she scorned me, I should for ever have despaire of pardon: but since she does not, I beseech you let me have no other ob|stacle but Cleodora her self: moreover (said he unto him) I know that she gave you a picture, which indeed she could not give, because she gave it unto me first, there|fore I pray you restore it unto me.

But is it possible (said I unto him, and interrurp|ted him) that this you say should be really true? Can I beleeeve that the man which within this eight hours said he could love none but Leonisa, should now love none Page 185 but Cleodora? I cannot well expresse my thoughts (said he unto us) for there is such a multitude of things which at once do overpresse my heart, that I cannot ut|ter them; all I can say unto you is, that I know the gods are resolved to punish me for my inconstancy; and therefore I do most cordially repent of it: I am confident that within this eight hours, neither Cleodora, nor Leonisa hated me; yet by a most fatal|l turne, I am like to lose them both, and that in the most cruell manner. For Leonisa is ravished from me by a man, whom of all living I most scorned; and Cleodora by him, whom I most dearly loved. To speak my minde really un|to you (said I and interrupted him) you can blame none but your self, for your misfortune; I know very well, replied he, that I am culpable; I see my request unto Hermogenes is not just; yet since the love of Cleodora, took first root in my heart, me thinks Hermogenes might pittie my weaknesse I doe very much pittie you, replied Hermogenes, but me thinks I ought to pittie my self also: However my dear Hermogenes (said he unto him) I beseech you for heavens sake, oblige me, and tell me sincerely whether you think Cleodora does really love you? or whether it be only spite against me that moves her to let you serve her. I know very well your merit is much above mine, and therefore, since I had the honour once not to be hated, it may not be impossible, but she may now love you: However I begg this favour from you, to tell me what you think, protesting unto you, that if you will swear as you are a man of honour, that you think she loves you as well as she loved me, I will never seek for any other remedy against my misery but death: All that I can tell you, is (replied Hermogenes who could not tell all his thoughts) that I am perswaded Cleodora hates you, and I know she con|sents that I shall marry her, This is enough to let me know, replied he, that you are not upon such good tearmes with her, therefore I conjure you to permit me so much favour as to speak once more in private with Cleodora: For if she love you so well as not to value my repentance you will be the more happy: And if I be so happy as to reduce her unto the same tearms she formerly was, you will be a gainer by that also, since it would have been but halfe a happinesse for you, to marry a woman whose affection was but weak towards you, therefore, I beseech you, deny me not this request: I confesse, that since I thought the request of Belesis to be something reasonable, I endeavoured to perswade Hermogenes unto a consent, but he would not by any meanes harken unto it. In the mean time, the more he denied, the more hopes Belesis had that he was not quite rooted out of Cleodoras heart, so that having no hopes at all from Leonisa, but conceiving some glimps from Cleodora, his passion did much increase: Seeing then that Hermogenes would not by any means consent he should speak unto her, he began to act the picture which he had: But Hermogenes replied, that he ought not to take any notice whether it was his or no, it sufficed that he received it from Cleodora; and therefore he would not restore it to him: As I had blamed Hermogenes a little before, because he so obstinately refused to let Belesis speak unto Cleodora: so afterwards I blamed Belesis for pressing his friend, to restore a picture, which he had not from him. In the interim, since I did extreemly fear that being alone with them, I could not hinder them from being too sharp and high, I, told them that being both possessed with one too violent a passion; to speak of their interests with moderation, I desired, that for the time to come, they might know each others pretentions only by me: Adding further, that when they were seperated I should tell them something which I could not tell them in their presence. So that temporizing thir minds, as well as I could: I got them to part without a quarrell: After which, I went sometimes to the one, and sometimes to the other, not knowing which side to take: For when I was with Belesis, he repented so bitterly of his inconstancy, that he moved me to pittie him: and when I saw Hermogenes, he would perswade me that right was on his side: for said he unto me if Belesis had never for|saken Cleodora, I should then not only have never falne in love with her, but if I had, I should have restrained my self out of respect unto the lawes of friendship: But since he forced me to see her often, and entreated me to dissemble love unto her; and now to barr me from seeing her any more, but to ravish out of my heart a love which he himself caused, that is a thing which I neither can, nor ought, nor will do: on the other side, said Belesis to me is it just, that because I intreated Hermogenes only to see a Lady whom I loved, that he should therefore rob me of her? does he not know that ever since the first time he asked me leave to discover my inconstancy unto Page 186 her, I told him, that I would never suffer him; might he not well imagine that I neither would, nor ought, to do it but out of resentment of love, though he gave it another phrase? Can one be Jealous without affection unto the party of whom he is Jealous? might not Hermogenes rather think I loved two persons at once, then to think me jealous of him without being in love with Cleodora? Afterwards (said he unto me) my demand was but just, when I propounded to let Cleodora judge the difference between us, and that he would suffer me to see and speak to her; for if after that she would have chosen him, I would have left Susa, and should have gone unto some place farr off from hence, where I might have hid my self from the acquain|tance of men; where neither he nor Cleodora should have heard any more of me. After this Belesis began to aggravate his misfortunes, untill anger did so swell his spirits, that never remembering his love or friendship to Hermogenes, he said that he was not able to suffer him to marry Cleodora. In the mean while, the Prince of Susa hearing that Belesis stirred out of his lodging, was so incensed against him, that I was advertized, he intended to give command that he should retire himself. And I un|derstood that Tisias (thinking that whilst he could not stirr out, Belesis might per|haps work upon the spirit of Leonisa against him) had moved the Prince of Susa, up|on some Colourable pretence or other to place Leonisa about the Queen, untill he was perfectly recovered of his wounds: So that fearing some mischief was plotted against my friend, I conjured him to quit Susa for some certain dayes: but he told me that he would never quit it untill he had spoken with Cleodora, and that in private. He told me how that he had been severall times at her house; but he was always answered by them that she was not within, or would not be seen: Adding that if Hermo|genes would enjoy her in quietnesse, it were his best course to procure him a sight of her: When I therefore perceived the obstinacy of Belesis, I went unto his friend, in hopes to do some good upon him: but found him as resolute as a Rock which would not be moved: So that when I saw I could make no good end between them, I went privately unto Cleodora to let her know the state of things, and that her prudence might prevent all mischief, and order the businesse between them; for they being both my friends, I knew not how to be partiall, and to preferr one before another: I had no sooner acquainted Cleodora how things were between Belesis and Hermogenes, but she said that the last of these did her wrong to tell his friend she would not see him, she seemed to be much surprised, and very unquiet: Yet afterwards she used so many expressions of anger against Belesis, as I thought he would finde no great satisfaction in seeing her: But since he did so vehemently desire it, and since I could not perswade him to go out of Susa untill he heard his sentence of death pronounced from her own mouth, I beseeched her to let him have the opportunity to see her, but she would not consent unto it; Yet for all this, I had a conceipt that if I did deceive her, and finde out a way for Belesis to see her, she would pardon me; So therefore thinking to advance the happinesse of Hermogenes by advancing the departure of Belesis, who would not stirr from Susa till he spoke with Cleodora, I ordered the businesse so, that the next morning, I imployed Hermogenes in some businesse another way, and one of my Cosens carried Cleodora to see a new built palace, which for its curiosity, every one went to see it, since it was yet uninhabited; Belesis who had his instructions failed not to be there; & my cosen conducted Cleodora unto a Gallery, where leaving the rest of her women, she carried her into a chamber, & within that chamber a closet where Belesis was waiting for Cleodora; she no sooner saw him, but she started back, & would needs go out again; he falling upon his knees, and having hold of her gowne; For God & Heavens sake Madam (said he unto her) give me but one howres hearing, I conjure you. Twas to that end this chari|table woman brought you hither; Give me leave therefore Madam to beg your pardon, and to beg it in a flood of tears. Provided you will give me leave to deny you all you aske (said she unto him) I shall consent to give you audience. If I demand death Madam, will you deny me that also• (said he unto her) doubtless I would deny you that, replied she, not only because the punishment which you deserve would not be long enough if you dyed so soon, but because it sufficeth that you have desired something, which I cannot consent unto, how ever it be Madam (said he unto her) if it be only to chide me, yet I beseech you hear me, & hear me with patience, whilst these two were thus in discourse; she who brought Cleodora in the house went unto the rest of the women which were in the Gallery, & did amuse them with shewing them pictures, & other such talk, so that Belesis seeing he could talk and not be understood: Give me leave Madam (said he unto her, Page 187 fore I ask you pardon, to assure you that this Belesis whom you see at your feet, is the very same Belesis whom heretofore you were pleased to preferr before any other. And so I do still, said she, for I think you so much different from all other men, that I think you do incomparably excell them all. However it be Madam, said he, I am most certain of one thing, which is, that my heart was never so full of love unto you as now: Oh, I wish with all my soul, replied she, that you spoke truth; and I wish with all my soul Madam, said he, that you did really desire it; No, no, Bele|sis, answered Cleodora, I was not far from my reall thoughts, when I said that I should be even ravished with joy, to be certain that you were desperately in love with me; But you do extreemly mistake my meaning if you think I make this wish with any intentions to accept of your affection; Since I do not wish you should love me for any other reason, but that I might thereby punish you for ceasing to love me before. I confesse Madam (replied he) that I am the most to blame of any man alive, for doing as I lately did; But Madam I beseech you do not too severely looke upon the most extravagant act of all my life; or if you do looke upon it, let it be as upon a subject whereupon to exercise your goodnesse; Forgivenessse Madam does most resem|ble divinity, and by consequence your self; To what purpose is clemency, but to forgive; and this is the operation, that when it is extended in the greatest measure, it converts the greatest offenders to become the greatest lovers; Moreover Madam, do not think, I beseech you that I did absolutely cease to love you, at that very time when I seemed to be most in love with Leonisa; She can tell you that I would never be moved to acquaint her with the least passage which had been between us, nor could I ever endure that my best friend should ever love you; and therefore it must by ne|cessary consequence be concluded that I ever loved you; Not that by this I intend to justifie my self; But that I would if I could something lessen my crime, to the end you may the sooner pardon it; Before I can ever have such a thought, replied Cleodora, I must lose my wits: for inconstancy is a crime of such a nature, as is absolutely impardonable: But I beseech you Madam, replied he, did not you your self so behave your self towards Hermogenes in such a manner as might very well make me be|leeve that you were guilty of the same crime wherewith you tax me? When I ob|served, replied Cleodora, that out of a most fantastical|l humour you were angry I should begin to love Hermogenes, I must confesse that ever since the first time I per|ceived you loved Leonisa, I would not undeceive you: think on therefore, if it an|ger you, that I do love him, and did love him, and more then that, ever will love him: for I assure you, that you cannot please me better then to torment your self: But Madam, I beseech you (replied he) do you not fear to drive me into a horrid dispair; and to make me rush upon any rude attempts, which a man desperately in love may do, when he has lost his reason and wits? No Belesis, replied she, I app re|hend no such danger, for I heard say and beleeeve it, that a man of a divided heart is not capable of over violent passions: But Madam, replied he, my heart is none but yours, nor ever shall be any others. Can you be so impudent, replied she, as to make any apologie for your self, after your weather-cock inconstancy? for my part since I use to judge of the future by what is past, I am confident I should love you to mor|row again, and you would say the same unto Leonisa which now you do unto me: and perhaps forgetting both her & me the third day, you will make a fresh address to a third: Alass Madam, said Belesis, can you not finde a heart to pardon me: And will you not have any confidence in my affection? no doubtlesse, (replied she) for how is it possible you should give me any assurance of it: Since you cast me off when I was as handsome as ever I was or ever shall be, and at a time when I was most affable and complacential| to you? What can I trust unto? to your words which you have so ill kept? or to your oaths which you have so wickedly falsified? No Madam (said Belesis, and interrupted her) you may trust unto my repentance. That is, divine Cleodora, which will preserve me from inconstancy for the future; for I am so horridly ashamed of my crime, that it will most certainly prevent a relaps: I cannot beleeeve it (answered she very sharply) and I assure you, that I do interest my self so little in any thing which relates unto you (except in such things as may vex you) that I care not a straw what befalls you. In the mean time, I must tell you, that I would not have you seek for any more opportunities of speaking to me, unlesse you would have me put a thousand incivilities upon you before all the world: Page 188 But Madam, (replied he) though all my past services are lost, and though I am quite ruined in your opinion, yet I cannot chuse but beseech you to obliterate all past crimes, and to suffer me to begin upon a new score of love, as if I had never loved you before: and then if you be not satisfied with my fidelity, treat me as the most vile, base, and infamous man that lives; and may you marry Hermogenes: and untill then, give me leave to tell you Madam, that I cannot endure him. Yet I will marry him, replied she, since my parents consent unto it, therefore the best course you can take for your own tranquillity, is to endure him, and say nothing, rather then nothing to the purpose; for all you can say shall be in vain, Moreover, never think of speaking unto Hermogenes, unlesse you will augment my hatred, and my scorn of you: In the mean time, you may hope to your comfort, that perhaps, Tisias will die of his wounds, and then you may return unto Leonisa, and quit me the second time: for since she is of a much more sweet and affable disposition then I am, doubtlesse she will receive you more kindly then I shall. And after that Belesis, I have no more to say unto you, unlesse to assure you, that when you have quitted me for Leonisa, I shall have such thoughts of you, as shall deserve that you become more faithfull then you have been. These Belesis are all the advantagious thoughts I can have of you: After these words Cleodora rose up, and say what Belesis could she left him complaining against her that deluded him: But Sir, that which was most rare in this encounter was, that this conference produced different effects in the hearts of Cleodora and Belesis. For this imperious Lady was extremely joyed, to know by the eyes of Belesis he was the same to her as formerly he had been, though it was without any intention to pardon him, but only to make him more miserable: So that she published to all the world her marriage with Hermogenes, as a thing which much pleased her: As for Belesis, he parted from Cleodora, more in love with her then ever he was: so that extremely wondering at his love of Leonisa, he looked upon her as the cause of his losing Cleodora, and began to hate her extremely. Being thus in a most horrible despair, he came unto me to tell me, that he found Cleodora absolutely inexorable; but that for all this, he could not endure Her|mogenes should marry her. I used my best rethoricke to perswade him to it, but all in vain: I hinted unto him what he had said unto Hermogenes, that if Cleodora should make choise of him after he had talked with her, then that he would let him alone in quietnesse. But he told me, that he was not obliged by any such promises, as were impossible to be kept; so that not knowing how to prevent that inconveniencie which I feared, I told him that the Prince of Susa would banish him the Town, I hoping that time and absence would settle his soul: But although Belesis received this command that same day, yet was he not so quick in his obedience; but did something to obey it, for he did conceal himself some dayes in the Town: In the interim, he writ divers times to Cleodora without receiving any answer: also he saw Hermogenes once: but Hermogenes gave him such satisfactory and prevalent reasons, that they parted without a quarrell as Belesis intended: for in the very heat of his love; he still retained a great love of Her|mogenes. Whilst he was in Hermogenes his Closet, he spied the picture of Cleodora, lying upon a Cabinet; and being transported with violence of passion, he took it, whilst his friend was gone to speak with one who asked for him: I do confesse, I saw him commit this theft: but since I knew Hermogenes were ere long to marry Cleodora, and that Belesis would depart the Town within two dayes, I did not oppose him: but fearing lest during those two dayes some sad consequence might follow, I stayed with Hermogenes, and told him how it was, desiring and conjuring him not to deny so small a consolation to his friend: and indeed Hermogenes promised me to take no notice of it, though the losse of this Picture did exceedingly trouble him. In the mean time Tisias thought himself all happinesse; his marriage and Hermogenes his also, was published to be both in one day: and all preparations were providing to render the solemnities joyfull. But during this while, Belesis, Hermogenes, and Cleodora were not without their unquietudes. The first of these, as you may well imagine, had cause enough: Hermogenes also, though ready to marry Cleodora, yet thought himself not satisfied, because he saw she was extremely melancholy: And Cleodora was as sad as any, for though her heart was full of sweet revenge upon Belesis, yet she was to be revenged upon him, by being revenged upon her self: But whilst they were all in their discontents, Leonisa, whose ambition recompensed the losse of Belesis, knowing that he was concealed in Susa: And fearing, that it was onely to be an obstacle to her greatnesse, desired Tisias Page 189 to move the Prince of Susa, that he might be searched for, and secured: so that Belesis hearing of this, and fearing to fall into the hands of a violent and incensed Prince, resolved to leave Susa: but before he went, he heard that the marriages between Tisias and Leonisa, and between Hermogenes, and Cleodora were to be solemnized the day after: For my part, I went with him some two hundred furlongs out of Susa; but I never in all my life saw so sad a soul, as Belesis had at that time: At parting, he gave two letters unto one of his servants, the one for Cleodora, the other for Hermogenes, with order to deliver them into their own hands before he departed: That which did a little perplex me at parting was, that I saw he sent all his train and equipage into his own Countrey, with a letter to his father; and that he would retain none with him but one slave, having no mind to tell me what his designe was, nor whither he went: In the mean time the messenger with the letters did not fail in his Commission. Since it was very early, for Belesis went out of Susa by break of day, he went unto Hermogenes before he went unto Cleodora, and gave him a letter, which was thus indited.

BELESIS UNTO HERMOGENES.

I Think you will not complain against me for taking Cleodora's Picture, since I leave you in possession of Cleodora her self: I cannot deny, but that if I had found any inclination in the heart of that fair One, to pardon me, I would have contested for her till death: and I confesse my sorrows to depart before I have given you some testimonies of my resentments, for the troubles you have put me unto; yet since I have taken up a resolution to pulnish none of all those that were causes of my miserable misfortune, I entreat you to acknowledge my moderation, and to let me make one request unto you: Which is, that when you are in possession of Cleodora, you would not insult over an unfortunate lover, whom you have made miserable, and not put her in memory of that inconstancie, whereof you your self have been a confident. This is the onely desire which an unfortunate man will ever ask of you as long as he lives: who having found no compassion in the heart of his friend, nor sweetnesse towards him in the mind of his Mistresse, will for ever renounce the society of men and women.

Belesis.

Hermogenes received this letter with some resentment of tendernesse, but for all that, he was not sorry for the departure of Belesis: and his hopes of marrying Cleodora the next morning, made him so full of joy, that he could not very much condole the misfortune of his friend. But as the letter of Belesis to Hermogenes, had no great operation upon his soul; yet that to Cleodora produced considerable effects: for it was so full of moving expressions, that unlesse her heart had been made of marble, it would have moved compassion: and certainly it made such a deep impression in her minde, that when Cleodora shewed it unto me, I asked her a copy of it; and though I never read it but once, yet I shall never forget it: The words were these.

BELESIS UNTO CLEODORA.

Madam,

I Have so well deserved all the torments which I endure, that I cannot accuse you of any Injustice: and I am so really repentant, that I do not think it fit to murmur against your goodness, though it would not grant me a pardon: In the mean time I respect you so much irreconcilable as you are, that I will not complain either against you, nor against Hermogenes, nor any else but my self: and to let you see that I should have been faithfull unto you, I promise you, to live in some place farre from hence: I passe my word, that I will think of nothing else but you, all the rest of my miserable life: and since I became criminall by the sight of One whom I ought not to have looked upon, but for the love of you, I will never look upon any whosoever, but one servant which I will carry with me, to the end that when I am dead he may relate unto you the constancy of him whom you banished for his inconstancy. I am confident that if he be faithfull, he will draw tears from your fair eyes, and will perhaps make you grieve for the death of him whose life you have made most miserable.

Belesis.

When Cleodora received this letter, her mind was extremely unquieted, and though she was ready to marry Hermogenes, yet her sweet desire of revenge upon Belesis was converted into extreme sorrow for him: and though she exceedingly esteemed Hermogenes, yet her soul not being able to love any but Belesis, she discovered, that notwithstanding all her resentments, and her anger against him, her heart was never quite disingaged from him: she received his letter with a blush, and opened it with extreme beating of heart: she began to read it with a sigh, and ended it with a shower of tears: In short Sir, Cleodora saw she could not marry Hermogenes, and that shee still loved Belesis: In the mean time all things were prepared for her marriage, and shee saw an impossibility of recalling Belesis: Not knowing then what to do, she deferred her marriage, purposely to consider what was to be resolved upon: and to that end she fained her self to be sick, and went to bed. Hermogenes hearing this, he was exceedingly troubled, not onely because she whom he loved was not well, and because his happinesse was deferred, but also because he had some suspicion of the truth: he went then to see Cleodora in all hast, but he was told by orders from her, that shee was asleep, yet he came so often, that she was forced to let him see her, but she spoke very little to him, and that she did speak was onely in complaining of her sicknesse, and pain, which shee did really endure, though it was of an other nature then she complained of: Thus the marriage of Hermogenes was to be put off for that day: And Tisias more happy then he married Leonisa, whose eyes though dazeled with the magnificence of all the preparations, yet sometimes they were very melancholy that day of great jollity; yet very few observed them, for I onely perceived it; As for Hermogenes, hee was not present that day, though the whole Court was. But whilst the Kings Palace was filled with joy, where the Prince of Susa would have this marriage solemnized, Cleodora was in her bed: Sometimes she repented that she did not pardon Belesis; otherwhiles, shee would blame her self for treating Hermogenes so kindly; and presently after, she would approve of what a little before she condemned, and passing from one thought into another, she found rest in none, especially when she considered that perhaps shee should never see Belesis again, who was the onely man of all the world with whom she Page 191 thought she could live happily: as rarely accomplished as Hermogenes was, she then discovered a hundred things in his humour, which concurred not with hers; in conclusion Sir, not to abuse your patience too much, Cleodora passed over three dayes in such horrible agitations of spirit, that she thought it would cost her either her life, or her wits: but at last, being resolved what course to take, she gave orders secretly for the execution of her intended designe; and indeed did execute it as I shall tell you. Be pleased to know Sir, that one morning as I was ready to go out of my lodging, I received a letter from Cleodora, which desired me to bring Hermogenes that same hour, unto the Temple of Ceres, which is not above thirty furlongs from the town, whither she went, to give thanks unto the Goddess, for a favour which she said she had received, during her sicknesse. Then Sir, be pleased to know further, that this Temple is kept by an hundred virgins, who observe the same ceremonies which they at Ecbatan do, though they be not consecrated with the same Goddess. I confesse that at first, I had not any suspicion of Cleodoras designe, but went unto Hermogenes, unto whom I shewed the letter which I received: but as for him, he was more clear-sighted then I was, for as soon as he saw the letter, he feared she would take some desperate resolution: so that without any more delay, we took horse and went unto this temple: as soon as we were alighted, they conducted us unto a chamber, which was ordained to receive strangers; where we stayed awhile: presently we saw a door open out of the cloister of the Virgins, out of which we saw Cleodora come accompanied with two women, but with such a sober melancholy in her aspect, as would have tendered the most obdurate heart. Hermogenes also was so moved, so amazed, and so angry, that he had not power enough to expresse his astonishment: after this she came unto us, and after civil salutations she did sit down, and caused us to sit by her: After this, she began to speake; I do not doubt (said she unto Hermogenes) but what I shall now say unto you, will trouble you: And I had a mind to let you know it in a place, where the respect due unto the Goddess of this place, will perhaps oblige you to receive it with more moderation. I beseech you Madam, (said Hermogenes unto her) do not put me to the utmost triall of my vertue; and consider well what you will tell me, whether I can hear it and live, or without losing my wit and reason, and respect unto sacred things. Since I know by my own experience, that none ever di• of sorrow; and since I have a better opinion of your vertue and wisdom, then your self has, I shall not fear to tell you, what resolution I have taken. Know then, said Cleodora, that I should be unworthy of your affection, if I should marry you, for the discovery of my heart since the departure of Belesis, lets me see, that I am not in a condition to make you happy: Why Madam (said Hermogenes, interrupting her) will you delude those hopes which your self did create in me? I should delude them more, replied she, if I should go about to satisfie them, since then I should attempt a thing above my power. For to tell you truly, I have these three last dayes, continually contested for you against my self, and could not overcome; so that seeing it was impossible to give you my affection, since I had given it to Belesis, and by consequence, should make you miserable, and augment my own sorrows; I thought it most expedient for me, to disingage my self from all the world, and wholly devote the rest of my dayes unto the Goddess which is adored in this place. This Her|mogenes, is that which I had to tell you, and it is your part to testifie by your voluntary consent unto it, that you have more vertue then love. Ah Madam, replied he, I am not able to endure this, but I must murmur and oppose it with all my power. I would not advise you to do so, replied she, since if you do, it will be in vaine. But Madam, (said he unto her) if it be so, that you love Belesis still, why did you not pardon him? and if you do not love him, why will you not accomplish my happinesse? Do not force me (replied she) to make a precise relation of what hath passed in my heart; for since I am resolutely determined to forget all my follies, I will not revive them in my memorie: The truth is, I will never returne again to Susa: perhaps Madam, said I unto her, that during the time that you are but a probationer, and before you engage your self for ever, your minde: will change: I do not think it, (replied she) for it is not my custom to change my minde; and if I ever change, it shall be in favour of Hermogenes: For heavens sake Madam (said he unto her being transported with sorrow and despaire) do not shut up your self in this place: Page 192 if it be (added he) because you do not think me worthy of that honour which your parents would confer upon me; though you would deprive me of that happinesse, yet do not deprive the world of 'its chiefest ornament: Beleeve me Hermogenes, my fate hath called me to this place, and there is no remedie you can use to prevent it; as Hermogenes was going to answer, the same door through which Cleodora came unto us, opened the second time: and the Governesse of these sacred Virgins, appeared all in whit, holding a sheafe of gold in her hand, accompanied with a great number of virgines in the same habit, holding every one of them, apples of gold in their hand: As soon as they were all come out and ranked behind the governesse, she called Cleodora: who leaving us, and desiring us to acquaint her Aunt that she was in that place; and after she had made a low congee to Hermogenes with tears in her eyes, she went towards that door, whom she who kept the door received in: all the virgines beginning to sing hymnes unto the honour of Ceres, as soon as she was entered and the door shut. But Oh heavens, how dolefull was that song unto Hermogenes, and in what a pittifull plight was he in? In the meane time there was no remedie but complaints; for there was no possibilitie of procuring any more conference, either with Cleodora, whom they carried into the temple, nor with any of the virgins. But we were constrained to returne unto Susa, and report this strange story: and never since Sir, was it possible for Hermogenes, to see Cleodora; yet we understood by one of the sacrificers, that since she came into that place, she never enquired of any worldly businesse, except it were sometimes, she would aske if any knew in what part of the world Belesis lived; or in what part he died? But as none could inform her what was become of him, she was nothing satisfied: yet we were told she was something joyed to know, he was not returned into his own country, which made us thinke she had rather be her self miserable, then to know that he was happy: Yet for all this, she lived a most strict and exact life, and as regular to the orders, as any of the most ancient virgins of the temple, though she had yet six monethes to be as a probationer, before she made her last vowes. This Sir, was the adventure of Belesis and Hermogenes: and I have no more to tell you, unlesse that Hermogenes since Cleodora took this resolution, was a hundred and a hundred times at deaths door with sorrow: but beginning insensibly to consider, that he himself was in some sort a cause of her reclusement, and of his friends losse, reason began to relive in his heart; his passion by degrees grew lesse violent: and I have heard him wish divers times that he were able to call back Belesis, whom we thought to be dead in some unknown country: and therefore I cannot chuse but wonder that he should quarrell with Belesis when he first met with him: doubtlesse it must needs be Cleodoras picture which Belesis took from him; the sight whereof did surprise his reason as well as his eyes, which was the cause of it, since I am very certain that he preserved a good opinion, and much friendship for him, especially since his love to Cleodora began to lessen.

Alcenor having ended, Cyrus was well satisfied with his relation, and gave him thanks: Panthea, Araminta, Abradates, and Mazares did also thank him: afterwards upon examination of the matter, they could not conceive it any great piece of difficulty, to reconcile these two enimies. For since Hermogenes could live without Cleodora, and that his love to her was lessened, doubtlesse it was fit for him to yeeld unto Belesis, whose love was rather augmented then lessened: they conceived also that as for the picture, it was just it should remaine in the hands of him unto whom Cleodora gave it, and that if Hermogenes could not consent to renounce Cleodora, then to let that faire one know Belesis was alive and loved her still, and that Hermogenes loved her also: and that afterwards whether she would remain still in that place, or chuse one of them for her husband, they should conforme their wills thereunto accordingly, and become friends: but the best of the story is, when Alcenor went to Belesis, with intentions to acquaint him that Cleodora had not married Hermogenes; he found them talking together, having both of them desired their guards that they might meet: so that Belesis understanding that Hermogenes had not married her, his animositie against him so vanished, that he was full of tender expressions in words to him: making a short relation of the miserable life he had led: & so that Hermogenes being exceedingly moved with it, & considering that he was the cause of all his miseries, resolved to overcome himself, and consented to use his best endeavours to Page 193 get Cleodora out of her Cloister: Since Alcenor was friend unto them both, he embraced them with much joy; and carried them into Pantheas Chamber, more to thank the company for their patience in hearing their Adventures; then to be reconciled by them, since they had composed all differences themselves. Yet notwithstanding Cyrus willed them to promise the Queen of Susiana that they would live lovingly together: and so they did very willingly: Afterwards Cyrus and Mazares, accompanied with Belesis and all that followed him thither returned to the Camp. In the way thither, Chrisantes brought a man unto Cyrus whom he thought to be a spie, and upon whom they found a Letter directed unto the Princesse Araminta. This did constantly affirme, that he was not sent to know any thing concerning the Army, but only with a letter to the Princesse of Pontus: Cyrus taking this letter but not opening it, asked him from whom it came: but he answered he could not tell: All he knew was, that a man unknown to him, came into Heraclea where he dwelt, as it appeared by his language and taking him aside offered him a great recompence if he would undertake to carry a letter unto the Princesse Araminta, and a greater if he brought him back an answer, and told him that he would expect his return about eight dayes hence, and would be every morning by sun-rise at the Temple expecting the successe of his voyage: Cyrus knowing by the ingenuity of him who spoke, that he lyed not, did not set any guard upon him; but to testifie the respect he owed unto the Princesse Araminta, did send this letter unto that Princesse and never opened it: Commanding Chrisantes, who had orders to carry it, to observe her countenance whilst she read it: and in obedience to this command he went unto the Princesse, and delivered the letter: which as soon as ever she saw the superscription, she knew it to be the hand of Spitridates, so that opening it with extream desire to know where Spitridates was, she read these words,

THE UNFORTUNATE SPITRIDATES, UNTO THE PRINCESSE ARAMINTA.

Madam,

What sorrowes soever I suffered, yet I do declare in the frontispiece of my letter, that I do not intend to complain against you; but to observe all those due respects which I ever rendered unto you; and if in the sequell of my discourse any unbecoming word drop from my pen, it is against my will, After this Madam, I shall not doubt, to let you know the adventures of an unfortunate man who has no share in your affection, and shall tell you, that the prison in which my father keeps me for the love of you, they cannot torment me more then by telling me every day, that you have conquered the conqueror of all Asia, and if I durst, without offence, speak it, your heart is more illustrious in that victory, and more secure. I beseech you Madam, do but imagine how insupportable is my imprisonment, in hearing how kinde you are to him by a hundred particular circumstances: Yet I would not resolve upon death, till I had it under your hand that you have changed your thoughts, me thinks I owe so much respect unto those assurances of fidelity which you were pleased to honour me with, as not to condemne you before you answered for your self: Not that I do think you perfidious maugre all reports: But Madam that which most of all perplexeth me is, that knowing I resemble Cyrus, I know not how you can look upon him without a remembrance of unfortunate Spitridates: and I know not how you can remember him but you must also remember my loyall love, This resemblance 'twixt Cyrus and my self is not at all in our fortunes as in our faces: for he is happy, Page 194 am miserable: he is with you: I am absent, he a Conqueror, I a Captive: He can command most of all Asia, but I cannot command my self: But yet for all this; Madam, this Prince does all his actions more for his own then your glory: whereas on the contrary, I have renounced all mine to do you service: I have forsaken Crowns, suffered Banishment and imprisonment: and to speak all in few words, I have done all I could and consequently all I ought: A• I wish with all my soul Madam, that you could say as much, and say truly: However, since I never had the least desire of life, but only to do you service: and since I ought not to enjoy it unlesse you will looke favourably upon me, I beseech you be so generous as to pronounce my death under your hand, that I may have the glory of dying in obeying you.

Spitridates,

The Princesse Araminta blushed all the while she read this letter, and Chrisantes did so seriously observe her, that he made no question but it was a letter of some importance, though he could not imagine the truth: But whilst he was guessing at it, the Princesse of Pontus called for her dear Heseonida to shew her this letter, her self not being able to contain her wonder at the contents of it, nor well knowing whether or no, she should let Cyrus see it, because her modesty made a scruple of it. But Heseonida upon serious consideration of the businesse, and how he had sent this letter unopened unto her, she thought it but fit she should trust him with the secret of it. Moreover, this Princesse knowing very well how grossly Spitridates was mistaken, and that Cyrus was as constant unto the Princesse Mandana as her self was unto the Prince of Bithynia, she resolved to let him see it, lest he should imagine it to be of another nature then it was: so that without further delay, she writ these lines,

ARAMINTA UNTO CYRUS.

Sir,

IT is fit my confidence in you should equall your civility: and since you would not open that letter which by the lawes of warry you very well might, I will shew you one which I ought to conceal, if I did not think you as discreet as you are generous. You may judge by it Sir, after you have read it, how ingenious fortune is to persecute me, since unlesse you will be pleased to tend me your helping hand you will augment my miseries: I beseech you pardon the crime of unfortunate Spitridates, in thinking you to be guilty of one, and help me to lament his miseries and to sweeten mine: you may if you please, Sir, send back this letter unto me by him who brought it, to the end I may know a little better, in what condition that unfortunate Prince is;

Araminta.

This Princesse had no sooner done writing, but she inclosed the letter of Spitridates in her own, and fealing them up gave them both unto Chrisantes, who returned to his master after he had received as much civility as the perplexities of that Princesse would permit her: After which, she began to repeat all his misfortunes, with resenting Page 195 aggravations. In the mean while Cyrus, who longed for an occasion to oblige her, as soon as he had read the letter of Spitridates and her own, did send it back unto her by him that brought it, and answered her in these termes.

CYRUS UNTO THE PRINCESSE ARAMINTA.

Madam,

Since the lawes of war ought never to contradict those respects which are due unto persons of your Quality and virtue, doubtlesse I have done no more then what I was obliged unto: But for your part Madam, you have gone farr beyond what might be required at your hands. All I can say, unto you by way of gratitude for the confidence you have in my discretion, is to assure you, that the Prince is only mistaken in Name, when he speaks unto you of that affection, which your merits hath planted in my heart, since certainly my love of you is as perfectly pure, as his love is constant: I am confident Madam that what I now say, will not offend you, but that you will be pleased if I conjure you so to transact with Spitridates (whose virtue makes me admire him) that he will looke upon me as his friend, as I am resolved to be and already am, that so justifying me, you may thereby justifie your self also: And in the interim I promise you, maugre the hatred which doubtlesse he conceives against me, that I will be very carefull of restoring him unto his liberty, as soon as ever the Gods have made me so happy as to release the Princesse Mandana.

Cyrus.

This Letter being given unto him who brought that of Spitridates, he was conducted unto the Princesse, who made no question of being by him fully informed of the fortune and condition of that Prince: But she was astonished when she found he did not know so much as that he was a Prisoner: He could only tell her, that about some moneth since, there were some prisoners brought from Heraclea in the night time, and that they were closely kept, but he could not tell who they were: Then she asked him what was reported of Spitridates? to which he answered that none knew what was become of him, and that all the people both in Pontus and Bithynia did much lament him. After this, she enquired concerning Arbianes and Aristheus, who he said were in health: So that since she could not receive any further satisfaction from him, she resolved not only to send him back with a letter, but also to send one of her servants with him, to speak with the man who was to meet him in the Temple of Heraclea: Then without more delay, the Princesse Araminta writ unto Spitridates, and chusing out a servant to send back with him who brought the letter, she recompensed him in an ample manner: for though she was a prisoner, yet such was the generosity of Cyrus, as he allowed her whatsoever she pleased: In the mean time, the treaty concerning the exchange of this Princesse for the Prince Artamas went slowly on: for Cressus did so delay the business, as that there was not one Article resolved upon the day before the Treaty was to end: Cyrus no sooner consented unto any thing, but Cressus raised a new difficulty in the business: and his secret designe to gain time, did so manifestly appear, that though it concerned the liberty of the Prince Artamas, yet the King of Phrygia was the first that told Cyrus, it was not fit to treat any longer with such a Prince as was not sincere in his business: and the rather, because it was reported there was great joy in the Army of Cressus, for the arrivall of some Egyptian Page 196 forces, which were reported to be commanded by a Prince of a most gallant deportment. So that perceiving this Treaty was onely a colour wherby to protract the war: It was resolved to prolong it no longer, what propositions soever the enemies made, yet would not Cyrus break it until the last minut of it was expired: but as soon as ever that was, and the Commissioners for treaty on both sides being come back, Cyrus renewed the war; And began to draw up his forces, to passe over the river Halis at that passage, where the brother of Andramites commanded: and since there was in that place, a great and stately Castle, as soon as the Army had passed the river, and the Fororn hope of Cyrus had beaten back the scouts of Cressus, to the very wals of Sardis, Cyrus caused the Queen of Susiana, the Princess Araminta, and all the rest of the Ladies to be brought into that Castle, to the end that Abradates might not be troubled to passe over the river, when he went to see Panthea: in the mean time this great soul which was capable of many things at once, in the midst of all his amorous sufferings, was as vigilant as any young ambitious man, and as prudent as any old weather-beaten Captain he did not onely know how many troops he had, what ammunition, and what magazins, and artillery, but he knew also who commanded every particular squadron, and who was fittest to be trusted in any dangerous expedition: he knew the capacities of every Captain, even to the personal valour of every private souldier: so that when he drew up his army into Battalia, every one was ranked in such a place as was fittest for him: but whilst his diligence was in the ordering of every thing, it was much murmured in the army, that Araspes should revolt unto the enemy, and intelligence was one day brought unto him, when the kings of Phrygia, and Hircania, Tigranes, Mazares, and many others were present, that this Araspes was the onely adviser of Cressus how to rank his men in the day of battle; and as some prisoners which were taken were brought unto Cyrus, and as he asked them, how they thought Cressus would order his army? they answered they heard say, that all would be disposed according to the counsel of a certain Medean who was come unto their side, and who advised them to alter that order which they were accustomed to observe. The prisoners had no sooner given this answer, but every one knew it was Araspes they spake of: but they were all much amazed to see Cyrus in lieu of being angry against him, onely smil'd and said, that he wished this Medean in his power. Yet he had no sooner said so, but without any further reflection upon it he called a council of war, to consult upon the business in general yet there did not need any where Cyrus was: for he so strengthened his advice with such & so many prevalent reasons, that none ever opposed him: so that the Kings of Assyria, Phrygia, Hircania, Susiana, and Mazares, Tigranes, Persodes, Phraartes, Gobrias, Gadates, Anaxaris, and every one referring all things to his conduct: he began to consider of all things requisit for the march of his Troops, and for the day of battle; in order to that he caused all the officers of his Armie to come before him, and gave every one of them his particular order what to do: so that their business was onely to obey his orders, and that was enough: it is your care, (said he unto the Captains) to inclose the worst of your souldiers with the best, that their valour may on all sides be exemplary, and keep them from running away: afterwards, he commanded the Captains what confidence so ever they had in their men, yet to exhort them unto their duty, and be sure to punish cowards telling them, that the onely way to make their souldiers invincible, was to make their souldiers to stand in more fear of their Commanders, then of their enemies; after that, he gave all necessary orders for the march of his Artillery and baggage, as well as for the Chariots of war: he ordered how the Regiments should march one after another, and was very circumspect that none should be displeased with his imployment, he took order for the Archers which were to be carried in those Chariots, assigning every one in all this great Armie his particular dutie, and his soul was of such a large capacite, as made it apparent that he could govern the whole universe with as much ease as others could a private family. This one thing he did especially recommend unto all his officers, that those that were of the Reregard should always keep themselves in as ready a posture to fight, as if they were in the front of the battle. All things being thus ordered, and it being resolved to match the next morning, Cyrus the night before went to take his leave of the Princess accompanied with most of any qualitie in the Army, Page 197 and amongst the rest those that had nearest relation unto that place, as Phraartes, Andramites, and Ligdamis: who knowing that Cressus would surprise the Castle of Hermes, and that his father who was governour, would be forced to declare himself, he made no difficulty at all in fighting for Cyrus, since so many other Lidians would be in his Army. Cyrus, being full of generous civility, told all the Ladies in general, that he would do all he could to prevent their shedding of tears after the victory which he hoped to obtain, assuring the Princes Araminta for her particular, that he would not fail in any thing he had promised Cyrus had that night as much joy in his aspect as might easily perswade unto a belief of a happy successe in that battle which he was to fight; Panthea also added unto the hopes of it, imagining he knew well enough that his enemies were not so strong as they gave out: but he told her, that on the contrary he understood there was an extraordinary gallant Egyptian Prince come unto his enemies, and that the Prince of Mysia was also arrived at Sardis, and further that a valiant Jo[nian] Commander called Arimaspes was come with Auxiliaries to the aid of Cressus: but since the valiant Abradates is on my side (said he) and since Justice is also on our side, I shall not despair of victory: but I shall have this consolation at the least, that I will either get the victory or die: after this, he took his leave of them and all the rest of the Ladies, every one of them commending his civilitie, and praying for his prosperity. Yet Phraartes could not obtain one smile from the Princes Araminta, whose sorrows for the prisonment of Spitridates, and fears of the battel were so great, that she hardly took any notice of him: as for Ligdamis, he received all imaginable expressions of tendemesse from his dear Leonis: but for Andramites, he saw Doralisa onely in termes of civilitie, yet he did not think himself altogether miserable, since she looked so well as in termes of civility upon him: in the mean time Abradates took not his last leave till the next morning: but as he was ready to put on his Arms which he used to wear, Panthea sent him a most magnificent sute which she had secretly caused to be made, and which she trimmed up with all her jewels; His helmet glittered with abundance of rich Diamonds, and had a plume of purple colour; the rest of the arms were suitably rich, and of the same colour with his plume: so that Abradates wondering to see a stately sute of arms, began his thanks unto his dear Panthea, by complaining against her for dressing his arms with her jewels, which were for her self at a feast of rejoycing after the victory. I have so great an opinion of your valour (said she unto him) and we are so indebted unto the illustrious Cyrus, that I thought it requisite you should wear very remarkable arms, to the end your glorious acts, may the more easily be discerned by him in the day of battle: but for all the courage of Panthea, she could not pronounce these words without a shower of teares: she endeavoured to hide them, lest Abradates should take them as a sad omen, nor would that Prince take notice of them, lest it should too much melt her heart and his own: but many expressions of an inviolable eternal affection passed between them: and he promised so to acquit himself in the sight of Cyrus, as should become him, so that insensibly ingaging themselves in a discourse of Cyrus, they did infinitely commend him for his civil usage of them, Panthea making the time as long as she could before they bad this cruel adieu, purposely the longer to enjoy the sight of her dear Abradates, who was never so handsome, and gallant as in this glorious sute of arms. But the time did come that he must leave her, and he embraced his dear Panthea, and then pronouncing the word adieu, he went out of her chamber, to mount into a most magnificent Chariot of war which waited for him at the Castle-gate, Panthea following him with all the rest of the Ladies which were prisoners. And he espying her with such a sadness in his countenance as was not suitable to his great and heroique soul, he went back unto her, and taking her by her fair hand, which he kissed with a sad devotion, and being desirous she would go in again, I pray unto the gods, (cried he out) I may behave my self as one that is worthy to be Pantheas husband, and Cyrus his friend, after which conjuring her once more to retire, he left her, and went hastily into his Chariot: but she was not retired till he was quite out of sight, he still looking upon her as long as he could. But as if the constancy of Panthea had been inspired that she should never see him again, she sounded, and her women were forced to carry her to bed.

In the mean time, never was such a glorious sight as this Army, for not Page 198 onely Cyrus, the king of Assyria, Mazares, and all the rest of the Princes were most magnificently armed; but there was not a common souldier, which shined not in his arms: so that the sun shining that day without a cloud, made the march of this army the most glorious sight that ever eye beheld. All the Cavalry had marions of burnish Brasse, with white feathers, their suits of arms carnation colour, and their lances all gilt or imbroidered. As for Cyrus his arms were the same of gold, which he wore that day he gained the victory over the King of Assyria: the horse he rid on, had also the honour to serve him in many of his victories, and particularly in that: so that the king of Assyria knowing these armes, he sighed, and could not chuse to say unto Cyrus, I pray heavens, (said he unto him) that those arms which now you wear, prove as fortunate against Cressus and the kings of Pontus, as they did against me, and I beseech the gods I may make better use of mine this day then I did on that. You did such glorious things that day, (replid Cyrus modestly) that if fortune had not been your foe, Cixares had not been conquerour, and therefore I have greater hopes this day in your valour then in mine own. Then Mazares, Tigranes, Phraartes, Anaxares, Gobrias, Gadates, and all the volunteers coming unto him, he commanded that all the army should march; he himself did lead up the vanguard with the king of Assyria, unto whom he gave the right hand, and offered him the command of it: Hidaspes commanded the main body of the battle, wherein were all the Homotimes: the King of Phrygia the rare guard: and Abradates al the Chariots of war, which made a distinct body of it self: Cyrus then beginning to advance, having first sent out scouts to discover the enemy, gave motion to this huge body, who with one wink dispersed spirits into it. Cressus also and the King of Pontus prepared for a general combate, and neglected nothing that might get a victory. Tis true, there was a vast difference between these two armies: for hope was in that of Cyrus, and fear was in the Lydian kings. Not that he was any thing inferior in numbers, especially since the arival of the Egyptian Auxiliaries, and of those forces which the Prince of Mysia and Arimaspes brought up: but the very name of Cyrus was grown so terrible every where, that it was no sooner known in the camp of Cressus this prince was come over the river Halis, but fear seised upon the hearts of all his souldiers, and the night following their frontier Guards gave many false alarmes to their own side, for they apprehended such fears as made them believe they saw what they saw not, so that they stood all night in their arms. Cressus then fearing lest this general terour should grow to be one of those panic fears which hath ruined whole armies, without a blow, resolved to expresse some courage, and by his example to infuse it into others, that he might meet Cylrus: so that the morning after, he disencamped, and advanced a little beyond Thylbarra, at the same time Cyrus was drawing towards him: so that these two huge armies encamped that night within fifty furlongs of each other. Cyrus because he would not be surprised, passed over all that night without any sleep: and the King of Assyria and Mazares being as vigilant as he, they were witnesses of the pains he took in every thing, and how he neglected nothing that might obtain a victory. In the mean time these three illustrious Rivals spent all the night together in one tent, but with different thoughts, though Mandana was the onely object of them all. As for Cyrus his certainty of Mandanas love, maugre all the manaces of the gods, afforded him many hours of joy amidst his sufferings: whereas on the contrary, the king of Assyria, maugre the favourable oracle which he received at Babylon, knowing he was not loved, and that Cyrus was many times possessed with such fits of fury, as he had much ado to master them. Mazares, though his thoughts were lesse violent, yet was his sorrow a heavy load upon his heart, for when he began to consider, how he had imposed upon himself a necessity of never pretending further then to the frendship of Mandana, he knew not whether he was able to keep within those limits which he had prescribed unto himself: on the other side, the king of Pontus, thought himself as miserable as any, especially when he considered that it was not a victory could make him happy, since when he had conquered Cyrus, he could not conquer Mandana, unto whom he had not spoke one word of the battle towards, lest it should trouble her too much: for it may well be said, never was ravisher lesse violent, and more respective then himself: so that Mandana and the princes Palmis not knowing they were ready to fight, for their liberties, did both condole and comfort each other. Yet was Mandana very sorry she Page 199 did not credit Mazares, for she understood by Cyleneisa how that Prince was really gone unto Cyrus. The Prince Artamas for his part, he did suffer unconceivable torments of mind, not onely by reason of his own imprisonment, but for the Princesse Palmis, and in thinking upon the Battle which was ready to be given: yet as brave as hee was, he was something glad that he was not to bee in it, because the

Princesse Palmis could not hereafter upbraid him for fighting against the King her father. But as restless as these three, nay all these illustrious persons were, I think it may truly be said, that Cyrus being most amorous, was most tormented, or at least most diligent to obtain the victory: For no sooner did Aurora begin to gild the clouds from the East, then hee awaked all his Camp, by sound of Trumpets, Drums, Fifes, and Howboys: so that all this vast Army, was in a moment in their Armes, and ranked under their colours, ready to obey their Generall; who, being as full of Piety as valour, commanded a Sacrifice to be offered unto the Gods, and to beg victory from them: and willed the Sacrificers to use no other Ceremonies then after the Persian custome: so that the Magi who made preparations for this Ceremony, made choice of a Hill, which was in the midst of the Camp, to sacrifice unto the Sunne, which they called, Ocosmades, and unto Venus Urania, whom they called Mitra, and unto Jupiter; Cyrus making choice of these three divinities: to the end that Jupiter might give him power to vanquish; that the Sunne might shine upon his victory; and that Venus Urania might favour his designe of Mandanaes releasement; Since the Persians ne'lver use to sacrifice, but under the Canopy of Heaven, nor dresse up any Magnificent Altars, nor light any Fire, nor use any Crowns of flowers: the Ceremony was not long, for the Sacrificers do nothing but put a wreath of Myrtle upon their heads, and carry the Victims up to the Hill they make choise of: and there they invoke the Gods unto whom they sacrifice, and according to the Persian custome, which is ne'lver to make any prayers but for all the Persians in generall, excepting for their King, they ask of those divinities all that may be glorious unto their nation, and by consequence victory: Afterwards they pray for all their Army, and for Ciaxares onely in particular: Cyrus desiring to make no distinction between Persians and others; In the mean time, how early soever the Magi were, those of Cressus were before them: 'Tis true, it was in a different manner: For since he and the King of Pontus, and the Prince of Myssia, and all the other great Commanders, had observed that their souldiers stood in fear of their enemies, and that the very name of Cyrus struck a terror into them, they were them selves afraid lest this panick fear should put their Army into disorder: Therefore since they were to fight a deciding battle, they thought best to infuse mettle into their men by some rules of religion. And in order to that, they brought into use an ancient sacrifice used in wars, in the time when Heraclides raignd in Lydia: And about two hours after midnight, they make ready their Altars in the midst of the Camp, all the Souldiers being drawn about them as in Battle array: After this, they make about these Altars, twelve fires, which shews unto the Souldiers a great number of Victims, which the Sacrificers kill before them: About these Altars, fires, and bloody Victims, stand two hundred men with swords drawn in their hands: After which, these men do swear all the Officers, ne'lver to leave fighting untill they have met with deaths or victory; then they call all the Souldiers one by one, and make them promise and swear with most terrible Impratijons upon themselves and their posterity, to be obedient unto all that Cressus, or their Officers shall command them: and never to flee from battle, but every one to kill his fellow that shall offer to give ground before victory be obtained, and if there were any which out of fear of such a strange sacrifice, would not swear, these men with swords in their hands were to kill them; and by this cruell example to affright the rest to promise what was desired them, though perhaps they had no intention to keepit: yet notwithstanding since such things as these do extremely move the hearts of the multitude, the souldiers in the Army of Cressus in generall, did beleieve they shall become more valiant after this Ceremony: so that hopes succeeding their fears; the Army of Cressus began to be confident of happy successe in Battle.

However, the King of Lydia did not trust more to the multitude of his men, then he did of some advantages which might be taken, and therefore he advanced to Hyberra, so that Cyrus was much amazed, when after his sacrifices ended, and day began to break, he saw his enemies removed from the place he thought them to be, coconceiving that they Page 200 had possessed themselves of a place of great advantage for themselves: and the very truth is, if this Prince had not been full as wise as he was valiant, he had exposed his Army to an inevitable ruine. Thyberra was a Town of an indifferent largenesse, sealed upon a pleasant Hill, some thirty furlongs from Sardis: at the foot of this hill ran a little river, which running round the walls made the accesse very difficult: So that it seemed, Cressus thought he stood in need of all advantages to deal with such a Prince as Cyrus was. As this Hero was ever used to seek his enemies, and never to turn his back upon them, he drew up into battalia upon another hill, opposite to that which Creslsus possessed, and seemed so exceedingly desirous to be fighting, that he stood in need of all his prudence, to stop the heat of that courage, which desired to hazard all then not fight. Yet upon better consideration, finding that if he lost this Battle his glory would receive a foil, and Mandana would not be released: he examined the matter a little better. He saw that the right wing of Cressus was sheltred with the Town of Thyberra, which on that side was naturally fortified, by the fall of many Torrents which time had made so deep and impetuous, that the passages were not fordable: Cyrlus also saw that the main body of his enemies was most judiciously placed, so that more advantage could not be devised: for indeed it was in a little wood, which nature had so intrenched, that all art could not mend it: As for his left wing, it also had possession of another Hill, the accesse unto which was through many ditches: so that it were fond imprudence to fight vpon such disadvantages, especially since Cressus was more numerous then himself. The King of Lydia hoped that Cyrus would have done as hee did at Artaxates, and in Assyria: so that Cyrus hazarding all, and he nothing, he might chance get the victory. But since prudence will alter thoughts according to occasions, Cyrus who did hazard all in Armenia to deliver Mandana, where he might well in reason do it, would not do so in Lydia, where he should hazard the losse of Mandana and the victory also: yet hee used all possible stratagems to make Cressus quit the ground he was in possession of, and to provoke him to fight upon reasonable termes. It may truely be said, all military Art was used upon this occasion, to draw his enemy out of his holds: so that every day both Armies had continually skirmishes, though Cyrus could not engage his enemy in a main Battle: In the mean while the place where he was encamped was very incommodious for him, for his enemies being master of the little river which ran by Thyberra, he wanted drink both for horse and man, and likewise all manner of forrage. Cyrus then resolving to disincamp, resolved to quarter neer Pactolus, where his Army might have plenty of all provisions, which he wanted in the quarters he quitted, and where he might observe the motion of his enemies, which way soever they moved, and force them to fight if they stirred: the question was, whether they should remove in the night, or in the day time: for though prudence told Cyrus it should be in the night, yet his great soul would not permit him: his chief reason why he desired to follow the motions of his courage was, because he was in hope Cressus would follow him, and so he should face about and fight him. But since there was some danger in that attempt, and that good successe was doubtful: he resolved upon an honourable Retreat, in the face of an Army much stronger then himself, and commanded by Princes expert in Command: so that at break of day his first Brigade began to march, the second followed; afterwards the Artillery, and Chariots marched in the head of the Infantry. The Orders of Cyrus were so well executed, that the Reitreat was without disorder, except the first Brigade of the right wing, wherein Cyrus was, because the left wing of Cressus, which was opposite to it, and wherein the Lydijans and Mariandins were, was best able to fall upon this Prince, because there was fewler obstacles on that side then any other: and they left them to charge that Prince, whom not a Lydian durst look in the face upon even termes, nor now assault him but because he retreated: In the mean time Cyrus commanded that body of Horse which Hydaspes commanded, to keep their ground upon the plain, to the end his Brigade might retreat between the Horse, as indeed they did: But those forces which Artabases commanded that day, who retreated with the rest of the Army, as well as those which Anaxaris commanded, were assaulted by the Mariandines, who received them with much courage, especially Anaxaris who indeed did miracles at that time. But do what they could, the Troops which they commanded were worsted, Anaxaris was wounded, and taken prisoner, and A <...> s more happy then he, disingaged himself from amongst Page 201 them, and got amongst his own party. The enemy encouraged by this prosperous belginning had advanced their victory, if Hydaspes had not stopped them, and given them such a sharp repulse, as merited the acclamations and praise of both Armies: for hee charged with such furious valour, as made it appear he merited the favour of Cyrus: and fighting both for his own glory, and the glory of his Master, he beat the Mariandines, and Lydians, as farre as half way up the Hill from whence they descended. But three squadrons comming fresh upon him, and all the Cavalry of Cressus being commanded to oppose the valour of Hydaspes, He and his forces were forced to submit unto such a multitude, and retreated in confusion, especially because they retreated down the Hill. Cyrus, whose prudence could not be deluded, did foresee this, and commanded one part of his Troops to draw up into Battalia on the top of the next Hill, and ordered his Brigade to keep the plain, to assist the retreat of Hydaspes; and to that end he went from squadron to squadron, to exhort them all, to shew themselves worthy of that good opinion which he had of them, and their courage, and indeed, he had a confidence that they would do as heretofore they were accustomed, and never forsake him: Yet as he charged those who forced his men to retreat in disorder, these same squadrons who promised never to forsake him, nor never yet had done so, were blasted with that same fear which heretofore they were wont to astonish others: so that whether the multitude of their enemies did amaze them, or whether the tumultuous retreat of their own side did shake their courage, they forsook Cyrus: so that there was no other course for him, but to think of saving himself, that he might save all his Army, yet he would not resolve upon that course, untill he was driven to the danger of being either killed or taken, more then once: so loath was he to retreat from his enemies, who never met him but were beaten. Those of his men whom fear frighted out of judgement, ran away to the bottom of the Hill, where all the Infantry stood as a Reserve: but those who had so much courage as to look danger in the face, and retain their reason, stayed at a passe in the plain, where there was a little blinde, which did in some sort hide them. Cyrus who at this time had his spirits as free, and his soul as seeing as if he were in no danger, spying some of his men which made a halt in this place, belgan to rally as many of them, as he could together, and courageously facing about upon his enemies did not only stop their pursuit, but did vigorously repulse them, and beat them up the Hill which Cyrus his men had quitted: After this Heroick Act, Cyrus meeting with the King of Assyria, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania; and all the Princes of his Army, he fully determined to give Battle, and not to alter from the first Orders which he had given: and indeed there needed no other alteration, unlesse that the first Brigade of the right wing should change places with the second: Cyrus not conceiving them yet recovered out of those fears into which they were driven, and therefore would not expose them to the first shock of the Battle: not but that there is ever some danger to change Orders in the face of an ene|my, yet the change of those two Brigades was done in such excellent order, and regular motion, that the least confusion did not appear: for commanding a counter|march, they passed from ones place to the others, between rank, and rank, and kept their distances and motions so even, that in a very little time, they were ready to fight, as if there had been no change at all: All the Calvalry which Cyrus had rallied were sent unto such Quarters as were fit to be possessed: and all things were so soon, and so well ordered, that it was not discemeable any men were lost in this retreat; the losse whereof in reality was very small. In the mean time, Cyrus who was always circumspect to chuse the most advantagious ground, especially in the day of Battle, took the right wing, and quartered them with the first Brigade, whose squadrons were composed of Persians, Medes and Cappadoceans, and placed a Body of Volun|tiers, who desired the honour to fight where he did, between two squadrons which Gadates commanded, in the head of which this Prince would fight: The most emilent of these Volunteers were Persodes, Andramites, Ligdamis, Timr+n, Sosules, Her|mogenes, Belesis, Orsanus, and Tegeus: Feraulus, and Ortalques alwayes keeping close to their Masters: Those who this day served under this Prince, were the King of Assyria, who commanded the first Brigade, assisted by Aglatidas: Tigranes kept close unto the person of Cyrus, and was adjutant unto him as Aglatidas was unto the King of Assyria. Artabanus commanded the Cavalry of this Brigade: In the mean Page 202 while Mazares took upon him the command of the left wing, the first division whereof was equal in number of squadrons, to the first division of the right wing: Gobrias commanding this first division, was assisted by Adusius: Phraartes commanded the cavalry of this Brigade. The first division of the infantry marching between these two wings, consisted of five battalions: the artillery marched in the head of the infantry: and so did the hundred armed charriots under the commande of Abrada|tes, whose statly charriot was drawn by eight of the finest horses ever eye beheld: the second division of the right wing was commanded by Artabases, as the second division of the left was by Chrisantes: the second Brigade of infantry was divided also into five battalions; many squadrons of horse were placed between the two Brigades of infantry, & all the body of Persian Cavalry, wherein were the Homotimes, and the Assy|rian Infantry commanded by Hidaspes, made up the body of the battle: The body of re|serves, composed of Phrygians and Hircanians, were commanded by the Kings of Phrygia and Hircania. All things being thus ordered, there was such an interior joy appeared in the aspect of Cyrus, as inspired courage into the soules of all those that looked upon him: But that the same spirit of valour which did animate him, might be infused into all the army, he commanded a muster of all his troopes, and going from Division to Division, from Brigade to Brigade, from Squadron to Squa|dron, and from Rank to Rank, he dissipated all feares out of cowards, and inspired valour into them, and the most courageous also.

Remember my Companions (would he say unto the first squadrons) that it concerns you to fight this day, not only to get victory, but to keep that Glory which we have gotten at other times. Afterwards turning towards other Troops, Forget not (would he say unto them) that those who fight ill, are in more danger then those who fight well, and that in all places and fights, there is more safty in keeping ground then flying. Then going a little further and speak[ing] unto others: Make it appear Souldiers (said he) that you know how to vanquish by Art, and never Triumph by hazard: Remember (would he say to others,) that most of our enemies have been vanquished by us before, and that they never vanquished you: Let not the multitude of our enemies fright you, (would he say unto such whose val[lo]ur he suspected) for if you have but more heart then they, you will easily overcome them though they were as many more. I should do you wrong (would he say unto such whom he desired to flatter) if I should exhort you to fight; It is enough if you do but as you were wont. Moreover my Companions, (said this Prince and went a little further) Remember that our Cause is Just, and the gods are Just. I know you are brave and Gallant men, and that you were never overcome, and that you justly expect great Recompence. And I dare boldly promise both it and victorie unto you, if you will but do, as I will do my self.

After, this Cyrus recommended three things especially unto them all. The one was, to observe each other in their march, that thereby the order of Battle might not be broken, but that their divisions might be even, and their distances equal: Page 203 The second was, neither to be too backward when they charged, nor too precipit[at]ly forward: And the last was, to let their enemies shoot all their Arrows, and throw all their darts, before they began to shoot and throw theirs. Afterwards Cyrus going to Abradates, told him that he expected to be a debtor unto him, for the victory which he hoped for: But the King of Susiana seeing himself very disad[vantageously] placed, answered, that he stood most in need of his help to get the victory, and that he desired some Persians would come and teach him to fight. After which, Cyrus still exhorting his souldiers, returned to the head of the right wing in which he was to fight: and he had no sooner took his place, but Araspes who had disingaged himself from the Lydians, came into the Army of Cyrus, and presented himself unto him. I am now come Sir, (said he unto him) to expiate the crime which I committed, by dying in your service, as I writ to you that I intended when I went first unto your enemies, purposely to give you intelligence. We have so much need of valiant men, replied Cyrus, that as faulty as you are, I cannot chuse but be glad to see you: and when you have given me a short account of what you know concerning the enemy, I will assigne you your place to fight with Andra[m]ites. Then Araspes whispered with Cyrus, and told him all which he thought of most concernment: As soon as Cyrus had well considered upon the advice which Araspes gave him, he saw the Lydian Cavalry appear upon the hill which was opposit to Cyrus, and to divide themselves into right and left wings, to make room for the maine Battle of Cressus. Cyrus seeing by this, that now his enemies would fight, was infinitely joyed to see that his seeming retreat had deceived them, and invited them to fight in hopes of a victory, upon more easie termes now then ever, by reason of the disorder which happened. In the meane time, the Army of Cyrus was in a condition to fight: and that of Cressus was not: for the great diligence of this famous conqueror, surprised the spirits of those, who would have surprised him. And indeed without any delay, or giving his enemies so much time as to rank them[selves], Cyrus marched up to them, the sun being then three hours and a half high: untill now the Army of Cressus was full of hopes to be victorious. But as soon as ever they saw Cyrus come to them with full resolution to fight, their confidence failed, and victory became doubtfull. The word of Battle which Cyrus gave unto all his Troops, was, JUPITER our PROTECTOR. But all the Army animated by the presence of a Prince, whom all the souldiers called a second Mars, in lieu of Crying Jupiter our Protector, made the aire eccho with the name of the god of war: so that all crying out Mars, Mars, the noise of so many severall voices, mingled with the Musick of Trumpets, Fifes, Hoboyes and Drums, seemed to be acclamations of victory, though it was only the beginning of combat. The Charriots and the Artillery of Cyrus did much more execution then those of his ene[m]ies, for they rained most terrible clouds and showers of arrows upon the Lydian troopes: and the artillery made such impetuous shots of stones upon the enemy, that they were exceedingly annoyed, insomuch, as they had much ado to keep in or[der]: yet Cressus and the King of Pontus, seeing they were forced to fight, did shew much gallantry, and came up to fight with great resolution: yet were they put to one notable disadvantage, for they were forced to rank themselves into Battalia as they marched: so that it was a hard matter for a great body not settled in order, to sustaine the shooke of another which is better ordered. But yet at last they ranked their troopes: The Prince Myrsiles notwithstanding his imperfection, commanded the two divisions of the right wing, being assisted by Pactias who gave orders for him, this Prince having only the honour of the command, not being able to do any other service, then by his personal Valour. The of Prince Myssia, and a Lydian of qualitie called Artibies, commanded the two divisions of the left wing: Arimaspes the valiant Jonian Captain, commanded all the infantry: and the King of Pontus all the other troopes which were as reserves: Cressus was placed in the head of a body of Lydian Cavalry in the midst of the battle: these two great armies, were some thirty paces from each other, when Cyrus perceived the left wing of his enemy sent three volleys of arrows upon the right wing of his, so that this Prince desiring that his men should not shoot theirs before the enemy had thrown all their darts, did make a stop to hinder them, and commanded that none Page 204 should draw an arrow untill their Enemies had done theirs. This command was as exactly obeyed as Judiciously given: from whence did arise three considerable advanta[ge]s: for it did redouble the fury of the troops in restraining them, it put order into all the divisions and ranks: and by receiving upon themselves all the arrowes and darts of their enemies, they exhausted them of all at the very first shock: This being the state of things, The Prince of Myssia to signall himself, advanced with his first division against that of Cyrus, who at the same time advanced to receive him: These two Divisions, being come within reach of darts, did both make a stand a pretty while, both desiring the other should begin: At last the Lydians more impatient, began to obscure the Ayre with an incredible Cloud of Arrowes and Darts: at the same time Cyrus Commanding his men to doe as he did, he threw the first dart, and drawing their swords, rushed upon the squadron which opposed him, and did such miraculous acts, that all he did before was nothing in comparison of this: his first division courageously following him, charged the first division of the Lydians with such fury, that they entirely routed them. Cyrus seeing he had taught them in that place how to get a victory, disengaged himself from amongst them, to see what other place stood in need of his help: But he was no soone[r] from amongst them, then the second division of the enemies seconding their first, did so repulse that from which Cyrus departed, that all the king of Assyrias valour could not save himself from being taken: 'Tis true he made a gallant resistance, and charged through both divisions of his enemies: Tigranes also was unhappily wound[ed], and maugre his valour, taken prisoner, though he did most gallant things in the sight of Cyrus; nor did he render himself untill his horse was killed, and was over[numbered] by a multitude.

This being the state of things; the second division to repair the misfortune which it had in his retreat, had command to relieve the first: Which it courageously did under the conduct of Artabases. In the mean while Cyrus having rallied his first division, fell upon them on one side whilst Artabases was on the other: And both this Prince and Aglatidas did such wonders, that the whole power of their enemies was not able to stop their valour: Yet the combat was a while very doubtfull: and victo[ry] knew not which side to take, for sometimes the Troops of Cyrus would so presse upon the Lydian Troops with such fury, as one would have thought them quite routed and torne in pieces: And sometimes they would so rally, and charge afresh, as would make those who routed them before to stagger: That which to the glory of Cyrus was most remarkable, was, that there was not one of his squadrons squand[er]ed by any of the Lydian Troops, which Cyrus did not rally, and bring up again to fight with as much courage and judgement, and quicknesse, as if he had been more then in one place at once, so ready was he to do all that his great soul d[re]d prompt unto him: And it is not imaginable how oft he charged, and how many single combates he had: He no sooner had vanquished in one place, but he sought out a new subject for his valour: and being not contented with overcomming all he met with, he sought out for the King of Pontus with extream desire: But all in vain, for fortune would not let them meet. In the mean while he met with fresh resistance, and the resolutenesse of his enemies gave him an ample subject for his prudence and valour; So that not enduring that the victory should continue any longer upon doubtfull tear <

...> s, he caused his body of reserve to march up; The King of Lydia did the like but with different successe; For the Kings of Phrygia and Hircania did so sharply charge their enemies, and were so exceedingly animated by the example of Cyrus, whom they saw do such incredible acts of valour, as they had the honour to second him in his courage, and: outed the left wing and body of his enemies reserve, who were forced to fly & yield unto the valour of a Prince whom none could surmount; In the mean while, since the whole Army of Cyrus was inspired with the same spirit, Mazares, where he was, did as much as any brave Prince could do, who desired death and victory; for he charged the Prince Myrsiles and Pactias with extraordinary valour. He did not only go unto them with a resolution of fury, but seeing they would not come unto him, because they were on a very advantageous ground, he went up the hill unto them, with incredible courage, though without any disorder or indiscretion, and charged them so hotly, that he routed them; yet one of his squadrons, passing up a place of difficulty, Page 205 was repulsed by one of the enemies squadrons, but Gobrias releevd them, and forced the Lydian Squadron to do like their fellows, which was to fly away in disorder; Yet The second division of the enemy attempted to relieve their first but Chri[s]tantes, comming up to Mazares, the right wing of the Lydians was entirely squand[er]ed; So that Mazares now made no doubt of victory, though himself was two or three times in danger to be taken by the enemy. The body of the battle, in the head of which were the Charriots, had no mean share in the victory; and Abradates did more then he promised his dear Panthea, and indeed more then he should have done; for he did so expose himself unto dangers, as if he had either known himself invulnerable, or else desired death; he drove the eight horses which drew his char[ri]ot with such fury, as he tumbled down his enemies, and forced their charriots to fly: The rest of the Charriots which followed him, doing the same, struck terror into all that opposed them; Some of the enemies charriots fled; others were tumbled over and broken: all were rendred uselesse to the Lydians. Abradates having done this, and seeing the Egyptian Battalia keep their ground, went with his Charriots to rumble amongst them and overthrew all he met, either by the impetuosity of his Charriots, or by his sword, or with the Sythes wherewith the Charriots were ar[m]ed: Never was sight more terrible to behold then this: The horses trampled upon the bodies of dead and dying men: The Sythes cut off others: and the wheels ran over those which the horses and Sythes tumbled down: But alas, the victory of Abradates proved fatal[ly] unto him: for the field was so strewed with horses and dead men, with broken armes, and overturned Charriots, that he could not passe but over Mountains of these mingled together: so that the wheels sometimes went high, and sometimes low, and his Chariot unfortunately overturned maugre the skill of him which drove it: Yet Abradates disingaged himself from under it, and began to fight on foot, but was forced to yeeld unto a multitude, who seeing him down fell upon him: so that this valiant Prince and all those with him perished at this time; yet his death was revenged to the full: For Hidaspes and Gadates comming in, they charged all those that fell upon Abradates, with such fury that they forced them to retire in confusion into the body of their battle; Afterwards Hidaspes with those troops under his com[mand] charged Arimaspes and his troops, and all the Battalions of the first division, charged those enemies which opposed them with such vigour, that Arimaspes as Great a Commander as he was, was forced to yeeld unto the valour of Hidaspes, not being able to resist him long. The King of Pontus who fought with as much courage, and ill fortune, perceiving the disorder in Cressus his Army, did what he could to Rally, and was twenty times in danger to be taken: But in that deplorable condition in which he saw himself, he could do no good. Cressus also, as well as he, gave many rare testimonies of his courage, but could not finde any remedy against his misfortunes. He saw the two wings of his Army broken in peeces, and the main body of the battle squand[er]ed: He saw the field was covered with his dead and dying men: That terr[or] was in all his Troops: they fled wheresoever Cyrus assaulted them, and in some places where they were not assaulted. So that Cressus seeing no way but to secure his person, and defend Sardis: And the king of Pontus thinking upon the preservation of the Princesse Mandana, both these two Princes resolved to retire; and so they did notwithstanding Cyrus sought all over for them, and could not hear any thing of them: for they were gotten into a great body of horse, which hastily flying, raised such a cloud of dust as obscured their flight, and hindered him from the pursuite: In the mean time Cyrus and Mazares, being both of them in the heads of those wings which they had so gloriously conducted, fell upon the Rear of the enemies battle, which consisted only of the remainder of Infantry, the Horse being all fled away. So that Cyrus seeing none that was able to resist him, but one Egyptian Battalion which stood still upon their ground: He sent Feraulus to take their Guards the Captain whereof was killed, and to give this Battalion Battel. But as Feraulus did execute the commands of his master, he found that these Egyptians did naught else but cover themselves with their Bucklers, and stood as men that were resolved to dye upon the place: Cyrus wondering to see this Battalion neither advance nor retreat; and seeing all his Army victorious, and also the Army of Cressus quite defeated; He commanded the fight to cease, and to ask the Egyptians, why they would not throw away their armes, if they Page 206 intended to render themselves, and why they did not fight if they would not? unto this they answered, that the Prince who commanded being dead, and his body in the middle of their Battalion, they were resolved never to forsake it; and therefore if Cyrus would have them submit themselves unto him, he must give them leave to render all the honours which was due unto his bodie, and go to bury him: this being granted them, they would take the part of Cyrus, and leave Cressus who had forsaken them: otherwise they would be all killed upon the body of their dead Prince: Cyrus no sooner heard their desires, but he admired their fidelity and affection to their Prince, and consented to their demands, appointing Feraulus to let the body of the dead Prince be carried in a Chariot of war whither they would have it, desiring also to speak with the chief commanders of these Egyptians, who without more delay lifted up the corps of their General. But as if heaven would recompence them for their fidelity, as the Chariot passed by Cyrus, he casting his eyes upon him whom the Egyptians thought to be dead, he perceived that as he leaned his head upon a Buckler, he opened his eyes: so that Cyrus seeing a Prince so handsom as he was, in a condition to be recovered, commanded Feraulus to carry him into one of his tents: so after this pursuing his victory he went before Thybirra, and summoned it, which the same houre submitted unto his discretion. So that having in one day won a battle, took a town, and released the king of Assyria, Tigranes, & Anaxaris, he was most triumphant: it is worth observation, that this prisoner king was he who did capitulate about the surrender of this town, unto which they who took him carried him: for the inhabitants seeing themselves with out any hopes of relief, or any power to defend themselves, threw themselves at his feet, beseeching him to intercede for them unto Cyrus to use them well, which he promised and performed: for Cyrus at the request of his Rival did most generously expresse all signes of clemency and sweetness unto them upon all occasions. This victory left the conquered no manner of consolation: for the Lydians were totally defeated: they lost all their Artillery, all their Ensignes and all their Chariots, and all their Baggage. Abundance were killed, and abundance were taken prisoners: Arimaspes that valiant Ionian was taken, and died the next day of his wounds: and all this with a very considerable losse unto Cyrus, unlesse in the death of Abradates which did so sensibly grieve him, that he expressed much sorrow upon the field, and where he encamped that night, notwithstanding his satisfaction not only to see that all his friends and souldiers had exceedingly well behaved themselves, but also that his very Rivals should adde unto his glory. Seeing he had now nothing to do for the releasement of Mandana, but to enforce the walls of Sardis, his joyes at it did comfort him for the losse of Abradates; whose corps he sent to seek, that he might render it all the honours it deserved. And since the gods were pleased to shew happinesses upon him, after so many bitter storms of misfortunes, as he went into his tent to rest himself after all his glorious paines, there came a post unto him from Thrasibulus, to let him know that his Armies were no lesse prosperous under his command, then under his own: for he had vanquished all that ever opposed him, and that the greatest part of all lower Asia was reduced under his Empire: at the same time also arrived an Envoye from Cilixares, to tell him that he could spare him many fresh troopes, because Thomiris was not in a capacite to make any war upon him, since she was desperately sick of a languishing disease which was like to cost her her life, or her reason. And to compleat his happiness, a Cavalier whom he knew to be one of those he heretofore had pardoned, for being in the conspiracie of cowardly Artanus; brought him a letter from Mandana, which before he read it, did induce him to beleieve that he had very ill expounded the oracles of the gods, and that for the future he should be as happy under the name of Cyrus, as he had been miserable under the name of Artamenes.

ARTAMENES, OR, CYRVS the GREAT. The Sixth Part.

BOOK. I.

Though Cyrus was infinitely impatient to see what the incomparable Mandana had writ unto him, yet it was a long time before he could reade the Letter; not only because excesse of Joy had disordered his heart so much, that he knew not whether he should beleieve what he saw, but also because hee would have the man who brought it tell him, whether he received it from the hand of Mandana? how hee saw, and when? but hee had no sooner asked him all such questions as he desired to be satisfied in them, without staying for his answer, he opened the Letter which had no superscription, but when he had opened it, hee knew her Character, and found in the beginning of it these words. The unfortunate Mandana unto the unfaithfull Cyrus.

This Prince had no sooner cast his eyes upon her cruell words, but hee stopt, and read them over the second time, yet with so much wonder and despaire, that hee could not chuse but breake out into sad expressions of his sorrowes, insomuch that feeling his heart full of violent Agitations, he return'd in private, but still as he return'd he read Mandana's Letter, which contained these words.

I would I could lock up in my heart my resentments of your Inconstancy: But I doe confesse my wonder is so great, to heare that you have changed your opinion of me, that I cannot chuse but vent both my admiration and indignation; though I know it argues weakness to make any complaints unto such as offends me, and that it speakes more greatness of Soule not to accuse such Delinquents as we are resolv'd never to pardon. But since I cannot indure your change without complaint, I will complaine like one that will never be appeas'd: Therefore I doe declare unto you, that I will not any longer be the Pretence of the ambition, nor be the innocent cause of all Asias desolation. Render back unto my Father those Forces which you have of his, to the end my fetters may never be unloosed by your hand, for I confess I had rather remaine a Captive still under a respective Ravisher, then to bee set at Liberty by a perfidious Prince, who hath heretofore given a hundred illustrious Testimonies of his fidelity unto MANDANA.

Page 2 Cyrus read this Letter with so much sadnesse, with such astonishment and perplexity of spirit, that he was forced to read it over againe: But the more he read, the more he was amazed, and the heavier was his heart: and though his innocency might have been a cordial unto him, yet his too delicate a soule could not without extreame sorrow, suffer such an unjust accusation: and his purity of love could not chuse but be apprehensive, that Mandana should think him capable of any change in his affection to her; moreover, since it appeared not by her letter who it was she thought he loved, he could not guesse whether it was Panthea or Araminta, for he rendred equall civillities unto them both: so that being in a most sad despaire, he sent for him who brought the letter, to see if he could draw such conceits from him, as might give him any satisfaction. This man then told him, that being in the cittiadaell of Sardis, when they brought the Princesse Mandana and the Princesse Palmis thither, he resolved to stay there untill he found an opportunity of paying a debt which was upon him, by doing some service unto the Princesse Mandana; hoping alwaies to finde an occasion to make it knowne unto some of the women which belonged unto that Princesse, how he was ready to attempt any thing which she would command. He further said, that since she was strictly guarded, he could not devise any way how to execute his designe, untill of late he met with an opportunity of talking with Martesia, who at first gave no credit unto his words, but afterwards beleieving what he said unto her, she brought him this letter, assuring him it would be a very acceptable piece of service unto the Princesse Mandana, if he delivered this letter unto him. Cyrus seeing this was all he could get out of the man, commanded Ortalques to have a care of him, and conjuring him to let none whatsoever know that he brought a letter from Mandana, for he would not make his Rivals so glad as to know he was in her disfavour: and love is of such a nature, as all those in whom it is predominate, doe forsee any thing that may either advantage or disadvantage their Rivals, aswell as themselves: and therefore Cyrus would not adde unto his sorrowes, those Joyes which he should finde in the King of Assyria's eyes, if he should come to understand his disgrace. His respects also of Mandana, would not permit him to let it be knowne unto others, that she was capable of so much injustice and weaknesse, and as all jealousy does argue love, so his discretion would hide it in the Princesse. After Ortalques was returned with him, who thinking he had brought such joyfull newes unto Cyrus, had filled him full of sorrow: Cyrus called for Feraulus, who was not a little surmised to finde so much sadnesse in his eyes. Sir (said he unto him after the same accustomed freedome which he elver used unto his illustrious Master) I did not think it possible a victorious conqueror could be so melancholy upon the very field of Battle. Ah Feraulus (said Cyrus & shewed him Mandanas Letter) Fortune is more ingenious to torment me then you imagine, see (said he) Read the cruell words which my Princesse hath written, which must needs poison all those sweets which use to follow Victory. This is it, which makes me insensible of the glory in Vanquishing, which bitters all my joyes, and ruins all my hopes. I must confesse (said Feraulus after he had read the Letter) that I wonder how the Princesse who is so prudent can thinke you unfaithfull; But for all that, I know not why you should so excessively grieve, for there is no question in the World but it is an easie matter to deceive her. No, no Feraulus (said Cyrus) my misery is not so inconsiderable as you thinke it: for since my Princesse can so easily beleieve I love her not, and that I fight only out of Ambitious ends; she may as well doe me more injury: perhaps she may absolutely take her heart from me, and give it to the King of Pontus, whom certainly she would never have so constantly refused, but for love of me. You know her, you know not how firme her resolutions are: you see how she would not let Mazanes release her, and you see also how she treats me as she did him, since she would have me surrender up unto her father, those forces which are his; and tells me plainly she had rather be in the power of a respective Ravisher, then be released by a perfidious Prince: Fie, fie, Mandana (cryed he out) can any so unjust a thought harbour in your minde? can you beleieve it? is it possible you should set your hand unto it? Alas, alas, but since I see you have, I must needs think you will not see my innocency, but that you are become the most unjust, the most perfidious, and the most ungratefull Princesse in the World. But Sir (said Feraulus and interrupted him) why may you not as well believe that as soon as you have taken Sardis, the prejudicated opinion of the Princesse will cease? For truly when she shall see you prostitute at her feet, all those Lawrells which Fortune and Victory hath Crowned you withall; and that you doe no longer look upon Panthea or Araminta, she must needs repent of her error, and render you her affection, which doubtlesse she never yet took from you, though she have writ it; for if she had, she would never have Page 3 writt unto you: however it be, said Cyrus, my Princesse thinks I love not her, but that I love some other, she thinks that all I have done for her, the giving of so many battles, the many hazards of my life only for her liberty, were only consequents of ambition, not love: though heavens know all my affection of glory, all the ambition of my soule, had never set fire on all Asia, had never overturned so many Provinces, nor Conquered so many Kingdomes, if my love of her had not been my only spurr; yet she thinks & she writes that all was but a Cloake to cover my Ambition, and never telling me whom it is she accuseth me to love, she treats me as one whom she loveth not; truth must be confessed Feraulus, there is some odd fantastical fury in my Fate: may it not be said, that Fortune which makes all in the world happy and miserable, hath forsaken the care of the universe to thinke upon me only? for by an unexpected cruelty she moves my soule to passe eternally from one extreame to another, and that there is not a minute between an extreame joy and an extreame misfortune: she ever makes the sweet to precede the bitter, so that it plainly appears, she gives me the first only to make me more sensible of the other: doe you not see in what a time, on what a day, at what an hour, and in what a place she will have me receive this cruell letter from Mandana? had she sent it before the battle, perhaps Victory would now have sweetned that bitter Wormwood which is in my heart. But on the contrary, I must receive it after I have overcome my enemies, and my Rival: after I know all lower Asia is reduced under my power: receive it when I was ready to take Sardis; in the field of Battle, where I saw nothing about me but signes of my Victory: yet in the midst of all these causes of joy, sorrow must needs clogg my soule and overcome it, insomuch as I am most confident that the King of Pontus who hath lost the Victory is not so sad as I am: But he hath more cause then you, replied Feraulus: for truly Sir, all your Arguments cannot perswade me that the Princesse can continue long in this beliefe. However, replied Cyrus, I must make hast and go to Sardis, that I may either perish under the Walls, or else come to throw my selfe at Mandanas feet, and aske her with whom she thinks me in love, and that I may protest unto her I love none but her selfe. After this and much other discourse with Ferau|las, he resolved to send him who brought Mandanas Letter to him, with an answer unto that Princesse: For the man seeming to be resolute and bold, Cyrus thought it an easie matter for him to gett into Sardis as indeed he did: so Cyrus transported by the violence of his passion writ a letter unto Mandana, but in such hast, as one may sweare it was the dictate of his heart, and his hand following his thoughts he writ these words.

Vnhappy CYRUS unto unjust MANDANA.

MADAM,

It must needs be that I love you better then ever any did, since notwithstanding your in|justice in calling me perfidious, I love you no lesse then I did before. On the contrary, my passion is so violent, and your unjust accusation makes me so sensible of it, that if you did but know the resentments of my soule, you would confess your selfe to be the most cruell and un|just woman in the world. If fortune in War continue her smiles upon me, and that I find no greater difficulty in taking Sardis then in winning that Battle which Cressus and the King of Pontus lost; you shall ere long (Madam) see me at your feet; and as you were my first passion, so you shall be my last. In the interim, I beseech you remember that you permitted me to affect glory; and thats the reason, I did not think it handsome to be rigorous after conquest; but that it was permitted me to be civill towards too great but unfortunate Princes|ses, and to compassionate their miseries. This is all I have done (to too unjust Mandana) unto the two only Ladies I have seen since the War began; and to the only persons I thinke you can suspect me to be in love with. But how was it possible (Madam) you should doe so? How comes it to passe you knew your selfe, and me no better? However I beseech you, dispence with me from surrendering my power unto the King your Father, untill I have set you at li|berty, and when that is done (Madam) and when I have conquered all my rivals, I shall sur|render the Army which I command unto the King of Medes, and leave you all the Crowns I have conquered, that you may weare them upon your head, and then (as I have already said) I will come and prostrate my self at your feet, and either die with sorrow & love, or else perswade you that I was never unfaithfull, and that never any since the world began did love one more, then you are by

Page 4 This Letter being written, Cyrus read it over more then once, imagining that his repe|titions of it, would perswade Mandana of his innocency, and after he had sealed it, Fe|raulas was to give it unto the man who was to deliver it: yet upon second thoughts, Cyrus would needs deliver it with his owne hand, and it may truly be said, that never bringer of ill newes was better recompensed. After this he was forced against his will to take some houres of rest: and the wearinesse of the day precedent, and his sorrowes were something charmed by sleep, 'tis true his sleep was but an interrupted slumber, and far from soft secu|rity: for since his Imagination was sweld with nothing but tumultuous things, his sleep and dreames could not be pleasant. But to see the force of his love, & tendernesse of his affections; in lieu of dreaming upon combatts and noise, he dreames only of Mandana and Abradates: he was full of various dreames, though all were sad ones: sometimes he saw Mandana without Abradates, but he never saw Abradates without Mandana: this Princesse was most deeply imprinted in his Fancy, as well as in his heart, though that part of the soule is accustomed to be light & extravagant, and will ordinarily represent severall kinds of obj|ects, especially in sleep. 'Tis true, the sleep of Cyrus was not deep, nor lasted long: assoone as he was awake, a councill of war was held in his Tent where the King of Assyria, Mussa|ines, and all those that used to be there, were present; where it was resolved, that without giving any time unto the enemy, to recollect himselfe, or to the King of Pontus to carry Mandana out of Sardis, they should the same hower goe and beleaguer the Towne: so that without more delay, they considered the scituation of it, & when quarters were most convenient to be possessed: Cyrus then assigned the quarters unto all his Army, which was to march that very hower: but he himselfe stayed untill the next day, because he intended a visit unto Panthea to condole the death of Abradates with her, and to comfort her: but newes was brought that his Corpes could not be found upon the place where he fought, by reason of the abundance of men slaine which lay dead upon the ground; Cyrus com|manded search should be made the second time, and sent for all the Captains that fought under Abradates and were alive, to assure them that he would recompense the admirable service both of their Master and them: Then after he had taken all requisite order for the Siege of Sardis, and for the interment of the dead, he took horse to visit Panthea, all ord|ers for the beleaguering of the Towne were easily executed; for as Cyrus foresaw it would come to that passe, he brought all manner of Engines with him, which were requisite for the taking of that Towne: But before he went to the place where Panthea was, he stept into the Tent into which the Aegyptian Prince was carryed, who was so loved by his souldiers; The chief of those Egyptians who never did nor would forsake him; told Cyrus, that the Chyrurgeons, after search of his wounds, did not despaire of Life, but yet would not un|dertake for him; and though the Physitians did forbid any to speak with him, yet theywould permit their illustrious Conqueror to enter, but he refused, knowing it might prejudice their wounded Master: so commanding that all possible care should be had of him, and assuring those Egyptians that they might expect any thing from his assistance, he departed. But as Cyrus was as sad after Victory as if he had been conquered: so Cressus and the King of Pontus were in a most deplorable condition; the first of these in flying away after the losse of the Battle, did forsee the losse of his Kingdome: and though the Delphique Oracle assured him, that if he undertook Warr with Cyrus, he should ruine a great Empire, he was affrayed he meant his owne, and that he understood the Oracle since he saw him|selfe so neer ruine: on the other part, the King of Pontus considering he was the cause of his ruine who had protected him, imagined that he should now lose Mandana as he had lost his Kingdome; so that these two Princes retired in silence and mourned in secret for their lamentable condition, not being able to complaine either against Fortune, or one a|nother, or of themselves, since they knew themselves to be the causes of their miseries: Terror had struck so deepe into the hearts of all their remainder of troops, that those which followed them did continually imagine themselves to be followed and assaulted: so that by degrees they disbanded themselves, and in little troopes tooke severall waies: And Cressus and the King of Pontus saw themselves so slenderly accompanied, that they could easily count all that followed them: so that considering how in the morning they were in the head of 200000 Men, and that before night they saw themselves without one servant, sor|row and despaire did so seise upon their sad soules, that not knowing what they did, and comming unto a place where the were severall waies, they parted from each other without any intention so to doe, and there was so very few men with them, that it may well be said they were alone. Which way soever Cressus turned his eyes at the beginning of his flight, Page 5 he saw nothing but dead and dying men, and men that fled: Presently after hee saw none but a few affrighted persons who saved themselves in the Towne with their Baggage: At last leaving the high way, and crossing the Country to get unto Sardis unseene in such a despicable condition, he came unto a little solitary vally: so that comming out of a terrible tumultuous world into a place where all was silent but onely a little murmuring Ri|violet, where birds were singing, he sighed, and, as if a place of silence were a place of safety, he marched softly: But as hee turned his head to see who followed, hee found himselfe alone, for of those foure or five which did follow him when the King of Pontus strayed from him, one of them had his horse wounded, and could nor follow; another himselfe wounded and stayed behind, and all having some impediment or other upon them, left their unfortunate Prince, who seeing himself alone in this solitary Valley, then knew, that all his beloved treasures were but uselesse vanities, and that wise Solon had good reason to despise them. Whilst he was there in his sad contemplations still going forward, he heard the sound of a pleasing Pipe, and turning himself that way, he saw that he who played upon that Rustique Instrument, was a young silly Sheapheard about fourteen or fifteen yeares of age; who without any feare of publique misery, or knowledge of any Batt|le that had been fought, plaid upon his Pipe, and kept a little flock as innocent as himself: Cressus then standing still and considering this young Shepheard who was very faire, sighed with more Bitternesse then his countrey musique was sweet, and casting up his eyes unto heaven, he envied the happinesse of this silly Boy; and though he was a King, yet wished with all his heart he could change his Scepter into this Shepheards hooke. But since he could not be dictator to his destiny, nor alter the mutable decree of that sovereigne power which rules the world, he continued his March, and came at last to Sardis, where he was received by all the people with teares of tendernesse and sorrow. The King of Pon|tus who wandred another way came not till an hower after him: so did likewise the Prince Myrsiles and the Prince of Myssia, who had taken another way. All the Princes did what they could to keep up the hearts of the People: but every minute wounded men came in, who told the people of the death of some freind or other, so that it was a hard matter, to gull those men who saw their King return single after he went out in the head of the greatest Army in the World. Moreover these Princes understood that the Thracians in lieu of coming to Sardis, after they were rallied, faced about into their owne country: and that the Ionian Troopes did the like; the Myssians also followed their example and retired: so that in all appearance they could never recruit into a body againe, and that their only course was to keep the Towne, till they could make new levies for their reliefe. Thus the people being too well informed of the lamentable state of things, did murther highly, and said very boldly, that the Prince Artamas must be released, that there was no other way to prevent the danger which hung over their heads, and that it was a shame for the Lydians to let so innocent a Prince be in prison, who had formerly established their Empire by so many brought-home Victoryes, and who onely was able to check the Power of Cyrus. This murmur of the people seemed so full of justice and reason, that it became the generall opinion of all in a short time, and nothing could be heard of in all places, but that Artamas was innocent, Artamas was a gallant man, Artamas knew what belonged to warr, he was a great captaine and a fortunate conqueror; so that pure respect which they bore unto their Sovereigne, kept them from releasing this Prince. But Cressus thought these respects (considering the urgent necessity of things) too weake an obstacle to prevent it; so that he told them, hee would release him, and in order to that, he propounded unto Prince Artamas to set him at liberty upon condition he would defend the walls of Sardis against Cyrus. But since this Prince could not accept of this condition, unlesse he should fight against the King of Phrygia his Father, therefore as well as he loved the Princesse Palmis, and as great a desire as he had to prevent the ruine of Cressus, he re|fused it: yet with so many signes of sorrow and evident testimonies of respect, as made it apparent he grieved that Cressus should have such enemies, against whom neither honor nor nature would permit him to fight. However this unfortunate King was much incensed at the denyall of Prince Artamas, and doubling his guards, he divulged amongst the people all that he could possibly devise, to allay their zeale of releasing him. But the giddy incensed people who are light and capable of any impressions, still continued their devices of this Princes liberty, making eternall Elogies of his Valour and Magnanimity, and rayling against Cressus, threatening every hower to release this renowned Prisoner, before they would sleep: yet they did not attempt it. In the meane time the King of Pontus took Page 6 such order in the Citadell, that the Princesse Mandana and the Princesse Palmis knew not that the Battle was lost, untill Sardis was besieged: as for the Princesse Mandana her soule was so full of sorrow that Cyrus should prove perfidious, that those thoughts took up all her minde, and she enquired of nothing; therefore it was easie to hide it from her. But whilst she thought upon nothing but the suspected inconstancy of the most constant Prince in the World: And whilst the Princesse Palmis thought upon nothing but the deplorable condition of the King her Father, and the Prince Artamas, and whilst all the cares of Cressus was to secure the walls of Sardis, and whilst the King of Pontus looked for nothing but death in defending the Cittadell, and whilst the Prince Myrsilesse, the Prince of Myssia, Pactias and all other commanders were busy in fortifying the Towne, and whilst the tu|multuous discontented people disapproved of all that the Princes did, not knowing whether it was right or wrong, Cyrus, though a Conqueror, yet went in extreame sorrow to visit Panthea: But in his going thither, he had some repugnancy against it; for since he knew it was either she or Araminta with whom Mandana thought him in love, he feared lest this visit should hurt him, and lest Fame (which carries the least actions of Princes over all the World) should let Mandana know it. But for all that, Abradates dying in his ser|vice, nothing could hinder him; since his soule was full of sorrowes, he would goe not only with a small compay, but also a dark way, by the River Halis untill he came at the castle where the Queen of Susiana lodged, yet he needed not to goe so farr to seek her, for assoone as newes was brought unto that Princesse how the Battle was fought, not telling her Abradates was kill'd, she took Coach immediately without acquainting the Princesse Araminta or Doralissa, so that taking none with her but Phinence, two other women, and a few servants, she went unto the place of fight by the same way which Cyrus took to come unto her; and though Phinencie did all she could to dissuade her from this voyage, yet needs would she goe, telling her, that if Abradates were living, she could not goe too soon to rejoyce with him; if he were wounded, she could not goe too soon neither to help him; and that if he were dead, she could not make too much hast to follow him unto his Grave: so that her Coach going as fast as her Horses could draw it, and going also all the Night, she came unto the place where Cyrus, who was coming to her, discovered her Coach, yet not knowing it to be hers: but that which took up his eyes most was to see her stopp and stay by another neer the River, where many men were doing something which he could not discern; his curiosity was much higher when he saw women come out of their Coach which stopped in much hast, one of which satt downe upon the earth, but he could not discern what she did, Cyrus seeing all this, without any extraordinary apprehension, went on still towards them. But he was extremely surprised, when coming neerer, one of those men whom he sent to seek the Corps of Abradates told him, that his companions and himselfe had found it and brought it to the River side, with intentions to carry it in the next Boat that passed by unto the place where Panthea was: but no Boate passing by, and an empty Coach coming that way, they altered their intentions, so that as they were ready to put the Body of Abradates into it, Panthea came unto them, who no sooner knew the Body of her Husband, but that she came hastily out of her Coach, and sat downe by it upon the ground, making such lamentable cries, and showering out such floods of Teares, as never was more sad an object. Cyrus making hast unto her, and lighting from his Horse a little distance from this deplorable Princesse, he saw her sit by the Corps of Abradates, from whom they had not taken his Rich suite of Armes which Panthea gave him; for the enemy being vanquished they had no time to think of Plunder, or stripping the dead, and Cyrus pursued so far, that his men were busied another way. 'Tis true these stately Armes had lost much of their lustre by reason of the abundance of blood which dimm'd the Diamonds, and turned them to fatall Rubies; but as for him, he was so little changed, that he only looked a little pale: Panthea, who held his head in her lapp, upon whom she fixed her eyes and bedewed with abundance of Teares which she continually wiped off that she might look upon her deare Abradates, her Teares were accompanied with sighs so sad and loud, which came from the depths of her heart, and from the saddest heart that ever was, so that they could not chuse but fill all spectators full of sorrow and compassion. This Princesse was so sadly taken up with this so fatall object, that she saw not Cyrus when he came unto her: and certainly she had not knowne he was there, if the Prince extremely moved at the sight of dead Abradates and to see Panthea in such a pitifull condition, had not kneeled down upon the ground to comfort her, and by his loud language moved her to turne towards him. I would it were Page 7 the will of the Gods, Madam (said Cyrus unto her, with such a sadnesse upon his face as sufficiently testified the sorrows of his soul) that I could revive the Illustrious Abradates with the losse of my life; and that the losse of my blood could stop your tears. You see, Madam, how much the losse of Abradates troubles me, and how your sorrows grieve me. At first Panthea could answer Cyrus no way but by profound sighs and sobs, which would not give her leave to speak. But as this Princesse had a soul as great as sensible, she recollected herself. Sir (said she unto him with a dolefull lifting up of her eyes, and with her right hand pointing at her dear Abradates) since I have received this fatall losse, you ne|ver need to think of stopping up my teares, since it is the office of death to doe it, and which ere long most certainly shall. May you quietly enjoy that Victory which you have got, and remember sometimes, that my dear unfortunate Abradates was perhaps the Victim which rendred the Gods propitious unto you. But, Sir, whilst my sorrows are sobbing olver Abradates, I forget my obedience unto his last commands. In saying so, shee pulled out a paper sealed, and gave it unto Cyrus. Sir (said she unto him) the day before the del|parture of my dearest Abradates from me, he gave me this, which I present unto you, with orders so to doe if he dyed in your service. You see he's dead, Sir (said she, and showed teares afresh) and therefore you may see there what he desir'd you should know. Cyrus did what he could to get Panthea into her Coach, and to let them lay the Corps of Illu|strious Abradates in the other, desiring to deferre the reading of the Letter which she gave him, untill so sad an object as dead Abradates was removed; but she would not by any means, so that this Prince not daring to contend too much with her in the first apprehensions of her sorrow, did as she would have him, and began to see what Abradates had writ with his own hands. As soon as he opened it, he saw these ensuing words writ|ten in a greater Character then the rest of the lines.

The Last Will of ABRADATES.

I Leave my heart and entire affections unto my dearest Panthea, and my King|dome unto the Illustrious Cyrus; upon no other condition, but that he shall pro|tect this Princesse who wore the Crown, and comfort her after my death: Concei|ving that all my Subjects will be as obedient unto this Prince as unto my self; and knowing that I cannot doe an act more glorious for my selfe, then to make choice of such a Successor, nor more profitable for them, then by giving them such a Sovereign; nor more advantageous for the Queen my dearest Wife, then in procuring her so ge|nerous a Protector.

ABRADATES.

After Cyrus had read what the King of Susiana had writ, he was astonished at the ge|nerosity of this Prince, so much, that his sorrow began afresh; and since his great soul could never yeeld unto any in point of Generosity, I must needs declare unto you, Madam (said he unto Panthea) that I accept onely of this last Qualification which the ever Renowned Abradates hath conferred upon me, conceiving that he would never have constituted me King of Susiana, but because the Laws of his Country would not permit him to make you Queen. But I accept of the title of your Protector, with hopes of meriting it by my services, and protecting you against all the world. I doe declare, and promise you, never to make use of this Authority which Abradates hath given me in his Dominions unto any other end, but onely to settle the Crown upon your head. Your expressions (replyed Panthea) are worthy of your self, and worthy of Abradates his friend. But, Sir, I need no more then a Tomb large enough to hold Abradates and my selfe: Therefore I beseech and conjure you to leave me by my self awhile with this dear illustrious Corps, which I am fully resolved never to forsake. I know, Madam (said Cyrus unto her) that your sorrows are but just, and that they may be extream without ever accusing you of any weaknesse. But, Madam, it is requisite that you should preserve the memory of Abr|adates; and in order to that, it is requisite you should live. Therefore I most humbly, and earnestly beseech you, let us goe and prepare a Tomb worthy of his Valour and Qual|lity; and give me leave to separate you from him, whom death too cruelly before me hath separated you. I conjure you unto it (said Cyrus, and taking one of the hands of Page 8 this Illustrious Corps) by the most valiant Prince that ever lived, and by the onely man of all the world whom you loved. But, alas, Cyrus was extremely surprised to see this hand which was quite cut off from the arm of Abradates with a sword, remaining in his own, and separated from the body of his illustrious friend; his speech failed him, tears dropt from his eyes; and Panthea redoubling hers, took his valiant hand out of the hand of Cyrus; and after she had kissed it with abundance of tendemesse, and respect, she layed it in its place, as if she desired to fasten it unto his arm again, washing it with many tears as quite took away all the blood wherewith it was sprinkled in severall places: It is my self, said she, it is I who am the cause of Abradates, my dear Abradates his death; for I had not confidence enough in his own accustomed valour, to pay that debt which I owed unto you, Sir: I spoke a hundred things which moved him to surpasse himselfe; and I am most confident, that his love of me caused him to precipitate himself into the midst of dangers: Is it possible I should look upon him and live? Can I suffer any should speak unto me of any such thing as consolation? Madam (said Cyrus unto her) since your mi|series cannot be remedied, you ought to endure them patiently. Abradates dyed full of glory; his memory will passe to Posterity with honour; but to make it more illustrious, it is your part, Madam, to make the constancy of your soul equal his courage; and it is my part also to make the friendship betwixt me and him, and the respects I have of you, conduce unto his glory, and your tranquillity. I beseech you, Madam, tell me whither it is your pleasure I should conduct you; and leave it unto my care, to provide for the Funer|als of this Illustrious Corps. Sir (said she unto him, with a little more serenity in her looks) I beseech you let me have the sight of this dear Corps only one quarter of an hour, and let me have the liberty to lament in silence and privacie when none shall be with me. Cyrus, unwilling to contradict her too much, rose up, and taking Phinence apart as well as Belisis, and Hermogenes who followed him, he began to desire her she would help him to perswade Panthea, that they might take away this doleful object from before their eyes: But Phinence and Hermogenes were so sadded with sorrows, that they could not speak; and as for Belesis, he durst not think that his eloquence could prevaile where all the Rhe|torique of Cyrus could not. None of the other men which waited upon this Prince were so near as to speak unto this miserable Queen; so then seeing he was the only man who must deal with her, since Phinence could not by reason of her extream grief, and abundance of tears, he began to chide Panthea: But Phinence who by long experience knew she could not endure to be crost in her first apprehensions of sorrow, restrained him, and desired him to give her a minutes patience. Stay, Sir, said she, I beseech you stay: I will if I can stop the current of my tears, and cast my self at the Queens feet, and endeavour to get her from Abradates. But whilst Cyrus, Phinence, Hermogenes, and Belesis were devising how they might separate Panthea from dead Abradates, this deplorable Princess was de|vising in her mind what course she should take never to be parted from him. And since Fate favoured her dismall design to dye, she espied a Dagger which her dear Abradates had about him, which he used not in Battaile; so that conceiving her self to be the cause of her husbands death, not onely in what she had said unto him at parting, but also be|cause she did first engage him on Cyrus his Quarrell, she thought the Gods did suffer Abr|adates to have this Dagger, that she might by it both punish her self, and free her selfe from all her miseries. Since she had lost all she loved, nothing could please her; she could not conceive she ought ever to comfort her self, and she thought it a shame to live since Abradates was dead. So that her excessive sorrow made her think death to be the greatest good that ever could befall her. She no sooner espyed this Dagger, but taking it unseen by any of the company, because every one diverted their eyes from that lamentable object, she struck it into her body, and drawing it out againe to give her self a second blow, she had not strength enough; she leaned upon the body of her dearest Abradates, the blood which poured out of her wound, gushed upon the arm of this Illustrious dead corps. Though those who were near Panthea never perceived this act; yet one that was a servant unto this Princesse, and who was farther off, did see her take this Dagger, and crying out aloud, and running towards her, his voice made Cyrus, and all the rest turn their heads towards him, and not towards Panthea; so that this was partly a cause that none but this Servant saw the act, and by consequence why they could not prevent it. But since the loud cries of this Servant doubled, who still cryed out, and never told why, Cyrus began to suspect something; he went towards him, and coming near Panthea, he found her at the last gasp; yet she opened her fair eyes, turning them towards Abradates, and afterwards Page 9 up to Heaven, where they fixed without any further sign of life. Cyrus was so amazed at this sad accident; so grieved for the death of two such Illustrious persons, and so asto|nished at the great heart of Panthea, that he was not able to expresse either his wonder or his sorrows. On the other side, Pherenice, and the rest of the women were so full of pitt|yfull lamentations, as would have melted hearts of Marble. And the amaze was so generally amongst them all that were present spectators of this bleeding spectacle, that none of them were able to comfort another: And to compleat this Tragical adventure, three of the Queens servants killed themselves within ten paces from the Queen: And Araspes, igno|rant of this accident, came by, by chance, and saw the dead Queen, whose Beauty surmounted his Virtue, and overcame the insensibility of his heart; Araspes being of a violent hasty composition, and still in love, though he was full of respects unto Cyrus, yet his Passion was above his Reason, and the greatnesse of his Love did appear in the greatnesse of his Despair, that he deserved some excuse for no better concealing it. His eyes were full of fury, he knew not whom he spoke unto, and asked all one after another, what brought Panthea unto this condition: He could not beleieve she was dead by her own hand, and resolved to revenge her death as soon as ever he should know the cause. But when at last he beleieved what was told him, he turn'd his fury against himselfe, and had hee not been prevented, would have fa|ln upon his sword: Afterwards he would have thrown him|self into the River, if Cyrus had not commanded two of his friends to have an eye over him, and not to forsake him; otherwise he had infallibly followed Panthea to the grave. In the mean time, seeing no remedy for this sad accident, he caused the bodies of Abradates and Panthea to be put in one Coach, and the women of the Princess in the other; himself following on horsback with his men, towards the Castle where the Princesse Araminta was. Cyrus also caused the bodies of those servants which killed themselves, to bee brought, to the end they might be buried close by the Tombs of their Princes. He sent Feraulas to order all things necessary for the Funerals of these two Illustrious persons, which he desired should be as magnificent as possible. In the mean while the Princesse Ar|raminta,, who with extream impatience expected the Queen of Susiana's returne, was in the window of her chamber with Cleonice, Doralisa, and the rest of the Ladies, which were Prisoners when these two Coaches arrived, and followed by Cyrus: So that she was infinitely surprised to see one of the fairest Princesses in the world, and one of the most valiant Heroes upon earth in such a lamentable condition. Cyrus commanded their bodies to be layd in a great Hall under a Canopy of State, covering them with a Counterpane of black Velvet: He also commanded abundance of Christall Lamps to be placed in the Hall, and there these two Illustrious Corps to remaine untill the Ceremonies of Funerall were ready. In the mean whil Cyrus went to the Princess Araminta to condole with her, rather then to comfort her; but what consolation soever he found in her company, he made no long visit there. Yet he assured her that the King her Brother was neither dead, nor wounded, as he understood by some Prisoners which were taken. After which he left her, saying, he would wait upon her the next day; for he was resolved to honour the Funerals of Abradates and Panthea with his presence. After this Cyrus visited Cleonice and Doralisa in their chambers, whither they were retired; bringing Cleonice unto them, and comforting them with extraordinary civility. He assured them he would have as great a care of them as ever Panthea had; nor would he forget the very meanest of her Vassals. But to testifie how much he honoured the dead, he command Crisantes to provide Architects for the erecting of a stately Tomb of Marble and Porphyrie in the same place where Panthea dyed. The next day following an Aegyptian Sacrificer embalmed their bodies after the custome of the Country, which was to keep them incorruptible: After which they were layd in a Temple close by, untill their Tombes were built, whereon Cylrus caused their Epitaph to be written in many Languages; setting forth to all that read them, the Valour of Abradates, the beauty and virtue of Panthea, their dear affections to one another, their lives and deaths, and the fidelity of their servants. After Cyrus had rendred the honours due unto Abradates and Panthea, he resolved to see the Princess Araminta once more before he went whither his honour, or to say better, his love called him. But in seeing her, he conceived, that since she had so much confidence in his discretion, as to acquaint him how Spiritidates was jealous of her and him, so he conceived it expedient to acquaint her, how Mandana was jealous of him and her; but his principall motive of all was, because he had a design to take all manner of choler from Mandana, to be jealous of him; and in order to that, he beseeched this Princess not to think it strange if Page 10 he visited her no more untill he had delivered the Princesse of Medea from her imprisonment, and had justified himselfe: but the best of the story was, that at the very same time he intended to acquaint Araminta, she intended to intreat him that he would see her seldomer, lest those who perswaded Spiritidates of what was so far from truth, should thereby have some ground whereupon to build their suppositions, so that Cyrus needed not to feare his request would be offensive to her. Afterwards she conjured him, that as long as the Siege lasted, he would not suffer the Prince Phraartes to visit her. But wonder was, that these two prudent persons, who had such great reason not to be long together, yet this time held a very long conference; for after they had discoursed of their misfortunes, and after she had put him in memory of all his promises concerning the King her Brother, they began to talk of Abradates and Panthea. Cyrus intreated her she would be pleased to take a care of Pherenice and Doralisa untill they had resolved upon some course, and that she would be pleased to let Cleonissa and her friends stay with her till the Siege was ended; after which he left her, and went in all hast to lay close Siege unto Sardis. But in his way, he called at the Tent of the Egyptian Prince, whom he found in a condition to be seen, and to be carried unto the same Castle where the Princesse Araminta was, whither Cyrus caused him to be conducted, and where he lay in the Chamber of the unfortunate Panthea: the interview of these two Princes began such a friendship, and ended not but with their lives; for from this very first day they found in each other all the qualities that could be wished for in friends. When Cyrus first entred into the Tent of this illustrious wounded Prince, who was called Sesostris, the Grandure which appeared in his Aspect surprised him, for though he then seemed to be of a very handsome composure the first time he saw him, yet since he saw him not but when he lay in a swoond, he found a very advantageous alteration in him. But as Cyrus was very pleasantly surprised at the sight of Sesostris, so Sesostris was infinitely surprised at the sight of Cyrus, who produced his customary effect in the hearts of all that looke upon him, which is, to move respect and admiration. Since Sesostris did owe his life unto Cyrus, and was infinitely obliged unto him, for his so generous usage of his men, he returned him a complement of gratitude. Sir (said he in the Grecian language, knowing that Cyrus spoke it admirably well, but was not so well versed in the Aegyptian Tongue) I am very glad that Fortune which in divers other occasions hath been such an enemy unto me, hath been favourable to me in this, and hath brought me to take that side, which is both more just and more fortunate, then that where I was. But Sir the principall reason why I thinke my selfe so obliged unto Fortune, is, because by her I enjoy the honour of seeing you, as I most earnestly desired. I thinke my selfe extremely honoured (replied Cyrus modestly) that a Prince so highly honoured for his vertue by his Souldiers as you are, should have any inclination to love me; for it is to be beleevd, that so many Valiant men would not reverence you so much as they doe, unlesse you were more valiant then they are. But Sir, I doe admire, I should never till now heare tell that there was a Prince in Aegypt, which carried the name of Sesostris; and knowing all the acts of the great Sesostris, who heretofore was so highly Victorious in Asia, and Arabia; I should be ignorant who this Sesostris is whom now I see so illustrious. Sir (replied this wounded Prince) when I shall have rendred my selfe worthy your esteem by some considerable action, I shall then tell you who I am, and untill then, I cannot thinke my selfe in a condition able to let you know the disasters of my selfe and Family. Cyrus, perceiving that much speaking might prejudice the health of this Prince, would not presse him any further, but parted from him infinitely well pleased and satisfied. One of the principall Egyptian commanders who was with Sesostris waiting upon Cyrus to his Horse, told him that Sesostris was one of a most prodigious spirit and Valour, and assured him, that when he shall be acquainted with his quality truly, he will finde his merits surpass the most illustrious that are in the world. After which Cyrus leaving him, went in all hast unto the Camp: assoone as he came there, the Kings of Assyria, Phrygia, Hircania, Mazares, Anaxaris, and all the rest, rendred him an account how all things stood, yet he did not altogether trust unto them but went himselfe to view all the Quarters, & to spie out the strong and the weak places. But upon exact view and consideration he was very sorry to finde them much more strong then they were reported unto him; yet what difficulty soever there was in taking it by force, he was resolved not to make a long warr of it, nor to make a regular Siege of it, by raising Forts and casting Lines about it, and he chose rather to lose some men than to be a long time thought unconstant unto Mandana; yet he thought it expedient not to presse too hard upon Sardis, untill he made sure Page 11 one side of the Towne, at which he feared the King of Pontus might carry away the Princess. In the meane time, as he would never neglect any thing which was becoming him, so he sent unto the Prince of Classomina, whom he acquainted by Letter with the deaths of Abradates and Panthea; he sent also unto Cixares, to let him know of his Victory, and to tell him that he had no need of those Forces which he offered him; he sent also unto Persepolis to the King his Father, and the Queen his Mother; he desired also that Alcenor would goe into Susa, accompanied with Artabases and Adusius, and that they should carry with them the last Will of Abradates, the better to move the people to put it in execution; his device was also to send Hermogenes: but this generous friend knowing that Cyrus would send Belesis also, he desired a dispensation, not daring to trust himselfe, but feared he was never able to see Cleodora come out of the Temple of Ceres, without some resentments of sorrow, if so it chanced that Belesis should perswade her to come out, so that there was onely Abradates, Adusius, Belesis, Alcenor, and some other Sulsanians who were in commission to goe into Susa: They did not take their leaves of Cyrus without expressions of much sorrow to leave him at such a time, when they might be serviceable unto him. Cyrus to testifie his acknowledgment of Belesis his zeale towards him, wrote unto Cleodora to assure her of her adorners fidelity. Mazares also did the same, and that Belesis might not be necessitated to tell Cleodora himselfe what a miserable discontented life he lived, this Prince sent Orsanas with him. The parting between Mazares and Belesis was exceedingly sad; aswell as that between Belesis and Hermogenes who had so much power over himselfe, as to let his friend see he was well satisfied and contented. Cyrus appointed Alcenor and Belesis to goe and bid adieu unto Doralisa and Pherenice, who might perhaps employ them in some businesse. When Cyrus had given satisfaction unto all others, he thought upon nothing but how to satisfie himselfe in releasing Mandana. The King of Assyria and Mazares were much in Admiration to observe he was more disquieted after the Victory, then he was before; yet they could not dive into the reason, but did in vaine seek for it: however, the melancholy of Cyrus beginning to lessen by reason of his hopes ere long to justifie himselfe; their curiosity did lessen accordingly, and both they and he thought upon nothing but the taking of Sardis; yet had they very different thoughts, for Cyrus hoped that by the taking of this Towne he should justifie himselfe in the opinion of Mandana; and assoone as he had vanquished the King of Assyria, to enjoy her: but as for this King, the taking of Sardis, and the vanquishing of Cyrus would not suffice to make him happy, for when all this was done, he had the obduracy of Mandana, to vanquish which in all probability he could never hope for, unlesse in the promise of the Oracle; as for Mazares he was in a more miserable condition then they both; for which way soever squares went he could never finde any favourable hopes, he did his best to banish that hope out of his heart, by banishing that love which first planted it there, so that at the same time when he fought against the Lydians, he fought against himselfe: and there passed not a day away, wherein love and vertue did not contend which should have the dominion of his soule. In the meane while Cyrus was extremely vigilant, he went perpetually from quarter to quarter, and longed with exceeding impatency to see things in such a state, as they might make an assault upon the Towne, though all the Walls were manned with such a multitude of souldiers, that the very thought of placing ladders, was enough to stagger the stoutest resolution. 'Tis true, that those which in the Towne upon their ramparts, seeing this great victorious Army environ it, were not terrifyed with the spectacle, as not doubting their ruine, thought upon nothing but how to sell their lives at as deere a rate as they could; yet the sight of this apparent danger did not produce the same effect in the hearts of all the inhabitants, for the Towne was so divided among themselves, that Cressus stood in as great feare of his owne subjects, as of his enemies. As love is such an heroicque pass on as is infinitely above the capacity of the vulgar, so the people of Sardis could not believe that Mandana was the reall cause of the Warr; but on the contrary they imagined it to be ambition only which exasperated Cyrus against them; so that knowing how this Prince had rendred back the Kingdome unto the King of Armenia after he had conquered it, and that he contented himselfe only with the honour of it, and making him to pay a tribute which was due unto Cixares. Therefore the rout of the people took up a Fancy, to say that Cressus had no better way then to propose unto Cyrus to become his Vassall, imagining that this Prince would accept of it: so that this fancy passing from minde to minde, and from mouth to mouth, it raised so great a tumult in the Towne, that Cressus to calme it, was forced to tell the people, that he would make some propositions Page 10 <1 page duplicate> Page 11 <1 page duplicate> Page 12 of peace unto Cyrus, but yet must stay a few daies first. Whilst Cressus and the King of Pontus were in this condition, Cyrus whose great soule thought nothing difficult, prepared himselfe for a generall assault. 'Tis true, one side of the Towne towards the Mountaine Tinolus, was so inaccessible, that there was no possibility of assaulting it on that side, and every where else, the Walls were so full of men, that there was apparent danger in the assault: however, Cyrus resolved to attempt it, he visited all his Engines, and Ladders, to see if they were long enough: he mustered up all his forces, he spoke his souldiers faire, and after he had given order to assault it in three places at once, the one of which was to be commanded by the King of Assyria, the other by Mazares, and the third by himselfe, This Prince was the first that put a Ladder against the Walls of this Famous Towne, after the ditch was filled full of Faggots, maugre the resistance of his enemies, considering the disorder in the Towne, there was great hope of good successe unto Cyrus in the attempt. Yet the report was no sooner spread about amongst the Inhabitants of Sardis, that their Towne was ready to be stormed, but despaire did so rouse up their spirits, and made them so Valiant, that there was hardly a woman that went not to defend it, and had not to throw upon the heads of them that climbed the Ladders: indeed the resistance of the Lydians animated by the King of Pontus was such, that all the valour of Cyrus, and them that sought under him, could not force them that day; Cyrus was repulsed above twenty times from the top of the walls; and if fortune had not happily preserved him, he had most certainly perished at this bout, for the enemies did so stoutly defend themselves, that there was no possibility to get upon their Ramparts: nothing but overturned and broken Ladders could be seen; there flew from the Walls of Sardis such a prodigious number of Arrowes, Darts, and Javelines, that the Aire was obscured by them, those who escaped them, missed not a shower of stones, which were continually throwne at them; they also had a kinde of Sythes which kept the Walls from the assaultants, so that all three divisions were forced to come off: but Cyrus in his coming off quartered under the counter[scarp] of the Mote, since he would not be upbraided with getting no advantage. Anaxaris, who fought that day next him, and did such wonders, that Cyrus confessed he never saw a more valiant man, did exceedingly help this Prince to take this Quarter, and to keep it: the night also coming on, did much facilitate the worke, and made it in a condition to be kept; yet Cyrus was very sorry his first assault succeeded no better; but knowing all daies were not alike in Warr, he shrunk not, no more then the King of Assyria or Mazares who were very gallant that day, and he commended his souldiers, as indeed he had no reason to complaine, for they did as much as any couragious men could doe. He was so happy as to lose not one man of any quality in this storme, 'tis true, a great number of souldiers were killed, so that assoon as day appeared, a truce was made to carry off the dead, during which time Cyrus was very circumspect to observe whether there was any other quarter of the Wall which might be attempted with lesse difficulty. But whilst he was considering what was advantageous or disadvantageous, the Lydians, who in reason should have been more couragious, after they had repulsed their enemies, became more cowed in their spirits, for many of them being wounded and killed, they were more affrighted then before, the women seeing their husbands and children wounded and killed, were so full of cries and teares, that they melted the hearts and courages of the rest, so that supposing their King might now make a more advantageous treaty after he had repulsed Cyrus then before, they began to speak of nothing else, and that in so high a manner, as this unfortunate Prince would willingly have parted with Mandana to save his Crowne. But the King of Pontus had so cunningly carried the matter, as Cressus was not Master of the Cittadell, for this Prince had so complied with Pactias and all the souldiers, that Cressus could not dispose of it: insomuch as this unfortunate King was not Master so much as of his owne Daughter, nor of the only Towne which was left him. In the meane time Cyrus being advertised by some spies which Andramites employed, and which went in and out of the Towne, that the tumult began to grow high, resolved to let them alone, and try what it would produce before he would give a second assault: also intending to assault in all places of the Towne which were accessible, he found he had not Ladders enough for it, so that he contented himselfe with keeping that quarter which he had made, and to repulse those enemies which two or three times did indeavour to dislodge them that guarded it; but as oft as they fallied, Cyrus beat them back so sharply, that at last they thought no more upon it. As all things stood upon these tepmes, Leontidas accompanied with an Envoye from Philoxipes, came from Thrasibulus and Harpagus, to Page 13 acquaint Cyrus with the particulars of the happy successe, which before he hinted unto him presently after the Battle was won: Cyrus no sooner saw them, but he was as much Joyed as possible, for since he loved Thrasibulus very well, and exceedingly esteemed Leontidas, he hoped for much consolation from them. Yet he could never look upon this jealous Lover without a remembrance of all his jealous passages which he related at Sylnope, or without calling into his memory at the same time the unjust jealousy of Mandana, so that notwithstanding his joy to see Leontidas, he embraced him with a sigh, yet he gave a sudden check unto all his sad resentments, purposely to expresse how great satisfaction the victory of Thrasibulus did give him. I assure you (said he unto him after the first complements, and after he had asked the Envoye from Philoxipes, how that Prince did) I have made no fewer prayers for the felicity of Thrasibulus, then for my owne, and his happinesse keeps me from murmuring at the continuacion of my owne miseries. You have reason Sir (answered Leontidas) to interest your selfe in the good fortune of the Prince Thrasibulus; for as his good fortune keepes you from murmuring against the Gods for your miseries: so your miseries keepe him from thanking them for his owne happinesse. But I pray you relate unto me not only all his Victories (said Cyrus unto Leontidas) but also all his and your adventures, and tell me also, how fares all your friends? is Philocles yet cured of his passion, does he love still without being loved againe? is Thimocrates still Amorous and absent? and are you yet jealous? All that you aske (replied Leontidas) doe questionlesse deserve answers, except the last which concerns my selfe: for Sir, it is to no purpose to aske a man who is naturally jealous whether he be jealous still, (since certainly he can never be otherwise. This answer of Leontidas did much grieve Cyrus, conceiving that according to it, the jealousy of Mandana would last Eternally; for the excesse of his passion would not permit him to distinguish between a jealousy naturally rooted in the heart without cause or reason, and a jealousy which hath some colour and cause, and which by consequenc continues no longer then the cause; yet he concealed the disorder of his thoughts, and moved Leontidas to satisfie his curiosity in letting him know all the passages concerning Thrasibulus, Harpagus, Philocles, Thimocrates, and himselfe, conceiving it would be a great joy unto him to heare that these lovers, who were so unhappy the last time he saw them, are now in a better condition: also since Leontidas came upon the day of Truce, when Cyrus had no great businesse in hand, knowing that Sardis was not in any condition of reliefe, he employed this leasure in hearing of the particulars of both the Victories and amorous adventures of Thrasibulus. But since Leontidas knew that the Envoy from Philoxipes whose name was Megasides had something to say unto Cyrus from his Master which would be more pleasing unto him, than all he could say, he resolved to satisfie his curiosity in few words. Sir, said he unto him, the Prince Philoxipes hath sent you such joyfull newes by Megasides, that lest your soule should be too much surprised at it, I thinke it is expedient for me to prepare you for the reception of it by relating things of lesse consequence; yet I must not keep you too long, therefore I will tell you all you desire to know in as few words as possible. Cyrus hearing Leontidas say so, did beleeve that what Melgasides had to say, related only unto Philoxipes, and not himself at all; so that though he much esteemed him, yet since he loved Thrasibulus better, he did not interrupt Leontidas, who at first put him in minde of the state wherein things stood concerning the Prince of Milete, when they parted from each other: But Cyrus interrupting him, Ah Leontidas said he, you wrong me much if you thinke I forget the interests of my friends, no, no, I have not forgot any thing which concerns Thrasibulus or your selfe, I very well remember how the people of Milete drave out the wicked Melasia, the ambitious Philodice, the unfortunate Lejonce, and the Tyrant Alexidesmas, and that all these abominable wretches retired to the Prince of Phoceus, brother of Philodice, who endeavoured to contract a league with all his neighbour states, and that in the meane time Anthemeus in lieu of calling back his Prince, as the wise Thales advised him, he employed all his endeavours to make the people cry up Liberty, and not to acknowledge their Master. I remember also that the fair Alcioniida stayed at Mytelenes whilst the Prince Tysander came to Sardis, and from thence went into Armenia, where you know he dyed, declaring by his last words, and by a Letter unto Alcioniida, and that it was his will Thrasibulus should marry her: And to shew you, said Cyrus, that I remember all that concerns my friends, I remember also that the last absence of Thimocrates was caused by a combat which hee fought with one of his Rivals, whom he killed, for which he was banished from Delphos for three years. Nor have I forgotten how the unfortunate Philocles, who never was beloved, was absolutely out of all hopes to be so, Page 14 cause the fair Philista was married, and returned into Ialissa. And for your part (said Cyrus, with a smile, which he seconded with a sigh) I remember very wel you were jealous of all both above and below your quality; and that when you left Sam's, after you had fondly consulted with the Philosopher Xanthus, you left three of your Rivals with the fair Alciodamia. And after this, I pray judge whether it be necessary to call into memory what I have so well, and so often thought upon. I must confesse, Sir, replied Leontidas, I could not think your own misfortunes would have permitted you to remember so exactly the misfortunes of others; but since I see that I am deceived, I will hasten, and tell you that the Prince Thrasibulus, not being able to carry Tisanders Letter unto Alcioniida himself, nor to acquaint her with the death of her husband, and having no mind to urge her unto the accomplishment of that unfortunate Prince's Last Will, as soon as he came into Milete, of which he was not yet Master, he sent Leosthenes to give the Letter of dying Tisander unto Alcioniida, giving him also another from himself to that Fair one, which, Sir, I am very sorry I cannot shew you as Thrasibulus did unto me: For, Sir, I never in my life met with so well a penned Peece, so moving, so full of Art, Wit, Eloquence, and Judgement: But to hint it a little unto your apprehension, I need say no more, then that when Thrasibulus was not in love with Alcioniida, but onely the friend of Tisander, it was impossible shee could be more tender then she was towards that Illustrious deceased Prince: And that when he was not the friend of Tisander, but only a Lover of Alcioniida, she could not be more passionate then she was: He used not one word which was unbecoming: The word Love was not so much as once used throughout the Letter: He did not entreat her to fulfill the Last Will of her Husband, who desired her to marry him. But in asking nothing, he ask'd all; and never was peece so full of wit and passion, as this admirable Letter. But after Thrasibulus had fully instructed Leosthenes, and dispatched him away to Alcioniida and unto the sage Pittacus, Father of Tisander, unto whom he writ also; he consulted with Harpagus, upon the best expedients to compasse his designs, and they conceived it best; First, how to become Masters of Milete, before he thought of any revenge of his enemies: Yet the matter was not in their owne choice, for the Prince of Phoceus as I told you before, made a league with the Lanthians, the Carians, and the Caunians, so that getting up a considerable Army, he must thinke of fighting and not of going unto Milete, whither Thrasibulus then sent one of his men secretly unto Thales. In short Sir, this Prince did fight him and defeated him. After this Victory, the Prince of Phoceus and Alexidesmus were forced to retreat into their Towne: which Thrasibulus the same hour beleaguered with Trenehes, and by that meanes they had only that side towards the Sea open, from whence they had no hopes of any suddain reliefe, so that since their crimes put them in minde of punishment, if ever they fell into the hands of Thrasibulus, their plot was to get their persons out of the reach of his revenge. They inspired into the spirits of the Phocean People, so great a horror of strange dominion, that the innocent People were out of all heart: Then they desired a Parle, and at first proposed such advantageous termes, that Harpagus moved Thrasibulus, to forget some of his resentments and hearken unto them: So that all acts of Hostility ceasing on both sides, and they were in treating two dayes: In the mean time, the Phoceans took hold of this Interim, to tackle up all their Ships, which were not a few: For they were the first of all the Grecians which made any long Sea voyages, and who also found out the way of Tyrrheneia and Tartessia. In conclusion, Sir, in one night all the Phoceans embarked with their Wives and Children, and carried with them all that was of any value, even to the Statues of their Temples. So that the next morning in lieu of Commissioners to Treat, we saw none, neither upon the Walls, or any where else: Insomuch as Thrasibulus triumphed in an empty Town, none remaining in it but a few miserable Slaves. This, Sir, much perplexed Thrasibulus, for it was prejudicial unto him: Who putting a Garrison in Phoceus, he stayed no longer there, but sent to assure Euphranor, who was chief of all the Gnidian Councell, that he had no other design but to protect them, and conjured him not to give any Retreat unto the Prince of Phoceus, nor Alexidesmus. But notwithstanding all the fair words of Thrasibulus, he knowing that the Army which he commanded belonged unto a Prince which pretended to subject all Asia, he would not trust him, but endeavoured to cut that Isthmus of land which was between the two Seas, and which only joyned the Gnidean Country unto the Continent. But as they digged to make their country an Isle, whether it was so, or whether they imagined it, they thought the stones rebounded against them; so that Page 15 thinking the Gods were not pleased with their work, they gave it over. Euphranor to oblige them by the same reason which hindered them, sent to consult with the Oracle at Delphos: But the Oracle which formerly returned obscure Answers unto all their Questions, did now answer the Gnideans, That they should not any longer vainly labour to cut this Isthmus, because if Jupiter had intended to make their Country an Island, he could have done it without them, so that this answer being known at Gnide, Euphranor submitted to the will of the Gods; and yielded unto more then Thrasibulus demanded; for he sent some deputies of the country to assure him of the fidelity which he would render unto him. I shall not need to tell you Sir how Thrasibulus used them kindly, for when you know they came from Euphranor, you will imagine it: In the mean while Thrasibulus (after he had sent them away with as much confidence of well usage as they desired) understood that his enemies were retired unto Xanthus, after they had been refused in many other places, and that the multitude of Phoceans were gone to Chio, he turned his Forces towards them, yet first there was a necessity of fighting the Carians, who quickly submitted: Meane while Anthemius and Thales negotiated in Milete according to their severall designs. But the ends of Thales being more just then the ends of Anthemius, the Gods did favour them, and maugre this Arch-enemy of Thrasibulus, he disposed the people to submit and receive their Legitimate Prince. 'Tis very true the power of your Armies Sir did not a little help him in his establishment, and he commanded me to tell you Sir, that he is a debtor to you for that security which he hopes to enjoy as long as he lives, and that all his Victories are but effects and consequences of yours. But Sir, to compleat his good fortune, he received newes the next morning, that he had defeated the Xanthians and Licilians who were joined together, and had forced Alexidesmus and the Prince of Phoceus to retire, not only into the Towne, but into the Castle; for they thought themselves not secure in the Towne: but that which is most strange, was, that these miserable enemies, (the image of whose Crimes disturbed their reason and deprived them of all humanity) set fire on that place which was their Sanctuary. It is no wonder if the horror of their wickednesse did make them Imagine more mercy in the flames, then from the hands of Thrasibulus: For Melasia had exiled him, had caused him to lose his Dominions, and poisoned his Father; Philodica was a partner in her designs and crimes. The Prince Phoceus to revenge the misfortune of his sonne, did not scruple to violate all Lawes, no more then Alexidesmus, whose Wife doubtlesse was little culpable, and yet she had a hand in the same designe: For Sir, these desperate wretches did not only burn the Towne of Xanthus in retiring to the Castle, but seeing Thrasibulus preparing to force it, they burnt it and themselves also, and by this meanes were the executioners of divine revenge, and with their owne hands punished those crimes which they had committed. You may well imagine Sir, how much this horrid adventure did surprise Thrasibulus, and all the Army, for such a horrid object was enough to strike terrour aswell into the hearers as spectators of it. After this Sir, nothing could resist the power of your Armies, all did acknowledge your Authority, so that Thrasibulus full of glory went unto Milete, where he was received with the greatest acclamations in the world. But since he thought it not enough to be established in his Dominions, unlesse he were so in the heart of Alcioniida, he thought upon nothing but that; his greatest grieve was, that he did not know directly what opinion this faire one had of him, for since she had heard of Tysanders death before Leosthenes came to Mytelenes, he found her ready to embark and return to Gnides unto her Father, when Thrasibulus sent him unto her, so that she received his Letter, but returned no answer but by way of civill Complement, and would not write, because she thought he should expresse either too much or too little; Leosthenes only told him at his returne, that one could not behold more sadnesse then appeared in her eyes, though still most fair. Thrasibulus no sooner knew that she was at Gnides) where she arrived presently after the Deputies which had been with him were returned) but he sent Leosthenes unto Euphranor to aske her in Marriage; he sent also at the same time unto the Prince of Mytilene, to intreat him he would move Alcionida to fulfill the last will of dying Tysander, and he writ the second time unto Alcionida in such passionate expressions, as was easie to discern that his thoughts & his words were all one: Since Thrasibulus did me the honor to have a great confidence in me, during this Warr, he sent me with Leosthenes to assist him in the negotiation of his designes, so that though Leosthenes was sent unto Euphranor, I may say, that I was sent unto Alcionida; I cannot make an exact relation Sir, of all our transactions, which mett with no great difficulties in approbation of the Father, but with many in the minde of the Daughter; for if I should, the length of it would deferre that satisfaction [Page 16 which you may otherwise receive. But in as concise a manner as I can, let me tell you, that the rare merits of Tisander did not lessen the tender affection she bore unto Thrasibulus, though she lived most lovingly with her husband: Yet for all that, though her husband upon his death, willed her to marry Thrasibulus, yet she had a conceit that it would be more glorious for her not to obey him then to accomplish his Last Will: And this conceit did so command her mind, that she thought her self worthy of blame if she should marry Thrasibulus, though she loved him very dearly. But the Prince of Mytilene having writ unto her, with desires she would fulfill the will of the Prince his Son; and Euphranor absolutely commanding her, she obeyed them without any resistance: And was glad that two who had such power over her, did assure her it was not against her honour. Thus, Sir, since Leosthenes and my self had absolutely power to doe it; the marriage of Thrasibulus and Alcionida was concluded, Leosthenes returned to Milete, and I stayed at Gnides until all things were ready for Alcionidas departure: I shall not speak, Sir, of Thrasibulus his joy, nor of her magnificent Reception: But I shall assure you that the fair Alcionida is worthy of his affection; and so much the more, Sir, because she shares with him in that affection which he hath unto your service; since certainly she is so charmed with your Virtue, though she know you onely by Fame, and Thrasibulus, that she was full of prayers for your prosperity, as he is, Thus, Sir, you see, in what a happy condition is Thrasibulus: And as if his good fortune did extend unto his friends, when I returned from Milete with Alcionida, I found Thimocrates ready to depart unto Delphos, because he received News that his friends had procured a revocation of his banishment; and that the Father of Telesile having changed his mind, would give his daughter unto him, before all the rest of her Lovers; since Menecrates, who was the most considerable of them all, being repulsed by the rigours of Telesile, had changed his mind: So that this Lover, who resented absence the worst of all miseries, was gone unto his dear Telesile, never to leave her. Philocles also departed from Milete at the same time to Ialissa, hearing that the Husband of fair Philista was dead, and would try whether he could finde a Widow more molible then a Maid. For my part, Sir, whom jealousy hath so tormented, I found at my return a Letter from one of my friends at Samos, which might in all probabilities cure me of my Passion, and consequently of my Jealousie; for he writes unto me, that now Alcidamia is not all Fair; he describes her lean and pale, and so altered, that I know not how my Love and Jealousie can subsist any longer, and yet they doe. I doe not wonder (said Cyrus, and smiled) that your Love should last longer then the Beauty of Alcidamia; for one ought not to measure the length of Love by a Rule which is short, fragile, and mutable, as Beauty is. But my wonder is you should be still jealous; for according to your description of Alcidamia, she is not like to make any more Conquests. 'Tis true, Sir, replied Leontidas, but in telling me this of Alcidamia, they tell me further, that Theanor was never so much in her favour as now: So that since I have heard say, commonly the fairest persons cease to be rigorous when they cease to be fair, I am afraid she will keep that by her favours which she could not by her beauty: So that I am now more jealous then I was when Alcidamia was the fairest in the World. And since, Sir, Alcidamia hath onely lost her beauty by losing her health, so that perhaps the next Spring will give her more then she hath lost, but will never restore me her affection which shee hath bestowed upon another. But, Sir, since I ought not to be lesse jealous of your glory then of my Mistris, though in a different manner, give me leave to tell you, that within these few daies there will come unto you Deputies from all the Countries which Thrasibulus and Harpalgus have conquered. And since the Army which they command hath nothing to doe in those places where you are the Master, be pleased to send them such orders as you would have them follow. In the mean time, Sir, I beseech you, let Megasides doe the commands of the Prince Philoxipes, and acquaint you with a businesse which will rejoice you in your miseries, because it will let you see the end of them. What confidence soever I have in you (replied Cyrus sadly) I can hardly beleieve what you say: Nor can I tell whether I should credit the Prince Philoxipes himselfe, if he were here, and should perswade me I ought to hope for an end of my miseries. I would not have you beleieve, Sir (said Leontidas) either the Prince Philoxipes, or Megasides, or my self, but the Gods onely, who have given you such a clear assurance of it, that you dare not doubt it when you know it. I understand so little what you mean (replied Cyrus) that I know not what to answer; therefore I conjure you (said he, and applied his speech to Megasides) to tell mee what you would have me know, and what it is will so much rejoyce mee. Sir (replied Page 17 Megasides, before I satisfie your curiosity, be pleased to remember, that in Cyprus there is the Oracle of Venus Urania, which for matters of Love did never fail in her Answers. After this Sir, give me leave to tell you, that the Princesse of Salamis, sister unto the Prince Philoxipes, in whose fortune hath been many changes, since you were in our Isle; having a minde to consult with the Oracle upon a businesse on which the welbeing of her life depended, and having sent unto Delphos, as unto the most famous Oracle of the World, she received an answer, which so surprised her, that she thought it impossible to come to passe, so that seeking for further satisfaction of the answer, she consulted with this of Venus Vrania, which told her in expresse termes, It was not more true that Cyrus was the greatest Prince in the World; and that he should be hereafter as happy as heretofore he had been unfortunate, then what this Oracle of Delphos had told her should come to passe. Ah Megasides, said Cyrus, how should I beleieve this? for the Gods never use to contradict themselves: however, they did not give me any such answer when I consulted with those by whom they sometimes reveale their secrets unto the sons of men. Megasides, seeing he was not beleieved, presented unto him a Letter of credence, which the Prince Philoxipes writ unto him, which he did not present sooner, because Cyrus and Leontidas were so close, he could not without interruption. But after he had given him this Letter, he gave him the Oracle also which the Princesse of Salamis received, so that Cyrus not knowing whether he should sooner beleieve Venus Urania, then the Sibyll with whom he had consulted, or Jupiter-Belus who rendred the favourable answer unto the King of Assyria, his minde was in an anxious perplexity. That which induced him to thinke he had ill expounded what the Sibyll said unto him, and what was answered the King of Assyria at Babylon, was, to see the Oracle at Delphos assure Cressus, That if he went to War, he should ruine a grea Empire. Yet he saw that he was in a condition of ruine. But all the hopes of Cyrus could hardly expell feares from his heart, therefore he said unto Megasides, I perceive the Oracle which the Princesse of Salamis received, tells her, That it is not more true I shall be happy, then that which the Oracle answers her shall come to passe. But Megasides, the knott of the matter is to know, whether that which the Oracle of Delphos answered her will come to passe; for it is upon that which I must finde a foundation for any of those hopes which the Prince Philoxipes would haue me entertaine. Sir, replied Megasides, as the Prince who sent me did imagine, that it would be the good fortune of the Princesse of Salamis, which would create belife and hopes in you, it hath obtained permission from her, to let you know what all her adventures, which doubtlesse is so rare, as the relation of it will adde much unto your hopes and delight, if you can spare so much leasure to heare it. Though I ought not to interest my selfe so much in the Fortune of one of the fairest Princesses in the world (answered Cyrus) yet since my owne hath a dependency upon hers, I am forced to intreat you to acquaint me with it: and therefore since the Prince Philoxipes, and the Princesse Salamis have given you permission, I beseech you to doe me the Favour: but that I may have the better leasure to heare you, and not hinder my cares of the Siege, which is of so great importance, it is requisite I take the time which I use to allow my selfe for sleepe: therefore let it be in the night if you please: and so it was. In the meane time Cyrus appointed Ferulaus to have a care of Leontidas and Megasides, and to bringe them unto him assoon as he was retired into his Tent, after he had bid goodnight unto all the company. But doe what he could, his minde still rann upon what Megasiaes told him; and he had such impatient desires to know how the Oracle was fulfilled, that he dispatched all orders concerning the Army with as much celerity as possible, to the end he might retire the sooner. Cyrus then was no sooner at liberty, but Ferulaus in obedience to his commands brought Leontidas and Megasides unto him, and Megasides began his relation after this manner.

The History of TIMANTES and PARTHENIA.

I Beseech you Sir, doe not expect I should relate any thing of those wonderful events wherein Mars has a greater influence then Love, or wherein fortune workes the greatest alterations, in acquainting you with the Adventures of the Princesse of Salamis, whose name is Parthenia: but on the contrary, be pleased to know, that all the accidents in Cyprus can not be of that nature. Indeed, it may well be said, that Love, who in all other places does often cause tragicall events, is contented, when he is angry, to produce onely fantastick and capricitious effects in our Isle. However, those who find these effects in themselves do think themselves most unfortunate, and complaine as much as those whom Fortune, Love and Ambition all at once doe torment: After this Sir, I know not whether it be necessary to put you in minde, that Page 18 Love in our Court is not a simple bare passion as in other places; but a passion of necessity and decency: All men must Love; and all Ladies must be loved: no hard-hearted insensible man ever gets any esteeme amongst us, except the Prince Philoxipes, who yet continued not so long: This obduracy of heart is branded as a crime, and liberty of this kind is such a shame, that those who are not in Love, will at least seeme to be so. As for Ladies, custome does not necessarily oblige them to love, but onely to suffer themselves to be loved, and all their glory consists in making illustrious conquests; and not to lose their Loves which they have captivated, though they be rigid unto them: For the principall honour of our Beauties is, to returne in their obedience those captives which they have made onely by the power of their Charmes, and not by their Favours: so that by this custome, there is almost an absolute necessity of being a Lover, and unfortunate: yet it is not forbidden Ladies to acknowledge the perseverance of their loves by a pure affection; Venus Vrania allows it; But sometimes it is so long before they can win the heart of the person loved, that the paines of the Conqueror does almost equall the pleasure of the conquest: yet it is allowable for beauties to make use of many innocent Arts wherewith to take hearts: Complacency is not a crime: care to seeme faire is no affectation, obsequiousnesse is extreamely commendable, so is without baseness. Plausibility is a vertue: and to conclude all in short, all that may make themselves amiable, and all that may make themselves to love, is permitted, provided it be not against the lawes of modesty and chastity: which manage the Gallantry of our Isle, is the predominate vertue of all Ladies. Thus allowing Fate, Innocency & love, they live most pleasant & merry lives: This Sir I thought requisite to hint unto your memory, that you may better comprehend what I am to relate. I shall not neede to tell you Sir, that Parthenia was borne with a taking beauty; such a one as charmes at the first sight, & which seemes to augment, every moment one lookes on her; for it is impossible you should have been in Cyprus and not know it, though she was at Paphos when you were there: But give me leave to tell you Sir, that her witt sparkles as well as her eyes; and her discourse charmes as well as her beauty: Moreover, her minde was none of those narrow ones, who knew one thing, and was ignorant of a thousand: but on the contrary, it was so miraculously large, that though it cannot be said Parthenia knew every thing equally well: yet it is most certaine she could give an excellent accompt of all things: there was also such a delicate sharpenesse in her witt, that those whom she honored with her conversation stood in feare of her, and though all her expressions were simple and naturall, yet were they full of strong soliditie: moreover she could turne her witt as she pleased: shee would be serious and wise with those that were so: she would be gallant and pleasant upon necessity: she had a high heart, and sometimes an humour of flattery; None knew the newes of the World better then she: she was of a naturall timorosity in some things, and bold in others: shee was full of heroique Generosity, and Liberality, and to conclude her description; Her soule was naturally tender and passionate: and it may justly be said, that never any did so perfectly know the differences of love, as the Princesse Palmis: And I never in my life heard a more pleasing discourse then her, to make a distinction betwixt a pure refined love and a grosse terrestrial passion: between a love by inclination, and a love by acquaintance: between a sincere Love and a Counterfeit, between a Love that hath ends in it; and a Love Heroique: For indeed, she would penetrate into the very heart: she would describe jealousy more terribly by her words, then those who Paint it with Serpents, gnawing the heart: she knew all the innocent sweets of Love, and all the Torments, and every thing that had any dependency upon this passion, was so perfectly knowne unto her, that Venus Urania her selfe did not know them better then the Princesse of Salami. This Sir is her description of whom I must speake, who was no lesse loved, then she was lovely. And indeed, whosoever would Catalogue the Prodigious number of her Lovers in his memory, would questionlesse be astonished, since it is most certain, the fair Parthenia hath Captivated many, above a thousand hearts since she began to appear a Glorious Starre in the World: The greatest wonder in Paphos was, that she was never taken away, because the Father of Philoxipes being Governour of Amathusia, caused all his children to be taken away untill they were in a fit condition to appear in Court: So that the Lustre of Parthenias beauty was not like that of the Sun which we see every day, and unto whose Rayes

we are accustomed unto: For she appeared upon a sudden at Paphos, all Lustre and Glory, and dazzled all beholders: It may most truly be said, that she dimmed all other beauties, and scorched more hearts in one day, than other beauties could only warm in all their lives. But that which is most observable in the Conquests of Parthenia, when she came first to Paphos, was, that she never made use of her admirable wit, because her beauty was so Prodigiously charming, Page 19 that those she Captivated, were fettered by her looks, before ever she spoke; so piercing were her eyes, and so inevitable were her Charmes. But Sir, as I told you already, that none durst be insensible at Paphos, or at least seem so; you may well conceive Parthenia found not many men at Liberty; and that she could not gain so many hearts without robbing others; and since so, she must needs be loved by inconstant servants, who quitted their first Chaines to assume hers: For in the changing of a Mistress, it is no good reason to alledge, he found one more faire, and therefore changed: since I am confident that whoever quits one whom once he loved for another more faire than she, doth most certainly quit her for some end or other. Look then upon Parthenia as one that hath many Lovers, and many haters: for it is to be supposed that they who lost those hearts, she found did not love her: And not one of them but did set their wits on work to cavill at her beauty, and find some defect in it; And since they found that not any easie matter, they would at least quarrell with her dresse, though it was never so handsome, and devised all manner of Plots to disparage her. In the meane time, Parthenia perceiving their envious aims, tooke much pleasure in revenge, by Captivating each day their Lovers; not caring for new Enemies, so she could make new Captives, for she was taken of a fit age for it, and wherein it is a difficulty to keep within limits of Conquests and unjust suites and sacrifices unto her beauty: She was infinitely pleased to see such a croud of Adorers about her, whom she carried in Triumph which way soever she went: But since she did Captivate them only by the lustre of her eyes, and not her wit or tongue, all her Amorites were not equally worthy of her Chaines: Some of them dull and grosse: others light and fantasticall, and some again envious and troublesome: So that finding her self troubled with that which at first she delighted in, she did what she could to restore them unto those from whom she drew them, at least to be rid of them; yet she found this to be no easie matter; and now, it may well be said, her beauty put her to abundance of trouble and vexation: For many Quarrells did arise amongst themselves; But at last, her severity to some, and even incivility to others did rid her of this doting and troublesome multitude: For though the Custome of Cyprus, was for Ladies to suffer themselves to be loved; yet it was not with all sorts indifferently. Thus Parthenia, being delivered from that persecution, which this abundance of Lovers, and her own beauty caused, she retained only three, who being more agreeable to her fancy than the rest, she banished not: These three were not only different in quality, but also in humours: The first was a kinsman unto Timolea, whom you saw in Cyprus, called Polydamas, whose inclinations were all generous: Hee was fair, handsome, and well compacted, he had a high and noble Aire; his wit was pleasant, but ordinary: And he pleased more by an unexpressible charm which was in all his actions and his Person, then by what he spoke, which tooke more by the manner then the matter expressed. The second was the Prince of Salamis: infinitely Rich, of great qualitie, and of a handsome presence, having wit enough, but a little fantasticall. And the third was of a mean and base birth, called Callicrates, whose wit was incomparably above the best in all Paphos; and highly esteemed both amongst Men and Women. He writ both in Prose and Verse most admirably, in such a pleasing and unusual way, as may be said, he invented it; at least I am sure, I never saw any for him to imitate, and I think it may be truly said, none will ever imitate him, but imperfectly: For of a very trifle he would compose a pleasant Letter: And as the Phrygians said of Midas, all he touched was Gold; So all that came from Callicrates past for current: He would make Glasse passe for Diamonds, and out of the poorest subject extract excellent matter: His company at some times was wonderous pleasant, but not alwaies alike; for sometimes he would be as ~~if~~ ~~rom~~ ~~me~~, as most of the World were alwaies unto him: And hee had such an excessive delicacy of wit, that sometimes it might better be phrased Phantastically than delicate: His Person was not very well composed; Yet he made an open profession of Courtship and Gallantry; but it was of an universall Gallantry, since he loved all sorts, of all qualities: Yet had hee one most dangerous quality for a lover, which was, that hee did as much affect to be thought he was loved, as really to be so. These Sir, were the three assiduous Servants about Parthenia, who yet would not let her heart be engaged unto any one of them; For Polydamas had not wit enough, though will, the Prince of Salamis was fantasticall; and Callicrates was of so inferiour a quality, that she could not look upon him, only as an admirer of his parts, not as her Lover: So that to make up such a one as she could fancy, was to finde one who had the heart and person of Polydamas, the quality of the Prince of Salamis, and the wit of Callicrates: But since this was a thing impossible, she contented her self, to esteeme every one of them according to their merits, but to love none of the three. Yet Polydamas, and Callicrates were more in her favour then the Prince of Salamis: For the person of the one did extremely please her, and the wit of the other made her ~~more~~ ~~Page 18~~ ~~<1 page duplicate>~~ Page 19 ~~<1 page duplicate>~~ Page 20 merry. In the mean time, all these three Lovers had different designes upon Parthenia: For Polydamas his chief care was to be loved, and unlesse that, doubtlesse he would not marry her. On the contrary, the Prince of Salamis, rather then not enjoy her would have married her, though she hated him; and therefore he was as diligent to gain those who had any prevalence with her, as to please her; and Callicrates whose soul was all vanity, his principall care was to carry it so, that the people should suspect Parthenia was in love with him; and I am confident, he would have been better satisfied that all the Court should have believed it, then he would, if she had really loved him and none have known it. Therefore all his actions had some secret design in them, which Parthenia did not perceive till a long while after. But the strangest humour of Callicrates was, he never so much loved out of his own judgment, as by that of others: And if Parthenia had been fairer then she was: had it not been for the great reputation of her beauty, he had never loved her: For the lightnesse of his fancy commonly never fixed upon any thing, but such as made greatest noise in the world: Stately houses, Greatnesse, Pompous Traines, high Quality, and such like, sometimes made him quit the fairest Lady in Cyprus; and therefore it is no wonder, if meeting with Quality, Beauty, Wit, Reputation, Honour, Riches, and all in one person, he should apply himself more to her then any other; and his chief felicity was in perswading all the Court he was in no mean favour with her: Not that the meannesse of his birth durst presume to act as Polydamas and the Prince of Salamis did; but he took upon him another kind of familiar air, and he did insensibly allure Parthenia to let him commend her; to speak unto her often in whispers, and sometimes to say aloud in Rallary, that she was a most dangerous person. Since he did not so much care to be loved, as to have it thought he was: He never spoke any thing to her in private which might displease her, lest she should banish him. But he was exceedingly careful to carry it so, that people might perceive he was in love with her: Therefore when at any time he went out from Parthenia with any one whom he thought had wit enough to observe him, he affected to seem melancholy. Sometimes he would not speak; otherwhiles he would speak of nothing but her; and follow almost into all places, affecting to look attentively upon her, when she looked not upon him; yet very carefully watching for an opportunity to make some secret sign unto her, upon some trifle or otherwise which he had trusted her withall, purposely to that end: For his humour was, to peruse one favourable looke which might be perceived above any real favour in secret. The strangest humour of Callicrates was, that though he had such fitness of wit, as he could seldome find any that were worthy of any Elogies, yet he had certain extravagant and fantastical conceits, which sometimes made him love others, which were not at all amiable, unlesse it was because he would be loved; and according to his own sense, he had the vanity to beleieve he was: He had such an imperious wit, as he affected alwaies to have some whom he might scorn; and since none such could be found either amongst persons of quality, or persons reasonable, he looked a little lower for some whom he might torment, and be rather their tyrant then their Lover; so that it may rightly be sayd, never had any so many thoughts in their heart so opposite to one another as his. Moreover, all the world knew, that he was a greater Votarie unto Venus Anadiomena the Lascivious, then unto Venus Urania the Chast, and he had such adoe to beleieve there was any such thing in the world as pure affection; yet he was not only allowed of amongst all the Ladies, but also by many of them loved; so that it was not to be wondered that the wisdom of Parthenia should permit him her esteem; and the more, because he was more respective to her then all others, and because he never spoke of any such thing unto her as Love, unlesse in Rallarie, and after such a manner as could neither offend her, or make her beleieve him. In the mean time Polydamas and the Prince of Salamis being of such qualities as they might publish their loves of Parthenia, they courted her by wayes very different: For the Prince of Salamis was only very assiduous about her, and Polydamas, who had not wit enough to hold out any serious and long discourse, did expresse his passion by a thousand diversions, as Balls, Musiques, Collations, and Walks; and since he was very amiable, and danced well, all his actions pleased her, and his presence and pleasant humours was enough to infuse joyes into the most melancholy souls, so that Parthenia did not hate him, nor had any indisposition to marry him if her Parents would consent. But since there was then some factions in Court, which divided the Great Families: Some reasons of Interest moved those who had the dispose of Parthenia, not to marry her unto Polydamas. On the other side, Callicrates seeing Polydamas in much favour with Parthenia, he moved her to observe the shallownesse of his wit, and did it with so much art, as for all her inclination to Polydamas, shee began to think she should be blamed if she loved him, or made choice of him, so that checking her Page 21 own thoughts, Callicrates had the joy to see she began to be a little more cold towards Polydamas, then accustomed. Yet since she had a very strong inclination to him, she could not upon a sudden vanquish her self; and Callicrates stood in need of new wit to hinder her. As he was one day with her, he brought it about so handsomely, that she began so insensibly to speak of Polydamas, and to speak very advantageously of his great courage, of his Liberty and Magnificence. I confesse, Madam (said he unto her) that Polydamas merits all the commendations you give him, and if he did but know as well what you deserve, as you doe what he deserves, he would be the happiest man upon earth, he would honour you more, and ~~be~~ ~~more~~ in love with you then he is. Polydamas (replied Parthenia) is not in love with me; but though he were, I am confident more or lesse wit does not get more or lesse love; and there are some dull blockheads more in love, then all your spritely wits are. Ah Madam (said Callicrates) if I durst but tell you what I think, I should induce you to change your minde. I give you leave (said she unto him) Then, Madam (said he) let me tell you, that poor Polydamas does but love the one half of the fair Parthenia. Dare you swear, Madam, that he understands all you say? Doe you not observe that he looks more upon you then he hears you, and that there is no coherencie between what you say, and what he answers? For my part (said Parthenia, who was not very glad at what Callicrates told her) I think Polydamas answers as others doe; but it is the noble qualities of his soul which is most commendable: since you will not consent with me (replied he) that Polydamas hath a very shallow wit; I will apparently prove unto you that you have ten thousand times more then hee hath. You would doe me the greatest pleasure in the world, replied she. Truly Madam, said he unto her, I doe not beleieve you. Doe you think then, replied she, that I love Polydamas better then I doe my self? since I preferre his glory before my own. I doe not say so, (said he, and laughed) but I must tell you, I fear it, and think it. But I pray, Madam (said Callicrates, with the same freedom he used to all the world, whilst Polydamas loves one half of the fair Parthenia, let a certain man whom I know love the other. Yet, Madam, when I say Polydamas loves the one half of Parthenia, I say not truly; for certainly he loves not halfe her beauty, though he see it every day. I think indeed he knows that it is great, that she is of a good stature, that she hath faire eyes, that her neck is whiter then snow, that her complexion is admirable, her hair fair, her mouth lovely and all excellent; but as for that charming air, which is an ornament to all these, he knows it not at all. I am confident that though you please him infinitely, he knows not why you please him. There are such pretty, I know not whats, in your face as infinitely transcends his sphere of knowledge. He understands not the language of your eyes; your sighs which are so subtle and eloquent, and which sometimes makes known the sweetnesse or bitternesse of your heart, doe not produce the same effects in his heart which they doe in others; and to expresse my very thoughts in one word: I am confident, that he who can be so happy, as to obtain so much favour from Parthenia as to love all in her, that Polydamas knows not; will have a better halfe then he. Callicrates spoke all this with so much audacity, that Parthenia had a mind to be angry, but she had no time; For the Prince of Salamis coming in, Callicrates retired with as much seriousness in her looks, as if he had been all day talking upon nothing but Politiques, or Morall Philosophie. In the mean time, since Parthenia did very much esteeme him, she was very sorry she had such an inclination to love a man whom he esteemed not: For since she did not suspect that Callicrates was in love with her, his words had a great influence upon her heart: Yet she was not absolutely resolved to banish Polydamas at that time, as afterwards through the malice of Callicrates she was, and thus it came about. Parthenia being one day ill, she kept her Chamber, and by consequence, was visited by very many, amongst the rest, Polydamas and Callicrates, who being that day in one of his dumpish moods, which every one did chide him for; did sit in a corner of Parthenia's Chamber, seeming not to understand what any said. In the mean time, Polydamas not thinking that Callicrates was so silent, to the end he might hear the better, began to talke, as he used, to wit, with little coherence, lesse eloquence, and least wit; yet with acceptance, because his Person was very amiable? And as an amorous man is apt to speak more unto her he loves then any other; So Polydamas to Parthenia: On the other side, Callicrates, having a close design, and an admirable memory, not regarding what any of the rest said, harkned very attentively unto all Parthenia and Polydamas said to each other: as he listned well, so he remembered better, since certainly he remembered word for word, all that passed between them: So that the conversation ending without a word unto any, and in all hast went home; when as soon as he was come, he writ dialoguewise all that he heard Polydamas and Parthenia say, putting their names to Page 22 each Paragraph, without any alteration. So that Parthenia speaking alwaies as well as any in the World, and Polydamas the worst; the words of Polydamas wanting the grace of accent wherewith they were pronounced: and the words of Parthenia gracing themselves, this Dialogue was very delightfull to read: For beside the difference in their answers, the discourse made most pittifull gibberish, as if it were a continued discourse: But though Polydamas was not to be blamed or upbraided with this; yet Callicrates made use of it to serve his malice: Who to lose no time, went next morning betimes to Parthenia, whom he found alone: As soon as he was entered, the Princesse remembering his silent dumps the day before, began to chide him, and to ask him whether he was yet in the humour of speaking: No Madam (said he to her) but on the contrary, I am come hither this day to tell you what I thought yesterday: You seemed so melancholy yesterday, answered she, that I doe not think it will be any delighting matter, unless you were in the humour of composing Verses: For I have heard say, those who compose them, are as much separated from themselves, as you were yesterday from the company whilst you were in it. I assure you Madam, said he, I had no conference with the Muses, yet I was in the merry vain of writing something as pleasant; But 'tis in Prose, not Verse: since I know you are as good at the one as the other, replied she, I much desire to see it, and therefore since you came hither this day to tell me what you thought yesterday, I pray shew them: I swear Madam, said he unto her, though I came with that intent, yet I know not whether I should shew you what I writ: No no, Callicrates, (said Parthenia, and suspected nothing) never pumpe for any excuses or denials, for I will see them: Then promise me Madam, (said he unto her) to doe me so much honour, as to tell me sincerely who you find ill in them; and observe unto me all the faults. I professe Callicrates, (answered she) this is a most admirable good one, that you should think I can correct any thing you write: But to take all colour of excuses from you, I promise you to tell what I think of them, that is as much as to say, I will promise you to commend them and you both. I assure you Madam, (said he unto her) you will be very indulgent, if you commend all I have writ: but to be sincere, let me tell you that there are some things in what I shall let you see, which are not unworthy of your selfe: And let me also assure you, there are other things, which are not so much as worthy of my selfe, and which cannot please you, unless you be strangely prejudicated: You doe not use such inequalities in what you write (replied Parthenia) and I am confident you would not satisfie my desire in seeing if they were so: You shall your selfe be judge (said he unto her, and gave her the Paper writ word for word, all the discourse of Polydamas and Parthenia) But how comes it to passe (said she in taking it) that you put me to read what you have writ? The reason is, (replied he) because I shall be more delighted to hear you read them then my selfe, and I am confident you understand them better. Callicrates being accustomed to vent a hundred witty trickes, Parthenia upon a suddain suspected one: But however she had rather expose her selfe to be deluded, then not satisfie her Curiosity, and therefore shee opened the Paper, and first found this Title.

The answers of POLYDAMAS and PARTHENIA, and of PARTHENIA and POLYDAMAS.

She had no sooner read this, but she began to laugh; yet not with a blush, (and looking upon him) as being more desirous to read in his face then in the Paper what he meant by this piece of knavery: Yet did she not imagine the truth; for she thought he would have informed Polydamas and her selfe of something: But in reading on, she found her own very words, as well as those of Polydamas; and indeed all their discourse verbatim. Then had she various apprehensions, for at first she thought it a pleasant Piece of work, but immediately after, she could not chuse but be angry at Callicrates, at Polydamas, and her selfe: at Callicrates for his knavery, at Polydamas for his little wit, and at her selfe for her weakness. Yet out of honour, she concealed her thoughts as well as she could, thinking it much better to hear his Rallarie, then shew her resentment; and to that end, she read the Paper from one end to the other, and was so extremely ashamed, that her heart should ever have any disposition to love him who spoke so, that she absolutely resolved to Cashiere Polydamas out of her Soule. All this while Callicrates looked attentively upon her: So that as soon as Parthenia had done reading, well Madam (said he unto her) do you not confesse there are many things in that you see, which deserve your Censure? I confesse, replied Parthenia, that you have as much knavery as wit: and I had need be as good unto you as I am, not to hate you extremely for this trick which you have put upon me: Madam (said he unto her) you are Page 23 not so good as your word, for you promised to correct all my faults in what you read. You are so far from wise (said she unto him and smiled) that I should be as foolish as you are, <◇> I should take the paines to answer you seriously: However Madam (said he unto her) certainly you will confesse, that yesterday you did not thinke that Polydamas spoke so ill as you doe to day: I assure you (said she) I did not need the answers of Polydamas, but my owne, and I am beholding to you for nothing but for undeceiving me of the over good opinion I had of my selfe; for I thought I had spoke better then I did. Ah Madam (said he, and would have taken the paper from her) certainly you did not read them so well as you spoke them: I beseech you give me leave to read your words; yet Callicrates could not get the paper out of Parthenia's hands, who kept them whether he would or no; perhaps if you desire to see what was writ in this paper, that you might see the difference between the wit of Polydamas, and Parthenia: But Sir that a sister which I have, who waits upon this Princesse did tell them unto me, yet I cannot remember them; yet certainly nothing could be more different from another then the answers of Parthenia and Polydamas. In the meane time this conference of Callicrates and Parthenia, which began in rallerie, did end in a more serious discourse: for passing insensibly from one thing to another, Callicrates moved Parthenia to confesse she could not but wonder Polydamas should be so Amiable and have so little Witt. For Heavens sake Madam (said he unto her) doe me the favour the first time you see him and are in discontent with him, turne away your head and winke, that you may heare him and not see him: and if after that you doe not confesse you have no cause to love him, I will for ever forsake those hopes I have that you will never hate me: for really Madam; there cannot be a greater difference between any two, then between the Princesse Parthenia and Polydamas. Therefore Madam take my advice, prophane not those excellencies which the Gods have given you, by giving your selfe to one who cannot halfe understand them; but finde one out that is able to know and adore you. This Sir was the conference between Parthenia and Callicrates, who left her with much satisfaction, that he had so well prospered in his designe: and indeed, ever since that day, Parthenia was Mistressse of her selfe, and disengaged her heart, able to look upon Polydamas as a lover, whom she would condemne unto despair, which was no small joy unto Callicrates, who as oft as he met Polydamas, did treat him most cruelly, and abuse him in the presence of Parthenia; yet in such a manner, as Polydamas did not perceive it, because it was by applauding him for things which were not at all commendable, and in admiring all he said, and making an Elogie upon every word he spake: and he had been more gross in his abuses, if the Princess: had not imposed silence, and forbidden him to use him so. In the meane time the Prince of Salamis continued to see and serve her, though he made no great progresse into her affection; and observing that Callicrates was much in her favour, but had not the least thought of his being in love, though it was already noised in the world, he indeavoured to oblige him, and made him the confident of his designe; but Callicrates having no minde to turne solicitor for another in matter of love, told him, that he could doe nothing for him, and that Parthenia was one who would take advice from none but her selfe: But since he perceived that Polydamas was not yet enough out of Parthenias Bookes, he hinted such things unto the Prince of Salamis, as moved him to apprehend, that as long as Polydamas was a visitor of Parthenia, none ought to be pretender unto her: yet he told this as a mighty secret, for his designe being to make the world beleieve Parthenia loved him, he would not publish that she had any inclination to Polydamas. But he told him all that he could devise which might move the Prince of Salamis to hate his Rivall, and to make him quarrell with him, hoping thereby to be quit of two Rivalls at once, either by killing each other, or by banishing them for fighting: and indeed his plot did hit, and that which did advance it, was, the Prince of Salamis being one day in Parthenia's closet, she went out for something, and left this Prince with others in it, and the company coming out presently after, left him in the Closet expecting Parthenia's return, so that looking upon divers things which lay upon the Table, he found a paper which the Princesse had left and forgotten, and it proved to be that which Callicrates writ, with the answers of Polydamas and Parthenia: for the Princesse would not burn it, because she kept it to cure her spirits in reading of them: so that the Prince of Salamis seeing the name of Polydamas and Parthenia, took up the Paper, and would see the contents of it; yet seeing there was much to read, and fearing the Princesse would retorne before he had finished, and being transported with a curiosity as great as his love, he took it and went away before the Princesse returned into her closet: but he was strangely amazed when he saw it, for it passed all mens understanding, nor he could not thinke that Page 22 <1 page duplicate> Page 23 <1 page duplicate> Page 24 Parthenia, who had so much witt could thinke well of all that Polydamas had said, nor could he imagine it writ by Callicrates with her consent, though he knew it to be his hand; nor could he beleieve, considering his suspicions, that Parthenia loved Polydamas, that she should take any delight to see Callicrates full of such rallery against him, so that not knowing what to thinke, he resolved to make him who writ this fantastical Dialogue, tell the truth: he sent then to seek Callicrates, and rather then faile of finding him; went himselfe to look him: but since this man, maugre his vanity he had in being thought to be Parthenia's Idoll, and her lover, had many other passions lesse honourable then that, the Prince of Salamis could not easily finde him, though he went unto twenty severall houses to enquire: but at last, accidentally seeing him come out of a house which he never thought of, he sent for him, and conjured him to tell him what was his designe in writing those answers of Polydamas, and giving them unto Parthenia. Sir (said he with an answer as quick as his witt) I wonder much you should not understand my designe, and that you should not see I have no other but to doe you service, in letting faire Parthenia see the odds that is between her witt and your Rivalls. Ah Callicrates, said the Prince of Salamis, why would you keep secret my obligations unto you? and why did you not let me know Parthenia suffered you to abuse Polydamas? As she hath much witt, replied Callicrates, what resentment soever she hath, she makes no expressions of them; However it be, said the Prince of Salamis, all will doe no good, since after this I see Polydaines in as great favour as ever. Callicrates perceiving that this Prince was not jealous of him, he kindled it against Polydamas by a hundred cunning expressions, so that when he left him, he left him more jealous then ever, but with more hope of revenge also against his rivall, imagining that since Parthenia out of her prudence had winked at Callicrates his jeering rallerie, she would be also discreet as to hide her resentments at his quarrelling with him. The Prince of Salamis having this Fancy, it was not long before he put his designe in execution; for as there never wants a colour of a quarrell between two Rivalls: The first occasion that he met with, he began to contradict all that Polydamas said very obstinately, and passing from contradictions unto angry disputes, they fell from words to blowes, and fought a Bloody duell. For the Prince of Salamis, having a secret designe upon him, stayed for Polydamas in a great plaine, which is before Parthenia's Palace, so that this Princesse was a spectator of the Combat out at her Window, which was ended before they could come in to part them. Which of these two had the advantage could not be judged, for they were both of them equally wounded, and their swords both broke when they closed, and fell; doing both of them what they could to vanquish each other; this combat made a great noise in the Court, but as for Callicrates, he laughed in his sleeve: yet hewent presently to the Priuceffe to grieve with her, or rather to see how she took it: but she thought him to be her friend, she did not dissemble how this combat had a great influence upon her heart; which newes was nothing pleasing unto Callicrates: for she let him know, that she hated the prince of Salamis, and that she loved Polydamas better then before, taking it very ill at the hands of the first, that he should be so bold as to quarrell with the other in any consideration of hers; not being ignorant, that it was he who first assaulted, and knowing that there could be no other fallings out between them but for her interests. Truth is Madam (said Callicrates to her) you have reason to be angry with the Prince of Salamis, and it is but just to hate him for his soe little respect of you: But I cannot find you have any cause to love Polydamas better, since he hath done nothing, but that he would not let himselfe be killed: for I cannot beleieve Madam, you should thinke he had any other end in defending his life, but to keep it for the love of you; and were I to judge upon the actions of these two Rivalls, I should thinke you are more of the two obliged unto the Prince of Salamis, then unto Polydamas, who for all this, hath no more witt then he had; for I protest Madam, I am confident, that if he were himselfe to relate his Combate with such Eloquence as he hath, you would wish the Prince of Salamis Victory. I assure you Callicrates (said she unto him) I have much adoe not to be offended at you, for scoffing at a thing which both grieves and angers me: And the the truth is Sir, though Parthenia had not contracted any affection with Polydamas, yet she could not chuse but be very sensible of his misfortune, and the more, because falling in a Feavour he dyed of his wounds, the sixth day after the combat, so that Callicrates needjing not now to oppose that affection which he feared was in her heart towards him, he belgan to pitty him in her presence, saying, that the high qualities of his soule, and the handsomnesse of his person, did serve to excuse the imperfections of his wit, desiring if it were possible, that her sorrows for his death, might keep her from any affection to the Prince of Salamis, and moved him to goe out of Paphos untill all things were appeased: but when Callicrates Page 25 was out of Parthenia's presence, he scoffed as much at Polydamas dead as living; and said that all the Court was beholding unto the Prince of Salamis for ridding it of a man who spoke so much nonsense. In the mean, to satisfie his vanity, whilst there was no professed Lovers of Parthenia, he was an eternall visitant, and saw her every minute she was visible; and when she was not, he affected to speak of her, and oftentimes to name her in lieu of another: So that he called every one Parthenia, seeming alwayes to reprehend himself, and be angry that his tongue should so betray the thoughts of his heart. In short, he carryed it so, that all the Court suspected him to be in love with Parthenia, none yet daring to speak of it unto the Princesse: For certainly (said every one) she must needs perceive that which all the world sees; and if she does see it, why does it not displease her, and move her to banish Callicrates from her? So they thought Callicrates in love with Parthenia, but never told their thoughts unto her, who never suspected any such thing, since he never talked unto her but of things indifferent, and of small consequence. As for him, since he affected more the satisfaction of his vanity then his love, fear of banishment would never let him tell her seriously that he loved her, to the end there might be more suspicion that he was loved. In the mean time the Prince of Salamis having settled his businesse, and the Physicians reporting that Polydamas dyed rather of the ill disposition of his humours then of his wounds, he returned unto the Court as soon as he was recovered; and he knew so well how to tamper with all the Parents of Parthenia, that his Marriage was concluded upon before ever he spake unto her. I shall not relate unto you, Sir, what unwillingnesse was in Parthenia to obey the commands of her Parents, in looking upon the Prince of Salamis as the man whom she was to marry; nor how Callicrates did augment her aversion to it: But give me leave to tell you, Sir, there was no remedy, Parthenia must marry the Prince of Salamis, and Callicrates must be contented: His comfort was, Parthenia loved him not, and in his hopes she would make him her secret Confident. Also his hopes were, that all the world knowing Parthenia loved not her Husband, it would be more easie for him to make them beleieve, she loved him. Yet what vanity soever he had, and what ill opinion soever he held of women in generall, I am confident hee could never think Parthenia, whose virtue he knew very well, could have any vitious thoughts in all her life, though she had a sensible and passionate soul. In conclusion, Sir, the Prince of Salamis married Parthenia much against her will, and he expressed so much love unto her at their Marriage, that shee sweetened her bitterness, and diminished her aversion to him. Hee gave her, in case he dyed before, the Principality of Salamis, being more submisse unto her then ever any was. But, Sir, as I have before described the beauty of this Princesse unto you, so, is it possible you should beleieve that the eyes of this Prince being accustomed unto the beauty of Parthenia, should take lesse delight in looking upon her, then in a fresh beauty, which was a thousand degrees inferiour unto hers? Yet it is true, that this Prince loving her onely because she was fair, and his eyes being glutted with the custom of seeing her, his passion lessened, and his soul insensibly fell off from lukewarm to indifferency, and from indifferency to scorn: For since he was of a fantastick spirit, the humours of Parthenia and his kept no correspondency. I leave you, Sir, to imagine, how sad this Princesse was when shee found her self slighted: Indeed it troubled her so much, that she fell sick, but in such a languishing disease, as though it did not much hazard her life, yet it robb'd her of her beauty. And you may imagine, Sir, that he who scorned her when she was the fairest in all Cyprus, did not love in the Autum of her beauty, but began to be harsher then before unto her: He had twenty severall Paramours, who for all their glittering beauties were yet inferiour unto Parthenia, notwithstanding her decayed alteration. The mutable mind of this Prince did so amaze the World, that none could imagine the secret cause of the ill correspondence between Parthenia and him; and every one had his censure for him: In so much as he having a hint of it, grew angry, and began to speak aloud, that hee could not conceive why they should think it strange he could not love his Wife, since according to his sence, it was neither handsom nor reasonable: For (said he unto me, when I asked him what answer I should returne unto those who wondered why he loved not Parthenia, who was yet the fairest in Cyprus?) I think there is no such extravagancy in the world, as for a Husband to be alwaies in love with his Wife; and if Parthenia would have kept me still in love with her, she should never have married me. I confesse, Sir, (said I unto him) there ought to be a difference between a Husband and a Lover; and I agree with you, that there are a hundred gallantries which are ornaments in a Lover, that would be ridiculous in a Husband. But, Sir, by your favour, this difference ought not to reach so far as the heart; certainly one ought to love and honour her he marries as much after, as before marriage: Civility and Respect must not be banished, but [Page 62 preserved as preservers of Love; lest incivill familiarity should intirely root it out. Alas, Megasides, said he, it seems you were never married, nor very well know the nature of Love. Truly, Sir, said I unto him, I think you doe not know it your self; for if you did, why doe you not love Parthenia, since she is as fair now, as when you were in love with her? The reason is, said he, because, that beauty which one enjoyes is like perfumes, which continuall custome brings one not to smell at all. And for my part, I am perswaded, that as one doth accustome himself unto a beauty, one may likewise accustom himself unto uglinesse; so consequently whosoever will marry, ought not to be so curious in chusing one that is fair. Then Sir, said I unto him, why did you marry Parthenia? I married her, said he, because Love led me out of my wits; and I chose rather to run the hazard of being her Lover, then not to enjoy her. The truth is, there is something in Marriage, which is so inconsistent with Love, that I cannot endure people should blame me for not loving Parthenia. I cannot conceive, replied I, you can love other women, who are a thousand times lesse fair then she. Were you married, answered he, you would know how, as well as I: The truth is, whosoever takes away the sweetness of Novelty from Love, takes away Love it self; and whosoever doth banish fresh desires, and fresh hopes from it, leaves no zeal or delight in it. Consider what the passion of a man will be, who alwaies sees the same woman; who has no new hopes, no fresh desires, and who sees nothing in the time to come, but that his Wife will grow old and ugly. But, Sir, said I unto him, though you are not capable of a constant love, yet let me advise you at least to esteem Parthenia; let your love become friendship. Had I never been in love with her, replied he, or had I married her for no other interests, I could have done as you advise me. But, Megasides, to fall from love to friendship, is a thing I cannot think possible, nor am I capable of it. Indeed I am sometimes ashamed to see how weary I grow when I have been with her one poor quarter of an hour. Yet since I cannot love her, she must sute her mind to her fortune, and let me alone to live as I list. These, Sir, were the thoughts of this Prince when he began to leave loving Parthenia; but hee was not the onely man who changed his thoughts of her; for Callicrates also finding that she was not now the glorious Star of the Court, he fell off from his frequent visits; all the Beauties whom she had robbed of their Lovers at her first arrivall in Paphos, were ravished at her misfortune; and all her Lovers whom she had rigorously treated, rejoiced: Insomuch as Parthenia, seeing she had lost all that her beauty had gotten, had such an indignation against her self, that she left the Court, and went unto Salamis, where she lived most obscure and solitarily; but where she found a hundred things to charm her sorrows, and solitude afforded her much sweetness, since the cause of her grief was out of sight; and as she saw nothing which pleased her, so she saw nothing which vexed her; and the absence of her husband, and all those that forsook her with her beauty, made her mind very serene; so that using her self by degrees unto a kind of melancholy which seisseth upon a soul and never troubles it, she grew wonderous well contented, and recovered her beauty. This being the state of things, so it chanced, that the Prince of Salamis died suddenly at Paphos, in his return from hunting: And the King made choice of Callicrates, as him that was the ancient friend of Parthenia, to carry the news of his death unto her. I am confident, Sir, you will imagine that it was impossible this Princesse should grieve violently for the death of her husband who had so scorned her; yet was she much more moved at it, then in all possibility she would: For when Callicrates acquainted her with his death, she shed tears, but not in so great abundance. But Callicrates could discern her eyes had recovered their first lustre; and he found her so admirably fair, that in lieu of telling her what he had premeditated, he stood and gazed upon her, only telling her that her husband was dead: Yet he could not see her long that day; for she retired, and sat upon herbed, purposely to receive the visits which she foresaw would be made: And indeed about two hours after the news was known, all of any quality in Salamis came unto her. In the mean time, she sent back Callicrates the next morning, though he had no desire to goe so soon; but when he was returned, his report of Parthenia's beauty was so high, that all the Court talked on nothing else but this wonderfull alteration. I shall not spend any time, Sir, in telling you how the Corps of the Prince of Salamis was carryed to the place of his name; but give me leave to tell you, Sir, that as soon as all ceremonious mournings were over, Parthenia made a voyage to the Court upon a businesse which concerned the Principality of Salamis; also that perhaps she was not sorry that she was as fair as ever; for Parthenia was not above eighteen years of age: However she returned unto Paphos, where she dimmed all that could pretend to any beauty, and captivated no fewer hearts then she did at first; but hers was more difficult to be caught then ever, and she was so resolutely determined not to receive the affections of any, Page 27 that shee did not thinke her selfe so much as obliged unto any that profered theirs unto her. And as Callicrates one day chid her for this cold indifferency; and telling her that solitude had made her salvage and unsociable, shee stiffly maintained, that shee had no reason to think her self beholding unto those who loved her, because her beauty pleased them: For the truth is, said she, I am resolved not to expose my selfe unto the same misfortune I have had: and as long as I believe, that they do not love me, but because I please their eyes; and for a fading thing which a little sickness may take from me, I cannot much build upon such kind of affections. But Madam, replied Callicrates, if you take beauty away from love, you may as well take away his arrowes and bow, and quite disarm him. I would not take beauty away, replied she, but on the contrary, I would have such use made of it as of a Candle: do you not see, that when fire is put unto a faggot, it burnes, though the Candle which lighted it be taken away? or extinguished? So would I have beauty do, which sets hearts on fire: but I would not have them extinguish, when it which set them on fire is extinguished: Your smile Madam, replied Callicrates, is full of wit: Yet certainly, the fire which lasts long, must have something to maintain it: Tis true, said she, but it must not be beauty, for that is onely to kindle the fire, not to preserve it: It would be a rare World, if love should alwaies change as oft as the face of those they love doth: if so, a Rheume would kill a thousand lovers: and a gentle feaver would break a thousand Chaines, and set as many Slaves at liberty: No, no, things must not be so; and whosoever loves onely the beauty of Parthenia, shall never get her love: I would have them love all Parthenia, and not by halves as you told me when Polydamas lived; I would have them love her for something besides her beauty, that they may not fall off when it fades: did not you do so Callicrates before I went to Salamis? Tis true Madam, I did; answered he, but it was because I could not endure to see you miserable: Fie, fie, replied she, you cannot make me believe that: but I am perswaded you left me, either because I had fewer Company, or because my friendship was lesse considerable: But know, said she and smiled, that I never loved Callicrates, but for the wit of Callicrates, I liked his f <...> Letters and his smooth verses, and his pleasant conceits: otherewise what did I care <...> he were happy or miserable? Also I thought <...> daies in which you shewed me <...> one of my letters (said she in such a manner as might let him see she was not ignorant of his proceedings) or verses, or on which you were not pleasant, to be ill spent in your company, and but for them, I should very near have hated you, for I cannot endure <...> constancy, either in friends or lovers; but it is most of all odious in friends; since so, Madam said he, I beseech you do me the honour, to ranke me amongst your Lovers that I may be lesse criminall. Since I cannot revoke what's past (said she, and smiled) I cannot though I would make you <...> ore or lesse innocent then you are, but in justifying you on the one side, I shall condemn you on the other; therefore it is much better I look upon you as an unfaithfull friend, then as an unconstant lover, since which way soever you shall become the last of these, you will be alwaies criminall, and alwaies ill treated. However I should be glad Madam, said he unto her, that you <...> uld do me the honour I ask, for I must confesse, I cannot endure to be dishonored, and called an unfaithfull friend, since in being one, I should have renounced all virtue and generosity: but it is otherwise in being onely an inconstant Lover, for such a one is onely accused of lightnesse and weaknesse: Yet I think folly may be added unto them (replied she.) Since that is a thing which is not dishonorable, replied he, it shall be no great obstacle unto me; and I had rather you should think me foolish and out of reason, then thinke me culpable. Though Callicrates was formerly wont to speak many times as boldly as thus, without any suspicion of speaking seriously; yet now Parthenia took it ill he should speake thus, for he spoke it with such an Air, so bold as displeased her: So that both she and Callicrates stood a long while silent, and Parthenia had no mind to begin discourse, for she observed that Callicrates was not sorry for her anger: but this silence lasted not long, for company came in; and Callicrates went out, very glad Parthenia understood him: Yet he resolved to appease her at what rate soever, though it cost him a hundred oaths that he did not love her, and that he spoke as he did onely to put her into a quarter of an hours impatience. How[eve]r Sir, there was such a Fatalitie in the beauty of Parthenia, as brought upon her a hundred miseries, either by those who loved her, or by those who envied her, or by Callicrates. There was also a man of very high account who loved her, but not long; and she was so assaulted by all the Court, and all the World, that she was not able to endure it; and so much the lesse because the

Prince Philoxipes returning from War, Courted her in marriage, for a friend of his; so that to deliver her self from so many importunities at once, she returned to her solitude. She had no fancy to Salamis, but to the Country; and since I had Page 28 a Sister whose name was Amaxita, whom she loved very tenderly, she entreated her to goe with her unto her accustomed desert, which she willingly consented unto. In the mean time, since Parthenia had ever a passionate Soul, she was something perplexed to see that she could meet with none whom she could love: Also the custome of Cyprus requiring that all Ladies should be loved, she was something vexed that all those Ladies, who were her Enemies, because she was fair, should Triumph in her absence. But that which most vexed her, was a piece of knavery which Callicrates played her. I think Sir, I told you not that since their last conference which ended in silence, he never spoke in private with Parthenia, who alwaies tooke occasions to prevent him, and who treated him so coldly, that if he had not found out a way to make this coldnesse serve his Vanity; he would have dyed with sorrow: But since this happened a little before the departure of Parthenia, he made every one believe, but did not say it directly, that this coldnesse of hers to him was but dissembled; and the more to confirm this belief after the Princesse of Salamis was gone, he writ unto her very often; yet writing nothing that could possibly displease: Moreover he sent her a hundred pretty knacks, and sent them so handsomly, that it had been hard for her to refuse such diversions as were but necessary in that solitude wherein she lived: So that to make it last the longer, she resolved to answer. But though her letters were onely Jollities, and of things very indifferent, and written with design that he should shew them; yet he did not shew one of them. So that every one knowing Parthenia writ unto him, and seeing that he made a mysterious secret of her letters; the Enemies of this Princesse endeavoured to make it thought that the Correspondency which she held with Callicrates was more then matters of wit onely. But the further to satisfie his vanity, he dissembled an intended journey, and gave out such unlikely pretences of it, as made every one full of Curiosity: And to make it more generally, he had adieu to all the Court: After which, he departed without any with him, and in the Evening, saying that it was hot, and therefore best travelling in the night; Moreover, since he made no question but some would have very observant eyes upon all his actions, as soon as he was out of the Town, he took the way which leads where the Princesse of Salamis was, and went within fifty furlongs of the house; they turning upon the left hand, he went to hide himself with a friend he had thereabouts, not telling the true cause; and there he stayed fifteen whole daies: After which, he returned to Paphos, where those who watched him, had published that hee was gone to the Princesse of Salamis: So that when he returned to the Court, every one asked him why he would conceal the place where he had been: But the more to make it beleived, he seemed to be in a mighty chafe against them that said so: The businesse made so great a noise all over, that I writ unto my Sister, purposely that she might let Parthenia know it, who made no question, but that this was some knavery of Callicrates; So that this did more and more confirm her in her aversion which she had to the World. In the mean time, Parthenia did so clearly make it known at Paphos that he was not with her, as none did doubt it; but yet they could not accuse Callicrates of this imposture, because he alwaies said he was not with the Princesse of Salamis. However Parthenia broke off all manner of commerce with him: But as if the Gods would have death Triumph over all those whom the eyes of Parthenia had vanquished, Callicrates, a little while after this imposture, dyed, extremely lamented by all those that knew him, and even by those also whom he had most cruelly deluded: for his excellency of wit, and other rare qualities, excused the malignant vanity of his Soul. The fair Parthenia amongst the rest lamented him: notwithstanding all Causes of complaint which he had given her: Now was the time Sir, when the Prince Philoxipes, fell in love with Policrite: So that being busie with his own Passion, he let the Princesse of Salamis live as she pleased: Yet would he sometime invite her to quit her Solitude; but this was not often: Yet since he was married, he began to importune Parthenia to return unto her friends, and not to passe away the rest of her daies as she did. But all his pressures were in vain: For she told him, that her resolution was to submit the conduct of her life unto the Gods: and in order to that she had sent unto Delphos to consult with the Oracle, and to enquire what she should do to be happy, expecting the answer with much impatience; yet when it came, she was not much satisfied with it: For the Oracle answered her in these words; That if she would be happy, she must marry a man who loved her without the helps of her beantie: and that on the contrarie, if she married any one of those whom her eyes had Captivated, she should be the most unfortunate woman of her time. I leave you to imagine Sir how much this answer perplexed Parthenia, for to imagine that any one could love her and not see her, she could not comprehend it possible: To think also one should see her, and not think her fair, and in seeing her, separate her spirit from her body, and adore the one, without Page 29 loving the other, this was as far fetched a conceit as the other: So that she concluded it to be the will of the Gods not to love any but that she should still live in solitude: For, said she, since the Gods doe tell me, that if I marry any one of those whom my eyes have captivated, I shall be the most unfortunate woman of my time: they doe tacitely tell me, I must never marry. But though you should take this resolution, (said the Prince Philoxipes who loved her exceedingly) is it therefore necessary that you should banish your selfe from all civill Society? Certainly I should (said she unto him) for why should I expose my selfe unto the assaults of any that will professe service, and perhaps perswade me to slight the counsell of the Gods? For my part, replied Philoxipes, I doe not thinke we understand this Oracle as it ought to be, for the Oracle of Delphos would never counsell you unto a thing so opposite unto the Laws of the Goddesses whom we adore, who would have us love and beloved: for my part, if I thought it, I should advise you to supplicate this Goddess, for a resolution of this doubt which I thinke is well raised. The opinion of Philoxipes seemed so reasonable unto Parthenia, that she went her selfe into the Temple which is upon the farthest part of the Isle towards the East, to consult with the Oracle of Venus Vrania; The Princesse Policrite carryed her thither, and I had the honour to goe with her, and to be present, when she asked, whether she ought to understand the Oracle of Delphos as she did? But Sir, she was extremely surprised, and so was all the company, when the Oracle answered her, That it was not more true that you were the greatest Prince in the world, and that you should be hereafter as happy as heretofore unfortunate, then it was true that this which the Oracle of Delphos said should come to passe. The Prince Philoxipes Sir, was beyond expressions joyed, to see that you were so highly in favour with the Gods, as that their Oracles should Trumpet your prayes over all the earth: and it may be truly said, that never since the time of Licurgus, who heretofore received the like honour from Delphos, did the like happen till now. The Prince Philoxipes then was much comforted by it, for the slender satisfaction which the Princesse of Salamis received from this Oracle: for indeed she could make no other construction of that from Delphos, and this Oracle, but that the Gods would have her passe away her life, unseen of any, and unloved, which is a kinde of shame and malediction in our Isle. But Sir, that which the Prince Philoxipes most rejoiced at, was to see the Gods not only truly to commend you, but also to promise a period to your misfortunes, so that he no sooner carried the Princesse of Salamis into her solitude, but he embarked one of his Servants to bring you this pleasing newes: yet by misfortune the Vessell in which that man embarked suffered Shipwrack, and the man perished; the Prince Philoxipes not hearing any thing of it untill a long time after, so that he could no sooner let you know the glorious testimony that the Gods did render unto your vertue, and I am confidently perswaded that it was the pleasure of the Gods, you should not know this Oracle untill that which concerned the Princesse of Salamis was found to prove true; so that there might be more ground for your hopes and belief of what they said concerning you. Give me leave to tell you Sir, that since this Princesse received the last answer from Venus Vraia, she looked upon her Cell, as the place where she was to live and dye, and took as much paines to hide her Beauty, as others did to show theirs; The reading, the walking, and conversation of my Sister who would never forsake her, were all her recreations: the Prince Philoxipes, Policrite, and Dorida, did sometimes give her a visit, but it was very rarely. Parthenia employed her selfe sometimes to make her Prison more pleasant, in causing the Chambers to be painted, and making Gardens: In the meane time, though she strove to Eclipse her beauty, yet it did every day increase, her Cheeks had fresh Roses grew in them, and the lust <...> her eyes shined more glorious then ever: But the pretyest wonder was, that though Parthen <...> w no body, yet she was nothing negligent in her dresse, but still had as great a care of her beau <...> as if she had a designe to conquer a thousand hearts, as if she had thought, that though it was forbidden her to love any, yet she would employ her inclination to love, and be beloved of her selfe: and certainly a more beautifull object could not be seen, since Parthenia was never so faire at Court, as I saw her in her solitude, where she suffered me sometimes to come and visit my sister: yet for all that, on some certaine day's she would be something out of tune, and so give over her selfe to Melancholy, that she would fall out with her own Beauty: 'Tis true her humors angered none but her selfe, for she would even then then vent a hundred excellent things to those that could understand them. I remember one day when I was there, and found her in one of those humors when she was off the hookes in her conceit, and when I heard her wish she were not of so high a quality, to the end she might be more Mistress of her selfe and lesse observed by others: and when I heard her wish her selfe of another Page 30 sex; however Madam said I unto her, you cannot desire to be more faire then you are. Ah, Megasides, said he unto me, how infinitely are you mistaken? For I protest in the humour now that I am in, I had rather bee such an one as Aesop is described, who they say, was the most ill favoured man in the world, then to be the fairest woman, eye ever saw. I confess Madam, said Amaxita, that I cannot beleieve you, or be of your mind. Perhaps so (said Parthenia, and smiled) but however, I cannot think beauty to be so great a jewel as it is imagined; at least it is none of those sweets which have no mixture of bitterness with them. For my part, Madam, said I unto her, I am not of your opinion: For I am perswaded that beauty is one of the most excellent gifts of the Gods: Doe you not see what a sovereign influence it hath upon all hearts above any thing else? It charmeth Marble, and makes it molliible; it tames Tygers, and makes them affable, and subjects the most cruel, rebellious and ambitious spirits. 'Tis true, said Parthenia, but it cannot keep those who are inconstant; and I have known some, but of common beauty, which have been more constantly loved then any others. Since the number of Inconstants is less then those I named (answered I) and since Inconstancie hath its birth from the hearts of Lovers, and not from the eyes of their Mistresses: It is not to be wondered that it should be so. Yet, Madam, without all dispute, of all the excellent gifts of Nature, Beauty is incomparably the greatest. But not most durable (replied she) and therefore I can not think a thing so fading, can deserve the Epithite of good, since its sweets are mingled with so many bitter Ingredients. I pray examine what pleasure those find who are owners of Beauty: In their Infancie they are not so much as sensible of it; in more ripe years they injure o[th]er beauties; or which is worse, are injured: if they be of fair complexion, then they can not endure the brown; or if they be brown, they cannot endure the fair; all, that's as fair as themselves, displeaseth and frets their hearts: Moreover, if a Lady look a little pale, or her eyes a little hollow, there needs no more to make all the Town say, Alass, how she's changed! She was fair sayes one; There goes a withered beauty sayes another; and every one hath his censorious vote. But say they should not say so, what's the result of the finest Beauty? It gets one many Lovers, whose love lasts no longer then it doth: It attracts at randome, both the wise and the foolish, the handsome and ugly; and vanisheth often before youth, and infallibly when age comes. So that those who love their Wives because they are fair, will most certainly come to hate, and at least slight them. I pray then judge whether Beauty be a thing so desirable. Though all should be true (replied Amaxita) yet I had rather be fair, and run the hazard of being slighted when I am old, then not to bee faire, and be sure to bee slighted when I am young: For truly if one be not fair, there is requisite abundance of wit to supply that want: And since more men are able to judge of the beauty in a face, then they can of wit, or soul, the world will follow the fair, and let fine soules shift for themselves. However it be, said Parthenia, since I am perswaded that the highest misfortune is to be once loved, and then not to be so; and since Beauties are more exposed unto that danger then any others, I doe not recant of any thing I said. These, Sir, were the opinions of Parthenia, whilst shee was in her melancholly moods; and this was the life she lived when a Gallant of high esteem, called Timantes came to Paphos, with an equipage proportionable to his quality, and high birth, and suitable to the magnificence of his mind and riches, which were both as high as his Quality. This Timantes, Sir, was descended from King Minos, who reigned long in Crete: And though the Crown was not invested in his house, but the form of Government changed, yet the people did highly respect those who were descended from their ancient Kings, insomuch as they had the highest honours, and greatest authority amongst them. So that it may be said, that though the Father of Timantes had not the name of a King, yet <◇> ad very near the authority, especially in matters of War. 'Tis true, that since he did st <...> observe the Lawes of that famous King which before I named, and who was a pat[er]n <◇> the Legislators of Greece, hee did not deceive that trust which the people repo <...> him, but did infinitely purchase their love; and no wonder; for I am confident, that <◇> oever is an observer of the Laws, will easily get love and obedience also. This, Sir, was the descent of Timantes, whose person was extremely handsome, and whose wit was above ordinary capacities. The reason of his voyage had no matter of privacy in it, and being born in an Isle which had a controversie with ours in point of Reputation, he had a longing curiosity to see whether Cyprus was to be preferred before Crete, or Crete Cyprus: So that his travel being a voyage of pleasure and curiosity onely, he arrived at Paphos, as I said, with a most magnificent Train and Equipage. His Quality was no sooner known, but the King did him all imaginable honours; and his merits were no sooner discovered, but he was esteemed beyond all expressions: So that in a few days Timantes was no stranger in our Court: The Queen Alrethephile Page 31 much honour'd him; the Prince Philoxipes had contracted a close friendship with him; Policrite esteemed him, and not a Lady in all the Court, but had a good word for him. As it is the custom of all Courts to double their diversions in favour of strangers, the like was there for Timantes: But whether in company, or Balls, or Sports, or Walks, or publique Feasts, Timantes was the only man of spirit, wit, behaviour, and magnificence. So that no one was talked on in Paphos but him, his reputation rung as loud, and reached as far as where the Princess Salamis kept her solitudes; and I think I was the first who described him unto her. Yet she did all she could to hinder me, saying, she would not willingly know any more what passed in the world, since she had quitted it: But notwithstanding, presently after, she asked me, which of all the Ladies in the Court was it that most moved the heart of Timantes? Believe me, Madam, said I unto her, hitherto his civility hath been so equal unto all, that it seems he's not in love with any: For at a grand Feast, where there was used a kind of delightful Combat, where those which fought had their devices upon their Bucklers: Timantes represented upon his, a Phoenix with this Motto; I stay until the Sun doe burn me.

Certainly, said Parthenia, this Stranger puts none of the Ladies out of hope to conquer his heart, to the end none should hate him as long as he stays at Paphos. In the mean time, Megasides, you would oblige me very much in acquainting me with these diversions which I am ignorant of: And therefore when you visit your Sister hereafter, I pray you acquaint me with what the Court hath more then it had when I was there; what new diversions, what fresh gallants, and what the old ones, who are past diversions, say. This, Sir, Parthenia heard me speak of Timantes the first time; but I was not the only one who told her of him: For the Prince Philoxipes went to see her, and did the same; Policrite also, and Dorida writ unto her; so that she had a most exact Idea of Timantes: Yet would she never consent that the Prince Philoxipes should bring him thither, as he affected; this Prince telling her, that a Stranger would not interrupt her solitude: But she did so earnestly forbid him, that hee durst not bring him; or, to say better, the Gods would not permit him, since they would have Timantes and Parthenia acquainted in another manner. But, Sir, before I tell you how it was, be pleased to know, that there was a fair house of Timocleas Fathers, about a dayes journey from Paphos, about half way unto the town or place where Parthenia lived; in this place there was a Labyrinth of Myrtle trees, whose hedges were so thick, and so high, that one shall be as much puzzled to get out of it, as out of the famous Labyrinth of Egypt, or that in Crete; but this was made with such art, that those who were in them of Egypt or Crete, yet could not finde out the issues of this: For as that of Crete was made by ingenious Dedalus, when Minos kept there the Minotaure, whose modell Dedalus borrowed from that of Egypt: So likewise that which is at Paphos was made by a man, who, having seen both the other, took something out of the one, and something out of the other, and contrived one of the most pleasant diversions in the world: The Architecture seemed in Myrtle as if it had been in Marble, conveying from room to room, from closet to closet, and from gallery to gallery: In divers places there were erected Statues of Alabaster, and Brasse, which yet were no notions of the wayes in, or out, because the very same were placed <...> in many places alike; there were also several seats of grasse-cushions, whereupon to rest the weary limbs of wanderers, or for those that knew the passes to sit & contemplate. The center of this Labyrinth, where <...> these wayes did meet, was a most pleasant round, in the midst of which was a most admirable <...> source of water, which was conveyed over the hedges as high as they were. This, Sir, was the Lab <...> nth which Timantes had so much curiosity to see, & with more longing desire, because he <...> seen that in Crete, which was visited from all parts of the World: He spoke often of going to it: and the Prince Philoxipes intended to make one, but falling sick, his journey was stopped: So that Timantes turned his intentions into a hunting design, with some others of quality in Paphos: But as chance would have it, Timantes lost his way, and wandered from the rest of the company with a friend who travelled with him, whose name was Antimaques; So that not knowing where they were, they espied at their coming out of a Wood, a very stately house, standing in the midst of a great pleasant Plain: They no sooner saw it, but went thither, both out of curiosity, and to ask where they were, and which was their way to Paphos: Timantes going first, went straight to the dore, and found it open: Then came into a great Base Court, where he saw no body: Yet he and Antimaques lighted from their horses, and leaving them with a servant which followed them, they entered into a Page 32 Garden of a prodigious bignesse, whose door also they found open: But as soon as Timantes had taken two turnes in the Garden, he saw a great Copps of Myrtle Hedges, so that he made no question but chance had brought him thither, where he had such a desire to go, and that this was the Labyrinth he desired to see; So that walking hastily towards it with a longing desire to satisfie his Curiosity, and never thought of any guide: For since he was acquainted with the turnings and windings of that in Crete, he imagined, he should hit of this also: He entered therefore with Antimaques into this Labyrinth, and as soon as he had passed through five or six of the Roomes or Closets, he found, that he was ignorant of the turnings, and that it differed from the other at Crete: But it was no longer considering, for he was already so far wandered, that the more he sought to find the way out, the further he was carried in. Yet was he much delighted with this pleasant Wilderness: for since Antimaques and he were both in hunting habits, Antimaques had a horn about him: So that they feared not losing themselves, imagining they could make themselves heard when they would: As they were thus talking together, and Antimaques jesting with Timantes at their wandering, and telling him they stood in need of Ariadnes thred to get out of this Labyrinth; and hinting unto him, that being of that Queens Race, it was more a shame for him then any other, to be thus entangled, upon a suddain, he heard a woman singing, and that most admirably: so that silently walking towards the place from whence the voice came, they found there was but one thick hedge between them and her that sung: But it was so extraordinarily thick and high, that they could by no means possible see her they heard, nor get to her; For when they tried, they found themselves farther from her: So that not being able to withhold commendations from one that sung so well; And Timantes hoping thereby he might perhaps get out of his wandering, he began to cry out, in a loud tone of admiration, as soone as she had done singing: Ah Antimaques how happy is this wandering unto us, provided we meet not with the same destiny by Land, that Ulysses did by Sea, & that harmonious voice we hear be not only a bait to draw us unto a farther loss of our selves. But Sir, to make the reason of the fantastical encounter the more pleasant unto you, be pleased to know, that she who sung, was the Princess of Salamis: who having planted such a Labyrinth as this at her own house, onely the hedges not yet grown above two feet in height, she knew all the turnings very well: So that coming thither that day to consult with my Sister, whether she should place the Statues in hers as in this; She came into this Garden at a little back door, where her Coach waited for her. More over, since she affected to be solitary, she kept this voyage very secret, and therefore she came in a poor Coach, without one man with her, and her chiefe reason why she made such a mysterious secret of it, was, because this Garden belonged unto a man whose Son was deep in love with her; and therefore she would not have it known who she was, lest they should imagine she desired to recall him whom she had banished: And it was the easier to conceal, because the Porter and the Housekeeper, who let her in, had been her Domestique Servants whilst her Husband lived; so that they were more for her then for their Master, and therefore they took an especial care none should know it? And in order to that, they went to the place where her Coach stood, lest any should enquire whose Coach it was: They left another Gardiner at the other door, with orders to let none enter, though it seemed they were ill observed; for Timantes it seemed found the door open, and entered, as I told you before: But Sir, he had no sooner expressed himselfe unto Antimaques (as I said before) but Parthenia was much surprised to heare one so near her, and would remove from that place: But Antimaques answering Timantes, that he was so farre from fearing this sweet voice would make them lose themselves, as he hoped she would happily help them out of the Labyrinths, she understood by this, that they had really lost themselves, and had no Guide, especially; because she perceived by the accent of their voices, that they were strangers: So that recollecting her selfe, and imagining that <...> could never get unto the place where she was, and knowing they knew her not, she resolved for diversions sake, to answer them that spake unto her: So that she said, the voice they heard would not chame them, since they cared not for the hearing it, but onely that they might by it get out of that Labyrinth in which they were entangled: Oh Madam, said Timantes, I beseech you mistake me not; For I am so glad of my entanglement, that I wish not to come out: and am so far from seeking for the issues of this Labyrinth, that I seek onely how to get unto the place where you are, that I may know whether there be as much sweetness in your eyes as in in your voice: It seems by your expressions, replied Parthenia, that you have as much wit as Civility: but I know not whether I may chide you or no, for offering to engage your self without a guide in a place where you cannot get out without one. Whilst Parthenia Page 33 was talking to Timantes, Amaxita, and Antimaques, did both of them, what they could, on their sides of the hedge, to open the boughes of Myrtle: but they were so extraordinarily thick and entwined, that Amaxita labored long in vain: Yet at last she found a place by the beames of the Sun, which pierced through the thick of the hedge, so that though the place was very narrow, yet she spied Timantes talking to Parthenia, but saw not Antimaques, who was as busie as she some four paces off, but could see none of them: Amaxita no sooner saw Timantes, but she made a signe unto Parthenia, who imagining that since they might see on that side of the hedge, as well as she on this, pulled down her hood, and caused all her women to do the like. Yet she removed a little to look upon the man whom Amaxita spied, and whom she easily perceived to be a man of some great quality, not onely by the richness of his Clothes, but also by the Garbe, and Aire of Timantes; Parthenia stayed not long there; for she no sooner saw him, but she made no question but that he was the stranger of whom they reported such wonders: Insomuch as without any reason, she perceived in her selfe a strange agitation of that, for which she could find no cause, but onely the odnesse of the adventure: But at last Antimaques found out a place where he might see Parthenia: 'Tis true, see her but with her hood pulled down, no more then he could Timantes who saw her so also: So that all this while, every one was in a husht silence: For Timantes not knowing that the Lady whom he looked upon, desired not to be seen; hoped still she would lift up her hood as he earnestly desired: His curiosity was the more zealous, because he saw a Lady of a very handsome stature and Symmetry, and had the whitest hands in the World, for Parthenia pulled Amaxita by the Gown to whisper unto her, that she thought this to be the man so much extolled by every one: So that by this means, Timantes might judge of her beauty by her voice, by her stature, by her armes, and by her hands. As for her dresse, nothing could be concluded from it: For that day, she wore such a dresse as ladies of highest quality sometimes use, and which those of a more inferiour Rank use also, so that nothing could be drawn from it! Nor had he time to observe how her women kept that respective distances, for the hole through which he looked was so little, that hee could see but one at once, and Parthenia removing from that place some two paces, he could see her no more, do all he could: I beseech you Madam, said he unto her, though you will not give me leave to see you, yet for Heavens sake let me hear you; and be not so inhumane as to let an unfortunate stranger wander, and wander for the love of you: For truly Madam, had not your sweet alluring voice becharmed my eare, I am confident I had found the way out of this mysterious Labyrinth: And though I am deceived in this, yet to let you know that I have seen others which I could have better understood: Let me tell you, that I am a Cretan, and I beseech you, let me not find the Cyprian Ladies lesse pittifull then they there: For doubtlesse you know how Ariadne helped Theseus out of the Labyrinth there: And be not so cruell I beseech you, as to leave him wandering here, who has the honour to participate of that illustrious and charitable Ladies blood: but help Timantes out of this place as Ariadne did Theseus out of that: For I must needs have the same passion to you, that shee had unto him, if you do the like for me. Since you are such an absolute Master of your passions (replied Parthenia, very glad to see she was not deceived) that you can love, when and whom you please: It is to be likewise feared, that you can also hate when and whom you please: and that if I should do for you as Ariadne did for Theseus, you would not do for me as Theseus did for Ariadne: Therefore Sir, I have no disposition to free you from your Labyrinth upon that condition which you propose, for on the contrary, you could tell me nothing which would sooner withhold me: Also since now I know your qualitie, I cannot find in my heart to see you, because I am much ashamed that I have rendered you no more respect: But Madam (replied he, and smiled) would it not be uncivil, if you should not permit me the sight of you, but to leave me wandering in a place, out of which I cannot get without your help? and do you not fear I should complain against you? Could you know Sir who I am, replied she, doubtlesse I should fear it, and should not do so: However Madam, I beseech you tell me why you use me thus? The reason is (replied she, and laughed) because having never captivated any by my own charmes, I should be glad to take hold of this opportunity, and at least to make one Prisoner. If there want nothing but that, to give you satisfaction (answered Timantes) I promise you to be your Captive, and Prisoner both: I consent not to follow you out, but to remain in this Labyrinth; therefore I beseech you, deny me not the happiness of seeing you, but instruct me which way I should come unto the place where you are; since I shall be nothing but a peece of incivillie towards you, replied she, I cannot allow my self to let you see me: but must be guilty of this cruelty wherewith you charge me: The cruelty of fair ones, will absolutely be forgotten, (replied he) if they will but once shew Page 34 themselves, how can I give credit unto your words (replied she and laughed still) since you rank me in the number of faire ones before you see mee. I know already (replied he) that you have a most Angell-like voice, not only in singing but in speaking: moreover I know that you are of a most admirable stature & garb, & that you have the whitest hands upon earth: so that if your eyes be answerable, and as far as I imagine them, you must needs be the fairest upon earth: Since you imagine them so faire, replied Parthenia, I will keep you still in that imagina|tion, and not show them unto you; yet that you shall not say I am altogether inhuman, I promise to send you one that shall help you out of that Labyrinth, assoon as I am gone. Timantes perceiving Parthenia prepared to be gone. I beseech you Madam said he unto her, let me at the least know your name as I have told you mine: I had rather let you have a sight of me (answered she) then tell you my name, but I pray you give me leave to conceale both. After this, Parthenia went away, and Timantes heard no other noise but what she and her women made as they departed, who never feared being followed; yet they went very fast, and took Coach in all hast, commanding the Porter to goe and help those strangers out who were wandering in the Labyrinth, but not untill a full hower after she was gone, commanding him also not to tell who she was, but to say they were some Ladies of Paphos unknown to him. After this, Parthenia went away, and the porter in obedience to his former Mistresse, stayed an houre, before he went to release the strangers she spoke of. In the meane time Timantes and Antimaques were as busie as could be to follow her, but they were so far from getting out as they came into the middle of it, that is to say, in the round place where they resolved to stay and expect the performance of her promise. But as every minute seemed an age unto any that are in expectation of any thing, Timantes began to expresse his sorrowes unto Antimaques that he could not see the face of her who sung, and his extreame desire to know her name; yet his impatiency was not so earnest to be out of the Labyrinth, as that he might endeavour to learn who this unknown one was, whose voice, stature, hands, and witt, did so pleasingly surprise him, & sweetly charme him: so that Antimaques, thinking the sound of his Horne would the sooner cause some unto their release, began to winde it as loud as he could, but all in vaine, for the Porter who walked in the Garden till the hower after Parthe|nia's departure; hindred the Gardner from going to them also: but when the hower was olver, he went and released them: assoon as he saw them, according to Parthenia's order, he told Timantes, that a Lady unknowne unto him sent him to release them, and asked pardon for coming no sooner, because he mett with a man with whom he had some businesse of importa|nce. Ah my friend (answered Timantes) you tell me not truly, for it is impossible you should not know one who is so well acquainted with every turne of this mysterious Labyrinth. Sir, (said the Porter with a seeming ingenuity) since I have not been long a Porter unto this house, it is no wouder I should not know this Lady; for I assure you my Master hath a Daughter I know not yet: Timantes did not yet beleeeve him, but pressed him to tell him who she was; but all in vaine: then did he promise him a very considerable reward, if he would but satisfie his longing curiosi|ty, but since promises are not so prevalent with such men, as present gifts, and since Timantes had nothing about him to give, he kept himselfe faithfull unto Parthenia. When Timantes saw he could not win him to reveale, and indeed beleeeved he was ignorant who she was; however tell me said he unto him, which way she went: Sir (said the man most subtilly) I shall easily doe that; and then he shewed him the high way to Paphos, assuring him confidently that her Coach went that way, though it were quite contrary, and he told it with more confidence, because the way was much beaten, and Coach-Wheelles might be seen lately gone that way, so that Timantes giving credit unto his words, took Horse with Antimaques, and without any thoughts of Hunting, went in hast and hopes to overtake the Coach: yet he asked the Servant whom he left with the Horses, whether he saw any thing, but though he answered, yet did not this undeceive him, so that he went as farre as Paphos in hopes to overtake it: and so it chanced, that asking some men upon the way whether they mett a Coach, they answered that they mett two: so that Timantes not questioning but she in whom he was in quest of was one, he went on: but when he came at Paphos, and told every one he spoke with, that the Lady he met with at the Labyrinth came thither, none ever looked towards the Princesse of Salamis, nor could they beleeeve she would ever leave her desart, and come unto that place for the reason aforesaid, and therefore none ever thought upon her: but to consider who there was in Paphos who did so well sing, but since the number of them was great this afforded no light, the Prince Philoxipes never thought upon the Princesse his Sister, but on the contrary imagined her whom Timantes heard to be a woman of inferiour ranke, who had a good voice but was very ugly, and for that reason would not show her selfe, and indeed every one was of that opinion, and chid Timantes for his curiosi|ty: But he for his further sa|tisfaction Page 35 would see this ugly woman, and heare her sing; but when he saw and heard this woman, he was confident she was not the same: but his imagination was filled with so much curiosi|ty, that Timantes began to suspect it was Parthenia which he heard. In the meane time, he would not declare his thoughts unto any but one woman, who was his friend, and this wo|man being one of those whom Parthenia had heretofore robbed of her adorers, she hated her; he had no sooner asked her whether this woman whom he mett with might not be the Princesse of Salamis, whose Beauty, Witt, and Voice, he had heard so much extolled; But she cried out, and answered with as much envio|us hast as any Rivall could, that if she whom he met was of a good stature, white hands, and sweet voice as he described, it could not be Parthenia. For said she, however she be cryed up by the world, yet she is tall but not hand|some, her hands are white, but not well made, and her Voice is shrill, but not pleasant. You may imagine Sir, after this, that all the suspitions of Timantes dyed, for he knew that he whom he saw was of an admirable proportion and height, her hands the whitest and best made in the World, and her voice the most sweet and pleasing: so that this pleasing Idea swelling his imagination more and more, and augmenting his curiosi|ty, he continued his quest after this amiable unknowne one, he went unto the Temples, and the Walks, and all Visits, with an intended designe to seek her out in all places: but all his labour was lost, and he still continued in the same unquiet curiosi|ty. In the meane while Parthenia being returned from the Labyrinth to her solitude, began to talk with Amaxita of their encounter, ex|treamly commending the handsome garb of Timantes, and the gallantry of his witt. Madam, (said Amaxita unto her) if Timantes prove the man whom the Gods have reserved for you, our journey was very happy, and I am confident your voice and witt did charme him more then you imagine, for he spoke in such an obliging Emphasis, as certainly expressed more then common civility. Alas Amaxita (answered Parthenia and laughed) doe you thinke I could wound Timantes through so thick a hedge? I know they say Love has wings, but I cannot thinke he can fly so high as over it: therefore never imagine that Timantes has any thoughts of me: his curiosi|ty happily lasted a quarter of an hour, or so, and after that, dyed, and there's an end: and I pray let us doe the like, and never trouble our selves, with chimeri|call Fancies in the Aire, which have neither beginning nor ending: For truly Timantes will never love me unseen, and if he should see me, and chance to be captivated by that poore pittance of Beauty which I have, I durst never trust him; not only be|cause of that cruell experience I have had, that love founded upon Beauty will never last, but also because the Gods have fortold me, that I shall never be happy if I marry one whom my eyes have captivated. These, Sir, were the thoughts which Parthe|nia had of Timantes, whose person and wit did much please her: yet had he easily slipt out of her memory, unlesse the Prince Philoxipes had visited her, who revived him in her fancy; and thus it came to passe. After that Prince had been a long while in conversation with her, shee asked him whether he would give her leave to shew him the alterations she had made in her Garden: And Philoxipes desiring the same, Parthenia carried him into all the places which she had tricked up since he saw her; for he had an admirable fancy and judgement in such things, his stately house of Clara having learned him knowledge in such things. After a long discourse of Fountains, Walks, Statues, and Flowers, Philoxipes casting his eye upon the La|byrinth which I told you before shee had made, and whose hedges were not yet grown up; Your Labyrinth, said he unto her, will be a long time in growing up before they will be fit for such an adventure as the Stranger had of whom I spake the last time I saw you; for these hedges are yet very low. Parthenia, hearing Philoxipes say so, changed colour: 'Tis true he did not take notice of it, because his head was turned towards the Labyrinth: So that Par|thenia recollecting her selfe, asked Philoxipes what that adventure was, which shee knew of better then he did? And he related from the beginning to the ending all the story, aggravating the applauses and commendations which Timantes gave the unknown Lady, purposely to make his relation seem more pleasant: For after he had told Parthenia, how Timantes had extolled her hee knew not, and he thought him in love with her, hee added his further con|ceit, that he thought she whom he so excessively commended, was a woman of low Quality, and ugly; then hee named that woman unto Parthenia whereof he spoke before, and with whom he had so upbraided Timantes. Me-thinks he may be soon satisfied, whether or no it be she (said the Princesse, and laughed) for he need only see and hear this woman. He hath done so already (replied he) but he is certain that it was not she, and is angry when any names her unto him, most confidently affirming, that she whom he saw is the handsomest woman in the world, and seeks out for her in all places. You may imagine, Sir, how much delight the Page 36 Princesse of Salamis took in hearing a relation of an adventure which concerned her self, un|known to the Prince Philoxipes; yet this was not her greatest delight; for her certainty that she made some impression upon the mind of Timantes, or at least his memory gave her so high a satisfaction, that how joyed soever she was in the company of Philoxipes whom she tenderly loved, yet she was impatient till he was gone, that she might the sooner tell Amaxita all he had related. She offered a hundred times to discover unto the Prince the truth of the ad|venture, but some secret suggestion of her thoughts did hinder her: However she asked Philoxipes a hundred questions concerning Timantes, which induced him to tell her, he would bring him to her; but she forbade him more violently then ever; telling him, the more com|pleat Timantes was, the lesse desire she had to see him: For truly, said she, when one is resolved upon a course of solitude, to bring any pleasant company which is not to stay there, doth but redouble sorrowes, and leaves one in a more deep and serious melancholy and mi|sery: And truly, whensoever you doe me the honour to see me, 'tis two dayes at least after, before I can take any delight either in Fountains or Gardens. You could not in a more civil manner tell me (replied Philoxipes) that I should not come so oft to see you; and indeed I am partly acquainted with your humour, which is not to affect such pleasures as are seconded by sorrowes, and that's your chiefe reason why you would not bee loved, lest you should run the hazard of not being so after. 'Tis very true, replied she, I place that unhappiness in the high|est rank of misfortunes; and as I think there cannot be a greater: But you see (said Philoxipes unto her) that all those who love do not prove Inconstants, as the Prince of Salamis was, and as many others who loved you did. And to shew you one example, I doe protest unto you, that the enjoyment of my dear Policrite, does not at all lessen my love: I am as much charmed as I was before I married her; and if handsomnesse would permit it, I would cast my self as submissively at her feet now as ever: For my heart is not at all altered, and I am more troubled to hinder my self from expressions of my passion, then to continue my zeal|lous affections to her. Policrite is still admirably fair, replied Parthenia, that your Constancy hath not yet been put to any difficult test: For I confesse there are a sort of men, not like those, who fall off from loving, before the beauty doth which first moved them, and whose passion does last as it doth. Fie, Sister, said Philoxipes, wrong me not so much as to think, that though Policrite were not fair, I should not love her as much as ever; but beleeeve me that her beauty is not the onely cause of my Constancy; her soul, and her mind has a million of reall beauties beyond it, which time and age can never ruin, and which I shall dote upon eternally. I need no confirmations of my opinion, said Parthenia, that it is not beauty which causeth constant and faithfull love. Philoxipes would then have said more, but it was late; and there|fore he concluded with Parthenia, that as the absence of the Sun causeth darknesse; so the losse of beauty causeth lukewarmnesse and inconstancy in those who love onely for it. After this he returned to the Court, and left Parthenia at liberty to talk with Amaxita, unto whom she related all that the Prince had said concerning Timantes, taking great delight in talking with her; wishing sometimes that Timantes knew it was she, and sometimes again checking her self for wishing. Since Amaxita would have been glad to have Parthenia lesse solitary, she used all her arguments to perswade her, that Philoxipes might bring Timantes to her; but she could not be moved unto it, still protesting, that her beauty should never be the cause of her misfortune, and that both reason, experience, and the authority of the gods obliged her not to change her opinion. After this, Sir, Parthenia would sometimes unawares talk of Timan|tes, and then cease for many daies together; so that perhaps she would have quite forgot him, but for another adventure which I shall acquaint you withall. It was now at that time of the year when the Adonian Feast was celebrated in the Town of Amathonte, which is so famous for the magnificent Temple there, and the ceremony there celebrated. I know, Sir, you will be a little surprised to hear talk of this Feast in a place where Venus Urania had not more Altars then hath Venus Anadiomena. But be pleased to know, that when that famous Queen, of whom ye have heard reports, did re-establish the Temples of that great goddess, shee was forced to tolerate some customs which were not quite repugnant unto good manners: For as the herd of people doe oftentimes love the Ceremonies of Religion, better then the Religion it self, she thought it not expedient to incense those who were apt to murmur at an universall change: So that she was in some sort forced to tolerate the Feast of the Adonians for the sa|tisfaction of the people in Amathonte: So that since that time this Feast is still kept, and belcome so famous, that they resort from all parts of the Isle unto it. Parthenia knowing the day when it was to be observed, resolved to go thither, and more for the satisfaction of Amaxita's desires, then to content her own curiosity: And so she designed for Amathonte, but to goe Page 37 unknown, lest it should be laid in her dish, she should quit her solitude, to see such a Feast as that. Since she was acquainted with one in Amathonte whom she could absolutely command, because she was brought up with the Princesse her mother, she lodged at her house: And since she was well in years, & had neither husband nor children, nor any great Family, she did so well conceal her self there, that none ever suspected she was at Amathonte: For coming in the night, & in no magnificent Coach, & having none with her but my Sister, & two women to wait upon her, it was no difficulty to be unperceived in that Town, especially at a time when so many strangers were there: But, Sir, give me leave to tell you, that this Feast of the Adonians is a Feast of Tears at the beginning, & of Joy at the end, as you shall ere long know. In the first place, it was the very essential part of the Ceremony in mourning for the death of Adonis, to forbid all Ladies that day to enter into the Temple with their masks off, or hoods up, it being not permitted those that come to lament over the Tomb of Adonis to have their faces uncovered as long as the Ceremony lasted: For since all the Ladies could not cry, they said it was better they should come veiled, then that Joy should be seen in their eyes at a Feast of Tears. The first thing that is to be seen in the Temple that day, which is full of Lamps, and no other Light, is a great Coffin of Gold covered with Roses, Mirtle, and Cypress, lifted upon four steps covered with black Tapestry, full of enflamed hearts, and drops of tears in silver: These four steps stand upon four great Pillars of black and white Marble, twenty paces in diameter; about which stand all those that are spectators of the Ceremony: These Pillars being half covered with the richest Sydonian Tapestry; Close about the Coffin kneel fifty of the fairest Virgins in the Town, dressed like Nymphs; but Nymphs in mourning, and all in despair, that is, with loose Robes of black Tiffeny, with a mixture of silver their hair dishevelled upon their shoulders, yet not in a negligent manner, testifying by dissembled tears, or at least deep-fetched sighs, their extreme sorrow of soul. About this Square, on which the Coffin lies, is hanged all the Equipage of a Hunter, but a Hunter most magnificent, that is, with a Bow of Ebony garnished with Gold, with a Quiver of the same; a Horn of Ivory, adorned with Jewels; a Hunters staffe headed with Rubies and Emeralds. Then two of those mourning Beauties, which were about the Coffin, began to recite in verse the Praises of Adonis in form of a Dialogue; and when their Panegyric was ended, twelve others began to sing other Verses, condoling his death, and to say truly, the Song was sad, and so full of grieving expressions, enough to melt any heart. But before I end the relation of this Ceremony, I must needs tell you, Sir, how the gods having determined that Timantes should love Parthenia, prompted him to come unto this Feast, and so he did; and was not only there; but had placed himself between Parthenia and Amaxita, who according to the custom of this place had their hoods pulled down, and therefore the beauty of Parthenia could not attract his looks more then any other of the Ladies who were all hooded, except those who were about the Coffin: But since Parthenia and Amaxita spied him, they made a sign unto each other as soon as he came in, signifying thereby their meanings. Parthenia confessed afterwards unto me, that she no sooner saw Timantes, but her heart did beat, and she thought of changing places; but thinking afterwards that perhaps it might more attract observance, shee stayed where she was. As for Timantes, since hee saw no Ladies unveiled but those about the Coffin, and knew not that shee hee so sought after was so near him, he regarded the Ceremony with close attention, untill after the twelve had sung their Song of sorrow. One amongst them turned towards all the Ladies of the Assembly, and conjured them in the name of Venus to conjoyn their complaints with theirs, and sing with her six verses which she would immediately recite unto them, to the end that which they made for the death of Adonis might be a publique mourning; and she no sooner began to sing these six verses (which all the Cyprian Ladies knew) but all within the Temple began to sing after her; so that Parthenia singing as the rest, not thinking that in such a crowd of voices Timantes could distinguish hers: But however, Sir, shee no sooner began to sing, but amongst this great abundance of severall voices, which made the Temple echo, he distinguished hers from them all, and knew it; and the voice no sooner struck his ears, but his heart, and let him know he had found her he long had look for. So that without any further regard unto the ceremony, he turned towards her, to see whether he could find the same conformity in her stature as in her voice; and as she feared, lest her hood should not be enough down, she cunningly, pulled it down with her fair hand: So that Timantes seeing the same stature, the same hand, and hearing the same voice which he heard before, did not question but she was the same he met with before. Yet he would not speak unto her untill she had done singing; Meane while hee endeavoured to discover through her Vaile, whether her face was as fair as all he knew, but his endeavours were in vain: For the Page 38 Temple having no light but that of Lampes, he was uncertain whether Parthenia's Vaile was thicker then others; for since her intention was to conceal her self, she wore one of those which our Ladies use to wear when they travell, to keep them from the Sun. Timantes could therefore see no more, then what he said before: Yet it did not much trouble him, for his hope was, that after the Ceremony was ended, he should satisfie his curiosity. So that Parthenia had no sooner done singing with the rest, but Timantes bowing and speaking unto her in a low voice; I need not ask Madam, said he unto her, what is become of my curiosity to see this ceremony, for certain it is your selfe, who drew me hither, without my knowledge. Sir answered Parthenia, if I did draw you hither without your knowledge, pray adde this, that it was without my knowledge: For since I have neither the honour to be known unto you, nor to know you, certainly we met without design: But since Sir, the end of the ceremony will quickly separate us, and since you came to see it, not talke with me, I beseech you observe the end with as much attention as you did the beginning: Ah Madam, (said he unto her) I cannot do as you bid me: And to shew you, that I ought not, be pleased to know, that I am the same Timantes, who had the honour to meet you in the Labyrinth, and who since that have sought you in all places. You need not tell me who you are (replied she subtly, and purposely to amuse him) for I have seen you in other places then here or there: Timantes was so surprised at this answer of Parthenia's, that he knew not what to say, for he knew not that she saw him through the hedge, but imagining that she had seen him at Paphos. However, he knew none that did sing like her, nor who spoke as she did; so that hearing her say so, he knew not what to think or say: Also she imposed silence, during all the rest of the ceremony, not, said she, I have any such great devotion unto this Feast, as I should if it were unto Venus Urania; but because it is not just, since you came from Paphos hither, and since I am here not to observe it, and be able to tell you what we have seen. For your part Madam, said he unto her, you may do what you please; but for my part, I am resolved to look upon nothing but your self: For I am so afraid to lose you again, that I am resolved not to be put to the cruell necessity of being separated from you the second time, before I see you. Parthenia hearing Timantes say so, and having no mind to expresse her self, that he should not see her, or know who she was, lest she should augment his curiosity, gave him no answer, but imposed silence, and observed the rest of the ceremony. Her example was nothing to Timantes, who could see nothing they did, since he had Parthenia to look upon. In the meane while, the ceremony continued still: a consort of hunting instruments was heard: another of Shepheards Musick, and another of Lutes: after which, they put most rare Odors in the perfuming pannes which made a little cloud, and by an engine which invisibly moved the Coffin of gold vanquished in the blood, as well as the Tapestry of sable full of enflamed hearts, and teares of Silver: and in Lieu of so sad an object, was seen a little Garden set with Rose trees, and Mirtles in huge magnificent basins standing upon the square, where the Coffin did lie in the midst, of which did grow above all the rest of the flowers, that sweet flower, into which 'tis said, the Gods at the request of Venus, did metamorphose Adonis. So that those sweet Odors dissipating by degrees, the ceremony began to look with another face, and the same women which before sung songes of sorrow, throwing away all their Mantles of mourning, appeared in rich and magnificent dresses, and sung some verses which declared the immortality of Adonis unto all the Assembly: So that the ceremony ended in joy, and a sacrifice of thanks: But Sir, since the custome is, that as soon as this little Garden appears, all the Ladies must unmask themselves; Parthenia who was not ignorant of it, though she had never seen the Feast, made a signe unto Amaxita to retire; and indeed, when the perfuming Pannes sent forth such clouds of sweet smokie Odors as did both darken the Temple, & almost stifle the Ladies; Parthenia seeming not able to endure it, changed places with Amaxita and her two women, and retired with variety of thoughts, for she feared Timantes would know and follow her: yet she was very glad, that he did not perceive her when she changed places; yet quickly he found her, and changed place as well as she, and followed her under one of the Arches of the Temple, where she was set with Amaxita, intending to goe out amongst the croude when the ceremony was ended, not daring to go out sooner, least Timantes should follow unto the place where shee lodged. In the meane time, as she was sitting, and causing my Sister to sit with her without any ceremony, (the better to disguise the matter) Timantes came and kneeled down before her, asking pardon for that liberty which he tooke, and beseeching her not to be as rigorous unto him, as she was in the Labyrinth, for Madam (said he unto her) though I doe infinitely honour your sex in generall, and you above all in particular, I am resolved this day to faile in that duty which I owe you, by importuning you to doe me the honour to lift up that envious vaile which Page 39 covers your faire face, and hinders the beames of your beauty from shining upon me, or else to tell me in what place and time my eyes may have a sight of her whom my heart already honours. Since Nature hath not bestowed upon me, replied Parthenia, any such beauty as your imagination gives me, I will not my selfe put you out of that pleasing Idea, which you have formed of me in your Fancie, but which does not at all resemble me: for truly when you see me, and see me so infinitely below what you thinke I am, I shall then perhaps in lieu of chafing curiosity out of your minde, put aversion into your heart. Ah Madam, said he, though your eyes should not be suitable to your stature and proportion, nor to your voice, nor to your hands, nor your witt, yet I should infinitely honour you. Yet Beauty does not consist in any thing you know of me, replied she, for the most exact and handsome stature in the world, the fairest hands, the sweetest voice, and the finest witt, may notwithstanding all these be the ugliest woman in a land; if her complexion be thick and muddy, the symmetry of her face disproportionable, and her physiognomy savage or dull. Ah Madam, answered Timantes, all these you name makes me believe you are such an one as my imagination Fancies: for truly if you were not so faire as I thinke you are, you could never make such a handsome description of ugliness, and I am confident, that to make up your owne picture, there needs no more but the just contraries to what you have said: Therefore Madam I beseech you in the name of that Goddess which is here adored, let me at least know who you are, for I am resolutely determined to follow you untill I know. Parthenia perceiving Timantes to speak as a man fully resolved to see her, and to know who she was, was exceedingly perplexed, she knew well enough, that if she should lift up her hood, he could not know her; but she thought also, that the sight would more augment his curiosity then diminish it, and that he would then follow her as earnestly as before, she durst not trust unto his discretion, and shew her face or tell her name, because she was not so well acquainted with him, as to thinke he would be faithfull, nor would she in the minde she then was in, suffer her beauty to make a conquest of him; and though she did already very much esteem him, both by all reports, and by her owne knowledge, yet she would not let him see her face, nor put her selfe upon such termes as should oblige her to shun him: But she knew not very well what advantage she could draw unto her selfe by not letting him see her and know who she was; yet for all that, since the Gods had let her know she should never be happy by procuring love unto her selfe, by any allurements of her Beauty, she could not resolve upon it, but concluded it to be her duty to submit unto the opinion of the Oracles, both of Delphos, and of Venus Vrania. Thus was she fully resolved not to shew her selfe, or name her selfe unto Timantes, therefore beginning to speak, Sir said she unto him, I perceive that you have some sleight curiosity to know who I am, and therefore to be just, I must not thinke it strange you should desire satisfaction from me, especially since certainly you are perswaded, that in importuning me to lift up my hood, you thinke to doe me a civility by it: But Sir, to testifie that I will deale with you as with one whose vertues I honour, I will impart something unto you, and tell you, that it does so much concerne me, that you should not at present know who I am, as perhaps the wellbeing of my life depends upon it: therefore I conjure you, by all that is deare unto you, not to aske me who I am, nor to follow me. It seemes Madam, replied he, that you dare not trust that vertue which you say you know in me, since you dare impart nothing unto me: But Madam, one is not obliged to doe impossibilities, and since I must not for ever lose you, therefore I doe professe that I will never leave you untill I know who you are, but withall I doe assure you I will never reveale who you are, since you would not have it knowne. Parthenia then perceiving the obstinacy of Timantes, bethought her selfe of another expedient to prevent his knowing who she was, and presently propounded it unto him, because she saw the ceremony was ready to end. Sir, (said she unto him) I confesse I cannot hinder you from following of me, and therefore you may know where I lodge, and perhaps know who I am; but I doe here professe and declare unto you, that if you doe so, you shall never see or speake unto me againe, but on the contrary, if you will be so observant of my desires as not to follow me, nor to enquire who I am, nor ever tell any without exception, that you met with her the second time, whom you first met with in the Labyrinth, I promise you my company in a place which will afford better conveniency of talk then here: Therefore make your choice Sir, but first consider well, that if I tell you this day who I am, I will shun you all the dayes of my life after, so that you shall never see me more; and if you doe not follow me, but exactly doe this I desire, I will keep my promise with you: but doe not thinke of promising (addeth she) and not performing, for I am confident there is not one in all Paphos unto whom you can impart these adventures, which will not communicate it unto me againe the same Page 40 howe: therefore take heed what you say, for I doe the second time reiterate my resolution never to see you againe as long as I live, if you see me this day, and doe not punctually observe all my desires. Madam, said he unto her, what would you have a man answer who is ready to dye with desire of knowing you, and whom you would have run the hazard of never knowing you: No, no, (said she hastily unto him, seeing that the people began to go out of the Temple) provided you doe not follow me, but doe as I desire, you shall infallibly see me, and speak with me, within these eight dayes. Swear then unto me, answered Timantes, in the presence of the Goddess who is here to be adored: I doe said she unto him, but after that, doe not follow me one pace further, and to keep you to your distance, think that the onlly meanes of seeing me hereafter, is not to follow me now. But Madam, answered he, you doe not tell me where I shall finde you: I will let you know it at Paphos, said she, and went away. Once more (said Timantes in following her) may I trust unto your words? Yes answered she, so you do not follow me. Parthenia spoke these words unto Timantes in such a resolved manner, as he saw she would be obeyed, and therefore he thought his duty so to do it; yet this thought had not fast root in his heart, fearing that unknowne beauty should break promise with him, he still looked after Parthenia, who turned her head two or three times to see whether he obeyed, and still looked after her as long as he could with intention to follow her maugre all her promises: But assoon as she was mingled amongst that great croud of veiled Ladies which went out of the Temple, doe what he could, he lost the sight of her; yet he thought he saw her in the street joyning to the gate of the Temple, but he was deceived, for assoon as he was out, she turned upon the right hand, still observing whether or no. Timantes did punctually obey her, and perceived that he had much adoe; and though she did not desire he should see or know her at this time, yet I know not whether or no she desired he should obey her without repugnancy; yet she was very glad she was out of sight, and gladder when she was come to the place where she lodged, out of which she stirred not, until she returned homewards the next morning: As for Timantes, he had a mind to stay some dayes in Amathonte, to enquire who this unknown Lady was; but since she promised him, to let him heare of her at Paphos, he returned thither, after he had walked over all the streets of this stately Towne, above twenty times, in hopes to find her, who was already in his heart; but after all his unprofitable quest, he returned to Paphos, having brought with him one servant and two Lacques, for Antimaques stayed behind by reason of some indisposition he found in himselfe. In his returne, he did nothing but muse continually upon his adventure; yet according to his promise he resolved to tell it unto none, unlesse she brake promise with him; he examined all reasons, and considered which of them it might be which caused her to deale thus with him, and there was nothing which his imagination did not suggest unto him; sometimes he thought, that perhaps she was not faire, but that thought vanished upon consideration of her faire hands, handsome stature, sweet voice, and her admirable witt, which were strong Arguments unto his faith that she was Faire. Afterwards he suspected her to be some woman that came to Amathonte upon some designe of secret gallantry; but afterward considering that she concealed her selfe aswell in the Labyrinth as at Amathonte, and that he saw no men with her, he changed his thoughts: At last he arrived at Paphos, and there he knew not what to do or think: In the mean time this adventure came so near his heart, that he thought upon nothing else, during the eight dayes of his longing expectation: As oft as he went out of his own lodging, he left word, that if any came to speak with him upon any business, to bring them unto him: And he never came in but he asked whether any were there to speak with him, or brought him any Letters: His life was so unquiet, and his curiosity so full of impatience, that hours seemed dayes, and dayes ages. But whilst Timantes was in this condition, Parthenia was in a confused irresolution: Her first thoughts were to break premises with Timantes, and not to see him; yet she continued not long in that mind; for considering that if she broke with him, he was not obliged to keep promise with her, but divulging unto all the world this last meeting, they might come to guesse the truth: so her first resolution held not, but she asked counsell of my Sister. I pray Amaxita (said she unto her) tell me what you would doe if you were in my condition? Ought I to break my promise with Timantes, or keep it? For my part, Madam (replied Amaxita, who did all she could to drive her out of her solitary humour) I cannot see any reason you have to break your promise with him, nor can I discover any ill that can come unto you by observing it; for if hee doe see you, then he will love you, and then the Oracle is fulfilled; and truly, Madam, I am so confident that Timantes is the man whom the Gods have reserved for you, that I dare not advise you to break your word with him: For you have Page 41 met him twice in so strange a manner as induceth me to this opinion: For doe you not observe, that as unknown unto him as you are he is unquiet, and as full of respective curiosity as some Lovers who have seen you a thousand times, and who did not think more of you then Timantes doth? Though all you say, were true, replied Parthenia, yet am I not much beholding to him, since his curiosity is not an effect of my merit; but because naturally one loves to know that which he is ignorant of, especially in some things: Yet I am confident, replied Amaxita, that if your voice had been harsh, your stature and composure ill favoured, your hands ugly, and your wit grosse, when you spoke unto him, his curiosity had not lasted halfe a quarter of an hour: I doe not say that Timantes is in love with you; but I dare confidently assure you, that if you will, he will be: For I perceive by his expressions that there is such a tender and passionate kind of inclination betwixt you and him, as useth to be between two who really love. By this account, said Parthenia, you think my heart has the same inclination to Timantes as the heart of Timantes hath to me. Truly Madam (replied she, and smiled) If my respects I owe you would permit me, I should freely and ingenuously confesse, that I think Timantes hath a strong inclination to love you, and that you have also an inclination to suffer him he should love you. Therefore I beseech you consider, being born in an Isle where it is a shame not to be loved, and not to love; whether it be handsom to muse alway your life in this manner: If it be not, I would advise you to doe more then all the Beauties of the Court can, and captivate the heart of Timantes, which would not be taken by all their Charms. Amaxita (said Parthenia to her) to lay open the secret of my soul unto you, I must confesse that I thinke the chief felicity of life consists in the having soveraigne authority over the heart of some one, and in a pleasing communication of joyes and sorrowes unto a suitable disposition: This sympathy of soules and spirits, doth doubtlesse find great sweetnesse in pure affections; but yet, for all that, there is too much equality between two friends to find that satisfaction, as may be had in an affection of another nature; for one shall not finde in friendship a blinde obedience, secrets are commonly disclosed; and though friendship have a fire in it, aswell as love hath, yet that fire is but a light without heat, whereas love both heats and lights; and indeed my deare Amaxita (pursued she and blushed) it must needs be confessed, that a pure and innocent love is the only joy of the world, if it be lasting; But the cruelty of it is, when a firme and constant soule contracts affection with a light and perfidious heart. But do you think Madam (replied Amaxita) that it is an absolute impossibility to finde a constant lover? I doe not think it impossible, said Parthenia, but I thinke it a great difficulty, especially amongst those who love only for beauty, and no other reason; the truth is, to make love lasting and perfect, there must no interest be mixed with it, he must love because he is forced unto it; reason must be excluded, and not at all contribute: And indeed I confesse Amaxita, that if I thought I should finde Timantes to be a man who could love me, without any confideration of my quality, or my riches, or without grounding his passion upon that little pittance of Beauty which I have, I would doe any thing to get his affection: I doe not say I would commit any crime to purchase it; but I should goe a little further then that exact rule of prudence which would have one hazard nothing. I pray you Madam said Amaxita, what hazard do you run, in this occasion which presents it selfe? you know Timantes deserves you, both by his birth, his riches, his person, his witt, and his vertue; moreover you know, the Prince your Brother loves him dearly, and you see Timantes courts you and seeks you out in all places; moreover yet, it appears by the manner of your meetings, that it is he whom the Gods would have you marry: for it is not by any influence from your eyes, that you have captivated, or at least filled him full of curiosity; and therefore Madam, if you will follow my advice, keep your word with him, let him see you, but not know who you are if he does not love you, yet you run no hazard, because he knows not who you are, and if he doe love you, then you have found in Timantes the man that must make you happy: But though I would keep my word with him and see him, replied she, yet how shall I doe it? unto whom can I trust the secret? and how can I handsomly see him unlesse he come hither? Moreover, since it ought not to be by that little beauty I have, that I must captivate him who must make me happy, I conceive it ought rather to be by my vertue then my witt, that I must make this conquest, and therefore I make a question whether in consenting that Timantes shall see me in secret, I bring my vertue in suspection, for certainly I have a most invincible aversion against any thing of immodesty. Amaxita seeing there was no difficulty in the minde of Parthenia, but how to carry the matter handsomely, began to consider how it might be done, and she considered so well, that her imagination had contrived a way how to satisfie the Princesse. But Sir, it is fit I tell you, that the Principall reason which moved Page 42 Amaxita to perswade Parthenia that Timantes might speake with her, was, because Philoxipos and Policrite had desired her a thousand times that she would perswade this Princesse to quitt her solitude, and not to rely so punctually upon the strict words of the Oracle, which they thought was ill interpreted. This Sir was the motive which induced Amaxita unto what she did, and to induce Parthenia to lay hold of this expedient which she proposed unto her, she moved her to read over againe the Oracle of Delphos, which was as I told you before in these words, That if she would be happy, she must not marry a man whom her eyes had not captivated, and by consequence (said Amaxita) it must be concluded that there is one in the world who may love you and never see your eyes; for the Gods doe never foretell things impossible; so that it is almost evident that Timantes is the man whom the Gods have sent to make you happy: therefore Madam if you will take my judgement thinke no more upon it, but let him speak with you. But I pray you Amaxita, said Parthenia, how can I goe unto Paphos and not be known? and how can I see Timantes, but he must see my face? or talk with him, but he may guesse who I am? However, after this cruell experience which I have had in the inconstant resolutions of those who only love Beauty; I will not have Timantes know whether my eyes be faire or ugly, nor know my quality; for truly if I doe conquer his heart, it shall not be by fading beauty which dies, and his affection dies with it, and which will leave me in such a sad despair, as I have had but too much tryall off. Amaxita hearing Parthenia say so, would not contradict her, because she thought it not impossible, but Timantes might fall in love with her, and not see her face, and that he was not of their opinion, who thinke the eyes only are the givers and receivers of love. But Madam, said she, you must act your part, and therefore you must give it out you intend a journey of fifteen dayes, and in lieu of going to the place pretended, go secretly into Paphos, and lodge at friends of my Brothers, and stay there all that time, during which time, upon some pretence which we will think upon at leasure, I will procure that your Chamber shall be a ground room towards the Garden, with a Belcone which opens upon a Jessimine Arbor, which is much darker then any other; this friend is a woman of quality and vertue, her Husband and Sonne are both at Athens, and she is much obliged unto my Brother, and he to her; she it is we will trust in the businesse. But if it should come to be knowne I was at Paphos (said Parthenia) what would people say? and what would they think? At the worst (replied Amaxita) they can but say you had a mind to see a Horse-race and not be knowne; and indeed this was a handsome excuse, for there was to be one, and the end of the race was to be behind the Ladies house; yet Parthenia could not bring her mind unto it, until the sixth day when I came thither, where I was no sooner come, but she desired to ask me concerning Timantes, purposely to know whether he had been secret, for I had the honour to see him after with the Prince Philoxipos. Amaxita in obedience to Parthenia's commands, asked me before her, whether the stranger of whom such wonders were reported was still at Paphos? and whether he was as pleasant in the Court, as he was at first? Timantes, replied I, is questionlesse as compleat a Gallant as the World hath, but since a journey he took to see the Adonian feast, he is become much more reserved, and unquiet then he was before; yet certainly it is by reason of some distemper in his body, not minde, for no ill accidents have any way crossed him: Perhaps he is in love (said Parthenia) No, no, replied I, for since his return from Amathonte, he never visited one Lady: Then certainly (said she laughing, and looking upon Amaxita) the Adonian feast hath inspired him with such a melancholy, as it cannot be cured againe. After this, passing from one discourse to another, I began to relate what expectation there was of a Horse-race to be at Paphos, so that Parthenia, whose heart desired to see Timantes, took this occasion to colour her designe: then she told my sister, that she would not eternally detain her from all manner of pleasures, but would have her go and see this Horse-race; and therefore (said she unto her) you shall have my Coach, and Megasides shall go with you to Paphos, and bring you back when the sport and Feast is done, that you may relate all the passages of it unto me. Amaxita hearing Parthenia say so, knew this was but a colour for her owne voyage, so that seeming to think she was in good earnest, she told her, that she would not goe unlesse she went also, and in conclusion, the journey was agreed upon, and Amaxita seeing the Horse-race, was her umbrage: But for all this she was full of anxious circumspections, such as were like to break off the voyage, and she alledged so many obscure and intangled reasons, to make me understand what cause she had to keep this journey close, as I wondered, and afterwards she made me sweare a thousand oaths of secrecy, though heavens knows I knew nothing then but that she would goe to see this Horse race? after which I went before to prepare her who was to entertain Parthenia, and order all things for the Page 43 concealment of her voyage, my Mother her selfe knew not that my sister was at Paphos, and the matter was carried so handsomely, that none did so much as suspect any thing; and certainly it was not a business of difficulty, for since Parthenia told none at her own house whither she went, and since she arrived in the night, and the house where she lodged, very near the gate of the Towne where she entered, it was not any easie matter for any to discover any thing, especially Parthenia having no women with her which stirred out. In short Sir, Parthenia came to Paphos hardly conceiving that she came to see Timantes; and when she was there, and Amaxita asking her whether she would performe her promise? she replied resolutely that she was not able to consent unto it, and that she would only see Timantes at the Race which was to be the next morning: It was in vaine for Amaxita to tell her, her term was expired that day, for she had settled her resolution: Amaxita was in a hundred minds, whether or no she should acquaint Philoxipes with the business: But for all that, she thought that the two Oracles which Parthenia had received, had made such a deep impression in her mind, that she would be extremely offended if she should have caused the Prince Philaxipes to have importuned her; so that fearing to incense her to no purpose, and thinking that if the Gods would have Timantes to marry Parthenia, they would find out the means to bring it about, she did not resist the Princesse. However, the Horse-race was to be the day following, and all the Court would be there, and since the house where Parthenia was, was used to entertain Ladies upon such occasions, she who owed it could not deny those who came that day to look out at the Windows, unless she should give cause of suspicion that some were there whom she would not have seen; therefore Parthenia was put into a Closset, whose Window was so dressed with boughs and leaves of Palme, through which one might see, and not be seen, and through which Parthenia saw the Horse-race, which was in a great plaine before that window. I will not offer to describe this Race unto you Sir, it will suffice I tell you that Timantes appeared there in glory, and won the prize; But the most remarkable passage was, that Timantes imagining that the unknown Lady who filled him so full of curiosity, was one of the Ladies of Paphos, and that she would see this Race, did change his Motto, which he bore upon other occasions, which represented a Phoenix upon his shield, with this Motto,

I stay untill the Sun do burn me;

he now represented a Faggot set on fire by the heat of the Sun, which was Eclipsed, with these words,

It burnes me though it be Eclipsed.

I leave you to imagine Sir, how the sight of this device surprised Parthenia, since the Closset wherein she was shut up, was very low, and the Race ending just under it, she might easily perceive this device upon the shield of Timantes; for all those who were of this sport, carried a Javeline and a Buckler. Parthenia no sooner saw this device, but she made the Application as Timantes would have wished, and told it unto Amaxita, who taking that opportunity, asked her with a smile, whether she would let that Sun which burned Timantes be always Eclipsed? As my sister did not speak altogether seriously, she answered her in the same manner; however, Amaxita observed, that Parthenia was very glad Timantes had not forgot her; & though this device might be taken as much for a common piece of gallantry, as a mark of love, yet it touched to heart Parthenia & obliged her. It seemed also, that Timantes then had a more melancholly aire in his aspect, then ordinary, & she imagined that the reason perhaps was, because she had broke her promise with him; yet she could not consent to send him word that he should come into the Garden by a back door which was under the Walls of the Towne, and speake unto her through the grates of her window: But Sir, it was not long that she was in this trouble, for the same Gods who brought them twice to meet, brought them the third time to speak together, and thus it came about. The Lodging of Timantes was so neare Parthenia's, that the lodgings looked into the Garden; those with whom Timantes lodged having no Garden of their own, and being people of good quality, and intimate friends unto this Lady where Parthenia lodged, they obtained leave of her to walk there sometimes, and obtaine the same liberty for Timantes: Timantes being melancholy & hot with Riding that day, he desired to refresh himselfe, and walk there that evening; and so he did, but all alone, and walked so long a time, afterward he sat downe in an Arbour of Jessimine, just under Page 44 Parthenia's window, and there stayed near an hour, finding much pleasure in musing in a place where the air was so fresh and sweet. The Sun was set, and hardly day enough to distinguish Flowers, when Parthenia opened her window over the Arbour of Jessimon, purposely to let in the sweet smel which every Summer evening in Cyprus ariseth from the ground: She no sooner opened it, but she saw the Moon arise, so that speaking unto Amaxita, but not naming her, That Planet, said she unto her, is not Eclipsed, as that in the Device of Timantes was; it was long onely of your self (said Amaxita unto her) that the Sun of him you named, shined not more bright then this Planet you behold. You may imagine, Sir, how Timantes was surprised, when he heard himself named, and thought it to be the voice of his amiable unknown Lady: Yet he was not sure of it at first; for since Parthenia spoke not very loud, he was in some doubt, but to be satisfied, he started up in all haste, and went unto the window gently; and he was no sooner there, but Parthenia answering to what Amaxita said, since it is the work of the gods to un-eclipse the Planets, said she, it is therefore unto them Timantes must adressed himself, if he would have them unvaild. I have already followed your counsell, Madam (replied Timantes) since doubtlesse it was the gods that brought me hither, when it is onely long of yourself that the Sun which burns me, though Eclipsed, does not reduce me unto ashes if it should discover its whole light. When Timantes came near, Parthenia not knowing who it was, pulled down her hood, and retired from the window: But Amaxita, not so frightened as she was, knew it to be the voice of Timantes at first; so that this encounter more confirming her in her opinion, that the Gods would have Timantes and Parthenia marry, she gave him a complement, and went unto the other side of the room to fetch Parthenia, who was very backward, but at last came unto the window: Shee did not trust unto the mask of night to hide her beauty; for since the Moon shone, neither she, nor Amaxita would appear before Timantes but with their hoods pulled down; so that he seeing she was not disposed to give him satisfaction: You must needs be, Madam, said he unto her, what I ever thought you, that is, the fairest person in the world, since you doe not think night with all its wayles can hide the lustre of your eyes. However, Madam, I beseech you shew me that which I know already. Let me receive some consolation by hearing you speak; and tell me why you would have me be a debter unto chance for my good fortune and happinesse in meeting with you, after you had promised me the honour of talking with you, within eight dayes? When Timantes began to speak, Parthenia was infinitely troubled because she could not conceive how he should come into the garden, unless he knew she was there, and unless some had betrayed her; but when she heard him attribute the meeting unto Chance, she grew more confident, and her mind was in disposition to answer him with more tranquillity; yet would she know more precisely how he came into the Garden, & did so earnestly press him to tell her, that he told her how it was, and moreover told her ingeniously without any dissimulation, that he did not doubt but to know unto whom he spoke, since she was in a house so near his; yet he did not know who dwelt in the house. But after Timantes had told all she desired to know: You see, Madam, said he unto her, that I tell you all I can, doe the same I conjure you for me, and hide not your eyes so long, since certainly they carry their own light with them, I shall see them in spite of all obscurity. Therefore, for Heavens sake, Madam, deny me not this favour; for I desire it more passionately then I did ever any thing in my life. I doe protest, Madam, though I have seen all that's fair in Cyprus, yet I find not one amongst them all whom I desire to see again with half that zeal I doe your beauty. I never appeared in all these publique Feasts, but with all the symptomes of a man who adores you as he doth the gods, that is, without knowing you. Therefore, again, and again I implore you, Madam, not to deny my suit. Sir, said Parthenia, I would I could consent unto what you seem so earnestly to desire: But truly there is something so odde and fantastick in my face, that I cannot doe as you desire, unless I should resolve never to see you again. But if it be so, that my conversation does not glut you, the time may come in which you may know who I am without losing mee, therefore I pray content your self at this time, that I suffer you to talk an hour of things indifferent. Of things indifferent (replied Timantes sharply) alas, Madam, 'tis more then I can do, and I must tell you, that I can speak of nothing but your self, until you grant my desire. Our conversation then will not be very pleasant (replied Parthenia, & laughed) for you know so little of me, that we shal but still repeat the same discourse again, yet I am most certain, replied he, that I shall never be weary of it, & after I have told a thousand & a thousand times how I am charmed a thousand times with the excellency of your voice, and more with the graces of your witt, yet I shall still be delighted with repeating it againe, provided you will not deprive me of the hopes of knowing you better hereafter then now I doe. As long as Page 45 you tell me nothing but that you have a strong desire to know who I am, replied Parthenia, I shall easily beleieve you; but that you should perswade me that as long as you are ignorant of who I am, yet that I should have any power over your soul, this is a thing I cannot easily comprehend, and yet it is that, if any thing, will oblige me to tell you who I am; for truly to trust all the secrets of my life unto one who has no affection to me, is a thing I cannot doe; and therefore since it is impossible you should love me unless you did know me, and since you cannot know me unless you love me first, I pray you therefore after a disengagement of our promises at Amathonte, let us part for ever. Oh Madam, said he unto her, since the meanes to know you is to love you; I doe now most infallibly professe it, for truly, there is some superior power which whether I will or no, does force me unto it, and to love you better then ever any I yet know: Yet Madam I must declare this withall, that since I must and doe love you, my love is love and not friendship-love; for as for my friends of either sex, it is my minde that makes the choice, and I will know them long before I trust them; But it is otherwise with my love, for it is above my reason, it is the worke of my heart, not of my Braine: Therefore Madam, since I sensibly find that inclination unto you, which I never found unto any else, I may well beleieve that this my inclination is love. For my part, said Parthenia, I am not of your opinion, because I am perswaded, that if you talk long with me, though you did not know who I was, nor saw whether I were faire or foule, yet perhaps you might affect in the degree of friendship; for by long conversation one may come to know the soul of that person they converse withall, and it is not impossible but friendship may spring from such acquaintance, though they are ignorant both of quality and face: But as for love Sir, it is of another nature, for it is beauty only which can claime the priviledge of creating love. Alas Madam; said he unto her, how little doe you know what zeale love is, if you think that Beauty is the only cause of it? doe you not consider that if it were so, none but great beauties could create it? then two or three high beauties would engrosse all the Adorers in a great court: but on the contrary we see it otherwise, and find some women who have neither much beauty nor great witt, yet are loved by very compleat men, and sometimes it is seen also, that the fairest women in the world cannot so much as win one single heart unto their service; and since so Madam, love is a powerfull effect of that sympathy which operates whether we will or noe; and beleieve me Madam, I beseech you, that since there are some men, yea and witty men, who love women who are not very faire, I may love you, whom I know already to be a great beauty, and whom I think to be very faire. However it be Sir, said she unto him, you shall not know it this long time: Is it possible Madam, replied he, that you should have any reason for doing so? Yes, answered she, a most prevalent one, such a one as if you render your selfe hereafter worthy to know it, you will confesse I doe but what I ought to doe. Yet Madam, replied he, though perhaps it concerns you not to let your selfe be known here, yet dare you not trust my discretion? I protest Madam, that I never revealed unto any whosoever, any thing which you did forbid me: At Amathonte I know it very well (said she purposely to puzzle him) for I am informed as much from all your friends, and therefore knowing that you are able to keep a secret, I will trust you with one, and acquaint you with the resentments of my soul, to the end you may not be absolutely ignorant of me: Know then that I am very sincere, that I have a very tender heart, that my affection is a little Tyrannicall, that I love vertue and honour, that I hate a divided heart, that I never will bestow my owne, but where I am fully convinced by all imaginable waies, that I shall sovereignly raige in his heart that shall have it; that I am a mortall enemy to inconstancy, and to avoid that unhappinesse principally, I neither desire to love, nor be loved: And more then this Sir, never ask me, for I assure you, that you shall not obtain it. Oh Madam (said he unto her) I beseech you doe not subvert the universall order of the World; I have knowne the faces of all my friends a long time before I could know their hearts, and you would have me know your heart a long time before I must know your face; once more I beseech you Madam be not so preposterous in your actions, but after you have shewed me your soule, let me see your faire eyes also. No, no Madam (said he after a little pause) upon second thoughts, I desire nothing but what you please, and I confesse, I ought to be so well satisfied with this rich discovery of your divine soul, that I ought to desire no more: But Madam, to the end you may know my soule as you doe my quality, my spirit, and my person, be pleased to know, that whatsoever I promise, I always performe; that where I love, I love till death, unless I be forsaken or betrayed; that I am none of those lovers who professe service that they may command; on the contrary, I would not be loved, but only to be the more captivated; I am not of their humour who vauel the witt of women, but only as an ornament unto their beauty; on the contrary, I Page 46 vauel their beauty only as an ornament unto their minds; so that not building the foundation of my love upon so transitory a ground, but upon such as shall last as long as life; it will last as long also. If all this were true replied Parthenia, and smiled, you should not despair of knowing who I am: Since I beleeeve all you say Madam, said he, I hope you will beleeeve all that I say; you may enquire concerning me of all those that know me, but I can enquire of none but your selfe: You might have said, replied Parthenia, that it was not permitted you to enquire of any body else: However Madam said he unto her, I beseech you permit me to talk with you here, untill you have had a longer tryall of my discretion: Parthenia then stayed a while before she answered; but Timantes was so importunate and full of urging expressions, that indeed she feared lest he should attempt more then she would have him, to know who she was; therefore beginning to speak: I am contented Sir (said she unto him) that you shall speak unto me for some certain dales, at the same houre, and in the same place, provided you sweare unto me by Venus-Vrania, that you will not tell unto any whosoever without exception, how you met with the unknowne person, nor reveale where she is; for if you doe, I shall infallibly know it, and I shall no sooner know it, but I shall immediatly resolve never to speak with you againe, and take such a course as you shall never know me, and therefore satisfie your selfe with thus much. Madam said he unto her, since it is in your power to make lawes, and since it is my duty to observe them, certainly you shall be obeyed: But I beseech you Madam, what security can I have in your promise, that I shall see you here to morrow at the same time and place? My word (replied she.) But Madam, said he, you did not keep your word before, for the eight daies were past, and yet I heard not from you. To set your mind at rest replied she, I allow you to reveale all I have said unto you, if I be not here to morrow. After this, Timantes retired, and assoon as he was gone, she shut her window, and sent to de|sire her with whom she lodged, that the door which was towards her neighbours house might be shut, lest Timantes should return and harken what they said in her chamber; she had a desire to quit it, and did so, taking another one story higher, which looked not into the garden; moreover she charged a new all those that knew of her being at Paphos to keep it secret, no other reason appearing unto them, but that Parthenia had no minde it should be known that she quitted her solitude to come and see any publique sports, especially, since she did not lodge with the Prince her Brother, whither she said she would not go, because there it was impossible her voyage could be kept secret; she had also this advantage, that the wo|man with whom she lodged, was easie to be deceived. But after all these orders were given, and that she was alone with Amaxita, she began to discourse of their adventure; one while was ravished with joy that Timantes had found her out, without her giving him any notice; otherwhiles one would have thought she had been angry with her selfe for seeing him at all; afterwards she had an imagination, that Amaxita gave him notice, that she was in the house, and that she had caused it to be told unto Timantes what was her humor; for in|deed said she unto her, he hath told me all that I could desire a man should say, or all that he could tell me if he had known my minde. This ought to perswade you Madam, replied Amaxita, that it was the Gods who prompted him to speake, for as for my part, you know I never was out of your sight, nor have I any acquaintance with Timantes: I know it very well replied Parthenia; but I know so little how it should come to passe, that Timantes should find me out so often, and should tell me almost all my owne thoughts, that you must pardon me, if I had and still have a little suspition of you; and since I must confesse the truth unto you as unto a second selfe, I think that I did not accuse you for it, to the end you might more powerfully perswade me, that it was the pleasure of the Gods Timantes should love me; and I did positively beleeeve all he told me, for I could not stifle the only pleasant thought which I enjoyed since my solitude, which is, my hopes to finde a man capable of a constant love. But Madam (said Amaxita unto her) why have you given orders contrary to the promise which you made of seeing Timantes againe? The reason is, said she, because I would speak with him, but I would not have him know me, and because I thought you would find a way tomorrow that the garden door which I caused to be shut, may be open: For truly, untill I am assured Timantes loves me, and assured by a thousand tryalls of his affection, I will not have him know yet who I am, or see me; but that which I would at present know, is, whether Timantes be faithfull or no, and whether he hath not told our adventure, neither to the Prince, nor any other of his friends. After Parthenia had expressed her selfe, Amaxita (who knew that Antimaques was in love with Dorida, and that Dorida wished well unto me, and would trust me with any thing) told her, that if she would trust it unto my discretion, I should easily make a discovery of what she desired to know. At first Parthenia paused upon Page 47 proposition, but afterwards she was so well perswaded of my fidelity, that she trusted me with the secret. In the mean time Timantes had his share in sorrow; for after he was entered into the house where he lodged, he enquired, not telling any reasons why he asked, what women those were in the house w|h belonged to the Garden where he walkt, but he was amused when he was answered there was none but the Mistris of the house, who was well in years, and some servants which waited upon her: Yet he very well knew, that she unto whom he spoke, was neither a servant nor old; for her conversation assured him of the first, and her fair hands, her sweet voice, and handsome stature assured him of the second: Also the two other times which he saw her, he knew by her colours which she wore, that certainly shee was young, though by it he could not know her qualitie: So that all these circumstances compared, they puzzled him exceedingly: He saw that all he knew of her was most admirable; and that she had such a c <...> ming Emphasis in the accent of her voice, as any thing sounded better in her mouth a thousand times then in any other: He found her to be of such sharp, so gallant, and easie a spirit and wit, that hee was ravished with her discourse, and hee beleeeved she was of such a sweet nature, as could love most tenderly, grounding his opinion upon her hatred against Inconstancie. But for all this (said he, upon serious examination of the matter) there must needs be something that is very strange, either in the qualitie, or in the beautie of this woman; for why else should shee bee so nice as to hide her selfe from a man whose acquain|tance shee does not absolutely reject? And yet shee must needs bee faire, for I have seen as much as argues it; and shee must needs also be a woman of Qualitie, her language, her spirit, her wit, her port, does sufficiently prove it, and convinceth mee of these doubts. Whatsoever shee bee (said hee) shee does infinitely please me; and though it bee onely to know her name, I must obey her; for shee hath told mee, that if I doe as she would have me, I may not despair of knowing it hereafter, and yet it is a very odde way, that I should know a thing by not enquiring of it; for he considered, how she positively told him, that if he enquired of any one, she could know it; and if ever she knew he enquired of any one, he should never know her, nor speak unto her; therefore his curiosity wrought such effects in his heart, as never did the like in any, since it hindred him from en|quiring of that which he most earnestly desired to know: And truly, though Timantes had a most longing desire to ask all his acquaintance who this amiable unknown one was, whom he already loved, and hardly knew it, yet he durst not speak of it, so much as to Antimaques, lest he should blab it unto Dorida: So that he passed over that night and the day following in extreame impatience. In the mean time Amaxita, having sent me unto him, I became his spie, and I kept all the day where he was, and at night reported unto my Sister, how he seem|ed very reserved unto all those he met withall; that he refused supper with the Prince Philloxipes, or to goe into the Walks upon the Sea-side, as he used, where all the Court did ren|dezvous, and that he retired unto his own lodging very timely, not rendering any reason why: So that Amaxita, told all this unto the Princesse; she was exceedingly joyed, and more readily resolved, not to faile in her promise unto Timantes, and in order to that, appointing A|maxita to get the Garden door open, and Amaxita knowing how to doe it unknown unto the Mistris of the house, all things were so handsomly carried, that at the appointed hour, Timantes came to the window of the low room where Parthenia was, under pretence of writ|ting. But when Timantes came, he could see no more of Parthenia then before, but yet found her in a disposition to receive him more civilly, the reports which she had from me, giving her more satisfaction. She no sooner saw him, but she began to speak: I desire your pardon Sir (said she unto him) for being perhaps a hindrance unto your pleasure in walking by the sea-side as you use, but that which comforts me a little is, that it hinders you from the sight of all those Beauties which use to walk there. It sufficiently appears, Madam (said he unto her, after he had most respectfully saluted her) That I hoped for greater pleasure in your company then in the sight of all those Beauties you speak of, since I quitted them to come unto you; and therefore I need not any complement upon that. But, Madam, since you know all passages of the world so well, it seems you are not unknown unto any but me. 'Tis true, Sir, replied she, but it is upon a reason so advantageous to you, that if I could now tell it, I am confident you would confesse your self obliged unto me for it: How much soever I am res|olved to honour you, replied he, yet I can hardly think I am obliged to thank you for deny|ing me a thing which I desire with as much zeal as the most violent Lovers do the enjoyment of their Mistresses. Yet it appears (said Parthenia craftily) that the conversation you had here yesterday, gave you no great satisfaction: For as for my part when I passe any night away in any agreeable satisfaction, there remains in my countenance all the next Page 48 day a great impression of joy, whereas on the contrary, when I have been in any wearying company, melancholy sads my eyes at least four and twenty hours after it; and therefore if you be of my humour, I have cause to think you were weary of our conversation yesterday; for I know you were very melancholy, and reserved all the day after. 'Tis true, Madam, replied he, I was very reserved, but it was upon a reason quite contrary to yours, since truly I am never so melancholy as after a great pleasure. And this, Madam, which I enjoy in talk|ing with you, is far from a serene delight, but on the contrary is so mixed with inquietude and curiosity, that it torments me as much as if you should deprive me of all hopes; for you know me, and all that I doe, but I cannot so much as know your name, or what you are, though I desire it with such a zealous passion as will never let me rest till I be satisfied. But, Sir, said Parthenia unto him, me-thinks you should not be so vexed to know who I am, since if I be worth your thoughts, it depends upon your self to know it hereafter, b <...> if you have onely a bare curiosity to know me, doubtlesse then it will be nothing difficult to overcome your self without that satisfaction, since you need onely come no more hither, but forget me, and there's an end. Doe you think, Madam, sayd he unto her, that it is such an easie matter to forget you? I think indeed, said she, that it is a harder matter to remember me then to forget me. No, no, Madam, replied he, do not deceive your self, I shall never forget you, nor be contented •ill I have obtained two most precious things from yo•, I mean, the sight of your beauty, and the knowledge of your heart. The knowledge of the one, replied she, must obtain the sight of the other; and therefore to teach you what you ought to doe to obtain your desires, Know, that before you see me, or know who I am, you must win my heart, and therefore consider well with your self, whether you can doe all I would have you without knowing me; for that is the onely way to winne my heart. And since I am very sincere, and will not disguise my mind so much as my face, I will tell you, that for divers reasons which now I must conceal, I am resolved never to entertain any affection which is built upon such a fading foundation as Beautie and Riches are, upon which time and fortune have such influjences: I would have one love me by a naturall inclination, by the knowledge of my soul, my mind, and my humour: Moreover, I would have him love me either ugly, or poor, as I am, or may be: I would have him love none but me, and love me extreemly, and alwaies; to doe nothing but what I would, nor to desire any thing but what pleaseth me; to obey mee blindly, and without any repugnancy. I pray, Sir, after this, judg whether it be so easie as you think to enjoy the sight of me: For I shall never grant it but unto such a one as hath won my heart, and my heart will never be won but by such wayes as I have told you. Moreover, sin• blood and birth are not things so transitorie, since neither time nor fortune can hinder me from enjoying them till death, I will confesse unto you that the house from whence I am descended is •s noble as any in Cyprus: But after all this, Sir, ask me no more; for you will ask in vain. Whilst Parthenia was speaking, Timantes was in a maze of thoughts: For as all Greece is full of certain women who make publique profession of an universall Gallantry, and who doe not confine themselves unto the limits of modesty, but who by prostituting their honours doe enrich themselves; and there was some such in Cyprus, so his fears some|times suggested unto him, that Parthenia was one of them. But hee found she spoke in such an air as perswaded him to the contrary; and when she considered that she was in the house of a woman of Quality and Honour, and that it is not the custome of such kind of persons to hide their beautie, he repented of his former thoughts: And when Parthenia had told him all the qualification which she required to be in a Lover, he found his own humours de|scribed, and told her immediately, that he would engage himself unto all she had propound|ed provided she would promise him, that after she had made tryall of his constancy, shee would give him her hear, and shew her face. And these promises passed on both sides in ap|pearance, rather as bare complements and peeces of Gallantry, then any reall promises. And though there was already a violent inclination in the heart of Timantes to love Parthenia, and a most strong disposition in Parthenia to love Timantes, yet since both of them were persons of great wit and reason, they thought this so odde and unreasonable, that they could not resolve to speak seriously, and many dayes passed before they could understand the reall thoughts of each other in earnest. In the mean time before Timantes went away, Parthenia made him swear not to speak a word of any passages, nor to enquire of her, but that he should stay untill she gave him assurance of her affection, and let him see whether she was fair or foul. The truth is, Sir, Parthenia's wit did so charm Timantes, and she had such an absolute power over him, that he durst not tell so much as Antimaques his adventure, lest he should tell it unto some other. And it was easie for him to conceal it, because Antimaques being Page 49 in love with Dorida, he was continually every night with the Princesse Policrite, so that Timantes could be at his appointed times unperceived; yet for all this, he indeavoured by one of his servants to suborne one of that Ladies house where Parthenia lodged, to tell who it was which lay there, but all businesses were so handsomly and closely carried, that nothing could be knowne. In the meane time, since he feared that if this unknowne Lady should know how he broke promise with her in the enquiring who

she was, she would cast him off, he laboured by all means to stop the mouths of those that were enquired of, and to oblige them unto silence: so that indeed Parthenia never knew it: 'tis true, he was every way so observant, and faithful, that she had reason to be contented; for notwithstanding all my observant eyes over him, both in all his words and actions, I could never report any thing unto my sister which could displease Parthenia, and indeed he much altered his manner of living, for his only designe being to find out this lovely unknown one, and being perswaded that she was some Lady of Paphos, who came to that house only to talk with him, he went from visit to visit, not staying long any where, hoping still to discover by voice this Lady whom he so much desired to know: but all his enquiry and visits were in vaine, for he could not find her; and Timantes became more deeply in love with Parthenia then any of her former lovers who had seen her: He grew also much more unquiet in his mind, and certainly was tormented more then other lovers use to be; sometimes he would so complaine unto Parthenia that she would pity him, and sometimes he would so dote that he made her laugh: For my part, (said he unto her when the Moon shined cleare, and when he pressed her to lift up her hood) I cannot indure you should so long deny me what I ask, not that there is any necessity of your Beauty to make my passion endure, for since it begun without it, it can continue without it: But that which makes me I cannot endure you should use me thus, is, that you tell me you will let me have a sight of you when I have won your heart, and perceiving that you are more and more careful to hide it, I have cause to think I am further off from making that illustrious conquest. You would have it at too cheap a rate (replyed Parthenia) if you should so soon win it, and therefore that you may the more esteem me, I will hold you off a little longer. In the mean time I beseech you Madam (said he unto her) let your words form your Image, that I may adore it, and which passing from your mouth into my heart, it may there remaine, untill the real substance drive it out: for truly Madam, I wander all the day long, from house to house, from Temple to Temple, and every where to seek you out: my imagination fancies your beauty every day in a hundred severall Ideas: sometimes I see you faire, sometimes brown haire, sometime fresh complexion, sometimes pale, sometimes I am perswaded that you have sweet, languishing, and compassionate eyes, and sometimes I think you have sprightly and sparkling eyes, such as kindle fire in the soules of all those that look upon them: sometimes I think them gray, and sometimes black, and not knowing what they are, I still equally adore them, what ever they be: But I beseech you Madam, tell me onely whether they be faire, or black, or gray, or blew, or what they are? When you have told me (replyed she craftily) what colour you desire them to be, then perhaps I shall tell you which they are. Timantes at this was puzzled, for he durst not tell which he desired, lest he should hitt wrong, nor did Parthenia positively promise him to tell which they were, so that not daring to answer precisely, he began to accuse her of inhumanity, and she interrupting him accused him of weakness; for said she unto him, I perceive by your own words, that you would have me fair, because you say your imagination fancies me to have the fairest eyes in the world, and consequently I have cause to feare, that if I be not so, you will change your opinion of me. Oh Madam, said he unto her, I beseech you doe me not so much wrong as to think, that though you be not fair, that I shall love you lesse: but however, as long as your eyes doe not bely my imagination, I must still think you are the fairest person in the world: and I beseech you, why should I not proportion your beauty unto the excellency of your soul and witt; and therefore if you will be sure of my fidelity, shew your selfe as you are, and if after that, I doe not adore you still, though you should be never so ugly, then hate me as much as I love you. Love is a most fantastical passion (said she unto him) Those who are in love with any beauty, doe professe that it is the soul they love, and that they onely desire the possession of the heart, and not the beauty: That this is the limits of their hopes, and summe of all their desires. Yet I see Love is of such a nature that it slights all that it enjoys, and prizeth that which it doth not enjoy. Fruition gluts desires, and if so, you have more reason to thank me then complain against me: For truly, I begin where others end: I have confessed unto you, that I esteem you: I have told you that I should be glad to have you love me, and I have not forbidden the hopes of being Page 50 loved: You have consented not to ground your affection upon beauty, I have discovered my soul unto you: I have taught you which way one may obtain my heart, and I never told you it was invincible: But after all this you complain, and presse me to shew you my face. Go, go, Sir, keep it within the limits of our conditions, unlesse you would have mee break off with you. There is so much charm in every word you speak, replyed Timantes, that you still augment both my love and my curiosity: And therefore I most humbly beseech you, Madam, Give me leave to beg this favour upon my knees. Let it content you that I attempt not violent courses to know who you are, and that I have so much power over my self as not to ask all my acquaintance about the Court. But, Madam, that I may still continue in my obedience, and enquire of none else, I beseech you give me leave sometimes to ask your self; And be not offended, I conjure you, if I importune you with my prayers and impatencies. Did I not infinitely love you, I should not be so desirous: But since I love you beyond all expressions, I must needs entreat you, and presse you, to let me know whom I love. I know there are a rich Mine of Beauties in your mind; all that I can see of your person is most admirable; The thoughts of your heart doe ravish me: There is some secret charm in your conversation, which I never found in any other: You doe so powerfully and pleasingly captivate my spirits when you speak, that I think I could look upon you, and not perceive whether you be fair or foul, you utter not a word, which pierceth not my heart as soon as my ear. But for all this (said he, and smiled) me-think I doe not know you yet sufficiently, and my curiosity is so violent to see your face, as well as your heart, that I cannot chuse but beg the favour, and to trust unto my love and discretion. Whilst Timantes was talking thus, Parthenia bethought her self of a very odde way to make tryall of his Constancy; therefore beginning to speak unto him, and seeming to yeeld unto part of his desires, I am content, said she, since I see you so much desire it, not to deny you all you ask: But since I am resolved not to conferrre favour upon favour, and to loaden you all at once, I will not let you know who I am, onely I will let you see my face in open day; but upon condition that you shall not speak unto me in the place where you shall see me, which shall be, if you please, to morrow morning at a little Church close by the Gate. There I will be just two hours after the Sun is up: I will wear the same clothes I did, when you saw me at the Feast of Adonis: I will sit by the second Pillar upon the right hand, and will lift up my hood as soon as I see you, to the end you may satisfie one part of your curiosity. I beseech you, Madam, said he unto her, why may you not now shew your face? I know it is too dark to see you as I would, but it wil not hinder me from seeing you better to morrow. I see you have forgot one of our conditions, which was, to desire nothing but what I shall please. How great soever your power is over me, Madam, said he unto her, it cannot extend so farre as to bound my desires: And all I am able to doe, is to hide them from you. After this Parthenia parted from Timantes, not consenting to his desire, telling him, that if he did offer to speak unto her, or to follow her to morrow morning, she would never see him again. So that Timantes promising all she desired, he went away full of hope and joy that he should see her in the morning who had filled him so full of love and curiosity. But as those hopes, whose causes are love, are very restlesse, so he could not sleep all that night, but did rise so early, that his men wondered, and the more, because they saw him dress himself, as if he were to go unto some Ball, or great Feast, though it was onely unto a little Church where few of any quality ever resorted, and so early as women of Quality were hardly awake. But Parthenia was as busie as Timantes was impatient; for she was so careful to make sure of the heart of Timantes, as nothing should ever after be able to take it from her; and therefore she resolved to try whether he could love her after a beliefe that she was not fair: And in order to that, she dressed a woman of hers, who was well bodied, and about her height, in the same habit that she wore at the Feast of Adonis; and since the woman had never been at Paphos before, she could not be known. But, Sir, be pleased to know, that this woman had one of the ugliest faces in the world, for all the parts of her face were so unproportionable, that one would have sworn they were never made one for another: So excessively ill favoured, that I never in all my life saw an object so displeasing as the face of this woman. In the mean time, to the end that Timantes might bee the more deluded, Amaxita followed this counterfeit Parthenia, as if she had been her woman, and they went unto this Church in the Ladies Coach with whom Parthenia lodged. But for the more security, Parthenia would have my Sister send for me, to be in the Church, and to fall in with Timantes as soon as he came in, to the end that he might keep him from speaking to her, whose sight was enough to blast a Lover, giving me orders to doe as occasion should require, and to speak what I thought fit to keep Timantes from discovering the fallacy. Yet Parthenia did not intend to keep Timantes long in that belief of her he should Page 51 see, but on the contrary resolved when he had seen how, he would speak unto her after this innocent imposture, to let him see that evening the woman with her, to the end that hee might know his error, and to root this terrible Image out of his mind. To be short, Sir, as this device was phantastically plotted, so was it cunningly executed. This woman went unto the Church earlier then the hour appointed, that she might be there before he came: Yet it was not above a quarter of an hour, for he burned in such impatience to have a sight of her he loved, that he was also there before the hour appointed: But as I was there before him, and knew the businesse, I saw him enter earnestly and hastily: Hee was no sooner there, but he looked towards the place where Parthenia told him she would sit, and saw a person of a handsom stature waited upon by one who indeed was the same hee saw with Parthenia at Amathante. Moreover, he saw she was in the same place nominated, and that she was in the same dresse and habit which he had formerly seen; so that he did not at all doubt, but that shee whom he saw was his beloved unknown Lady: And though there was a little difference between the height of this woman, and that of Parthenia, yet the fancy of Timantes was so prejudiciall, that he did not observe it: He advanced hastily to the place where she was. But as it was covenanted betwixt Parthenia and him, that he should not speak unto her in that place, so he set himself down some or four paces upon the left hand over against her, that he might the better see her: He was no sooner set, but Amaxita advertised this counterfeit Parthenia, who knew not Timantes, to put up her hood, which she immediately did, lifting it up so cunningly, that he could not see her hands; for Parthenia so ordered her. But, Sir, I beseech you imagine how Timantes was amazed, who fancying the Idea of an admirable beauty, saw the ugliest vizard in the world: His wonder was so great, Sir, that it appeared in his face and all his actions; his colour went and came twenty times in a minute: he congeed towards her with a lowering look in spite of his teeth; and was so frighted at such a monstrous object, that hee did not so much as strive to hide his amazement, nor had hee the least suspition of any delusion put upon him: So that being extreemly troubled at this adventure: Oh ye just Gods (said he to himself, as he told me afterwards) why did you put so sweet a voice, and so rare a mind into such an ugly body? And why did yee joyn such an admirable stature and body, with such fair hands, unto such a witches face? But how comes it to passe (said he immediately after) that this person should know all the niceties and delicates of Love, so well as she doth? Some one sure has loved her, else how could she ever know them? For my part (said he, and sighed) had I seen her face before I had known her minde, I should never have made her so much as my confident, and farre from making her my Mistris; and I think I should have falne from love to aversion. Had she been but indifferent ugly, or one of those women who neither attract nor loath: Had she any thing in her physiognomie which promised either wit or goodnesse, I should have some inclination to love her, and zealously adore her. But what doe I say? Can I forsake her who hath the most charming wit, and the most divine soul of any woman in the world, and who hath most sensibly allured my heart? As Timantes was thus discoursing with himself, with as much sorrow as Amaxita took pleasure in observing him, and continually looking upon her whom he thought to bee Parthenia; This woman forgetting Parthenia's order not to shew her hands, did pull her hood down, and did not hide them; so that Timantes espied them, when he was perhaps ready to resolve upon the breaking off with Parthenia, though he would never confesse it; he saw they were not the same snowy hands which he saw both at the Labyrinth, and at Amathonte, and also at the window where he talked with her. He saw, I say, that they were thick and short, and not at all white; so that recollecting himself, he knew he was deceived, and was so glad, that there appeared nothing but joy in his face, as there appeared sorrow before: Then was he sorry that he did no better gloss his first surprise, but to repair it, he resolved to go to her who had only the habit of his beloved unknown Lady, saying, that it was not unto her that he made a promise not to speak unto in the Church, nor to follow her, and since she had broke her word with him, he was not obliged to keep his with her. Just as he was fixing upon this course, the counterfeit Parthenia went away with my Sister, and perfectly undeceived him in her walk, since she had nothing of that Majestique port which Parthenia had, that she was of a handsom stature. In the mean time, since I saw he followed her, I met with him, before he could overtake her. Sir (said I unto him, as I accosted him) this Lady whom I saw you salute, is she of Crete? No, (replyed he, and was very angry that I interrupted him in his designe) I beleieve she is of Paphos: and because I thought her to be some woman of quality, therefore I saluted her though unknowne. I thought Sir, said I unto him, and smiled, that it had not been the fashion to salute Ladies who are unknowne, unless they be some superlative beauties; Page 52 but I see your civility goes farther then ours. I have something more to say then you have (answered he, and still went on) for I am more inquisitive then you are, and would gladly know who this Lady is: Certainly Sir (replyed I, not seeming as if I designed to hinder him) your curiosity in this, is like theirs who have a desire to see Monsters, and who never think they have seen all Aegypt, if they have not seen those dangerous Beasts which devour passengers: However said he, I would gladly know who this Lady is: Sir, said I still to keep him from following, I beleieve it will be an easie matter to know that, for I know the Coach which brought her to the Church: I know it also said he to me, but I know not her that is in it: I will promise you to enquire replied I, and to give you an account. In the meane time, the counterfeit Parthenia and my sister took Coach, and Timantes durst not speak to them in my presence, as he intended, so fearfull was he to incense his beloved unknown one: But when they were gone, and Timantes saluted them at parting, he put me in mind of my promise, and desired me to perform it, colouring his curiosity with such poor pretences, as I had much adoe to keep from laughing; I knew well that he only desired to know her, that he might be acquainted with her who sent her: and you may well think Sir, that at that time I would promise him any thing: After this, I went home with him, and presently after that, I went to give my sister an account of what had passed. Since she said that Parthenia did this only as a tryall of Timantes his fidelity, she would not acquaint her with the extreame sorrow that appeared in his eyes, when he saw the face of this ill favoured woman, but told her only that he seemed to be surprised, that notwithstanding he saluted her most civilly, and would not follow her when she went out of the Church, never telling how the woman undeceived him by shewing her hands, so that Parthenia thinking that Timantes imagined her to be as ugly as that woman, began to repent her of that imposture, fearing he would not return any more according to the ordinary appointment; for though she did this only to make Timantes think she was not faire, yet she could not indure that he should have such a horrible imagination of her, so that she waited for the evening with a restlesse impatience, sometimes she entertained her selfe with those joyes she should have if Timantes did return, since then it was an infallible signe that ugliness would not alter his minde; otherwhiles she feared that he would not come at all; so that tossing her thoughts continually between hopes & feares, she passed away the day with as much perplexity, as Amaxita did with pleasure, in remembrance of all she saw in the mind of Timantes, unto whom Parthenia commanded me to tell, that I could not learn who that Lady was whom he saw in the Church: However, night being come, Timantes did not faile to come unto Parthenia according to his custome. But she had no sooner opened the window, than she began to speak unto him: Sir, said she unto him, are you yet satisfied? can you find a heart to love such a one as you saw this morning in the Church? To shew you Madam, said he unto her, and smiled, that I can alwaies take delight in seeing you, I beseech you lift up your hood which hides you, for since I saw you in the morning, me thinks you should conceale your selfe no longer: Why Sir, said she, do you think you saw me? Indeed I doe not, said he unto her, and therefore I am come to complaine against you for breaking promise, and consequently disobligen me from keeping promise with you: No, no, Madam, said he, never deny the truth, for if you will deceive me, you must not only give your habit unto her who did so scurvily personate you, but you must give her your hands also, your aire, and your port: yet I confesse that at first, the confidence which I had in your sincerity, deceived me, and my owne eyes betrayed me; but yet my heart did quickly find it was not you. However (said she unto him, and confessed the imposture) I pray you tell me unto what height you hated me, when you thought that I was she you saw? I doe protest Madam, said he unto her, I had not one thought which could offend you, and I was more angry with the Gods then you: But yet (replied Parthenia) what thoughts had you at that time? Since you will have me confesse, replied he, I will tell you, that I murmured against the Gods, for placing so many opposits and contrarieties in one person: yet I murmured only for the love of you; I had respect unto your honour, and not mine owne; and I had not one desire but what was for your advantage. Ah Sir, you are not sincere, (replied Parthenia, and interrupted him) but yet I wish you were, and would really tell me, whether you would not have forsaken me, if I were such a one as you saw? Since you desire I should lay open all my heart unto you (answered Timantes) I must tell you, that if you were such a one and could not speak, I think I should have much adoe to continue my affection: but if on the contrary, you were such a one as I saw, and would speak alwaies as you doe, I would eternally follow you. But Sir, replied Parthenia, I would not have you dissemble, nor speak in rallery; but in very serious earnest: I will Madam, said he unto her, and the Page 53 more exactly to obey you, I doe protest before the Gods who heare me, and as I hope they will assist me, that what I say is most really true; and I assure you, Madam, my heart is so absolutely tyed unto you, that I will never disengage my selfe: yet I must confesse Madam, that if you be as faire as I think you are, I believe I shall perhaps love you a little more then I doe; but still I must confidently assure you, that though you be not, I shall not love you lesse. Ah Sir, replied she, this cannot be, for since you can love me more if I were faire, you must needs love me lesse if I be not: yet Sir, this is most certainly true, that though perhaps I be not ill favoured, yet I shall be: and therefore if you cannot love me unlesse I be faire, I pray you cease loving me now; for I ever told you from the first beginning of our acquaintance, that I never can endure a heart which can change, I would have one should alwaies love me alike, and if I should love you one day, I should love you ever, which can never be, if you can love me lesse; and indeed how is it possible one should endure without high anger, and just resentment, that one should fall back from love to luke-warmnesse, to see ones selfe sleight[ed] when one should be most esteemed: and yet Sir this is ordinary, and happens a thousand and a thousand times, and will doe againe; and the cruelty of the businesse is, that they both become equally insupportable; and if there be any difference between the sleighter and the sleighted, between the party who falls off from love, and the party who is constant, certainly he that falls off is least to be pityed: this inconstant doth certainly lose some pleasure, in losing his affection, but he can easily recover it in others; whereas on the contrary, a constant person in losing the sweets of being loved, doth at the same time lose all the sweets of his life, and is overwhelmed with all sorts of sorrows; and indeed, how is it possible he should ever think of any thing that hath the name of a diversion, how can he be able to live unlesse to revenge. Therefore Sir consider seriously, whether or no you can be constant, doe not make me more miserable then I am, in making me hope for a good which I shall be deprived of. I doe protest unto you Madam, said he unto her, that I think it an absolute impossibility that ever I shall love you lesse: the thing which most perplexeth me, replied Parthenia, is, that when I aske any assurances of affection, the most inconstant man in the world does think he shall never be inconstant, and he will tell me the very same things that the most faithfull lover <...> n. Madam, said Timantes to her, since there is no waies to make sure of the time to come, but by what is past, and what is present, I deserve not to be punished as an inconstant man, because I expresse my reall and true thoughts by the same words that a perfidious lover expresseth his; therefore I beseech you, be pleased to make tryall of my constancy, by any manner of way your witt can devise: but then Madam, I beseech you first, before you put me to the teste, tell me who you are, you must discover your faire eyes unto me, and stuffe not my imagination with the Idea of a witch, as lately you would. Then Sir, Parthenia thinking that perhaps Timantes was not fully undeceived of the opinion which he had, that she whom he saw in the Church was really her selfe, and therefore she would have that woman speak to him open faced, so that Timantes seeing them both at once, might plainly see, she was not the same he saw in the Church. But assoon as Timantes saw her, and she retired againe, he began to speak: No, no, Madam, said he unto Parthenia, you need not show me this woman twice, thereby to undeceive me, my error lasted not a minut, and my heart did not long fancy an image that was unworthy of your selfe. You tell me too much to be beleev[ed], replied Parthenia; and to say truly (added she and smiled) I cannot altogether blame you, though you should not tell me the whole truth at this time; for truly I can hardly endure to let this woman serve me, she is so ill favoured, and therefore I ought not to think it strange, that another should be backward to serve such a resemblance as she hath for a Mistresse. After this, their conversation was sometimes mingled with a thousand sincere protestations of eternall affection; another while with pleasing joyes of minde, which made both Timantes and Parthenia know, that they were worthy of each other, and that they loved more then they would speak of. In the mean while, since the most difficult things in the world unto a lover is, to keep lockt up in his heart all his adventures, and never tell them unto any; Timantes was of the same mind, and therefore altering his intentions of hiding it from Antimaques, lest he should be telling it to Dorida, he resolved to acquaint him; and on the contrary thought it an easie matter for one lover to keep close the secrets of another; so that after he had left Parthenia, and was returned home, he stayed untill Antimaques was returned from Policrite, to the end he might acquaint him with all the adventure, and ask his counsell which way he should satisfie both his love and his curiositie: yet before he would open unto Antimaques, he made him promise more then once, never to speak of it unto any whosoever, and then he told his adventure: At first Antimaques harkened unto it Page 54 as a pretty pleasant story, and as a very merry and phantasticall adventure; not thinking that his friend was really in love with one he never knew: But when he heard him aggravate his inquietudes, hee knew that his curiosity was of an amorous nature, for which hee began to chide him: But when he perceived that Timantes was the more serious, he began to pity and laugh at him. Then Antimaques asked him pardon for wondering at the odnesse and novelty of the adventure; and told him that he could not beleve it to be any more then a bare peece of gallantry, and not a real passion: But since I perceive you are really in love, I do infinitely pity you; and so much the more, because one of these things must necessarily be, either she whom you love is very phantasticall, or else she is foul, or else a woman of inferiour quality, and I pray heaven she be not some thing worse then all these, and that you be not cosened. Ah cruel, and unjust friend (said he unto him) it seems you know her whom I adore. I know her as much as you doe (answered Antimaques) for it was I who first shewed her unto you in the Labyrinth. 'Tis true, said Timantes, that you then saw her handsome stature and proportion, her fair hands; you heard her voice, and her excellent wit, yet all these are nothing in comparison of what I know: For I finde such a charme in her conversational as ravisheth me; and though she will not tell me who she is, yet I can discover as much as assures me of the greatnesse of her minde, of the noblenesse of her birth, the generosity of her soul, and also the beauty of her face: For there is such a kinde of charming aire, and gallantry in her speech, as any one may know shee is faire, and never see her. Alasse, Sir, (cried Antimaques) I cannot chuse but pity you, unto what a cruell point are you arrived? And I cannot chuse but pittie you the more, because I doe not see which way I should serve you, since you forbid mee to speake of it un[to] any, and consequently I cannot enquire who shee is you love: And yet I thinke that if you will follow my counsell, you may perhaps have some light of that which you desire to know. Timantes then asked him, what he would advise him to doe? I perceive, replied he, by what you have told me, that you have employed all your arguments to perswade her you love, to let you know who she is: You have used your best rhetoricke and reasons; you have earnestly entreated her; you have added complaints unto your reasons and prayers, but I doe not see you have tryed the eloquence of Liberality. Love would have offerings and sacrifices as well as the rest of the gods; and therefore if you will be rul'd by me, find out a handsome pretence of presenting a rich present unto her: If she be such a one as you think her, she will refuse it, and not shew her self after it: Or if she be not such a one and fair, she will take it, and let you see her. If it be the first of these, you have discovered a new beauty in her soul; and if the second, you have at least satisfied your curiosity: And however, if she resist your perswasions, your sighs, and your presents, you will reap so much satisfaction as to see that I shall not condemn your passion. Though I know very well, replied Timantes, that Liberality is inseparable from Love, yet I cannot chuse but fear to incense the person whom I love in presenting it. But if I doe follow your counsell, the present must be so rich and magnificent, as that she may judge of the measure of my love by it. Then Timantes resolving to follow the counsell of Antimaques, hee chose amongst all his Jewels that which was most rich and rare, and the number out of which it was taken was not small: For as persons of his Quality use alwayes to carry many with them when they travel, so Timantes being very rich and magnificent, he had a great abundance of Jewels: And after hee had taken one of them which he thought to bee most worthy of her hee loved, and put it into a very magnificent box enamelled with gold, he resolved to present it unto her the next morning with such a complement as might make it acceptable. Then after he had talkt awhile with her of several pleasant Subjects, Timantes who was accustomed to complain, and knowing that nothing pleaseth beauties better then to complaine of something, he began thus; How long, Madam, must I love you (sayd he unto her) without giving any testimonies of my love? When shall I obtaine so much liberty as to doe such things as love useth to inspire into such as are under his empire? Did I know you, and were it permitted me to manifest my passion, I should be as forward in my expressions as the most passionate lovers, and as magnificently you should be courted, with as many Musique entertainments as there are dayes; I should ere now have made three or four publique Feasts; the Ball should be continually left with you, and you should have seen whether we know how to treat in Crete, as well as they doe in Cyprus. Moreover, since I am confident that I have many Rivals, I should let you see that perhaps they were not worthy to be preferred before me: I should follow, and court you in all places: I would endeavour to be a friend unto your friends, and an enemy unto your enemies: I would not look upon any but such as you favour, and I should find out a thousand Page 55 wayes to let you see the grandure and merit of my passion: But as things are, what should I doe to expresse my love? You may obey me, said Parthenia, and that's enough; for in doing so, I shall think my self as much obliged as by all you tell me you would doe if you knew me. That is so little, replied he, that I cannot beleve it will oblige you at all, Madam, or that you can so much as esteeme me for it; for thereby you cannot know whether I be generous or no, you will be ignorant whether I be lib[erall] or courteous. I may have a thousand virtues or vices which you can never see; and therefore, I beseech you, Madam, let me not be confined unto such narrow limits, but give love leave to appear some way or other: To make it appear in my eyes, answered Parthenia, it must bee hid from the eyes of all others: At least, Madam, said he unto her, give me leave to regulate my whole life according to your directions, and that I may ask your advice in all my actions. As for that, replied Parthenia, I shall most willingly consent unto it; for I desire nothing more then to know your heart. Then, I beseech you doe me that honour, Madam (said he unto her, and presented unto her the enamelled box in which the Jewell was) as to tell me to morrow whether this which I present unto your fair hand be worthy to be offered unto a great Princesse; for I design it unto one who certainly merits to be a Queen. At the first Parthenia did not think that it was intended unto her, but perhaps unto Policrite, or Aretaphile, and therefore without any diffi[cu]lty she took it, yet she no sooner had it in her hand, but she changed opinion, and thought it intended unto her. This imagination did swell her heart both with anger and curiosity: The first of these, because she thought Timantes did not think of her as she would have him; and the second, because she would see whether Timantes would give it unto her; therefore seeming as if she never thought to have any share in his liberality, she told him that she would not stay so long as to morrow before she gave him her opinion of it, but would goe unto the candle which was at the further end of the chamber, and see whether this which he would give was worthy of himself; for certainly (said she, most obligingly) if it be worthy of your self, it is worthy of her you intend it for whosoever she be. In saying so, she went to see what it was which Timantes put into her hand, with intention to restore it unto him the same hour; and he also went away as well as she, the better to shew that he would not take it again: So that Parthenia hearing him walk, went back to the window purposely to call him, but hee was already gone out of the Jessimin Arbour which was under the window: So that after she had stayed a long while to see whether he would return, and hearing nothing of him, she shut the window, and went to look upon that which Timantes had left with her. She did not look upon it alone, for she shewed it unto Amaxita, who was not a little ravished at the lustre of it; but Parthenia did lesse regard all those Pearls and Diamonds then she did a Letter which she found with them in the box, which was thus written.

MADAM,

Since there is no King but receives Tribute from his Subjects, permit me, I beseech you, since I am not onely your Subject, but your vassall, to give what I can, though not what I ought. As you are my Goddesses, I must present you with offerings and sacrifices; and as you are the Queen of my heart, I must pay you Tribute. Therefore I beseech you to accept of my offering, not to let you see that I am liberall, but to shew you that I am not covetous. I beseech you doe not think that I have any thoughts of purchasing your heart by it: For I know the price is inestimable, and that all the Gold, Pearls, Diamonds, and Rubies which the Sun ever produced since it shined upon the Universe, is not able to pay it: And if ever I shall hope to be so blessed hereafter as to enjoy it, I must have recourse unto my tears, and sighs, and prayers, and not unto Pearls and Diamonds, and such like. However, I most humbly beseech you, be not offended at my boldnesse, nor take it ill from one who having given you his whole heart, may give you what he thinks inferiour to it also: And therefore, I beseech you doe not hate me for it, nor look more coldly upon me to morrow, unless you will overwhelm with sorrows your most Adorer

TIMANTES.

After Parthenia had read this Letter, she gave it unto Amaxita, who reading it also, could not sufficiently admire the liberality of Timantes, and told Parthenia, that if his love were measured by his gift, he loved her better then ever any could. I know not, replied Parthenia, Page 56 whether he love me as much as you talk of, but I am sure he does neither sufficiently esteem me nor know me at all: For it seems he thinks to blind my eyes, and winne my heart with Diamonds, as children with toyes; he thinks me of a weak mind, and mercenary soul; and yet I must confesse he is something excusable; for my manner of dealing with him is so phantastical and extraordinary, that I ought not to thinke much of him; nor am I resolved to treat him rigorously, but will onely let him see he was mistaken in his thoughts that I would receive a present of any importance from him; and that he may not doubt of my generosity, I will not onely refuse what he offers me, but I will present him with a gift, and a gift of that magnificence, as he may conjecture at my quality and riches; for the Gods have not menaced me with misfortunes, though he who is to marry me doe know that my birth and quality is not base. Parthenia was as good as her word; for she did not onely put those things which Timantes gave her into the box, but she put also into it the Case of a Picture set with Diamonds of a most considerable greatnesse. She did not fear they would be known to be hers, though Timantes should shew them unto all in Paphos; for she lately got them made in Sala[mis], purposely to put the Picture of Policrite in it, which she took out before she sent it un[to] Timantes: Also she answered the Letter of Timantes in another hand then she usually writes: After which I procured a trusty person to carry this box unto him in the morning betimes: and the matter was so well carried, that it was given unto one of Timantes his servants whom he put much confidence in, to give unto his Master: This was as well as Parthenia desired; For the servant of Timantes knew not the man who gave it unto him, nor took any notice of him, nor ever was like, for he was not one of Paphos, but departed the next morning into his own country: So that Timantes when he awaked was strangely astounded to see that upon the Table which hee thought was in the hands of his unknown Mistris. At first he thought his eyes deceived him, or else that he dreamt, and was not well awaked. But his servant telling him, that a man whom he knew not, nor would tell his name, nor would stay until he awaked, did charge him to give it unto him, then he thought it to be true. But since he imagined that his admired <...> own one had sent back his present, hee was exceeding sorry, and so much the more <...> e hee feared that since she was so generous as to refuse a gift of that value, she <...> be of <...> ed at him: Therefore he opened the box with much impatience, not to see whether all his Jewels were there, but to see whether shee had returned an Answer unto his Letter. In the mean time he was infinitely astonished to see upon the tops of all his own Jewels, that Rich Picture Case which Parthenia sent him, and which he was certain was not his: Hee no sooner saw it, but hoping her Picture was within it, he never considered the beauty and richnesse of it, but opened it in all haste; but in lieu of seeing what he so extremely desired, he saw these words written in the place of the Picture,

This Case will serve hereafter to put my Picture in, if you render your self worthy of it.

Ah most cruell Lady (said he, as I heard afterwards) will you never be weary with making tryall of my patience, and let me see what I so much adore? After this he found a Letter containing these words.

To the too Inquisitive TIMANTES.

SIR,

I Am so fully perswaded that Liberality is a virtue, and a virtue most Heroick, that I will never doe any thing which may make you think me guilty of its opposite vice; and therefore I have sent back your rich present, and send it without any sharp reprehensions: For since you doe not know who I am, I ought not to be offended at that which would be injurious to me if you did: Yet I must complain a little, that after so much converse with you, when I did not hide my heart as I did my face, you should not have so good an opinion of me, as to think that I would refuse your offer: But I will not break with you for this, though for no other consideration but to give you cause to know me better. However, to repair your fault, I enjoyn you to keep this case which I send you, without shewing unto any; for if you do, you shall never see my Picture nor my self.

Page 57 As Timantes ended the reading of this letter, Antimaques entered, who found his friend much taken up with this new adventure, which he related unto him, notwithstanding the prohibition of Parthenia, thinking it no treason to make that man his confidant, whom he loved as a second selfe: But as Timantes was astonished, so Antimaques was much more, having no reason after this, to doubt neither of the quality or generosity of this unknown Lady. For indeed the present which Timantes gave her was so rich, that it was an argument of a great soule to refuse it, and the Case which Parthenia sent him was so magnificent, that she must be both rich and liberall who gave it: so that Antimaques after this confessed, that Timantes had reason to prosecute his adventure, and to try how far it would go; he moved him to show this Case unto some who perhaps might know it, and thereby to learne where it was made: he moved him also to shew her Letter, thereby to find out the writer by the writing: But since Timantes observed in discourse with his beloved unknowne one, that she knew all passages in the World, he durst not put it to the venture, but desired Antimaques a thousand and a thousand times, not to reveale his secret unto any, yet he had sometimes a great desire to speak himselfe unto the Lady at whose house Parthenia lodged: but she had so often told him, that if ever he enquired of her, she would then never see him more, that he durst not attempt it. In the meane time, he waited for night with much impatience; yet he was much unresolved what to doe with the picture case which Parthenia sent him: for since it came from the hands of her he loved, he had no will to part with it: on the other side, it was so rich that he thought it were to be lesse generous then she, if he did not restore it; so that not knowing what he should doe with it, he carried it unto the place of meeting: but he was not so happy as he hoped to be, for Parthenia to perplex him the <...> re, sent Amaxita to tell him, she could not see him that night; and as Timantes asked <◇> the reason, she gave him some cause to think by her answer (though she told him not so expresly) that it was because she was preparing her selfe to goe unto a generall Ball, which the Princess-Policrite kept the next day: so th <...> Timantes ravished that Amaxita had told him this ere ever she was aware, began to resolve not to faile being at this meeting, and there to talk with all the Ladies, so that he made no question but to find her whom he looked for: but since he hoped to pick something out of Amaxita, he talked with her a long time, and since he collected by her discourse that she was of Parthenia's Cabinet counsell, he told her a hundred things to tell her, and began to aggravate his sorrowes, that he could not resolve to restore the picture Case which she sent him, and which he thought too rich to keep: yet (said he unto her at the end of their discourse) I doe conjure you to tell that excellent Lady, I will restore the Case that day she gives me her picture; but to the end she should not think I keep it out of any covetous inclination, I will within this four daies proclaime a Horse-race, and will give that for the prize which I presumed to offer unto her, and so I may safely keep that present which otherwise might make me suspected of covetousnesse. Amaxita used all her Rhetorick to perswade him to an alteration of his resolution, but all in vaine: However they parted, agreeing that the day following at coming from the Ball, he should come unto the usuall place of meeting. After this Timantes was all hopes and joyes, for he beleaved he should know this unknown one by her voice, or at least he would set such spies about the house whither she would come into at her returne from the Ball, as should tell him who she was. Then he prepared himselfe with all care possible, and went unto the Ball so timely, that the Hall was not made cleane when he came there. In the meane while I was advised by Amaxita to observe Timantes very close, and to render her an account a little before the Ball ended: I was so forward to doe the Princesse of Salamis any service, and considering that in this I might also serve Timantes, and the Prince Philoxipes, who I knew desired the Marriage, that I was almost assoon in the place of assembly as he was: For my part, I never had so much pleasure in all my life, as I had that day in observing Timantes, for there did not one beauty enter, which I perceived by his eyes, he did not wish might prove his unknowne one; and not one entered which was foule, but he feared that was she, and I saw so many several turbulencies in his countenance, that after I laughed at him, I could not chuse but pity him: That which did most stick in his stomach was, that there were at this assembly three or foure women of Paphos who were very rich and very ill favoured, and except the Queen Policrite, Timodia, and one more, he saw not one beauty there as was likely to send such a present as he received. In the meane time he knew it was not one of those foure, for he knew it by their Tones, and saw moreover it could not be the two first, who were both married and virtuous; and he knew it could not be the other two, for they had both of them declared Servants, and Ser[v]ants whom they did not hate: Thus not knowing what to thinke, he went from place to place, Page 58 talking to all the faire ones, and foul ones, one after another, but could not finde her he looked for: then as he was walking from one to another, a Ladie of Amathonte, a high beauty and one whom Policrite received as a person of quality, did enter; she being wonderfull faire, and he having never seen her before, though she had been three daies in Paphos, he looked upon her with hopes that this was she he loved; and hearing her speak, he thought he heard something in the sound of her voice which resembled his unknown one, so that being ravished with joy, he waited till the complements between Policrite and she was passed, and she seated in her place; and she was no sooner set, but Timantes according to the freedom of our Court, talked to her, to the end he might move her to answer him, but this Lady being one of that countrywhose custome is not to talk with any she knows not, had much adoe to an[s]wer him: Besides, she was as dull as she was faire, and when she did answer, it was so confusely and little to the purpose, thas Timantes hardly understood what she said. However, his imagination being forestalled, he thought her stupiditie and silence, was only affected, and that she would disguise her selfe, therefore he continued on, still hoping she would speak more; but long did he stay before he could get any thing from her, unlesse a yea or no: yet at last he found his error, for a man of Amathonte coming to her, she told to him so freely after the rusticity of her country, as fully undeceived Timantes, and since there was not one woman of any reasonable quality in all the assembly which he had not spoke unto, or heard speak, he satt downe, but so sadly, that he minded nothing which passed in the company; yet they forced him to dance, but it was so carelessly, and far from his accustomed garb, that Pollicrite could not chuse but chide him. In the mean time, since I thought the Ball would quickly end, I went out, to render an account of my observations unto my Sister, and told her exactly to the least circumstance all his actions, naming all the principall Ladies of the assembly which Timantes talked with, not forgetting the Lady of Amathonte: I told her also that I thought there were men about the house watching who entered, but I did not think they could know me, because it was very dark: After I had told all I knew, I went out at another dore then I intended at. But Amaxita had no sooner well informed Parthenia of all passages, but Timantes came unto his accustomed place. However, Parthenia the more to deceive him, wore many Jewells that night more then usual; for though it was dark, yet there was so much dim light from the Moon, the Starrs, and Candle which was at the further end of the room, as might make the Diamonds sparkle: so that Timantes knowing that Parthenia was better dressed then ordinary, he thought then that she had really been at the Ball: though he knew he had spoken unto all the Ladies, and knew that none of them was her he talked unto then: Moreover since he understood from his spies, that there entered none into the house but one man, he thought againe she was not at the Ball: so that he was driven to such a cruell necessity, as he knew not what to think: But to compleat his amazement, Parthenia no sooner saw him, but not giving him so much leasure as to speak. Well Sir (said she unto him) what think you of the spirit of the Amathontine Lady, with whom you talked longer then with any Lady of Paphos? doe you not feare that all the Ladies of our Court should hate you, for preferring a Lady of that Country before them? and doe you not further think I may well be Jealous? I pray heavens Madam, said he, that it be the last of these, for since that passion cannot be in your heart, but it must arise from another, I should think my selfe very happy; for then you must love me, and let me see you, and consequently I must not be driven to the cruell necessity of seeking you out every where, and finding you no where, but here where I cannot see you with a full satisfaction. But Madam, I beseech you tell me sincerely, whether you were at the Ball or no? Is it not a sufficient answer, said she, to tell you all that passed in this meeting? and then she told him all that Amaxita had related unto her, and so puzled him, that he knew not what to think. But yet (said she unto him) who would you wish me to be of all the Ladies you saw with Policrite? I wish you were none but your selfe, replied he, and that I could know who you are, for if you use me thus long, I shall infallibly lose my witts and reason. Very well (answered Parthenia and smiled) I begin to think so, and that which makes me most feare it, is, that unlesse you had been out of your witts and reason, you would never have offered me such a rich gift, which I could not accept of, without a stain unto my vertue. You may think it from another conjecture Madam, (said he unto her) for after you had sent me such a glorious example of generosity, and sent me back my gift with another more rich then mine, yet I keep it, and keep it without rendring you thanks: yet I shall keep it no longer then untill you are pleased to honour me with your picture, which you have not forbidden me to hope for. So did my woman tell me, replied Parthenia, but I must tell you, there are many things to be done, before I give you my picture, for I will be first Page 59 well assured of your heart for ever; but untill then, I pray tell me, who doe you think of all the beauties you have seen in Cyprus, does in your judgement best deserve the prize? You have so accustomed me to make no use of my eyes (said he unto her) that I think them to be very ill Judges of beauty; for since I think upon none but that of your soul, and mind, and cannot see yours, I cannot tell whether I should love the fair or the brown. Parthenia did then exceedingly presse him to tell her whether he liked the beauty of Policrite or Aretaphile better, purposely to preposseesse him with what he should hereafter find hers to be; but doe what she could, he could not clearly expresse himself, because he knew not the complexion of her he spoke unto, but striving to divert the discourse, hee told her, how all the men and women in Cyprus (except one woman, whose judgement was opposite to all others) told him that all the beauty he had seen was nothing comparable to the beauty of the Princesse of Salamis: Parthenia hearing her self named, did think at first, that perhaps Timantes knew who she was, but she was mistaken; for Timantes going on with his discourse; 'Tis true, said he, I doe beleeeve this singular woman as much as I doe all the rest; especially because she is one of a good wit. Wit, replied she, is not so necessary to judge of beauty: But there is a necessity of Justice and Impartiality, and without envy at the beauty of another. But I pray tell me, said Parthenia, who is the woman which speaks thus in disadvantage of the Princesse of Sallamis? Timantes thinking of no inconveniencie by naming this Lady, needed not many en|treates: But he had no sooner named her, then Parthenia began to wonder at her injustice. I beseech you, Sir, said she unto him, do not judge of the Princesse of Salamis and her beauty by the reports of this woman, who without reason hates her. But if she be so amiable as they s|y she is, replied Timantes, how is it possible she should hate her? No, no, Sir, replied Parthenia, doe not deceive your self, you must never judge of the beauty of one faire one, by the reports of another beauty: For I am confident that amongst a hundred, you will not find two that are just, but every one will think to adde glory unto themselves by detracting from others. The truth is, said Timantes, I did wonder very much this woman should be so opposite unto the judgement of all others, concerning the Princesse of Salamis. I pray tell me, said Parthenia, what shee did say in particular of her? For I take the greatest pleasure in the world to see envy and jealousie work in the spirits of those who are inspired with those humours. Since it is your pleasure, Madam, said he unto her, I will confesse, that after I had the honour to meet you the first time in the Labyrinth, and could not finde you in any place after, nor none could tell me who you were, I had an imagination that you were this Princesse whereof we speak: Yet I durst never reveale my thoughts unto any but this Lady, who was my indifferent good friend; but she kept me not long in that error; for she told me the Princesse of Salamis, had a shrill voice not at all sweet; that she was grosse and ill made; that she had white, but not handsome and fair hands. The truth is, said Parthenia, There is no certain conclusions to be made by the reports of others; and since I love Parthenia very well, but doe not love her who speaks against her, perhaps I shall be partiall, and favour the one, and wrong the other, then I would have you see the Princess of Salamis, and be judge your self. In the mean time I am beholding to you, for thinking me to be her; for though she were not as all report her, yet my obligation is not the lesse, since your imagination fancied me to be so, and not as that Lady described her. 'Tis true, replied Timantes, That I fancied your Idea like that of the Princesse of Salamis, bee shee as fair as shee can be. However (said Parthenia, exceedingly desiring to know what Timantes would think of her beauty) I pray doe me so much favour as to see that Princesse. How can I see her, Madam, replied he, for the Prince Philoxipes asked her leave to bring me into her desart, and she would not honour me so far: And to tell you truly, Madam, all my curiosi|ty is confined unto your self, and I desire to see none else: Yet I should think my self obliged to you (answered she) if you would see her. Once more, Madam, said he, pray tell me how I can see her. You may easily doe it (said Parthenia) for I know she goes almost every day unto a little Temple of Venus Urania, not above thirty furlongs from her house, towards Amathonte. I doe know the Temple, said hee, for it was shewed unto me as I went unto the Adonian Feast. Since so, said she, I pray you goe thither to morrow; for I confesse I should be very glad if the beauty of that Princesse should please you, to the end you may hereafter suspect the reports of that Lady who I love not, and may put her out of the Catalogue of your friends. Alass, Madam, said Timantes, there is no necessity of my seeing the Princesse of Salamis, for I know enough from you to make me discard that Lady from the number of my friends; for since she does not please you, she cannot me. No, no, said she, I would not have you do so out of complacencie, but out of reason, therefore I conjure you to Page 60 doe as I desire. But, Madam, said he, if this Princess be as fair as reports make her, me-thinks you should have some care of my heart, in exposing it unto so great a danger: at least you should shew me your eyes, that I may with them defend my self against hers. On the con|trary, said she, since I doe intend never to give my entire affection untill I am first most certainly assured of yours, I wish the Princesse of Salamis were a thousand times fairer then she is, that she might be a stronger tryall of your constancie: For since I value not a perfeedous in|constant heart, nor would be loved for beauty if I had it, but would have good security a|gainst all those evils which beauty causes, I should be glad you saw all the beauties in Cyprus, to the end I might not feare it. In conclusion, Sir, Parthenia ordered the matter with so much art, that Timantes promised to go next morning and see whether the Princesse of Salamis were at that Temple, not having the least suspition of the truth, nor thinking she had any other design in her commands, but only that she loved to be punctually obeyed: So that he prepared himselfe for it: And after he went from her, Parthenia gave all requisite orders for his journey in the morning, and so did she: Amaxita writ a Letter unto me to send a Coach by break of day; for Parthenia would not make use of the Ladyes with whom shee lodged, because Timantes knew it. So she did rise betimes in the morning, and dressed her self in her richest habit, and neglected nothing which might set her self out with advantage: When she was all ready, and had looked the last time in her glasse, Amaxita asked what was her design? not being yet satisfied with all the reasons she had told her, I would exactly know, said she, what Timantes will think of me, which I can never doe, if I shew my self unto him, and discover who I am. But, Madam (said Amaxita unto her) since you doe not feare that your beauty will attract the heart of Timantes, why doe you tell him the truth? No, replied Parthenia, I have not changed my mind, but still feare the menaces of the gods, and these fears are my reasons why I goe so fantastically to work. But for all that, Madam (said Amaxita) I am confident Timantes will think you the fairest that ever he saw; and I beleeeve all the excellings of your spirit, your soul, your hands, your stature, and your voice will have much adoe to hold out against the glory of your eyes; and therefore if you think you cannot marry him, if perchance he should be in love with your beauty as well as with your soul, never expose him unto that danger, but seek out some other way to make tryall of his f|idelity. Yet Parthenia would not hearken unto Amaxita: But not well knowing what she should think if Timantes should commend her either too much or too little: She went into the Temple so early, as she was in no danger to be known in the Town: She went also by a blind way, to the end that she might come as if she came from Salamis; for so her Desart was called: But since she feared that if Timantes did see her in the Temple, he would know her by her stature: as soon as she came; she offered her sacrifice; and afterwards seeing that Timantes was not come, she went unto the Sacrificers house under pretence of resting her self, whose house was close by the way as one comes from Paphos. So that being in a Parlor, shee leaned against the window talking with Amaxita, whose hood was up as well as hers; for in favour of their design the Sun did not then shine. She had not stood there a quarter of an hour, but Amaxita espied Timantes coming towards the place where they were, having with him only one servant, and she no sooner espied him, but she shewed him unto Parthenia, just as Timantes turned his eyes towards them, but it was so far off as he could not discerne her beauty, and therefore he advanced with no hast; but when he was so neare Parthenia as to distinguish that attracts in her face, he made no question but she was the Princesse of Salamis, and was so surprised at the lustre of her beauty, that he changed colour, and confessed to himselfe, that the Idea which he had fancied of his beloved unknown Lady, was not fairer, nor so faire as this Princesse: he went then as gently as possible, he gazed upon her with attention full of rapture, and bowed unto her with most reverent respect, and did not go into the Temple untill he had seriously contemplated upon it, and meeting with one of the sacrificers of that place going into the Temple, he stayed and fell into discourse with him, purposely for a pretence of looking longer upon her; at first he intended to go unto her as upon a visit, knowing she was not ignorant he was the friend of the Prince her Brother, but having only one servant with him, and being in a course and common habit, he could not find a mind to be so neare a person of that Beauty and Majesty, who struck so high an admiration and respect into him; therefore since the sacrificer went into the Temple, and he durst stay no longer there, he went into the Temple also, hoping still he should see her againe at his coming out: But Parthenia having no intention he should speak unto her, or follow her, assoon as she saw him gone into the Temple, she took Coach and went towards the place of her solitude, yet she went out of it againe, assoon as she was in a wood about two furlongs Page 61 distant from the Temple, and since she would not come unto Paphos untill it was night, nor meet with Timantes in the way, she took a blind way through the Forrest which went unto the house of one who was acquainted with my sister, and there she passed away the rest of the day. In the meane while Sir, since Parthenia had observed that her beauty had produced its customary effects upon the spirits of Timantes, to witt, admiration, and t|urbulencie, she knew not whether she should be glad or angry, yet she desired to please Timantes; but for all that, when she considered the menaces of the Gods, she could not chuse but be sorrowfull, that her beauty had any influence upon the mind of her lover, and feared, that since he was so sensible, he would not be so <...> nstant, as she wished and hoped. However, (said Amaxita to her and laughed) though I <...> antes doe change the object of his passion, yet is he not inco|nstant, because still he loves none but you: I assure you, answered she, that if he should, I should be no lesse jealous of my selfe then any other: Oh Madam (said Amaxita and interrupted her) it is not possible you should so scrupulously rely upon the Oracle, as to have any such thought, and be jealous of your selfe; for would you have Timantes have no eyes? or in halving be worse, and think you not handsome?

Truly Amaxita replied she, you put me to the question, for I should be sorry to seem ugly in his eye, and yet I would not have him dote too much upon beauty, and if I should find that he prefers the Princesse of Salamis before his unknown Mistresse, I doe confesse I should be very sorry: Truly Madam, replied Amaxita, I cannot beleieve you, and I am confident, that maugle all the menaces of the Gods, you doe not think as you speak, since certainly it is not possible any beauty should be an enemy unto her owne charmes. But Sir, whilst Parthenia and Amaxita were thus talking, Timantes was en|tertaining himselfe very sweetly with the rare beauty which he had seen. Is it not possible would he say, to joyne the spirit of my beloved unknown owne, to the beauty of her I saw? Alas, alas, I would it were, that I might be the happiest man alive, in the enjoyment of the most accomplit person in the world; but that would be too much, and if there were a wo|man in the world so faire as the Princesse of Salamis, and whose spirit were as great and sweet as hers I love, there would be more Altars erected unto her, then either unto Venus-Ana|diomena, or to Venus Vrania: Be contented therefore with what the Gods have given unto her whom I adore, and wish only that she be but a little lesse faire then the Princesse of Salamis. Timantes was not long in these thoughts, for his hot desire of seeing this wonder of beauty againe, moved him to go out of the Temple almost assoon <◇> came into it: But sore was he grieved, to understand from those that looked to his horses, that the Princesse of Salamis was gone, he asked which way she went, and followed a while, but since she was in the wood before he took horse, he could not overtake her, therefore he returned towards Paphos, so ravished with the beauty of this Princesse, that he almost feared his falling in love with her. In the mean time, since his unknowne Lady did not prohibite him, from speaking of this journey, he told every one where he had been, only concealed the cause; and the chiefest motive which induced him so to doe, was, because he could not forbear commending the beauty of the Princesse of Salamis, which he knew he durst not doe to the height, when he spoke with his un|knowne one at night, for he knew that it was the greatest indiscretion in the world for any lo|ver to commend the beauty of another before his Mistresse, & the most of all in him, because his Mistresse would not have him so inamoured with the beauty of the body as the mind, so that he did nothing but extol the beauty of the Princesse of Salamis, unto all the men he met with that day, he told it unto Philoxipes, Policrite, and Dorida; and he went himselfe to tell that Lady who so discommended this Princesse, that she knew not what beauty was; he had not the least suspicion that this Princesse was his unknown Lady, supposing it a thing impossible that a woman so faire, could hide her beauty from a man that was in love with her, especially from one she hated not, and whom she wished eternally to love her: for being igno|rant of the Oracles which the Princesse received, he could not guesse at the true cause of her so fantastical and extraordinary proceedings: None could think it strange that the Princesse should come so neare Paphos as this Temple, and not come into the Town, because it was her ordinary humor. But Philoxipes and Policrite murmured a little that she did not send to know how they did, imagining no other reason, but that she had no desire to have it known she was there, for feare she should be invited to come into the Town: However, night being come, Timantes went unto his accustomed place of meeting, being resolved to commend the beauty of the Princesse of Salamis, but not too highly for the reasons aforesaid: He was no sooner there, but Parthenia asked him, what he thought of the Princesse of Salamis? I think she is very faire replied he, and I think that she who told me otherwise, did her much wrong, for truly if that Princesse had a mind answerable to her eyes, and a soule as faire as her face, Page 62 questionlesse she were a rare woman: But though she be only faire replied Parthenia, is it not possible to love her? Yes (replied he, and smiled) if those that look upon her were all eyes and no spirit: No, no, said Parthenia, doe not dissemble, I see you have a mind to answer me according to my thoughts, and not your owne, and to tell me rather what I would have you say, then what you think: Suppose I did Madam, replied he, is it a crime to be com|placential? Compliance said she, ought not to go so far as to dissemble ones thoughts, it is enough if it submit unto them, and too much to hide them; true delight consists in con|formity of thoughts, and not of words only; and truly I am more joyed to see one whom I love, think just as I doe, then I am to see them who for my <...> ke force themselves in every thing to a complacency: certainly there is nothing more sw <...> nd pleasing then this, sym|pathy of spirits, thoughts and opinions; therefore never strive to find out what I would wish you to say, but be cleare and ingenuous, and speak your owne thoughts, for you cannot de|ceive me. Madam, replied he, I doe ever speak sincerely unto you, you ask me whether the Princesse of Salamis be faire? I answer you that she is very faire, am I farre from the truth? Parthenia being then angry to think her beauty had not so much pierced the heart of Timantes as she thought, began to speak in a little higher tone: You commend the Beauty of the Princesse of Salamis very coldly (said she unto him) that it is plain to see, you doe it out of complacency only, or else out of subtilty to perswade me your heart is not sensible of beauty. 'Tis most true Madam, replied he, I am at this time sensible of nothing but your spirit and soule, and all I know of you: and therefore Madam doe not wonder (said he, thinking that he could not please her better) if I be not so much charmed with the beauty of this Princesse, as I should have been, if I had not been in love with you: and truly Madam, my desires of returning hither were so hot, that I did not spend much time in contemplation of her. This Sir was the conference between Timantes and Parthenia that night, Timantes hardly daring to commend the beauty of the Princesse of Salamis, though Parthenia seemed to desire it, and Parthenia not well knowing whether she should commend him for it, or no: But after he was gone, she resolved with her selfe, and concluded that her beauty did not charme him, and was mistaken when she thought to see nothing but signes of admiration in his face and actions: No, no, said she unto Amaxita, certainly I am deceived, and all that which I thought to be admiration is only astonishment; Timantes questionlesse is surprisid, but it is to see that the world should so much commend me with so little cause, certainly he loves beauty in another shape then that which the Gods have given unto me; there is some|thing in my face which distasts his eyes, and will certainly make me to lose all that my spirit hath gotten. Madam (said Amaxita unto her) you said you would not have Timantes love you for your beauty: 'Tis true said she, but however, I would not have him hate me because he finds something in my face which does not please him: I know Amaxita (said she) that this I say seemes unreasonable unto you, but I cannot help it, for had you tryed as I have done, what a monstrous misery it is to be sleighted by him who once adored me, you would excuse all my imperfections and weaknesses, and would confesse, I had reason to try all waies possible, which might make me know the heart of Timantes. However Sir, Parthenia was not long in the belief that her beauty did displease her lover, for as it was my chance to be in three or foure places where he had so highly extolled her, the next morning I acquainted my sister, and she Parthenia with it, and since I thought there was never any danger in telling a beauty that she was extolled, I told the story with as many aggravations as I could, and therefore said, I think Timantes was as much in love with her beauty as her spirit. Madam said Amaxita to her, it may truly be said that Timantes loves two and is not inconstant, since he loves but one person, and by giving his heart to one he does not take it from the o|ther: and it may be further said, that you have a Rivall whom you cannot hate, for I doe not think your spirit can envie the power of your eyes, nor your eyes oppose the conquests of your spirit. Parthenia hearkned unto all that Amaxita said, and never gave her answer; but after I was gone, and she had commanded me to keep an observant eye still over Timantes, she did complaine of him almost asmuch for extolling her beauty too high unto others, as she did for extolling it too little the night before unto her, and finding that he did not speak sincerely, she was very sad, yet not so much as when she thought that she did not please his eye, and when Amaxita asked her what security she desired of the heart of Timantes? she told her that she did not know her selfe: Truly Madam, said Amaxita to her, I cannot see you can either expect or desire better assurance then you have, that Timantes is the man whom the Gods would have you to marry; for he began to love you without the power of your beauty, and not knowing whether you were noble or rich: he still loves you, and knowes not that Page 63 you are faire, and loves you in a place where there are a thousand shining beauties, who doe all they can to engage his heart; you would have perswaded him that you were ill favoured, and indeed he had great reason to suspect it; yet for all this he continues loving you, you have also employed your owne beauty to make tryall of his constancy, and you see he is faithfull to you, that he dares not commend her in your presence, for feare certainly he should thereby give you cause to think that he can be sensible of beauty. All that you say is true, replied Parthenia, but yet for all this, if Timantes can suffer his heart to be drawne from his un|known Mistresse, by the charmes that are in the beauty of the Princesse of Salamis, though his unknown Mistresse and this Princesse be all one, yet I have reason to feare, that if he can quit my spirit for my beauty, he may hereafter quit both my spirit and my beauty, for some other person, unto whom the grace of novelty will give advantage; so that to have better assurance of the heart of Timantes, I will yet try what absence will doe, which questionlesse is the strongest test of all others, therefore I will return into my solitude, and returne without so much as bidding him adieu, fearing that if he should know, he would set so many spies about the house, that he might follow me. Amaxita did oppose her designe, and perswaded her as much as she could to let Timantes know of her departure, but all in vaine, for she would not hearken unto her; yet she could not depart the next morning, because some orders were to be taken for the privacy of her journey, so that she saw Timantes once more, whom she chid for the excessive applauses which he gave the Princesse of Salamis, and for not speaking unto her in the same tearmes when he told her his opinion; and therefore, said she unto him, I have cause to beleieve that they who accuse you of being in love with her had reason for it: but I pray you if it be so confesse it unto me, I conjure you unto it, to the end I may not ingage my selfe in any further affection, and that I may be no impediment unto you in that conquest: but Sir deceive not your selfe, you will not find so easie a matter as may be you think; I know Parthenia, and I know she is harder to please then I am, and more deli|cate; so that in all likelyhood, if you quit me for her, you will lose me, and not find her. Timantes hearing Parthenia say so, did protest that he was not in in love with the Princesse of Salamis, nor ever would be.: You promise me now said she and smiled, more then I ask, and it will be sufficient if you only assure me you doe not love her at present; as for the time to come you are a little too bold with it, if you speak for it with as much certainty as for the present. But Madam, said he unto her, since I am not at present in love with the Princesse of Salamis, it followes of necessity I never shall be, for as I doe not seek to see her, so though I would I cannot, since she hath already denyed me that honour, and therefore it is not likely I ever shall: I doe confesse (since you know I said it in other places) that the Princesse of Sala|mis is the fairest that ever my eye beheld, but since I find a greater beauty in your mind and spirit, then in her face, and since I am resolved to serve you all my life, and never see her againe, it doth of necessary consequence follow, that I doe not love her, and that I shall for ever love you. However once more let me tell you, said Parthenia, it is good to submit unto the providence of the Gods, for the time to come: Why Madam? said he, have you not told me a hundred times that you would not valey any affection which you were not sure would be eternal? so that you had an eye unto things to come, aswell as things past and present. How|ever it be, said Parthenia, I would not have you answer equally for the present and the future, lest you make me suspect both. After much such discourse as this, Timantes retired, and the next morning Parthenia returned to her solitude, leaving a letter with me for Timantes, with orders to convey it so secretly unto him, that he could not suspect or guesse how it came; but since the difficulty was, to find out a way how Timantes might answer, and not know which way his letters went. I was a long time before my invention could hit on it, but at last I found out a way to convey Parthenia's letter to him, and his answer to her unknown to him by whom, and thus I went to work. I sent the first letter of Parthenia to Timantes as I s <...> t the Jewells, that is to say, by an unknowne person, who gave it unto his servant; but I added a note unto this letter, counterfeiting my hand as Parthenia did hers, by which I in|timated unto him, if he would return an answer, he should give his letter unto one who in the morning early should be at the statue of Venus in the great Temple of Paphos; and to the end that the matter might be carryed with more safty, I employed one of my friends, and made him beleieve, that it did highly concern me (upon a design which hereafter I would im|part to him, when I had commission for it from a person who had absolute power over me) to receive some letters which none should know by whom I received them, nor for whom I received them; and I did so entangle the matter, that he could never know whether I nego|tiated for my selfe or for another, or whether it concerned matter of State, or matter of Page 64 Gallantry, so that he not knowing whether I transa|med in things concerning love or ambition, he did as I desired him, and I giving him full instructions, and he being both •ld and trusty, the businesse was done aswell as I could wish: He delivered the Letter which Parthenia left at parting, and which did extremely surprise Timantes, and it was thus indited.

To TIMANTES.

SIR.

IN this resolution which I have fixed upon, to try whether the affection which you professe unto me, will abide absence, and surmount it, I think you are a little be holding unto me, for sparing you the labour of bidding me adieu, think, if you will that I spared my selfe that labour, for since I hide my face from you, it is but just I tell you that which my eyes would have done if you had seen them. If during this absence I understand you continue faithfull unto me, and that really you are not in love with the Princesse of Salamis to my prejudice, perhaps at our next meeting you shall know who I am. In the meane time remember it is not permitted you to enquire who gives you my Letters, nor who receives your answers; know that it concerns your good if you love me, and mine also: Adieu.

This Letter did not only surprise, but extreemly grieve Timantes, and he was so passionately both in love and sorrow for her absence, that he was nothing but a lump of Melancholly, and so continued many dayes. The greatest augmentation of his inquietudes, was, that it was not permitted him to enquire of that which he had the greatest desire to know; and that he was not able to keep within those strait limits which were prescribed him. He went himself to carry his answer unto my friend who expected it in the place which I directed him to; but he was exceedingly surprised when he saw him to be a man he knew not, and a man of Quality: He offered any thing unto him if he would tell him unto whom he was to give that Letter, but all in vain, insomuch as he was driven to the necessity of conjuring him not to tell hee asked the question. So that my friend giving me the Letter which could have no suspection, I sent unto Parthenia, who found these words.

The unfortunate and miserable TIMANTES unto his cruell unknown one.

MADAM,

IN thinking to spare me the sorrows of bidding you adieu, you have drowned me in them. What can you think, Madam, will become of a man who adores you, who knows not who you are, nor whither you goe, but is ignorant whether you will ever return for him, or ever return at all? For heavens sake, Madam, have some compassion upon my constancy, and never fear that the Princesse of Salamis will dri <...> you out of my heart: I doe adm^ee her, I confesse, but I will not love her, as I told you before, I will not see her. In the mean <...> e, I beseech yo^r, put not my patience to the utmost rack, unlesse it be your <...> gn to mak^ee despair, or unlesse you would put me to death not only for love, but also f <...> riosity. <...> um, Madam, I beseech you, if you be gone, or shew your self unto me if you be not: For truly I cannot imagine where you are, or who you can be; and I am perswaded that if your inhumanity last a little l^onger, I shall not know my self: Yet I am most certain, that nothing can prevent me from being the most faithfull of your Lovers, and the most zealous of your Adorers,

TIMANTES.

This, Sir, was the answer which I sent unto Parthenia, who writ many times to Timant <...> and he also unto her: Yet since the beauty of this Princesse who he saw in that little Temple which is in the way towards Amathonte, did make a deep impression in his heart, he spoke of her very much; so that Antimaques who was in love with Donida, and would have been even ravished with joy to see him married unto Parthenia, he alwaies was hinting unto him that was only this Princesse that he could marry with honor, and not with an unknown woman, who perhaps had no beauty, or at least was of some fantasticall disposition. Timan|tes then did remember him of his promise not to condemn his passion if the unknown Lady did refuse his present: But Antimaques answered that when he said so, he did not think there was in Cyprus any match for him so advantageous as this of this Princesse: but now Page 65 he unde^rstood that the Prince Philoxipes did really wish that he should marry his sister, he could not be any longer in his first opinion: For I pray you Sir said he unto him, do but compare your unknown Lady with Parthenia a little; as for her quality, it is most certain it cannot be more high, nor so high, for there is none in all the <...> e that is comparable unto her; as for her beauty, according to your owne description, the comparison must needs be as unequal; as for her vertue, •ou know what high reputation she hath; and as for her spirit, the world knowes no equall, and would you preferre you know not who, before her? Doubtlesse I would replied Timantes, for I love her, and she does not hate me: as for the Prin|cesse of Salamis, though I could love her, and though her ravishing beauty should force me to be perfidious, yet it were very doubtfull whether she could love me; for I have heard say she is of a nice spirit, and few men can please her, though many not without some merit have courted her, therefore I pray you talk no more of this Princesse, whose Idea is but too deeply imprinted already in my imagination. In the mean time, Dorida, who for the interest she had in Antimaques, desired that Timantes might stay in Cyprus, used all her arguments to perswade Policrite, that she would importune the Princesse of Salamis to quit her soli|tude; so that unknown to Parthenia, Philoxipes, Policrite, Dorida, and Antimaques, plott|ed her marriage with Timantes: and truly it was happy they did so; for otherwise, I think Parthenia would never have made her selfe known unto Timantes; for since her reason was not quite prejudicated, she would often think her proceedings with him so fantastical, that she could not beleve Timantes could really esteem her; and as an effect of this opinion, she did so firmly resolve never to discover her selfe, but to break off absolutely with him, that Amaxita quite despaired of ever altering her. In the meane time, Philoxipes knowing that Timantes thought his Sister very faire, he thought that if he could make her like him, aswell as he liked her, the design so much desired might happily take effect: But since she could never like Timantes unlesse she saw him; and since Philoxipes knew not that she knew him aswell as he did, he resolved to carry him unto the Princesse, and to surprise her in her solitude: But Timantes excused himselfe saying, he respected her more then to force her to see a man whom she did not think worthy of that honour, and had denied it before, adding further, that it would be a meanes to make her hate him: so that Timantes refusing to goe in a civill complement, Philoxipes knew not what to think: But Antimaques who was acquainted with the passage, told it unto Dorida, to the end she might tell Policrite, that the reason why Timantes would not go to see the Princesse of Salamis, was, because he would not expose himselfe unto the danger of falling in love with one who perhaps would be insensible of him: So that Dorida preparing the mind of Policrite, and Policrite the mind of Philoxipes, it was plotted and resolved amongst them, to get out Timantes under colour of taking a journey of pleasure, and in lieu of carrying him unto the pretended place, to carry him unto the Princesse: But since the Prince Philoxipes knew the humour of Parthenia, it was thought expedient to gaine Amaxita; therefore he made a visit unto the Princesse, and ne|gotiated the matter so dexterously, that she found an opportunity (whilst Parthenia was dressing her selfe, for it was very early) to talk with Amaxita in her chamber, and imparted unto her their designe of marrying the Princesse his sister unto Timantes. Let us tell her said he, to satisfie her concerning the Oracles which she received, that he is fallen in love with her reputation, and with the commendation which every one gives of her spirit. At first, Amaxita thought that the Prince Philoxipes knew something of the passages between Timan|tes and Parthenia, but she was greatly undeceived of that, by severall passages he told her: so that seeing it was the zeale and earnest desire of this Prince to promote this Marriage, she resolved to impart the secret of all the story unto him, conceiving that if she did not, perhaps the Prince Philoxipes (when he saw the amazement that Timantes would be in, when seeing and hearing Parthenia speak, he would know her, and his unknowne one to be one and the same person) would not know what to think, and perhaps would have some disadvantageous thought of Parthenia; therefore •e intreated the Prince Philoxipes to beleve the sincerity of her words, and conjured him not to discover what she had imparted, aggravating the scruple which Parthenia made, to marry a man who was in love with her beauty; so that Philoxipes crediting all that my sister told him, he was so strongly confirmed in his designe, that he thought of nothing else but how to promote it: He concluded then with Amaxita upon the day when he would bring Timantes unto Parthenia, to the end that the Princesse mig^t not be that day in her negligent dresse, though she should not be acquainted with the reason: After which he returned unto Paphos, where Timantes was droning out a life of melancholy, for he was profoundly in love with his unknown Mistresse, and could not forget Page 66 the beauty of the Princess of Salamis, from whom he received divers Letters, no^t knowing them to be from her. In the mean time Parthenia was almost absolutely resolved to disengage her self from the affection of Timantes, for she stood upon such terms of honour, that she could not resolve to make her self known unto him, after all this fantasticall gallantry: And indeed she writ unto him as if it were to be the last he should ever receive from her: Yet I think it was not her full intention, for I think she writ another after it, purposely to know his sorrows after this sad news, and the better to know how he loved her. However, Timantes received the Letter after he had engaged himself to Policrite and Philoxipes to goe the next morning unto a place where yet he never had been; not thinking that it was unto the Princess of Salamis. But since he grieved excessively at the Letter from Parthenia, he did what he could to dis-en|gage himself, but he could not; all his pretences would not serve for an excuse, nor content Philoxipes: Hee went himself to Timantes to oblige him unto this journey. Policrite sent severall times unto him, and sent him positive word, that for her part shee would not goe, unlesse hee did. So that as sad as hee was, there was a necessity of going with them; but Heavens know it was with so much unwillingnesse and sorrow, that it appeared in his face, in his words, and in his habit; for it was carelesse. He did strive, and force himself to seem a little pleasant, but his sorrows were stronger then himself. Philoxipes would have exceedingly grieved had he not known the cause; but my Sister did write unto him, intimating it, and her desires of hastning the execution of the design. I forgot to tell you, Sir, how Timantes answered Parthenia's Letter that night, and I sent it away so, that she received it two hours before Philoxipes and Timantes came unto her: But never was there such a condoling Letter written; it moved Parthenia to repent of her rigid dealing with him: In the mean time Amaxita knowing that some company would come that day, was much puzzled how to get her out of her negligent dresse, and bethought her self of a way how to move her unto it. The Princesse long since promised my Sister to suffer her to take her Picture, and therefore my Sister told her that I had writ unto her by him who brought the Letter from Timantes, intimating that the Limmer would be there that day, and would infallibly be there within two hours. So that Amaxita in this consideration entreated the Princesse to dresse her self as well as possibly she could. The Princesse told her at first, that he should stay untill to morrow: but Amaxita told her, the Limmer was so full of work, that he could not stay so long, and that there was no time to spare: So that Parthenia loving my Sister very well, did let her women dresse her as if she were going unto some publique Feast, Amaxita telling her that the Limmer was to work upon her clothes that day, and that the better dressed she was, the more lovely would her face look, and would inspire a hand|some fancy into the Limmer, and also that it was necessary that Parthenia was to dresse her self, to the end he might draw her whole Picture. But whilst Amaxita was making choice of such Jewels and clothes as she desired Parthenia to wear that day, Timantes not knowing whither he was carryed, left the conduct of himself to the Prince Philoxipes, and the Princess Policrite; Antimaques made one in this voyage as well as Dorida, and I had the honour to be there also, Philoxipes knowing by my Sister, that I was a confident in the businesse. But, Sir, the more melancholly Timantes was, the more inclination had Philoxipes and Policrite to be merry, being more fully perswaded that he was the man whom the gods had reserved for a happinesse unto the Princesse of Salamis, since it is hardly possible without some spe|ciall order of divine providence, that Timantes should love Parthenia in so odde a way. In the mean time this gallant company went on, and came at last so near that Desart of the Princesse of Salamis, that Timantes coming out of a deep study, asked whose house that was, and whither it was they went unto. It is the same that we goe unto, said Philoxipes, but you shall not know whose it is, untill you have seen her who will entertain us. Timantes was so deep in his melancholy, that he never minded this indirect answer, or had any suspicion. We came unto the Base Court of the Castle, and then went on foot: Timantes led Policrite, and Antimaques Dorida: As for Philoxipes, he told the Princesse his Wife, and Timantes, he would goe before, and acquaint them they were come; so that commanding me to follow him, we went befor unto Parthenia's chamber, who had newly done dressing her self, and who being told by some of her servants that the Prince her Brother, and Princesse her Sister was come, she was coming in hast to entertain them: So that Philoxipes giving her his hand after he had saluted her, he did not oppose her civility which she intended unto Policrite, but led her unto the midst of the outer room where they met. Sir, it is a most difficult matter to relate how Timantes was amazed when he saw the Princess of Salamis appear, whom hee knew at first, though he never saw her but once before; and how the Princess of Salamis was Page 67 surprised when she saw Timantes, who knew assoon as ever she spoke that his unknown Mistresse and she were one and the same; certainly this adventure was full of wonder, at the very first Parthenia blusht: and in lieu of advancing towards Policrite, she thought to stop; Timantes did the same, and never were two persons of such spirits as they so planet-struck with amazement; yet Timantes amidst his wonder, had some glimps of joy aswell as sorrow, the first of these, because the beauty of Parthenia made such a print in his heart, as he could not but joy at the sight of suth a beauty; the second, because as things stood between him and his unknown Mistresse, he feared left this visit would ruine him in her opinion. But when Parthenia was a little recollected from her first astonishment, and with much adoe was able to tell Policrite she was glad to see her, Timantes fell into a second fit of wonder, much greater then the first; for Parthenia had no sooner pronounced four words, but he perfectly knew her voice, and made no question in the world but that she was his unknown Mistress: but yet this last amazement was much different from the first: for he was beyond all expectation joyed to find, that all he loved in two persons were conjoynd in one, and that his unknown Mistresse and Parthenia were one and the same, the motions of his heart did beat in his eyes; joy danced in his looks, and he had much adoe to hinder his expressions of it; especially when Policrite having ended her owne complements, presented him unto Parthenia, who saluted him civilly, but yet very faintly; for since she was ignorant

how Timantes was compelled to come unto her, she thought that since he was so jocund after such a letter as she sent him, that he did not love her; so that though she was not uncivil, yet he observed she was angry: Also she was so ashamed, that Timantes should know her, that she could no longer hide her selfe from him, and that it was no obligation in her, the making her selfe known unto him, that all her thoughts were so intangled and confused, that she knew not what to doe or think, yet she imagined there was some secret designe or other in this visit, and she suspected that Amaxita had revealed her secret; she looked earnestly in her eyes to find in them a confirmation of her suspition, but she could not discover any thing by them. In the mean while Philoxipes began to chide his sister and laugh, because she was not sufficiently joyed at the sight of Policrite, and because of her incivility in not thanking her for bringing to her the bravest and most gallant man in the world, in bringing Timantes: I beleeeve, said she unto her, that the Princesse my sister is so well perswaded of my affection, as she will not doubt but I am ravished with joy to see her, and as for this illustrious stranger (added she and blushed) I think he hath so little cause to thank you for bringing him hither, as I have not so much interest in him, as to thank you my selfe for him. I assure you Madam (replied Timantes, and looked upon her with equall love and joy) I think my selfe so happy in the honour of seeing you this day, that if you had any interest in me, you would render abundance of thanks for me unto the Prince Philoxipes, and so much the more (said he, thinking to justifie himselfe, and not thinking that the company took any notice) because the Prince Philoxipes forced that happinesse upon me, in compelling me to come hither, where I should have feared to disturb your solitude. After this Parthenia brought all this good company into her chamber, her mind being as full of various thoughts, as the mind of Tilmantes, whose eyes were still fixed upon hers, and she on the contrary durst not look upon him, but shunned his looks as much as she could: In the meane while Philoxipes and Policrite, asked her how it came to passe she was so finely dressed in a desert, and afterward chid her for coming nere Paphos, and never sending to see how they did; and thus the time was spent untill dinner. But as Timantes did burn with desire to tell his adored unknown Mistresse that he knew her, so he watched the opportunity (whilst Philoxipes and Policrite were talking of the best expedients to get Parthenia's consen• unto their desires) to addresse himselfe unto her, and to talk with her when none heard. Why Madam, said he unto her, have you so long eclipsed the greatest beauty in the World? why would you rather put it to hazard then your owne will that I should see you? The last letter which your unknown Mistresse writ unto you (said she unto him) has so little reached your hart, that I cannot tell whether her acquaintance with you, will be so pleasing as you imagine; or whether the consolation which you look for from the Princesse of Salamis will be so great as you hoped: it was not she whom you saw at the Temple, but she whom you saw at Paphos, whom I desired you should love. Tilmantes hearing Parthenia say so, protested that he never intended to come and see her but that the Prince Philoxipes had deceived him, and forced him to come whether he would or no, and that she might observe by his negligent habit, that he had no such intentions when he rose in the morning. The truth is Sir, he set all his Rhetorick upon the rack for arguments to perswade her, and make her beleeeve, that he had no intention of seeing the Princesse of Salamis, and said asmuch as if he were to justifie himselfe for intending a visit unto her most Page 68 mortall enemy, or as if his unknown Mistresse and the Princesse of Salamis were not all one person: and he was in a faire way to make his peace, when Philoxipes and Policrite came towards them; Philoxipes taking Parthenia aside to talk with her in private, and Policrite to talk with Timantes. But Sir, why should I so longe hinder you from knowing the good fortune and happinesse of these two lovers, which is a happy Omen of your owne? Therefore let me tell you without making any particularities, that Philoxipes let the Princesse of Salamis understand, that he knew how Timantes loved her, and she made no difficulty to confesse she did not hate him. Afterwards he made it apparent unto her, that the Oracles were accomplished, since Timantes loved her without the influence of her beauty, and he perswaded her to put the fidelity of Timantes unto no further tryalls, protest[ing] unto her, that he durst answer for his constancy. On the other side; Policrite told Timantes, that Philoxipes knew of his passion and approved of it. Thus were all things so prosperously transacted, that it was resolved upon before Philoxipes returned unto Paphos, Antimaques should return to Crete to procure the consent of Timantes his Father. In the mean time, left solitude should infuse fresh scruples, and more fantastical thoughts in Parthenia, Philoxipes would have Policrite carry her unto his stately house of Claria, and there continue with her before she returned to Court. In conclusion, Sir, all things were happily composed; Parthenia pardoned Amaxita for revealing her secret: Timantes rendered a million of thanks to the Prince Philoxipes, and was infinitely more in love with Parthenia then before, but durst not tell her as much, lest she should thinke he loved her beauty more then her soul. Antimaques returned with the consent of Timantes his Father; and to recompence his pains a match was made up between him and Dorida, and they were married eight dayes after Timantes and Parthenia. I shall not trouble you, Sir, with a relation of the great rejoycings in Paphos, for you are not concerned in them, onely let mee tell you this, Sir, that never were two so happy as Timantes and Parthenia; and to let this Princesse see he loved her above Parents, Country, and and all the world, he would not goe into Crete, but resolved to dwell in Cyprus. The King, for Philoxipes his sake, conferred uppon him the Government of one of the principall parts of the Isle: So that Parthenia found a full accomplishment of her joyes, insomuch, as you, Sir, have reason to hope, that the same gods who declared her happinesse and yours at the same time, would produce the same happy events unto you, Sir, as unto her. Also it was the Prince Philoxipes his pleasure, that I should come and acquaint you with the happy conclusion of this adventure, that you might with greater hopes wait for a happy end of all your misfortunes, and for an accomplishment of your felicity, which he desires with all his heart, and wishes with as much zeal as he doth his own. Megasides having ended his story, Cyrus expressed a thousand thanks to the Prince Philoxipes for the hopes he gave him of an end unto his miseries; and thanking Megasides in particular for his exact relation of this pleasant adventure, he thought he had good reason to hope, that since the Gods had made Parthenia so happy so odde a way, they would also make him happy after all his miseries. After this Cyrus asked Leontidas where he met with Megasides, and he was answered, at Milete; then he dismissed them, assuring Megasides and Leontidas, that he would take orders for their dispatch, as soon as he had taken a little rest. But they both beseeched him to give them so much leave as to stay and see the end of the Siege of Sardis: Leontidas importuning him to send his orders unto Thrasibulus by some other; and Megasides desired he might not return unto Cyprus but with news of a new Victory, to the end he might be more joyfully welcomed by Philoxipes. Cyrus consented unto their requests, and giving them both thanks and commendations, he bad them retire unto their rest, being himself in more quietness of spirit then he was the day before; for though the Oracle of Babylon did threaten him; and the Sybill declared sad things unto him, yet since Venus Urania spoke him fair, he did not so sadly resent the rest, nor despaired of happinesse, since he might as well beleeeve the one as the other. Thus this news did invigorate his spirits amidst his sufferings: He had fresh hopes of happy success in his siege of Sardis, and hoped also that the unjust jealousie of Mandana would shortly end: So that after he had given some Military orders, he refreshed himself with two or three hours of sound serene sleep: His Dreames also which used to be horrid, now smiled upon him, and he saw Mandana, and Mandana not jealous nor angry: He thought he saw her sitting in an Arbour set round with Flowers, and that she called him with as much sweetness in her voice as in her eyes; but as he was going unto her, and ready to kneel unto his Princesse, he thought he heard a great noise, which made her vanish, and him awake, very sorry he could no longer enjoy so fair and sweet a vision.

ARTAMENES, OR, CYRVS the GREAT. THE SIXTH PART. BOOK II.

CYRUS, as soon as he was awake, begun to think how he might turn his pleasing dreames into reall enjoyments of Mandana, but since that could not be, unlesse Sardis were taken; the getting of that famous Town was the object of all his wishes and thoughts. Never was this victorious Prince so greedy of Conquest as at this time. Nor did he neglect any thing that might further his design, but did so often hazard his life at that Siege, that if Fortune had not had a greater care of his life then himself, his Rivals had triumphed over his ruin without any quarrell among themselves. But this Prince was so powerfully protected by heaven, to fall in so just a war, though those who judge of things according to appearances, and consider not that the secrets of So[vereign] power are inscrutable, did think him to be forsaken. Mean while, the cessation of hostility, untill the dead of both sides were brought off, being ended, both the Assaulters and the Assaulted began both to use all endeavours to compass their desired ends. Cyrus attempted to raise another Sconce under the Counterscarp of the Ditch, opposite unto that which he made before; to the end that when he made a second Assault, this might facilitate his design; and that when he was Master of two Passes over the Ditch, he might make a scalado in two several places at once without the losse of many men: Yet this was not done without a Councell of War: But since this Prince never propounded any thing without deep judgement, and which was not advantageous to the common cause, both his Friends and his Rivals were forced alwayes to approve of what he said: Yet would the King of Assyria sometimes oppose him out of pure obstinacy: And if the wisdom and prudence of Mazares had not sometimes interposed, and tempered the violence of the Assyrian Prince, perhaps the combat between Cyrus and him would have been fought before the War, and by consequence before Mandana was at liberty: For so was the condition between Cyrus and this Prince, to put to hazard that in a single Duell which he had wonne, and so justly merited by so many generall Combats, by the taking of so many Towns, by the conquest of so many Provinces and Kingdomes, and by the winning of so many Battels. 'Tis true, all the Friends of Cyrus had an observant eye over them; and more true, that Cyrus himself had sometimes pitty upon this Prince, who without all doubt had many excellent qualities: For when he considered, Page 68 <1 page duplicate> Page 69 <1 page duplicate> Page 70 how he was a great King, that he had lost a great Kingdom, and the prime Town in the World, and that the Violence of his passion, forced him to serve in the Army of his conqueror and rivall, and also enemy, that he was certainly hated of Mandana, he excused his imperfections and weaknesses, and deferred his revenge untill after Mandana's releasment when he might with honour take it; yet would he augment his sorrowes, by letting him know what the Oracle of Venus-Vrania had said in his commendations, that he might have lesse confidence in that which he received from Jupiter-Belus at Babylon. It was not only envie to take all hopes from a rivall, which moved Cyrus to publish this Oracle, but as his reason why he would not divulge the sad answer of the Sybill, was, because he would not dishearten his souldiers: so on the contrary, he desired they should know this Oracle, that it might invigorate their spirits, and give them fresh hearts to fight, knowing well that hopes of Victory in a Souldier is a Batttle more then halfe wonne. But since his modesty would not permit him to offer any prophanation, by altering any thing which the Gods had said, he desired Megasides and Leontidas to leave out what the Oracle of Venus-Vrania had spoken in his commendations, and to publish only what related unto an end of his miseries: For though this Oracle did not positively say that Cyrus should take Sardis, that he should release Mandana, and vanquish all his Rivals; yet since they told him to be happy, these things must consequently ensue, since most certainly he could never be happy without Mandana, and he could never get Mandana without a conquest of his Rivals and enemies; therefore by necessary inference, he was to obtaine this victory, before he could enjoy this Princesse. This Oracle then was no sooner published by Megasides, and principally by Leontidas, who was acquainted with all the officers in the Army, but it produced those effects which Cyrus expected; fresh valour was infused into all his troops, and new sorrowes seised upon the King of Assyria's heart; all the mountainous hopes he had in the promises of Jupiter-Belus began to shrink into Mole-hills, by reason of this Oracle; but since he thought that by murmuring against the Gods would but the more incense them, he was silently hushed, and hated Cyrus the more, though he did not lesse esteeme him. As for Mazares, since he expected nothing but misery, his reason did surmount his passion, and he had no other hopes but to participate with Cyrus in the danger and glory of releasing Mandana, and therefore these promises of the Gods unto Cyrus, the King of Assyria did little fret his heart: 'tis true, he was alwayes so miserable, that Fortune could hardly be more incensed against him then she was, but since he was not lesse prudent then unfortunate, nor lesse generous then prudent, Cyrus began to esteeme him infinitely, and keep close society with him; both of them did complain unto each other of the King of Assyria's violent humor, and at last did so accustom themselves unto civility, that they did not only esteeme, but think each other worthy of Mandana; yet they never spake of her but sighed, and as they went from quarter to quarter, visiting the gards which Cyrus kept upon all the advuenes of Sardis, Mandana was the only object of their discourse, unlesse when they were obliged to speak of something which related unto the Siege. How are you Sir, would Mazares say unto him, in being not only loved by the most glorious Princesse of the world, but also in never having done any thing which might displease her; I wish unto the heavens, that since it was my bitter fate to be hated, that it might be unjustly, and that I could not upbraid my selfe with meriting her hate, by my deceiving her, and carrying her away from Sinope. There is both so much love, and prudence, and generosity, in your expressions Sir, replied Cyrus, that I would not have my Princesse heare

you. No, no, Sir (said Mazares sadly) never feare the Princesse Mandana, since she has slighted the King of Assyria for you, and since she had rather see all Asia in armes then you unfaithfull; since she has held out against all the submissive attempts of the Pontean King; and has hated me so far, as to deny that liberty which I offered her, you may well be confident, that nothing will alter the constant heart of that Princesse. Whilst Mazares was talking thus, Cyrus hearkened and sighed, seeing him to be more miserable then he thought him; nor would he acquaint him with his condition in Mandana's thoughts, lest he should revive some hopes in the heart of his generous Rivall, and kindle that fire which was not quite extinguished. In the meane time Cyrus neglected not the erecting of that sconce which he intended, and was resolved upon by the councill of War, but it was not done without much difficulty; for the King of Pontus knowing the importance of it, did sally out three times upon them; yet Cyrus knowing well that one of the greatest secrets in War is, never to quit the first design for a second, because then sudden orders can never be so prudently given, nor punctually executed, as those which are deliberately pondered, therefore he com[m]anded this sconce to be prosecuted with all the power he had; and since his army was numelrous, Page 71 he thought that let the Enemies make what Sallies they could, he was able to beat them in again. The King of Assyria, the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircama, had each their severall Quarters to make good; and the Stranger Anaxaris fought that day next Cyrus, he thinking it a sufficient recompence of his Valour, to have this Renowned Heroe a witness of it: And it must be acknowledged, that as the commendations of Cyrus was noble Rewards for the Acts of Anaxaris, so the Acts of Anaxaris did deserve the commendations of Cylrus. Amongst all the rest of his bravery during this Siege, that erecting of this Sconce was one of the most remarkable; for he did such things as could never be equalled by any but by the valour of Cyrus onely, who questionlesse upon this occasion did such things as can hardly be related without suspicion of truth. Above twenty times was he beaten off by the enemy, and as often did he repulse them into the town, he lost and regained that quarter of the ditch where he intended the Sconce; but at last he wearied his enemies, and perfected his designe: The Sallies which the besieged made in other places did thrive no better: Cyrus sustained some loss of men, but not comparable to his Enemies: Araspes, who since the death of Panthea did sigh out a life of sorrows, was wounded at this bout, where he fought more with design to die then vanquish, but so it did not prove, for there was no mortality in the wound he receiv'd, but was rather a means to save his life then to put it in danger. The King of Assyria was in thoughts of death also at this time: But the advantage was clear on Cyrus his side: For he had finished his sconce, he had killed many Lydians, and took abundance of prisoners. Hee understood from some of them after the Fight was ended, and he returned to his Tent, that the King of Pontus to keep up the people, told them of great Relief to come from Thrace, that the Bactrians also would send Auxiliaries, and that ere long Cyrus would be forced to raise the Siege. He understood from them also more certainly then before, that Croesus had no power in the Cittadell, and that the King of Pontus had so tampered, that he was absolute master of the Souldiery. These Prisoners also told him, how there came a Lady late unto the Cittadell, unto whom the King of Pontus moved Croesus to give protection. How could this Lady, said Cyrus, get into Sardis, since it is compassed about with two hundred thousand men? No, Sir, said one of those prisoners, she came in before unknown for whom shee was, though they say she is of some great Quality. There is also a man, whose name is Helracleon (who is a most gallant man) that promisetht Croesus to bring great succours unto him: They say also, that he has been long in Sardis concealed; but I can give no further satisfacti[on] in the adventure, onely this, that he is a man of some great Quality. After this Cyrus retired, and most part of these prisoners took up arms under him. The day following, those Deputies which Leontidas spoke of, arrived, and in the name of the people who sent them, did swear inviolable fidelity to him. They came from Gnide, from Cavia, from the Territories of Xanthes, and from Licia; the Cauniens also, and the Melesians sent their Deputies, so that Fortune smiled upon Cyrus from all sides. And truly, if ambition onely had been his aim, and if glory onely had been his wish, he had full cause of contentment; but since Love onely was the engine of his soul, he relished nothing but what conduced to Mandana's releasment, and he would freely have quitted all his Conquests upon that condition. However he received all these Deputies with much sweetnesse, and treated them most magnificently. He assured them of protection against all their enemies; and told them he would so mediate the matter with Ciaxares, as he should look upon them like antient and faithful Subjects. In conclusion, they were so charmed with his sweet expressions, that he made himself as much a Master of their hearts by his sweetnesse, as he had made himself Master of their Country by force of Arms. Their greatest admiration was, to see a Prince so young, so expert in all their Cujstomes and Laws, and able to give them as sound advice in the management of publike affairs, as if he had been brought up amongst them, and had nothing to doe but govern them: He spoke unto them all in their severall Languages, and filled them all so full of wonder, that they returned not onely charmed with his presence, his spirit, his virtue, and his sweetnesse, but also with his gifts, and went with resolutions to incite their Citizens unto some act which might redound unto the glory of Cyrus: And they did constitute every year for ever a day of thanks to be rendered unto the gods for bringing them under the power of Cyrus. In the mean while to testifie more confidence in the people which expressed so much affection, he confirmed all their Laws and Priviledges, remitted unto them all Tributes, and required nothing from them but assurances of unalterable fidelity: Calling back the Army which Thrasibulus, and Hargapus commanded; sent orders for the first of these to march with them unto him, and leaving the other in the arms of his dear Aleionida: And though Cyrus was so well versed in the Politiques, as that he knew it contrary to custom to draw off his Army so soon from a Page 72 new conquered Country; yet since this Lydian War was the main hinge upon which all the rest moved, and since he left Garrisons in some places of greatest strength, he did not think the hazard was great, but thought it better to fortifie his own Forces; not knowing how long the Siege might last; and knowing that the taking of so great a Town as Sardis, might require as great an Army as his. However, Cyrus neglected nothing, he sent to see how Selsostris recovered, who was so well, that he sent Cyrus word, he should ere long come and halazard that life in his service which he had preserved. Cyrus also sent a complement to the Princesse Araminta, and was as good as his word in not suffering Phraartes to come unto her during the Siege: nor did he forget Cleonice and Doralisa, nor any of the Lady Prisoners: But though he did most gloriously acquit himself of all he had to doe, either as a Lover, or as a Friend, or as an Enemy, or as a Prince, or as the Generall of an Army, or as a Conquerour, yet Mandana's unjust charging him with infidelity, did grate upon his very heart: and as oft as this angry thought came into his mind, he thought also he had some reason to fear her constancy: Since commonly those who lightly suspect others are guilty themselves: yet did he presently repent of such a thought, which had much more troubled him, if he had not received intelligence that the people of Sardis began to consider that their riches would not fill their bellies, and that there was likelihood of a hungry sedition to rise amongst them, so that their Town would be thereby more pregnable: And indeed there was great probability of it, though Croesus, and the King of Pontus did all they could, the one to save his Crown, the other his Mistris; but they were in extream fears of both: Yet lest the people should despair, they concealed their fears, and divulged that Relief was coming; that the Army of Cyrus wasted every day, and that he would in a short time be forced to raise his Siege: That the people which he had conquered did revolt, and consequently he would not be in any condition of new Conquests. Moreover the King of Pontus gave out, that Cyrus did not now care for Mandana who was the cause of the War, but that he was in love with the Princesse Araminta; so that within this short time all would be made good friends: So that these reports being divulged, the people suffered their miseries more patiently, in hopes ere long to see an end of them. The King of Pontus also received another advantage; for this report coming out of the Town into the Cittadell, and from the mouthes of the people unto the Souldiers: So that Mandana's women heard what was talked in Sardis: the Guards told them aloud (thinking it would bee welcome newes that they should ere long come out of prison) that the Peace was almost concluded between the King of Pontus and Cyrus; adding, that the first of these was to marry Mandana, and Cyrus Araminta. Mar[tesia] did not credit these reports, though they confirmed Mandana's Jealousie; and though they made no impression in the spirit of Martesia, yet they did in Areatina, who told all she heard unto a woman belonging to the Princesse Palmis, and in so loud a voice as Mandana in the next room over-heard her: It did so surprise her, that the Princesse of Lydia who was with her, did ask her, why she did so suddenly change her colour? Mandana being one who loved not to confesse her own weaknesse; but what confidence soever she had in the discretion of the Princesse Palmis, yet she concealed her jealousy; but now seeing it was become publike talk, she resolved to acquaint her, desiring leave first to ask Ariamta where she had these reports. Arianita being surprised that Mandana should over-hear her, would have denied her words; but Mandana told her absolutely she did speak them, and she would know the truth; so that at last she told her all. These two Princes then retiring themselves: For my part, said the Princesse Palmis, I cannot find any reason why you should fear that this talk of the Guards should be true: For is it probable or credible, that the greatest Prince in the world should be capable of so much unworthinesse? Though he were perfideous, and could not preserve his heart, yet certainly he would never make conditions of peace by disposing of you, but would set you at liberty: He may perhaps restore the Kingdom of Pontus unto the Brother of his new Mistris, but has nothing to doe in the disposing of the King of Medes Daughter, whose Army he commands; and therefore I am confident Cyrus is innocent, and these reports of the Guards are onely those vain popularities which such kind of people usually vent, though there be no appearance of truth in them. No, no, Madam (replied Mandana sadly) the news is not all false, nor doe I think it all true: I doe not think the perfidie of Cyrus so high as to make his conditions of peace with me: Yet certainly he loves not me, but the Princesse Araminta; and I must confesse that I have such probable conjectures of his crime, that I doe not doubt it. I confesse also I have concealed my suspicions from you, because I could not possesse you so soon with an ill opinion of that man whom I had so highly commended unto you. But I pray you (said the Princesse Palmis) what proofs have you Page 73 of Cyrus his inconstancy, who hath testified so many signes of unalterable constancy? and done more for you, then any did for any? Be pleased to know, replied she, that a while before the King of Pontus went to fight the Battle which he lost, he came into my Chamber with more glimps of joy in his face then usually: Madam (said he unto me) I beseech you pardon me, if I acquaint you with a thing, which doubtlesse will not please you, but since it concerns you no lesse then me, I think it my duty to let you know it. Sir, said I unto him and sighed, you have so accustomed me to ill newes since I have been in your power, that though you should tell me any thing which will not please, yet I shall heare it. I think Madam, said he unto her, that it will displease you to heare that Cyrus whom you preferre before all the Princes in the World, and who indeed does merit all his glory, hath preferred one before you, that is inferior to you in all things: I doe not desire Madam you should beleeeve me, but beleeeve your owne eyes. After this he gave me a letter, telling me it was from the Princess his sister, and which indeed was so; adding, that it was taken from a man who was taken prisoner. But Madam, said Mandana, that you may see what cause I have to suspect and grieve, I pray you read this letter from the Princesse Araminta, which the King of Pontus left with me; I need not tell you how this Princesse was in love with Spitridates, sonne to Arsomenes King of Bithynia; nor need I tell you, how Spitridates does wonderfully resemble Cyrus; for persons of your quality and wisdom know all these adventures: After this, Mandana did give the Princesse Araminta's letter unto the Princesse Palmis, and the King of Pontus finding in it matter enough to make Mandana jealous, resolved to give it unto her, thereby to poison her opinion of Cyrus, and the Princess Palmis opening this letter found these words.

ARAMINTA, unto SPITRIDATES.

SIR,

I Conceive you have reason of wonder, to see one whom you have driven to the necessity of justifying her selfe, almost confesse all things that you can accuse her of: In the meane time I cannot deny, but that I am extreemly obliged unto the illustrious Cyrus, who hath had more respect of me, then ever conqueror had of a captive, and that I have as much of him, looking upon him as the greatest Prince in the world, and the most glorious conqueror: Nor can I deny, but he does wonderfully resemble you, and that the sight of him does extreemly delight me. After all this, I wonder you should write unto me, that it should be reported I have conquered the conqueror of all Asia, and that my heart is his most illustrious conquest; for considering all I have done for you, this is extream injustice, there was no necessity that you should tell me, that before you were in prison, you heard of his respects unto me and to him, for I confesse it; & lesse need to writ unto me how they report a hundred particular passages 'twixt him and me, for you cannot do it without a wrong unto me. Return Spitridates, return, & render your selfe worthy of my justification, repent of your accusation: 'Tis true, I cannot much grieve, since the taking of Sardis will let you know what the designes of Cyrus and my selfe are. I doe not say this Prince hath promised to set you at liberty, for you will perhaps think he would not doe it, but only to recompence you for taking from you one who heretofore was most deere unto you. After this, I have no more to say, but that since it is the voice of the people which accused me, I do expect and wait until the same do let you know I never did any thing which I ought not to do, nor ever had the least thought which I ought not to think, and that I love none but whom I will love unto the death of ARAMINTA.

As soon as the Princesse Palmis had read this Letter, Mandana began to speak. VVell Madam, said she unto her, is it not reason that since the Prince Spitridates is jealous of the Princesse Araminta, I should suspect the fidelity of Cyrus? must there not needs be some truth in that which is so generally spoken both in Bithynia and Lydia, in Chalcidonia & in Sardis? Moreover Madam, I am most certain this is the hand of Araminta, for I have severall times seen hers, when the King of Pontus was a hostage in the King my Fathers Court; so that I cannot think there is an imposture in it: moreover I cannot suspect the King of Pontus of forgerie, for I have seen the servant whom Spitridates sent with the Letter, and he is the very same servant which I preferred unto Cyrus when he went unto Themiscyra: But did this Servant tell you that Cyrus was in love with Araminta? (replied the Princesse Palmis) He did not directly say so (replied she) but he said Cyrus did render as much honour unto Araminta, [Page 74 as if she were at Heraclea, he visited her very often, and held long discourses with her: Moreover, this messenger from Spitridates tells me one thing, which puts me out of doubt that there is a great league of secrecy between Cyrus and Araminta; for he tells me, that when he was brought before Cyrus, and the letters which I had about me presented unto him, he sent it immediately unto Araminta by Chrisantes, not knowing from whence it came, and it was only by Araminta's answer I came to know it was from Spitridates; this messenger had orders to go unto this Princess with Chrisantes, who gave her this Letter directed to her from Cyrus, who was so full of respect unto her, that he sent it unopened, though by the lawes of Warre he might have done it without any incivility. But the better to let you see what this secret business was, the man saies that the Princesse Araminta sent back the Letter of Spitridates unto Cyrus by Chrisantes, with the letter which she writ unto him from her selfe, and that afterward Cyrus sent it back againe with his answer unto her. I beseech you Madam judge whether I need to doubt of the infidelity of Cyrus, for if he were not a lover of Araminta, she would never have sent him Spitridates his Letter, it had been enough if she had sent him word that it concerned no matters of State or Warre. But certainly she intends to sacrifice Spitridates unto Cyrus, and sent his Letter to know of him what she should answer. For all this, said the Princesse Palmis it seemes Araminta would justifie her selfe, since she saies Spitridates hath no cause to be jealous: Alas Madam, replied Mandana, I find more crime in Cyrus, then I do innocency in Araminta, for she does so weakly justifie her selfe, that she seemes rather to prepare Spitridates for her inconstancy, then to cure his jealousy; she confessest almost all he can accuse her of, and deferrs her justification until after the taking of Sardis; never telling him, she will be still his and not the lover of Cyrus; she began to make him hope for liberty, but she ended in telling him, she would love him until death whom she loved at that present, but never tells him whether it be he she loves or no; she might aswell have said, Araminta is inconstant, because she thinks Cyrus more amiable then Spitridates, and more happy; a mixture of ambition with love, is not amiss, and by entertaining the passion of this Prince, she reneweth the Crown in her, and Crowns her own head with all his Lawrells: The truth is Madam, it is not strange that the conqueror of all Asia, should conquer Araminta's heart; and less wonder if I should murmur, that Cyrus should be conquered by a captive Princess, then for her to be moved with the teares of a conqueror: But Madam, it must be confessed his height of injustice in him to forsake me after all this I have done for him, after he hath been the cause of all the miseries in my life; after I have for his sake slighted the greatest Princes in the world, and after I had overcome my own spirit and heart for his sake: Yet Madam it is but too true, that Cyrus has forsaken me, and had rather lose the reward of all his past services, then remain faithfull. Truly Madam, said the Princesse Palmis, me thinks you condemne Cyrus upon no good ground, for though there be some appearances against him, yet they are no convincing proofs; and you ought not to condemne him as a criminal. I beleieve (said Mandana and sighed) that the taking of Sardis will make his crime apparent; and as for this pretended peace, which is talked of unto Araminta, I am confident it is nothing but common brute without ground: However said the Princesse Palmis, deferre your judgment until the end of the Siege, and then you may see the innocency or crime of Cyrus, and indeed it is not safe to censure until then, and then either to thank him for your liberty, or chide him for his inconstancy. Oh, I pray unto the Gods that you may have then so much power with him, as to make him be gentle unto the conquered, as hitherto he hath been. Though I should have no power with him, replied Mandana, yet I am confident he would treat the King your Father very well; but as for matter of chiding, said she, I have already done it: and then Mandana told Palmis how she had writ unto him, and by whom, who was one of those assassins which should have killed Cyrus at the instigation of the coward Artanus, and whom Cyrus did afterwards most generously pardon, when he fell into his power. In the mean time, he never answers me, though the man promised me to return or die: But Mandana's expectations were in vaine; for as cunning as the man was, he was suspected and stayed, so that he could not return to the Cittadell, they searched him whether he had any letters, and found about him that of Cyrus which was most carefully sealed, and Pactias before whom he was brought, sent it immediately unto the King of Pontus: Thus was the unhappy Mandana deprived of the comfort in receiving a letter from Cyrus, which questionless would have convinced her of the error wherein she was; yet was she very happy in having the society of a person so full of spirit and goodness as the Princesse Palmis to comfort her in her miseries, and certainly did retaliate comfort for comfort, yet had they one more addition of sorrowes; for the King of Page 75 Pontus, conceiving another Chamber in the Fort did require fewer Guards, and by consequence more safe, since it is an easier matter to find few, then many faithfull, he would have them removed thither: But since they could only passe into it by a great high Tarrasse, from whence they might discover all about the Town, they had a view of all the Army of Cyrus which were about it; yet as their relations were different, so they turned their looks severall wayes: For Mandana looked towards the besiegers, where she knew Cyrus, though shee thought him unfaithfull; and the Princesse Palmis looked towards that part of the Town where shee knew the Prince Artamas was prisoner, but the love of her Country, her tendernes towards the King her Father, and the Prince Myrsiles, drew some of her tears for them, and for the Prince Artamas: And after she had seriously considered the huge Army which covered all the Plains as far as she could see: Alass (said she, and turned towards Mandana sadly) you have so much comfort, Madam, as to see your Releaser amongst this vast multitude of men. Alass, Madam (replied Mandana) a perfidious Prince shall never be my Deliverer; and I shall have more joy to see the Prince Artamas out of Prison, since he is your Adorer, then to see Cyrus victorious, since he loves not me. The discourse of these two great Princesses was not long; for their Guards would not permit them to be long in that place. So they entered into their new lodgings; and they entered sighing, though she who had the least cause was most sad; but her error was the more excusable, because if she had really lost the heart of her Illustrious Cyrus, she had lost the greatest Jewell in the world. Whilst then this faire and sad Princesse was with so much injustice lamenting her losse, and whilst Croesus was with as much reason trembling at his; whilst the King of Pontus was in despair, and whilst the Prince Artamas endured his prison patiently, Cyrus was thinking of nothing but how to release Mandana: He complained of her Jealousie, but it was with so much reverent respect, as would have been fully satisfied, had she known it. In the mean while, it vexed him to see Sardis hold out longer then he expected; and he resolved upon the losse of many men rather then not to carry it the next Assault: and because he would not receive a baffle, he stayed some dayes until Scaling-ladders were in readinesse. In which interim some design or other was still on foot, either in preventing victuals from coming to the Town, or in cutting off some Water from the enemy; or in repulsing of Sallies which were every day made: The reason which made the King of Pontus so frequent in his Sallies, and hazard so many men in them, was, he would the better pry into the encampment of his Enemies, and spie an opportunity, if need should be, of carrying away the Princesse Mandana: By this meanes also, hee could either send out Spyes into the Army of Cyrus, or else to sollicite for Reliefe. Things standing on these termes, the King of Pontus made a Sallie in the night time on that Quarter where Cyrus commanded in person. At first hee killed many men, fell into the Trenches, and slew all that stood in their way, and gave an Alarm unto all the Camp; but Cyrus did quickly stop their fury by his presence; for his voice was no sooner heard both amongst his own men, and his Enemies, but the one struck with fury, and the other with fear, the Enemy fled, and his men followed so close, that they were ready to enter the Town with them; but so few of the Enemy entered, as since that they had no great mind of making Sallies on Cyrus his side. The Egyptians and Medes being upon the Guard that night, had their share in the glory of that Action; who yet were beholding to Cyrus for their valour, who being as sweet after victory, as valiant in fighting, had a great care of all wounded men as well friends as enemies, and so much the rather, because he understood that there was an Egyptian of quality taken prisoner, who before hee rendred himself, did so gallantly dispute for his liberty, as he was wounded in severall places, and yet fought till he fell from his Horse, so was forced to yeeld. Cyrus enquired his name in the presence of many Egyptian Officers about him; but they knew not, and were extreemly impatient to know whom this valiant man of their Nation should be: But when they heard his name was Heracleon, they could not chuse but murmur amongst themselves, & seem astonished, especially when they heard afterwards that Cyrus commanded that a great care should be had of him, and placed him in one of his own Tents. There was an Egyptian Officer whose name was Miris, could not hold from grumbling at this indulgency of Cyrus to him. Oh, Sir, said he, be not so sweet as to preserve the life of the most wicked man upon earth, infinitely unworthy the protection of so virtuous a Prince. If he be such a one as you say, replied Cyrus, the Gods will punish him without me. But who is this Heracleon? Sir, replied Miris, he is a man most unworthy of his birth, which indeed is noble: He is a Rival to the generous Sesostris, he is an Enemy to his Country, an Assassin of Kings, and a man whose love and ambition prompts unto all imaginable villanies: Therefore I conjure Page 76 you, as you tender the interest of Sesostris, to command he be lesse esteemed, and more carefully guarded lest he escape, or kill himself when he sees he's known: For, Sir, it doth much import Sesostris, since Heracleon is in your power, that this wretch doe not dye, before he let him know that which he onely can inform him. Cyrus having observed that Sesostris loved Miris very well, did hearken unto him, and commanded that Heracleon should be carefully guarded, that his words should be carefully observed: commanding also, at the request of Miris, that an account be given of his wounds, to the end, that if he be in danger, he may be moved to confesse what concerned the Prince Sesostris: However, Sir, said Miris, I beseech you as you respect the interest of this great Prince, Sir, to let mee have two houres discourse and audience, as soon as conveniently you can; that I may acquaint you, how it concerns Sesostris to know what onely Heracleon can tell him, and that you may know also what difference to put between these two Rivals; for since I most exactly know all passages between them, and since the Prince Sesostris commanded me to acquaint you with it as soon as I met with a favourable opportunity, I should be exceedingly glad since you have his ene[my] in your hands, to acquaint you with his adventures. The story will extreemly please (replied Cyrus) for ever since the first I saw Sesostris, I have had a great desire to know his fortunes; therefore I promise you to manage my matters so, as I will find some hours of audience before I sleep; and indeed Cyrus was as good as his word; for after he had spent all the rest of that day, and the beginning of the night in giving orders, he retired something sooner then ordinary: Yet first he understood, that at the first Heracleon would hardly suffer himself to be dressed, and raved as if he had been mad, but at last he suffered his wounds to be dressed, which proved very dangerous, yet not impossible to be healed; and though they were not, yet it would be long ere he dyed of them. At last Cyrus sent for Miris to give him audience, conjuring him to make an exact relation of Sesostris his life: For, said Cyrus, your hints concerning Heracleon makes me desirous to know more, so also there is a secret kind of inclination in me, which makes me to desire a more exact knowledge of his interests. I assure you, Sir, replied Miris you cannot have a greater desire to know, then I have to acquaint you with his adventures. Since so, said Cyrus, let us lose no time in discourse of any thing else. Then Miris, in obedience unto the commands of Cyrus, began thus.

The History of SESOSTRIS and TIMARETA.

SIR,

To inform you rightly concerning Sesostris, and the cause of his misfortunes, I must not onely relate the History of his Life, but his Fathers also; and I must exactly bring in the story of all Egypt in generall, as well as his in particular: So far is the originall and source of his misfortunes fetched. Therefore, I beseech you, Sir, do not wonder if I begin my discourse with things which at first sight seem impertinent unto my discourse, yet by the sequell you shall finde that they are essentially necessary. I beseech you also, Sir, give mee leave to relate many things particularly which Fame doubtlesse hath already brought unto your ears; yet it is impossible you should perfectly understand the adventures which have dependency upon them, since it is not credible your Infancy could be capable of them; nor indeed possible in your riper years, that the Conquerour of all Asia should have so much leisure from his illustrious Conquest, as to enquire of all the passages in Africa. Give me leave to tell you then, Sir, that Sesostris is the sonne of Apriez, that Renowned, but unfornate King, who after a long and happy Reign, brought home so many glorious advantages from the Wars with Tyre and Sidon, was at last thrown out of his Throne. This Apriez boasts of his descent from the Race of the first Sesostris, so famous for his Virtues and Victories: For Psammethicus his great Grandfather was so. 'Tis true, this Prince from whom Apriez descended, was himself sufficiently adorned with glory, without any derivatives from his Predecessors, since it was he who had the honour to defeat eleven Kings, or rather so many Tyrants, which during a vacancie upon the Throne, divided all the Kingdom into so many illegitimate powers. This is, Sir, the extraction of Sesostris: And I know, Sir, you will wonder when I tell you, that Amasis, who this day reigns in Egypt, hath a Son of Apriez, and a Son who commands all the Forces of Amasis, Conqueror of the late King his Father: But, Sir, if you will be pleased to lend as much patience as to hear me, your wonder will vanish, and all that which did seem incredible, will easily be believed. To return then unto the source of Sesostris his misfortunes, it is expedient, as I said before, to acquaint you with the misfortunes of the King his Father; and afterwards tell you how Amasis came unto the Page 77 Throne, for these are the hinges of all the History. I have already told you Sir, how happily Apriez reigned: happy in Wars, happy in peace, and as happy also in his marriage, not only in a Princesse of most admirable beauty and vertue, but also in a sonne born the first year of her marriage: a sonne who from his very cradle seemed to be what you see him at this day; and all the interim of his infancy was full of illustrious hopes. Thus was Apriez the happiest of all the Kings upon Earth, Master of the most abundant of rich Kingdoms in the World; never was Aegypt in sweeter tranquillity, never did the Floods of Nilus make our fields more fertile, and never was the Monarchy more firmly established then it seemed to be at that time: Yet Sir, this Serenity was quickly overclouded; but that you may the better see which way the Gods did bring it about, be pleased to know, that Amasis (who at this day reignes, and whose birth was more noble then his enemies report) was then in the Court, harbouring so much ambition secretly in his heart, as seldome did suffer him to be in rest. There was in the Court at the same time, a Princesse, whose name was Ladice, who had been married, who being a Widdow, obtained the Queenes favour, and consequently the Kings, for it is the custom of Aegypt, that all Husbands doe in generall respect their Wives, and especially Kings their Queenes, grounding this laudable custome upon the excellent example of Osiris, who was infinitely uxorious unto Isis; and this way Ladice, possessing the heart of the Queen, was in great credit with the King; and as those in favour are alwaies looked upon, so Amasis whose spirit was as great as his ambition, perceiving the power which Ladice had with the Queen, began to apply himselfe unto her more then any other, before her favour was much divulged in the world; to the end he might perswade this Princesse, that this was not the reason why he saw her more then he was accustomed: For Amasis being of a penetrating spirit, and knowing the humours both of the Queen and Ladice, though the favours of this Princesse were at first but small in shew, yet he foresaw that undoubtedly they would augment, and therefore to set a better price upon his services, he began betimes to declare himselfe to be a devoted friend unto Ladice: and indeed this Princesse who was extreemly pleased with the spirit of Amasis, was not long before she became his friend as much as he hers, and more, for he loved her because of her favour, and she loved him only in respect of his merit and person. In the mean time, when Amasis saw he was not mistaken in his conjectures, but that Ladice did grow more and more in favour, the better to cloake his ambition, he made the Princesse think he loved her, and so handsomly managed the matter, that she was not angry with him for it: I will not tell you Sir, which way he discovered his passion to her, nor how Ladice accepted it, because I intend not a relation of his or her history: only this, that Ladice being both faire and a favourit, all the men of any quality in the Court, did apply themselves to serve her, so that she neither accepting nor rejecting any of them, she was absolute Mistresse of the hearts, of all the Grandees of Aegypt: and since this Princesse did love the State, she made use of their loves, as well as her beauty and favour, to keep them from any rebellions in the Kingdome, and inseparably to unite them unto the Kings interest: and the truth is, she did negotiate with so much wisdom and generosity, that she merited eternall glory, for she did dissipate severall factions, shattered many confederacies and plots, and reduced them all unto the Kings obedience. In the meane time Amasis, who in the eyes of all the world seemed only the friend of Ladice, did really become her lover, and a lover loved, because she had a belief that he was the only man who loved her, in consideration of her person, and not of her favour, not knowing that his soule was filled fuller of secret ambition, then it was of love: yet did she find some difficulties in the matter, for there was then no suitable proportion between Amasis and his rivals, nor between him and her selfe, yet notwithstanding, since she did most passionately love him, and thought her selfe obliged; and since he courted her with unequalled respects, and had served the King in many occasions with much fidelity, since he got much glory in the Warr with Tyre and Sydon, and since her inclination prompted her to preferre him before all the World, and since her soule was disengaged from all others, she could with more ease overcome all other obstacles, and resolve to marry him, if she could have any infallible assurance that those who then courted her, and whom she kept from disturbing the state, would not renew all their factions, especially at that time when the King was engaged in a warre with the Cyrenians: But Amasis being in great favour, and knowing all her thoughts, and all the impediments of his happinesse, he redoubled his courtship and suit for some further assurances of her affection; for since he saw a necessity of his going to the Warres with the King, and knew that some of his rivals would stay behind with the Queen, he feared lest in his absence Ladice should change her mind, so that seeming desperate, he told her absolutely Page 78 he would not go with the Army, that he had rather lose his honour, then hazard the loss of her affection; and was so resolute in his expressions, that indeed she thought he would not go. However Sir, Ladice loving Amasis very well, and having resolved to marry him assoon as this Warre was ended, this ambitious lover found it no knotty matter to winne her unto a marriage in secret: And indeed Ladices heart being as full of Love, as the heart of this secret lover was full of ambition; a few daies after the Kings departure they were married privily in a little Church, without any other witnesses but the officers of the ceremony, except one of her women in whom she trusted: By this meanes Amasis was in a quality to enjoy the benefit of Ladices favour, which he desired more then the enjoyment of her beauty: However, Amasis went now to the Army, and was husband to the faire Ladice: But to put her selfe into a condition of publishing her marriage after the Warre, she procured the King by the Queenes mediation to make him one of his Lieutenant Generalls, his fidelity and courage being the pretence of her suit, though it seemed something extraordinary to the Queen, yet the Queen condescended unto it. In the meanwhile this Warre wanted a plausible glosse, for it was said Apriez did make it, only to secure the Grandees of his Dominions, lest they should ruffle into a civill Warre; however the beginning was prosperous enough, Amasis performed very considerable services, he won the hearts of the souldiers, and was Master of the Army: whensoever Apriez encountered with his enemies, he baffled them; so that though no main battle had been yet fought, yet there was enough done to get a reputation unto his Army, and strike a terrour into the enemies country. This being the state of things, Apriez gave Amasis the command of ten Thousand men in his Army, with them to assault the enemies upon another side, thereby to separate their Forces, and then more easily to conquer them: but things did not succeed according to his designe, for the Cyrenians would not divide themselves, so that not separating their Army, they did that which Apriez would have done, which was, they forced him to fight and vanquished him: his Army was so absolutely defeated, that he was forced to return unto Sais, where he left his Queen, and where he arrived full of shame and sorrowes; for he had not only lost the Battle, but the loss of Blood was so much, that it put all Aegypt into mourning. Apriez in his return to Sais, sent for Amasis to come unto him, and commanded him to draw off those forces under his command from the enemies country, and keep them upon the frontiers; leaving order unto the other Lieutenant Generalls, to rally as many as they could of his shattered army: Amasis obeying the King, was very glad he had no share in the dishonor in this defeat, and that he was able to tell Ladice that he had done nothing unworthy of the honour she did him. In the mean time, the losse of this Battle caused a generall revolt in all Aegypt, both people and souldiers began to murmur, and an universall report went all over, that Apriez did suffer himselfe voluntarily to be vanquished; that he divided his army purposely to ruine some Grandees of his dominions, whom he thought did trouble him, hoping after that to reign more imperiously over them, and become more Tyrannicall. However Sir, whether the Souldiers spoke this from themselves, or from the instigation of Amasis; it is most certaine, that all the rallied troopes, with those which Amasis brought upon the frontiers, did seem to revolt, and make head against their Prince: Apriez no sooner heard this, but to calme this mutiny, resolved to send Amasis to the army, looking upon him as a plausible man with the souldiers, and faithfull unto him. Amasis accepting of this commission, prepared to go unto the Army; but before he went, Ladice used all her perswasions and arguments which could move him to doe the King and his country good service upon this occasion; adding unto all her prayers, that if he could at this time pacifie the Army, and by consequence all Aegypt, she would then acquaint both the King and the Queen with her marriage, who could not possibly disapprove of it, after such a considerable service. But Sir, since Amasis married Ladice more for ambition then love, he could not keep within those limits which this generous Princesse prescribed him: yet when he came first unto the Army, he began to doe like a faithfull subject; and I am perswaded, where his enemies say, that then he had none but good intentions, and as ambitious as he was, would have made himselfe a fortune by noble waies: He drew up all his Army into Battallia, and calling all the officers together he shewed them their fault, and the injustice of their proceedings. But whilst he was thus speaking unto them, an Egyptian took a Helmet, and putting it upon the head of Amasis as is used at the coronation of our Kings; let me put thee into the possession of the Kingdome of Aegypt (said the souldier unto him) and talk no more to us of obeying Apriez, for we will not have a King that hath been conquered. The insolent speech of this souldier, being prompted unto it by many others, was seconded by a generall acclamation; so that Amasis Page 79 saw it was in his choice whether he would be King or no. This rousing up the ambition of his soul, he consulted not with generosity, or reason, or glory, which forbids any to reigne by unjust wayes, but did blindly, and totally submit unto his ambition: Yet at first hee rejected the proposition, but yet so faintly, and after such a manner as made all the Souldiers second their acclamations, and say Amasis must be their Sovereign. Then, Sir, Amasis began to speak as a man who was forced to receive the Sovereign power, yet he would not directly take upon him the Quality of a King; but told them that to acknowledge their confidence in him, he would be their Protector, and promised never to leave them untill he had obtained their pardon, and also new Priviledges: But the more Amasis excused himself, the more violent were all the Officers and Souldiers, who all unanimously said they would have him to be their King. However Amasis dispatched a messenger to the Court, and to let Apriez know how sorry he was for this accident; assuring him, that he would not seem to accept of any part of this power which the Souldiers gave him, but only to reduce them unto obedience: But at the same time he sent one of his servants secretly unto the Princesse Ladice, conjuring her to retire from the Court, and to come and receive a Crown which the Gods by his hand did offer her. In the mean time the King was advertised by some faithfull Officers of the Army how things passed, and hee grew into such a choler against Amasis, that in lieu of dissembling his resentments, he railed against him as a Rebelle, and dispatched a man of good Quality, named Paterbenis with orders to joyn with some few Officers who were faithfull, and to seize upon the person of Amasis, or else kill him if they could not take him. On the other side, Ladice, who was truly generous, and did extreemly disapprove of this manner of acting, though she did extreemly love Amasis, yet she sent him word, that she was so farre from removing away from the Court, or participating of his Crime, as she would declare, that if he did not quickly return unto his duty, she would become his most mortall Enemy: Yet did she endeavour to glosse the matter at Court as much as she could; but all in vaine: for Apriez being resolved already upon his course, dispatched Paterbens with his Commission, yet it took not successe; for as secret as it was carried, Amasis did know it: So that when Paterbenis came to the Camp, he found him he was already acquainted with the businesse of his voyage. When he came unto him, he found him busie in exhorting the Souldiers to draw up into Battalia, and to defend his life which Apriez would take from him by some amongst them. Paterbenis comming to him as Amasis was thus busied, he resolved to speak unto him as if the King did credit all which Amasis told him, and as if he did not suspect his fidelity; to the end he might gaine more time to plot with those Officers of the Army who advertized Apriez of the truth: But Amasis knowing the cause of his coming, gave him no time to talk: No, no, Paterbenis, said he unto him, Dissemble not that which I know as well as your self; You come with intentions to carrie my head unto Apriez, but I cannot beleieve these Souldiers who Crowned it will suffer you; therefore I advise you to return immediately, and tell that Prince who sent you, that if he defend his Crown as well as I shall my head, I shall not be King a long while. Paterbenis would have replied unto this bold language, but there was such an acclamation amongst the Souldiers at the answer of Amasis, as the Messenger saw his best course was to return; for the Souldiers began to threaten him with insolent menaces. Paterbenis then returned to Sais, where Apriez was in his stately Palace which he had newly built; yet he found but faint entertainment from her; for this unfortunate King seeing the ill successe of his voyage, beleieved he did comply with Amasis, so that upon the information of some Souldiers who followed him, who affirmed that if he had stayed a little longer in the Army, there had been a mutiny, he did not onely arrest him, but put him to death. This hasty and violent death did ruin Apriez; for Pater|benis being a man of much integrity and known honesty to all the world, the people of Sais did exceedingly murmur at it. All the friends of Amasis fearing the like treatment from the King, since he was capable of so unjust an act, did take their friends part, and went unto him, and amongst the rest, the Father of Heracleon: So that in lesse then a moneth, Ama|sis had a formidable army which still did every day encrease from all the Provinces of Egypt. In the mean time the heart of Amasis was very restless; love of Ladice did strive with his ambition, yet could not vanquish it, and so much the lesse, because his marriage with her being not known, she was in lesse danger of Apriez his violence; but alas, this unfortunate Princesse was much to be lamented; for she was not only forced to separate from her dearly loved Amasis, but she perceived she was with child, & consequently must tel the Queen (whom she tenderly loved, and who tenderly loved her) that she was Wife to him who would pull her from the Throne. Being put to this extremity, she consulted with all her thoughts and Page 80 endeavours how to winne Amasis unto repentance; and in order to that, she sent to acquaint Amasis with her condition; and after a thousand most tender and perswasive arguments and invitations, she sent to tell him, that if he would not condescend unto her desires, she would acquaint the King how she was his wife, and shared in his crime, and so consequently, the next news he should hear, would doubtlesse be, that hee had lost both a Wife and a Child; since it was not probable, but he who put to death the innocent, would take the same course with the Wife of an Usurper who confessed her self culpable. But all the perswasions and threats of Ladice were in vain: For Amasis did think that the Queen loved her better then to see her perish, and that Ladice was wiser then to accuse her self, and therefore he sent her word, that he thought himself unworthy of that honour which shee had done him, unlesse he pursued his design, and set her upon a Throne. To that end he caused it to be proclaimed, that he was descended from the Line of the first Kings of Egypt, from whom the Predecessors of Apriez had usurped the Sovereign Power: So that to give some colourable glosse to his rotten cause, he made it passe for good, and strengthened himself the more: Apriez, seeing himself forsaken of his own Subjects, and particularly of Heracleons Father, who was a man of great power, made use of some Auxiliary Forces; The Ionians, the Carians, and some o|ther Asiatique people, raised him thirty thousand men; so that being in the head of this ar|my, he went out of Sais with resolutions to fight. One thing is here observable, which ne|ver perhaps was seen before; the right King of Egypt had not one Egyptian in his army, which was composed all of Strangers; and on the contrary, all the army of the Usurper was composed of naturall Subjects, who fought against their right King. In the mean time the mise|rable Ladice having not power to execute the message shee sent unto Amasis, hoping still to move his heart, she remained in unconceivable sorrows: for she knew, that had not she been a Mediator for him, he could never have arrived at that passe: So that looking upon her selfe as the onely cause of his crime, of her Countries desolation, and of the States ruin, there was not a day but she desired death. Nor did she know what she should ask from the gods: But ever refigning her self unto their will, she waited for the successe of War with more restles|nesse of mind then did the Queen. Sesostris her onely sonne was then some four or five years old, but his innocency could not prevent the Fate of his Father, for the more unjust side was the more fortunate: But not to stay you too long, Sir, in this part of my story, I shall onely in a few words tell you, how the Army of Apriez, and that of Amasis joyning near Mem|phis, where those high aspiring Pyramids look over all the rest of Egypt, this fatall Battle to Apriez was lost: At the first encounter he was wounded, and a while after taken; and lastly, in a most strange manner, lost his life: for those into whose hands he fell, disagreeing who should have the honour of presenting him unto Amasis, did quarrell amongst themselves amidst a Battle, and that with so much rage and fury, that one of them thinking his side the weaker, did desperately turn towards this unfortunate King who stood in the midst of them, and with an unexampled inhumanity killed him, rather then his companions should enjoy that advantage which he could not get himselfe. Thus, Sir, you see how this miserable King lost both his life and Kingdome, and upon what Title Amasis came unto it. You may imagine how sad this news was unto the Queen, when she heard her Husband had lost both Kingdome and life, and consequently, the young Sesostris the Crown. But how great soever her sorrows were, yet were they lesse then the Generosity of Ladice, who could never enjoy any comfort in being the Wife of an Usurper. This sad Queen endea|voured all she could to move the people of Sais unto fidelity, and oppose Amasis; but the hatred of the Inhabitants against Apriez was so high, as that they were so far from doing as she desired, though it was in a little River of Tears, shewing unto them her young Sonne, that they mutined afresh, and would all take the stronger side: So that this deplorable Queen fearing they would seise upon her person, and her young Son, was forced to fly the Towne in the night, and to retire with a very small number unto a strong Castle which was some thirty furlongs from Sais; as she had resolved from the first in case of necessity. As she was ready to depart, accompanied with her dear Ladice, there came a Messenger from Amasis to the Princesse his Wife, to tell her of his Victory, and also to will her not to engage her self in the misfortunes of the Queen, unto whom for her sake, he would leave a Province in Aegypt upon condition she would put the young Sesostris into his hands. Ladice no sooner heard this proposition, but she exclaimed against Amasis, and told the Messenger whatsoever the Queen could desire. Go (said she unto him) and tell Amasis, that I was born a Subject unto a King before I was his Wife; and my being married could not disoblige me from my Page 81 first duty, nor ever shall, unless he will restore unto the young Sesostris that Crown which he usurped from the unfortunate Apriez: After which, not suffering him to speak a word more, she went unto the Queen, who stayed for her to depart. Never was flight more happy than this; for the Queen was no sooner out of the Town, but the people were in her house, to execute that order which Amasis had sent by him who spoke to Ladice; which order was, that the Inhabitants should be in Armes, and secure the persons of the Queen, of Sesostris, and Ladice. But the gods, who doubtlesse were pleased to preserve Sesostris, moved this Envoy of Amasis to speak unto Ladice, before he did unto the Inhabitants. Thus this young Prince, and these two unfortunate Princesses escaped from the Victory of Amasis. This great Queen was also so happy in her flight, that none of them knew which way she went: But since they could not be ignorant long, Ladice, who would not be delivered in a house which might come into the hands of Amasis, advised the Queen not to stay in it, but to goe further off where they should not be so soon found: And so they did. But alas, these two Princesses had not sooner any leasure to reckon up the sum of their present miseries, and lament them together, but they were given to understand that all took part with the Conquerour; that high and low Aegypt did both of them acknowledge his power, and that all the Provincia|ll Towns sent their Deputies to promise fidelity: That Sais, Thebes, Memphis, Bubastis, Sienna, Bulsiris, Canope, and Anisis did submit; and that Amasis was Master of all Aegypt, except Elephantine, which yet took time of consideration. They understood, that all the Calasires, and Hermobites (for so we call the Noblemen amongst us) did obey him without murmur, because they all hoped Amasis would let them have more power then they had under Apriez. So that seeing no hopes of any relief from any side, the Queen was in the most deplorable condition of any in the world: From the sterile Desarts of Lybia she could expect no relief, which is on the West side of Aegypt; on the South, the Cataracts of Nilus, and the Moun|tains block up all Passes; and on the East, doubtlesse, Sir, you know the vast Fennes along that Province which is called Barathra, and which separates Syria from Aegypt, do hinder the march of any Troops; and on the North side, the wayes are all inaccessible; neither could the Queen expect my relief from the Ionians, nor the Carians, who lost all their Forces at the last Battle: Aegypt within was all revolted, so that she had no way but to flye, or dye. This great Queen had a man with her, whose name was Amenophis, Brother unto my Mother, a man of extraordinary spirit and virtue, brought up in the house of the late King, whose fidelity was well known unto the Queen, and Ladice, and unto whom he was a professed friend: Amenophis, to chear up the courage of the Queen, and to perswade her to sub|mit her self unto the pleasure of the gods for better fortune, advised her to think of no course considering the state of things, but how to hide her self, and the Prince Sesostris, and to see whether tract of time would alter the face of things. The Queen then referring the conduct of her self unto the prudence of Amenophis; hee resolved for Elephantine, which yet had not totally submitted. But, Sir, be pleased to know, that when the Battle was fought, the River Nilus began to rise, so that when the Queen took a resolution to quit that place where she was, to seek a sanctuary further off, this River, according to its custome, over-flowed all the Country, so that she was forced to change the place as much out of necessity as reason; for when this Deluge was at the height, all Aegypt was water, unlesse Hills, and Townes built upon them, which seemed like little Islands, and the Campaigne like Sea at that time about them. Amenophis then provided a Boat to transport this deplorable company: And as this swelling of Nilus did on the one side trouble them, so on the other, it kept them from falling into the power of Amasis, who by reason of this Inundation could not send any Troops from Sais, nor make any exact search for the Princesses. But, I beseech you, Sir, i|magine a little not only in what a pittifull condition the Queen, and the young Prince her Son were, but also in what a sad case that unhappy Ladice was: For since shee now grew big, though it was not perceived, yet since she was to goe with the Queen to justifie her self, she must needs tell that she was Wife unto Amasis. However, she was resolved not to forsake her, nor did not: Amenophis having provided all things necessary for fifteen dayes, they im|barqued from the place where they were, though the house was not near water when the Ri|ver was within i|rs Channel. Their Boat at one end had a Cabin covered with Canvas; un|der which was the Queen, Sesostris, Ladice, and two women of the Queens: At the other end was Amenophis, two Servants, and the Rowers. Imagine, Sir, in what a condition this Queen was, who of a great Kingdom had nothing left but a little Cock-boat, in danger to pe|rish by the impetuosity of the Nile, by the Crocodiles, by the Hypopotames, and a thousand most horrid Monsters wherewith that river is filled: which way soever they looked, they could Page 82 see nothing but water, which was making the land of her enemies fertile, if she cast her eyes upon poor Sesostris, they swam in tears, to see in his face so many signs of grandure in so despicable a fortune, & to find so many symptoms of a great heart in so tender an age, for he was not at all dismayd at the tossing of the waves, and bounding of the Boate: thus this miserable Queen, not knowing which way to look for any consolation, turned towards her dear Ladice; but in lieu of finding any in her eyes, she saw them swim in teares, and full of so much melancholy, that her owne was more augmented, Amenophis only was he who gave her some comfort: However, the River Nile was not so troublesome as she apprehended, because it was not so great where she crossed, as it was in the province of Delta, whose scituation is very low, and nothing to be seen but the forme of this Greek Letter, whose name it carries; so that after eight or tenn daies rowing, they found some townes where they might refresh and rest themselves in the night. I forgot to tell you Sir, that the Queen, Sesostris and Ladice had no such signes of greatnesse in their garments, lest they should be known; & truly I think they needed no disguise, for though the habit of a Queen and a Shepheard be very different, yet sorrowes had so changed the countenances of these Princesses, that they were lesse knowable then any disguise of garments could make them; only they had all their Jewells about them, in Case of need. But Sir, I have so many things to relate, that I shall not spend any time in telling you, how they were twice in danger of drowning, by certain Windes, which blow alwaies when the Nile is high, they are called the Etesian Winds, and I have so many other things to relate which will move your pity, that I shall not meddle with this: But let me tell you Sir, that after all imaginable impediments of this dangerous voyage, they came at last into a Town, scituated upon a high hill, and with works to repulse the waves, which is not above sixty furlongs from Elephantine; in this place Amenophis heard how that Town was at last resolved to obey Amasis, and that deputies were going to swear fealty to their new King. Thus after a long and dangerous voyage, hoping to find a place of Sanctuary, the Queen was loaded with a new burthen of sorrowes, so that she had no way now but to hide her selfe: But the better to doe so, they must not goe unto Elephantine, and therefore the Queen consulted with Amenophis, who was well acquainted with that Country, and upon better thoughts he re|membered a Shepheard of his acquaintance, whose Father heretofore served his, and who dwelt in a very solitary place and pleasant, where the Queen might be both safe and convenient: so that without more adoe, they went that way, and the next morning came to a little Isle, which doubtlesse the Gods did purposely create for a Sanctuary and place of retreat unto this great Princess: for Sir, I am confident that nature never framed such a place as this; it is about fifteen or sixteen furlongs in length, and something oval, in the midst of it is an high hill, where one may retire when Nilus is high, and where the pastures are only inhabited by Shepheards, in cabbines, this hill is full of Sicomores, whose shadow is very de|lightfull, and at the foot of it unto the river banks, are meadows, so thick, so fresh, so sweet, and faire, as it seemed to be a most fertile land: a million of water-trees did shaddow these pleasant meadows in divers places, and as if the Gods had designed that those who inhabit in it should not be discovered by passengers in Boats, it is set round about with a thick and high hedge of Osiers, and rose trees, which grow so close to the water, and adome it, and as if it did both invite and forbid an entrance unto all those that came unto it, all the Rose-trees were intermingled with a kind of wild Lillies, which grow along the River Nilus, and whose odour perfumes the whole Isle. This Sir was the pleasant desert which served for a Sanctuary and retreat unto the Queen. Amenophis was no sooner landed, but he went to seek him who he knew lived there, and having found him, he disposed him to entertain some pe|rsons which fled from the persecution of the new King, yet not telling who they were, though he enjoyed close secrecy: then they went unto his house, which was the greatest and nearest in all the Isle, which had not above ten or twelve in all, and they so separated one from ano|ther, that they might easily go in and out undiscovered by any: he found this Shepherd had witt enough, but something covetous, which fault the more pleased Amenophis, who having wherewith to satisfie the humor of the man, thought he would make him very faithfull to the Queen; and indeed he was so, for he never spoke a word unto any of the rest in the Isle; since it was late when they landed, none did discover them, all the Shepherds being busie in driving their flocks unto their folds, so that Amenophis had all that night to instruct his Shepherd, whose name was Traseas, a married man, whose Wife was called Nicetis: he told them then (after a good reward in hand, and large promises of more if they were faithfull) his best course was to say unto therest of the Shepherds, that these people in his house were forced out of their homes by the floods, which when it was passed would return, & in the mean time Page 83 stay here, that they dwell beyond Elephantine: Since they were already sufficiently disguised, they stood in need of no great change of Garments; the men which rowed the Boat were kept there for the wafting of their two servants into any Town to fetch such things as they needed: So that this little retreat for its tranquillity, did so satisfie the Queen, that she hoped the Gods would preserve Sesostris for some better fortune: But yet the sighs and tears of Laidice redoubled; for seeing the must make known her Marriage unto the Queen, unlesse she would dishonour her self in her opinion, she resolved upon it, the third day after they came into the Isle: As shee was then in the morning with this Princess, who never stirred out of her Cabin since she came into it, she began to conjure her with a flood of teares in her eyes, to promise not to hate her after she had acquainted her with a business: Such language unusuall did surprise the Queen, who knowing no possible cause why shee should hate Laidice, promised she would not, in the presence of Amenophis, and protested shee would love her as long as shee lived, let her say what shee would. Then this unhappy Princessse beganne to acquaint her in few words, but many, many sighs and teares, with her Marriage unto Amasis, and the condition she was in: And in such moving man|ner as would have inspired pity into the most barbarous heart. No, no, Madam (said Ladice unto her, after she had made a full relation) you are not obliged to keep pro|mise with the Wife of an Usurper; and I repent that I did ask it of you: Hate me, hate me, as you ought to doe the Wife of your Enemy, though truly I am at this present a most mortal enemy unto him, nor will ever pretend unto any greatnesse which Amasis hath gotten by un|just wayes, and doe so horribly hate his action, that I doe not onely hate him, but my self al|so. In the mean time, Madam, if your sorrows can find any satisfaction by taking revenge of Amasis upon my person, doe it, I conjure you: For since hee hath so much slighted my prayers and desires, I thinke he cares not for my life, therefore I re|fere it unto your disposition: I ask no other favour from you, but to think me innocent; and that if I could, I would pull the Scepter out of the hands of Amasis, and give it unto Sesostris, though I were a slave all the dayes of my life. Ladice, having told her tale in so sad a manner, the Queen as generous as she, began to answer her with a kisse; for she could not possibly expresse her won|der at the virtue of this Princessse, who had voluntarily exiled her self, rather then to reigne unjustly: But after her spirits were a little recollected, she began to comfort her, and tell her she would love her as well as before, and much better. Amenophis did second the Queen with all the comforts he could, and gave her as many praises as she deserved; but shee did re|ject all applaude in so generous a manner, as did more and more tender the heart of the Queen. After this, the sorrows of this Princessse swelled her heart so full, tha• she fell sick, and so sick, as she dyed the third day: But in losing her life, she gave it unto a Daughter, which was a most perfect Miracle of Beauty. But, Sir, since the death of Ladice was no lesse gene|rous then her life, I must needs relate in few words the particulars of it. After that she had brought to light this fair Daughter, whose life was as extraordinary as her birth, and that she perceived she could not live, to lose no precious time, she called for Pen, Ink, and Paper, and writ these words unto Amasis.

Dying LADICE unto Ambitious AMASIS.

Since I have but one quarter of an hour to live, I have not time to say much unto you, but know that I leave you a Daughter which perhaps you shall never see, if you do not restore the Crown unto young Sesostris: and I think my self happy, that in dying I have left some pawn in his hands. I wish unto the Gods that you could see me dye; for perhaps it would coole that ambitious passion which hath caused the death of LADICE.

After the Princessse had read over her Letter, she gave it unto Amenophis, desiring him to keep it carefully, and to make use of it when he saw fit: Afterwards turning towards the Queen, she implored her pardon in beseeching her to preserve the life of this daughter unto young Amasis, because as long as she was in her power, she might perhaps give some stop unto the ambition of the Father. The truth is, Sir, this unfortunate Princessse spoke unto the Queen, as if she wished life unto her Daughter onely for love of her, and if she had lost that naturall affection which is in all mothers, which is, to wish life unto their children for the loves sake which they bear unto them. The Queen was extreemly moved to see the Princessse Page 84 in such a condition, and assured her, that she would not look upon this Child as the daughter of Amasis, but as the daughter of Ladice, and consequently would have as great care of her as of her owne: after this assurance Ladice thanked the Queen, with eyes swimming in teares; then neglecting all worldly cares, her thoughts were all addressed unto the Gods, yet not with one prayer for either Amasis or her daughter, but only for the Queen and young Sesostris, after which she dyed: You may imagine that there was not very great Pomp at her Fu|nerall, which indeed was with no more ceremony then if she were some Shepherds daughter of the Isle, lest there should arise some suspicion of them: However, Nicetis was carefull in nursing of Ladice's daughter, who was called Timareta: The first daies, after the death of this generous Princessse, were spent in lamenting her losse; but afterwards, the Queen conforming her mind unto an accident, against which there was no remedy, advised with Amenophis what was best to be done with Ladice's Letter: Amenophis considering the case of things, could not beleeve that Amasis would restore the Crown unto Sesostris, at the request of dying Ladice, for since he could not moderate his ambitious passion at her conjurations, and at a time when he knew not whether the successe would be good or bad, certainly he would not hearken to her when he was in full possession; nor was it credible, that to get out of the Queens hands a young daughter newly born, he would part with a scepter; but perhaps when he hears of Ladice's death, he will enter into a new fury, and add revenge unto his ambition, imagining they were the cause of Ladice's death; furthermore he thought that it was to be feared when Ladices Letter was delivered, Amasis might come to know where Sesostris was; therefore his advice was to keep the letter untill such time as they were able to raise a party in the State. The Queen then approving of this advice, thought upon nothing but how to conceale her selfe and sonne; but this care lasted not long; for Sir, since Nylus was fallen into his ac|customed channell, there did arise from the ground certaine vapours, which that Year caused a contagion in the Town of Elephantine, which did depopulate almost all the Town, and was brought into this little Isle, by those two men which went in the Boat to fetch them necessaries; but these two men were not alone which lost their lives, for almost all the inhabitants of the Isle did the like, and those who did not fled; Amenophis had fled for company if the Queen had not fallen sick and dyed, with the two women with her; assoon as Amenophis saw the Queen sick, he resolved to stay with her, but sent away Sesostris with the Wife of a Shepherd, and Timareta with her nurse, into one of those Cab|bines which were upon the topp of the Hill, which not being inhabited, was not infected with so bad an aire, and by this meanes he saved the life of the young Sesostris: This horrible infection could not last long in the Isle, for there was so few people in it, that it was almost quite depopulated, either by death or flight of the inhabitants: But the most lamentable passage was, that the Queen and her women dyed in four daies, so that Amenophis was left alone in the Isle, with Sesostris, Traseas, Nicetis, Timareta her nurse and one servant. Seeing then the state of things, Amenophis thought it best to keep the Isle still, it being more safe by this accident then before, and more easie to hide the young Sesostris in a depopulated desert, then when it was peopled; and those who fled were so affrighted, that they durst not return, and those who were there, thought Sesostris to be the sonne of Amenophis, whom they thought a Shepherd, and that Timareta was daughter to Traseas and Nicetis. In the mean while, Amenophis considering the state of things, could not hope to attempt any thing openly against Amasis, therefore he resolved to wait some favourable conjuncture, when he might safely shew the young Sesostris unto the people, and that they might know him to be their Prince when occasion was; he took extraordinary care for his education, as well as that solitary place would permit. Sesostris being very young, was not sensible of the Queen his Mothers death, nor remembered any Father, but Amenophis: but to the end he might divert himselfe, and better learn those things which Amenophis taught him, who was one of the most knowing men of all Aegypt, he went secretly unto Elephantine, where then I was, about eight yeares of age; and since I had no father, but left to the conduct of a mother, who was sister unto Amenophis; he procured me of her, as a comfort to him in his exile; for since she had many children, and Amenophis very rich, she was willing to part with me: so I was carried unto this place of solitude, which at first I was weary of, but custom did better acquaint me with it, and though I was four yeares elder then Sesostris, yet he had such a quick forward spirit, that I exceedingly loved him: Amenophis had no other businesse or delight, but to teach us such things as our ages were capable of; Traseas and his wife took care of the family, and the servant went and came continually between Elephantine and the Isle, to have the newes of the world by meanes of my Mother, who did not yet directly know where her brother was: but still he could Page 85 heare no newes that pleased him; for be pleased to know Sir, that Amasis did think himselfe as secure and absolute a Master of all Egypt, as if the Throne had hereditarily and justly descended unto him; yet for all that, the Queen and Sesostris not being in his power, they were sharp thornes in his thoughts, he grieved also exceedingly that Ladice followed them; but seeing all his diligent searches were in vaine, and that he could learn no further then that they were imbarqued upon the Nyle, he thought his best expedient to divulge all over Aegypt that Sesostris and the Queen were drowned, to the end, that the people thinking there was no successor of Apriez living, they would more willingly submit unto him; and to confirm them in this belief, he caused the obsequies of Ladice to be solemnized, knowing certainly (as he said) that she perished with them: In the mean time, he caused secret searches to be made with extraordinary care, which perswaded Amenophis when he knew it, that Amasis had some ill design in it, so that seeing all Egypt was in a husht tranquillity, he thought upon nothing but the education of Sesostris: And since Astrology is the originall science of all Egypt, wherein all persons of any curiosity have some knowledg; Amenophis was expert in it, and found by it, that Sesostris should hereafter see happy daies: Yet maugre his Astrology he was once in a mind to quit his desert, and to go and let the people know that their Legiti|mate Prince lived; for he understood that Amasis beginning to cheer himselfe up, after his losse of Ladice, and altogether giving himselfe up unto pleasures, the people began to mur|mure, and considering that he was not of the royall race, they began to despise him, not ren|dring him so much honour as they did before, but said openly, that they remembered him in another picture then now he was, & that though they did not give him honour enough as their King, yet they rendered him too much as he was Amasis; and that since their King and Amasis were not all one, he ought not to complain against them. This Prince hearing how the people began to mutter, did resolve upon an odde course to stop their mouths, yet such a one as produced its effect, and forced Amenophis back unto his Desert. There was in that stately Palace which the late King built, great vessels of Gold which were used in publique Feasts, Amasis took all those Vessels and caused them to be melted into a Statue of Osiris, and to be set before the Palace Gates: As soon as it was placed there, all the people flocked about it, looked upon it with profound respect, rendering as much honour as if Osiris had been there: For amongst us the representations of such things as wee adore are sacred unto us, even the very Images of Animals are held in veneration. Amasis seeing out of a Balcone the reverence which the people payed unto this Statue of Osiris, told them that he wondered they should honour this Statue so much, considering it was made out of the Golden vessels which were used in their publick feasts, but they returned such an answer as he expected, that it was not the mettle they honoured, but the representation of Osiris: After which he told them, that accordingly they ought not to look upon him as Amasis only, but as their king, since he did represent Apriez more lively, then this Statue did Osiris. The people being moved by such an example as silenced them, began to reverence Amasis, & the more, because he proclaimed some lawes which seemed full of justice, and gave great hopes of his wisdom; for he enacted that all his subjects throughout his dominions, should give an account to the governour of the place where he lived, how he had lived the year before, to the end he might banish idleness and injustice both at once: So that Amenophis no sooner heard how the people began to grumble, but he heard immediately after, that he stood upon faster grounds then ever, as if the Gods had neglected the conduct of the universe, since they suffered an usurper to sit upon the Throne, and the legitimate King to be in exile, brought up in a Desert amongst a company of Shepherds. But Sir, I must not insist longer upon this, since I have many things of great importance to tell you: In the mean time therefore, since Amenophis thought to draw some advantage by the young Timareta, he thought fit to educate her so, as she might hereafter be known unto Amasis without dislike, which he did excellently well by meanes of my mothe, & the great recompenses which he promised, so that she sent him a woman to be tutor to this young Princessse: This woman was a Theban, most admirably qualified for the education of such a person as this: divers crosse adventures had ruined her family, and forced to seek a livelihood by such a happy servitude as this: her name was Edisea. Thus Sir, Timareta came under her tuition, as soon as she was fit to be taken from her Nurse, who had escaped the contagion as well as she: and be pleased to know Sir, that as Sesostris was a miracle, so Timareta was another, for beauty and spirit, all the parts of her face were so many wonders; her complexion though a little brown, yet most lovely; her hair the purest black that ever was; her aspect was so high and charming, as it did invite both admiration and love: So that I may truly say, never were two children together so amiable as the young Page 86 Sesostris, and the young Timareta; especially when the lustre of their spirits began to joy and shine with their beauties, which was, when Timareta was eight, and Sesostris twelve years of age: For, Sir, I assure you, all their actions and their words were infinitely taking, and transcend their ages. Since naturally I was reasonably active, and had some education before I came into this Isle, I practised all exercises of body with Sesostris, which he performed admirably well, as running, leaping, shooting, the Lute, and such things: As for the Liberal Sciences, Amenophis taught him as well as any Prince in the world stood in need of: He could speak divers Languages, especially the Greek very well: For since Amenophis had the disposition of all the Queens and Ladies's Jewels, we wanted neither Books, nor any thing else which was requisite: Yet our habits were coarse like Shepherds, and sometimes we went unto the Flocks when Amenophis gave us leave. Again, Edisea educated Timareta as if she were in the Court; though she permitted her to use some such common things as Shepherds use, as the making of fine Baskets of Rushes, weaving strings in several colours, and such like: But Edisea did not only teach her these trivials, but also the Greek language; yet the wonder of all was, to see what a wonderful inclination Sesostris had unto Timareta: He could not endure to be out of her sight; he never contended with her for any thing, but in all things submitted unto her, that at that age complacency was a novelty: If hee observed she wanted any Rushes to make her pretty Baskets, wherein she put her fruits and flowers, he went in all hast to get her them: If at any time she desired any Flowers, he was never at rest until he brought her a basket full: he thought so much of pleasing her, that he thought upon nothing else. On the other side, the young Timareta, though very sweet unto all, yet did put such a notable difference between Sesostris and all others, as it was very observable: She approved of all he said; and if two of us present unto her any thing at one time, shee would accept that which Sesostris offered before the present of any other. Thus, Sir, we lived until Sesostris was sixteen, and Timareta twelve years of age: But, Sir, as they were amiable in their Infancy, so they were amiable in their riper age, when their spirits did put souls into their beauty, and when they were grown capable of loving: For truly, though Timareta had a design to please a whole Court, she could not take more care of her self then she did: And if Sesostris had a design to publish his spirit unto all the world, he could not have been more exactly careful to please, then he was when he spoke before Timareta. In the mean time, since Amenophis conceived that if Sesostris and Timareta were hereafter to appear in the world as known who they were, it would be advantageous that Timareta should love Sesostris, he did not check this growing affection, no more then Edisea, who alwaies followed the mind of Amenophis, without seeking for other reason, and so much the rather in this, because she perceived all the inclinations of Timareta to be virtuous. In the meane time, since we read all sorts of Books, especially the History of Aegypt, sometimes when Sesostris, and I were together, we talked of many things, especially of Amenophis, and what designs he should have: For, said Sesostris to me, I find by the History of Aegypt, that it is divided into six severall professions: That the Priests are ordained for sacred things; the Noblemen for Councillors unto their King, for Commanders in their Armies, and Governours of Provinces; that their Souldiers in generall think upon nothing but matters of War; that the Merchants busie themselves in nothing but in things belonging to their Traffique; that Labourers follow only their Plough; that Artificers meddle with nothing but what will make them more knowing in their art; and that Shepherds keep themselves within compass of their Fould, and think upon nothing but their Flocks. Yet though we be onely Shepherds, I see Amenophis doth instruct us in a hundred things which the Law forbids, and I find my heart too big to be contained within the compass of this little Isle, and I have had some thoughts of making a proposition unto you of leaving it, if—At this word Sesostris stopped, and though I did extremely presse him to goe on with his sentence, yet I could not move him: So that I was forced to speak his thoughts, and agree with him to steal out of this Isle, relating many things concerning Elephantine, which I remembering very well begot a strong curiosity in him: But for all our plot it was not easie to be executed: For Amenophis had a strict observant eye upon us; and indeed Sesostris did decline it, for hee was already deep in love with the young Timareta; being after this very reserved unto each other, we parted, Sesostris saying hee would walke by himselfe, and I saying I would returne unto my Cabin: Since we came out with a design to Hunt, Sesostris brought his Bow, and Quiver full of Arrows, with a staffe in his hand like those which the Shepherds about Elephantine use to carry, with a steele point at either end, and with which one might defend himself as well as with any Sword: For since in the Province of Elephantine Page 87 these Crocodiles are not held in veneration as in that of Thebes, where it is not lawfull to kill them, but on the contrary they think it a thing well pleasing unto the Gods to purge Nilus from these terrible devourers, and all the Shepherds of this Province carry such Pikestaffes to kill them, and defend themselves: So Sesostris without any other design then contemplation, walked a long time by the water side, not meeting with any interruption of his study, but at last coming unto a place where a little Isthmus shot it self into the Nile, he espied Timareta, who to take the fresh air, and view of the River, had left Edisea, and came unto this neck of Land, which, as I said, shot it self into the River, and the better to enjoy a prospect, she had made a gap with her fair hands through that hedg of Osiers and Roses which grew along the banks of this Isle, and which was thinner in that place then any where else. Sesostris no sooner spied her, but ravished with joy, he made towards her, yet hee had no sooner stept four paces forward, but he espied upon his right hand, through the thick of Osiers and Roses, one of these terrible Monsters of Nilus, which cutting the water with incredible swiftnesse, was ready to fall upon the fair Timareta, and pull her into the water with his affrighting tallons which those Crocodiles are armed withall: He no sooner saw this fierce Animall, but he cryed out, and ran with all hast to get between the Crocodile and Timareta; for though he had Bow and Arrows, yet hee knew that both the thickness of the hedge would hinder their execution, and also the scales of the Crocodile were so hard, that it was impossible they should enter: Thus considering this in an instant, he ran with his Pike-staffe in his right hand, and his Bow in his left, to get between the Monster, and Timareta. In the mean time, the cry of Sesostris coming to the ears of this young Princesse, she turning her head to know the reason, and also seeing the Crocodile coming towards her, she was so amazed with fear, that she was speechlesse, yet the excesse of her fears did not produce their ordinary effects, but the contrary, and made her run as fast as she could towards Sesostris; and the nature of a Crocodile being to be more furious upon them which fly, then those which stand stoutly to them, this fierce Animall fearing to lose his prey, flounced out of the River, made the air echo with the rattle of his scales, and shaking off the fume of water, he followed the fair, and fearfull Timareta, who turning her head sometimes, to see whether the Monster were near her, yet ran with incredible swiftnesse towards Sesostris, who ran also to her relief. Imagine, Sir, I beseech you, what an object was this unto Edisea, who a far off saw this terrible spectacle. In the mean while Sesostris turning upon his right hand to let Timareta passe by, he got betwixt the Crocodile and her, to stay his fury at least, though he could not overcome him. This Monster (which never saw Sesostris, because he looked onely upon his fair prey which he pursued) seemed to be surprised, and stopt upon a suddain. But though the nature of the Crocodiles (as I said before) was to be lesse furious upon those who stoutly stood to them, then upon those which fly, yet since he saw himself so far from his Sanctuary the River, despair did rouze his fury, and he fell upon Sesostris, yet recoiled at first some two or three paces, but it was to return with greater violence; but Sesostris being beyond belief stout, did not at all lose his judgement, so throwing away his bow, and taking his Pike-staffe in both hands, the combat began between this fierce Monster and him, whereof the fair Timareta, who was fain with fear and wearinesse some twenty paces off, was a witness as well as Edisea, whose affright would neither permit her to goe forward nor backward. In the mean time, since Crocodiles can see better upon land then wa|ter, this did put by the point of the Pike-staffe so cunningly, that Sesostris could not touch him, unlesse in such places where he could not hurt him, for this armed Monster had onely one place where he could receive any mortall wound. Sometimes he would seem weary, and make a retreat purposely to surpris Sesostris; then upon a sudden stretching out his greedy tallons, and opening his hellish mouth, wherein all the teeth were poisoned, he would cast himself upon him with such violence, that Timareta often thought her dear deliverer was devoured: The Scales of this horrid Monster made a shrill noise, and would vary into severall colours, their russet would become red, and anon blew, his eyes were full of a gloomy fire, his teeth seemed all bloody with the last prey he had devoured; a green and yellow foame spued out of his throat, and a thick dusky smoak which came from his nose so blinded the eyes of Sesostris, that he could hardly defend himself from his tallons; yet his great heart was not at all astonished or weary, but he avoyded all the assaults of this affrighting Monster with such incredible agility, as is admirable, he shifted so nimbly sometimes to the right hand, sometimes to the left, that at every turn he gave him a thrust, but to his great grief all in vain. In the mean time, this gaping Monster would not submit, but with a reach of his paw, scratched all the Arrows out of his Quiver, and with another reach pulled his Quiver Page 88 quite from him, thinking to pull him also, but by good fortune the quiver loosened, and he escaped the fury of this monster; yet he began to think, he should perish at the last, and had no hope in any thing, but the glory in rescuing his dear Timareta, when the Crocodile rose up right on his hinder feet, intending to throw himselfe upon the head of Sesostris, but this Hero took that opportunity, to thrust his Pike into his belly, and reached his very heart; it was a happy hit to light just upon that only place where the scales were penetrable: this monstrous beast perceiving himselfe wounded, bellowed out a horrid noise, and strove to revenge his death; but Sesostris being ravished that he had wounded his fierce enemy, and to see his blood run upon the grasse, did hold his pike-staffe so stiffe and close in the wound, that the monster could not disengage himselfe, but in lieu of falling upon Sesostris, tumbled on one side, moving very weakly; for since Sesostris would not pull his weapon out of the wound, it was probable he pierced deeper into his heart, or at least kept him that he could not rise: Sesostris now seeing his horrible enemy vanquished, and ready to breath his last, he pulled his bloody weapon out of the wound, and let the life of this monster run out with his blood; after which, all glorious with Victory, he went to cast himselfe at the feet of the fair and fearfull Timareta, who not being able to passe so suddenly from extreame sorrowes into extreame joyes, had still all signes of fear in her fair face: I pray you pardon me, said he unto her, for no sooner killing this monster, whose cruelty would have devoured the fairest person in the world. Ah Sesostris, said she, rise up, how is it possible you should speak with such calmnesse of spirit as you doe, for my part (said she and walked towards Edisea who was coming towards her) I am still afraid the monster should revive: Sesostris smiled at the feares of Timareta, with as much tranquillity as if he had been in no danger, and assuring her there was no cause of fear, he helped her to walk: But as Edisea met them, she asked Timareta whether she had given thanks unto her deliverer: Alas, said she unto her, I am still so fearfull that the monster is not yet dead, that I shall not be able to thank him all the day; all I can say for his satisfaction is, that whilst he fought with this terrible Monster, I was in as much fear of him as of my selfe. Alas, amiable Timareta said he unto her, your expression is above my desert, and higher then I can believe. As Timareta was ready to answer Sesostris, and to tell him with what sincerity she spoke her thoughts, Amenophis and I came unto them, so that Edisea relating the combat of Sesostris and his Victory, we forced Timareta to return back and look upon this Monster which Sesostris had killed; I say we forced her, for indeed she feared to look upon him after he was dead, yet with much adoe she went: but when we came unto the place where he lay wallowing in his owne blood, and saw there was no cause of any feare, she began then to tell Amenophis with an incomparable grace, all the passages, and how the fight was; for the natural modesty of Sesostris only told how he had overcome him, and no more of any circumstances; but the young Timareta helping him out, did aggravate the matter, as if in publishing the glory of Sesostris, she had augmented her owne. Amenophis could not chuse but wonder at this prodigious encounter, and to consider how the daughter of an usurper should be relieved by him, from whom her Father had taken the Scepter and Crown; and to see as much amitie grow betwixt them, as there was hatred betwixt their Fathers. However, after Amenophis had well considered all these things, whilst Timareta was relating the adventure with an admirable grace, he highly extolled the courage of Sesostris, and told him, that this heriogue quality was the duty of all men; that Shepherds as well as Kings ought to be qualified with it; that they were obliged to defend their flocks, as well as Kings their people, and so exhorted him to invigorate his valour. Truly Sir (said he unto him) since there is a marvelous resemblance 'twixt Kings and Shepherds, you need not think strange if I give you the same lessons as if you were the sonne of a King. And indeed Sir, Amenophis instructed Sesostris in all the moralls and politiques, under the similitude of a Shepherd, ruling his flock as well, and with as much art, as might instruct a King in ruling his people: and therefore keeping still within his termes, he told Sesostris, that since he had so magnanimously defended Timareta from a monster, he should also defend his flock from wolves. Oh Father, (said Sesostris hastily) I doe not love your flocks of sheep, so well as I doe the fair Timareta. Amenophis smiled at this answer, as well as Edisea; but Timaret blusht, and looked downwards, saying something in a low voice, which some understood, yet which they knew was no ill of Sesostris. In the mean time, since it was late, we returned to our cabin, continually talking of Timareta's timorosity and her deliverers courage. The next morning, Amenophis, to incite this young Prince unto a love of glory, did make this known unto all the Shepherds in the Isle, who all admired and applauded his couragious act: These Shepherds when they Page 89 saw this Monster, they carried him unto a little Chappel which stood in the further part of their Isle towards the east, to render thanks unto the Gods, for saving Timareta and Sesostris from the fury of this Crocodile: the ceremony was performed with a little kind of triumph, for all the Shepherds with their Pipes went to and fro playing tunes of rejoicing and victory: afterwards eight Shepherds carryed this monster, and immediately after it, went Sesostris Crowned with a wreath of Palme and Lawrell, whereof abundance grew in this Isle: this victorious Prince having his Pike-staffe decked with flowers in his right hand; but the pretylest sight was, to see young Timareta, who made the Crown for the Temples of Sesostris, follow him with all the rest of the Shepheardesses, with so much joy in her face, as it may truly be said, she was the greatest ornament unto this rustique triumph, and indeed she was so, especially in the eyes of Sesostris, and his love did so much increase, that he could not long hide that harmlesse fire which began to burn his heart; so that after thanks given unto the Gods, and after all the Shepherds had brought Sesostris to our Cabin, he was no sooner returned, but taking the Crown from his head, he entered into a little Chamber where Timareta lay, and where she then was, and whilst Amenophis was thanking the Shepherds, and Edisea the Shepheardesses, Sesostris taking that opportunity, went to Timareta with the Crown in his hand: It is most just, said he unto her, that I present this unto you, who have much better merited it then I; and I assure you, I would not have worn it, but because I could not refuse so great an honour as to be Crowned by the fairest hand upon earth; but because I will not be unjust, I prostrate at your feet the same Crown wherewith you adorned my head; for once more let me tell you, it is your selfe only which merits all the honour of my victory. Truly (said the young and fair Timareta, with as much becomingnesse and innocency) I do not understand you, but I am very certain it was you who fought with the monster, and killed him: and if fear as well as valour deserved triumph, 'tis I then might claim it as my due, but since it does not, keep it Sesostris, keep this Crown which I have made for you, since 'twas your selfe only who fought and vanquished, and who only deserves it. 'Tis true indeed, my dear Timareta, 'twas I who vanquished, said he, but it is you who have vanquish[ed] me, for had I not had a most earnest desire to save you, I should have been lesse valiant, and should perhaps have been vanquished, and consequently it is you who has obliged me. You may say what you please Sesostris, said she, but I am sure I owe my life unto you, and you owe me nothing, for indeed I never did you any service, nor gave you any thing, only this poor Crown, which you would restore back. Ha Timareta, said he, you are much more liberal then you think of, for you have given me a thing which I shall never restore you, and which indeed I cannot if I would: Timareta hearing Sesostris speak thus, began innocently to bethink her selfe what Sesostris ever gave her; for my part, said she, you take a delight in puzeling me, for truly I remember that you have given me a thousand times, some fruit, and birds, and rushes to make my baskets, but I do not remember I was ever liberal unto you: Yet you have given me a thing, replied he, which I shall keep as long as I live: Then certainly, said she, I gave it you assoon as I came out of my cradle, and at a time beyond my memory: No, replied Sesostris, it was when you were more in yeares then so: For heavens sake, said Timareta, tell me what it is? Since you would so earnestly know (replied he, half smiling and blushing) you have given me love: Ah Sesostris, (said she all in confusion, not knowing whether she should be angry or glad) will you recompence me so cruelly for making you a Crown, as to mock at my simplicity? Ah Timareta (said he) will you so cruelly recompence me, for, as you say, saving your life, as that you will give me a death? for I must tell you most seriously, that if you do not think I love you a thousand times better then I do my selfe, and think it without anger, I shall most infallibly dye. Timareta having recollected her selfe whilst Sesostris was talking: however it be (said she unto him) I declare unto you, that though perhaps I did innocently give you what you say, yet I would not have you recompence liberality for liberality, in giving me the like. As Sesostris was ready to answer, they were called away to dinner; but as long as it lasted, Timareta durst not so much as look upon Sesostris; yet there appeared such carnation blushes in her cheeks, that she was forced unto a necessity of masking them with an excuse, and said, she was so hott with going to the Chappell, that she should not be cool again all that day. But Sir, without further relation of the first conferences between these two illustrious lovers, I shall only tell you, that as Sesostris loved Timareta, and Timareta knew it, so ever since they did agree more amiably. Then Sir, was this Prince pleased to make choice of me for his confidant, who had no other secrets to trust me withall, but the violence of his passion; for certainly Timareta did behave her selfe with an extream reservednesse, so that it may be said, she was wise before her time: moreover [Page 90 Edisea observed her very close; yet the virtue of Timareta was a sufficient guard unto her beauty. However, having put Sesostris unto a thousand tests by as many rigours, shee had all imaginable esteem and tendernesse of this lovely shepheard: she gave him a thousand innocent testimonies of it upon a hundred occasions; either by her favourable looks, or by some obliging blushes, or by some plausible words, or by a thousand other little expressions, which speak plain enough unto a Lover. It was a great augmentation of affection between these two young Lovers, to think they were like to have no obstacles in their Marriage: The quality of their Parents was equall, their age proportionable; there was not one shepheardesse in all the Isle whom Sesostris could endure to talk with one quarter of an hour; nor was there one shepheard which Timareta could endure to looke upon: Reason told them both, that Amenophis & Traseas would like of the match: so that without any resistance they gave themselves the liberty of that love which their own merits did create. This being the state of things, Amenophis, Edisea, Timareta, Sesostris, and I, we went one evening to walk in that place where they use to land in that Isle; for since the adventure of the Crocodile, Timareta would not walk any where near the River but about that Port. As we were set upon the Grasse, which was diaped with variety of Flowers, Timareta fitting next Sesostris, asked him, if he did see a Boat which was coming towards the Isle? he answer[ed] her, that she did him wrong to ask him such a question, for if she were in company hee never looked upon any thing but her self; but upon her serious demand, he looked, and indeed spied a Boat making towards them; so that shewing unto Amenophis what Timareta shew[ed] him, we all looked upon this Boat; but it being late, and beginning to darken, we could not discover the persons in it. The thing which Amenophis most wondered at, was, because it was not ordinary for any Strangers to come unto that Isle; but the Barque drawing nearer, we discovered in it a man of grave and serious physiognomy, yet very comely, who not regarding us, nor any thing the company did, lookt onely upon the Moon, which dimly shined. The rest of the men were onely Rowers, one of which came on shore, and asked Amenophis, whom he thought to be the Master of the company, whether a be-nighted stranger could possibly obtaine the favour of a nights lodging in the Isle, his intentions being for Elephantine, but being so late they conceived it dangerous to land in that Port in the night. Amenophis hearing the man speak, and knowing by his garb and habit, that the man in the Boat was a stranger, he did not onely let him have leave to lodge in the Isle, but let him have his own Cabin. Afterwards enquiring of what Country, he understood he was of Samos: after he knew his Country, Amenophis asked his Name? it was answered Pythagoras. Then were the spirits of Amenophis filled with joy, and he resolved to make him the best entertain[ment] possible: For Amenophis being an intimate Friend unto the High Priest of Memphis, and by means of my Mother held a secret correspondency with all his intimate friends, in[tending] to use them as occasions served, he had not long since received a Letter from his friend, which intimated, that Pythagoras was arrived at Memphis: You may imagine, Sir, how Amenophis was joyed, being a man of deep knowledge, who since his exile had no other company but Sesostris, Edisea, Timareta, and my self. His joyes were the more, because he understood from the High Priest of Memphis, that Pythagoras would not return unto the Court of Amasis, and therefore there was no danger in receiving him: So going unto the Boat, he offered his hand unto Pythagoras, to help him out, and addressing his speech unto him, I render most hearty thanks unto the Gods (said he in the Graecian language) for bringling a man into this Desert, whose Reputation transcends all the reports of those seven Sages which Greece at this time boasts of. This Philosopher wondering to hear Amenophis speak unto him, and in the Graecian tongue, saluted him with a Majestique civility, and to shew the esteeme he held of our Nation, he would not answer him in Greek, but in the Egyptian Language. Thus did these two Renowned men at their first meeting greet one another, but not in their naturall Languages, both of them retaliating equall Civilities. The Complements of Pythagoras were short, for doubtless you know, Sir, how this Philosopher was so great a lover of silence, that hee would have his Disciples study five yeares, and not speake: His Maxim being, to say little, and heare much; and the onely way to speak well, was to heare much. However, that little he spoke, was enough to charm Amenophis, who carried him in[t]o his Cabin, after he had presented Sesostris unto him as his sonne, and all the rest of his Family as servants unto Pythagoras. But, Sir, all the diligence of Amenophis to bid him welcome was ill bestowed: for this Philosopher never eat any thing which had life in it, but Figs and Fruits were a fine Feast unto him. After this slight repast, Amenophis began to discourse of the most sublime Sciences, and so admirably well, that this Philosopher charmed Page 91 with his knowledge, told him, that since his businesse in Aegypt was onely to learn, & know those great men in it, he must needs stay a while with him, & not goe so soon to Elephantine, where he could not meet with better company. Amenophis received his discourse with much modesty, and conjured him to let him become his Scholar, as well as two more, meaning Sesostris and my self. In short, Sir, Pythagoras resolved to stay some time in the Isle, so that he sent back the Boat which brought him, and liked his solitude so well, that hee stayed there four Months. In which time he instructed Sesostris with much delight; for this great Philosopher was so ravished to finde so wonderfull a disposition in the spirit of this young Prince to learne the highest things, as hee taught him both with wonder and delight. He admired also the young Timareta, and so much the more, because (said he) I never knew any of her sex who could so handsomely be silent, or speak quicker when there was need, or suffer others to speak with more patience. The truth is, Sir, he took an extream delight in her: For his opinion being, that all soules doe transmigrate from one body into another, either men, beasts, birds, or any animals (which the Greeks call Metempsychosis) he had an universall compassion of all living things; as oft as he found Fishers with their Nets full of Fishes, he would buy them all, and set them at liberty. And after he had been a while in our Isle, he took notice that the young Timareta had many little birds in cages which sung very sweetly, and that she loved them exceeding well because Sesostris gave them. The Philosopher according to his Doctrine gave liberty to these birds, and thereby did exceedingly grieve Timareta for the losse of her birds, and Sesostris for the sorrows of Timareta; yet did they murmur at their losse onely in secret; for as Sesostris received many sapient Documents from Pythagoras, so he practised that silence which he taught his Scholars. Sesostris talking with Timareta after her losse, told her, as pittifull as Pythagoras was, he was not able to set him at liberty as he had done her birds. Truly, replied she, I should think it more just to set men at liberty rather then birds. But, Timareta, there is a great difference between them and me; for those birds are glad of their freedome, but I should be sorry any should break my chains: So since Pythagoras intends onely a good unto those he frees, when he knows I am your captive, he would not release me: But as for your part, fair Timareta, why doe not you follow the example of this great Philosopher, and become pittifull? would you have me set you at liberty, replied she, as he hath done my birds? No, replied he, but I would have you make me happy in my captivity. How shall I doe that? (replied she.) The way is, answered he, by obliging me more unto you, by charming me with a million of harm[lesse] favours; by being gladder when you see my love augments, then all Aegypt is when they see the Nile to rise; and (if it would not anger you to say it) by participating with me in my Fetters: Ah Sesostris, said she, would you have me to be pittifull, and your self so cruell as to wish my captivity? Fie, fie, it were not just; therefore all I can doe is to tell you, it shall not be long of me, if you be not free. Then you doe not love me at all (replyed he, and looked sadly upon her.) I doe not see, replied she, how you can draw that conclusion from what I said; for what greater good can be done to a prisoner then to set him at liberty? yet you never gave those pretty birds which sung so sweetly and delighted you, their liberty, replied Sesostris. I doe confesse it (said she) for their imprisonment pleased mee better then their liberty. I beseech you, replied Sesostris, why will not my captivity please you also, since I am, and ever will be an eternall slave unto your beauty? As Timareta was about to answer, Amenophis came and interrupted. However, you see the Documents of Pythagoras were no hinderances to the love of Sesostris, but rather taught him a thousand innocent wayes to become more amiable, and his passion did still so violently encrease, that he asked Timareta leave to move a Marriage unto Amenophis. This motion much surprised him; for he did not think it within the speare of his Authority to marry Sesostris unto the Daughter of Amasis: Yet for all that, he was willing Timareta should love Sesostris still; For when things were ripe, and that he had raised a party in the Kingdom, this might be a means of peace between the Legitimate King and the Usurper, at least would be a good Ho[st]age: For Amenophis knew, that though Amasis was married, yet he had no children with his Wife, nor could have, because he had repudiated this second Wife: And though this motion did surprise him, yet he told Sesostris, that his choice was worthy of his spirit and judgement; but yet he was not of age fit for Marriage: That his Marriage was a matter of greater importance then he imagined; and that Timareta was such a Jewell as he must long hope for before he enjoyed it. This too strict answer not satisfying Sesostris, hee still added his prayers unto his reasons; but all in vain, for he grew so extremely melancholly and sad that he was hardly knowable. All the documents and advisements of Pythagoras which Amenophis Page 92 employed, were to no purpose: For this young man making use of his own Doctrines against him, told him, that since the Destinies did govern the Universe, and that men were not Masters of their own actions, he ought not to be condemned for loving Timareta with so much violence, since he did but what he could not chuse to doe. The truth is, Sir, this Prince was so incensed at the refusal of Amenophis, that he would not study, nor walk, nor recreate, nor doe any thing, but lament: And that which most augmented his sorrows and melancholly was, that Amenophis thinking the sight of Timareta was a main cause of his distempers, he resolved to send her to my Mother at Elephantine for a while: So that unknown to Sesostris, Edisea departed the next morning by break of day, with Timareta, carrying orders with them unto my Mother, that she should passe under the notion of one of her Cosens, and to put her into such a habit as was suitable to that quality. The design was so cunningly executed, that Sesostris knew nothing of it, and that Timareta could not speak to him at parting: But at last Sesostris seeing her gone, he was so sad, that it was impossible for any to be more: Yet since he thought Amenophis to be his Father, he did not exclaim against him, but complained of his misfortunes unto me, and in such a manner, as would have moved a heart of stone to pity. Pythagoras being informed by Amenophis of the cause of Timareta's exile, and of Sesostris his sorrows, did imploy all his Physick of Philosophy to cure or comfort him, but all in vain; for not knowing where Timareta was, or could be, he continued in a most sad condition. In the mean while, Pythagoras being called away, he prepared for his departure; and since he resolved to be gone very timely in the morning, he took his leave of my Mother might of Amenophis, who happened to be so ill, that he could not bring him to his Boat. Sesostris knowing this, resolved to quit the Isle which was intolerable to him, and to go and seek Timareta; or at least to let Amenophis know, that he did him wrong, in denying the satisfaction of his desires. He communicated his design unto me, which I approved of, upon condition he would let me follow; for I must confesse I was weary of a narrow Isle, which had not one beauty in it worth my passion. But after a departure was agreed upon, the difficulty was how to execute it. As for me, the matter was easie, but Sesostris had many observant eyes upon him; yet he contrived a way to execute his design; for seeing Amenophis was sick, and could not conduct Pythagoras to the boat, he dissembled himself to be lame in a thigh, and not able to stand: So Amenophis seeing him not able to goe abroad, nor out of his bed, he could not imagine of any going out of the Isle, and therefore gave no strict orders to observe him, but trusting much in me, he did recomend unto me the care of Sesostris. In the mean time Pythagoras having, as I said before, taken his leave of Amenophis over night, after a promise never to reveal he was in the Isle, he came also to bid adieu unto Sesostris, and I only had orders to wait upon him the next morning. But, Sir, we knowing that there were two Shepheardesses which intended to goe the next morning unto Elephantine, I did so tamper with them, that I got one of their habits, which I carried secretly unto the chamber of Sesostris: And the custome of the Egyptian Villages being to wear great white plaited Mantles which cover them from head to foot, when they goe unto that Town, Sesostris took one of them to cover his shepherds habit, and covered his face with a hood as Shepheardesses use; so getting out of the Cabin unperceived, he came to the River side, and stayed with her that was to goe unto the Town: So that when Pythagoras came to embarque, Sesostris covered with his Mantle entered in also with those two women which were of the confederacy, whom I perswaded that there was no other mystery in the design, but that Sesostris being in love with Timareta, he would goe and seek her out: And these women much murmuring that Amenophis should hinder their Marriage, they consented unto our design; and Pythagoras never heeded these women more then he did the Rowers: But then the difficulty was how I should pretend my departure, and at last I hit upon it; and told Pythagoras with a confident look, that Amenophis commanded me to wait upon him as far as Elephantine, so that this Philosopher did not long contend with me, but imagined this to be onely a complement of civillitie: So I embarked with them, still looking whether Sesostris was well disguised. But, Sir, to trouble you no longer with things of such trivial consideration, be pleased to know we arrived at Elephantine: As soon as we landed, I took leave of my Philosopher, and followed my Shepheardesses, who stayed for me some twenty paces off; then Sesostris had nothing to doe, but to throw off his Mantle which covered his Shepherds habit. Thus in an instant from a Shepheardesse he became a Shepheard, and parted from his company, after he had sent a Letter by them unto Amenophis, which he had written before he came out of his Cabin, and if my memory faile not, it contained these words.

SESOSTRIS unto AMENOPHIS.

SIR,

I Ask your pardon for being more obedient unto Love then unto you: For I am forced to it. Certainly I deserve to be excused. Do not wonder, Sir, that since I cannot live without Timareta, I should goe to seek her all over the World. I am extream sorry for taking Miris from you; but obliging terms of friendship has forced him to doe almost as much for me as I doe for Timareta, and he will quit you to follow my fortunes, which might have been made happy if you would: But I wish yours may be better, and that I may see you again after, but not before I have found Timareta, who is as the life of SESOSTRIS.

After he had given this Letter to these women, I desired them to tell those that rowed the Boat, I would not return unto the Isle that day, therefore to let them return and not stay for me; and telling the women that Timareta lived beyond Elephantine. But, Sir, we found our selves put to a pittfull non plus; for we were given to understand that they landed Timareta on the other side of the River, and not at Elephantine; yet after we had well looked about us, and could not discover any Town where possibly she could be, we concluded she must be in this. This conceit put us into no lesse puzzle then before, since Sesostris had never been at Elephantine, and since I had been so long out of it, that I had forgot all the streets: Nor durst I on the other side goe unto my Mother; for I knew, if she found that I came without the order of Amenophis, she would stay me: But at last remembering that in my Infancy there was a great League of Friendship between me and another boy which was the onely Son of a very Rich man, I enquired of a Merchant which was in the Port concerning his Father; and I understood from this Merchant, that both the Father and Mother of my friend were dead; and that he was in possession of his Estate. Then I enquired where his house was, and we went immediately thither; and I desired to speak in private with him. So that after some patience in waiting, I was brought unto him, who at first knew me not, both by reason of my shepherds habit, and because I was much altered in my stature and face. But after I had talked with him, and revived the memory of our ancient acquaintance, he embraced me with much joy, and knew me perfectly. Then I told him, after I had enjoyed eternall and inviolable secrecie, how Amenophis since the death of Apriez had renounced the world, and took himselfe unto a desert, where he kept me, and that I being weary of that life, had escaped from him: after which, I presented Sesostris to him, under the notion of sonne unto Amenophis. In conclusion Sir, I carried the matter so handsomely, and found my friend so generous, that he entertained us in his house, and accommodated us with all things necessary whatsoever: In the mean time, we knew not where Timareta was, nor knew not where to seek her in so great a towne, though we sought her in all places, as well as in places where she was likely to be, as where not. The sight of so fair a Town did spring some ambitious thoughts in the heart of Sesostris, and the sooner to cause Amenophis to bring Timareta into the Isle againe, he resolved to goe into the Warrs, where he might satisfie his ambition at least, though not his love, and to get glory, though he could not get Timareta: He had no sooner formed this design in his imagination, but he imparted it unto me, and no sooner communicated but consented unto; and the sooner, because a report went, there was some commotion against Amasis in one of the Provinces in Aegypt: so that without any longer delay, I communicated our intentions unto my friend, who being of a very generous disposition, did furnish us with all things requisite, to put our selves in an equipage of Warre: thus quitting the Shepherds crook for a sword, we left Elephantine, not hearing any thing of Timareta; and indeed how was it to be hoped ever to heare of a simple Shepheardesse in such a Town as that? However, since Sesostris desired his Shepheardesse should know it was for love of her he left the Isle, I forgot to tell you Sir, that he had engraved some words upon a Sycomore which grew upon the Hill in the midst of the Isle, where Timareta used often to sit and enjoy the pleasant prospect, and where they had often held such amiable discourses in that place, as he was confident that if ever she returned, she would come unto that place, and find these words, Sesostris not being able to live where the faire Timareta is not, he is gone with a designe to dye assoon as he hath lost all hopes of finding her.

Page 94 But Sir, before I tell you any thing of our martiall voyage, give me leave to relate in few words, how Amenophis was astonished, when about two hours after the departure of Pythagoras, he understood he was gone as farre as Elephantine to conduct him; yet since he could not imagine Sesostris to be in a condition of going, he did not at first suspect his departure, but sending unto his chamber to ask whether he knew of my intentions, he was extremely amazed when he heard he was not there; he presently sent for all those that saw Pythagoras embarque, who all said they saw none but three Shepheardesses, the stranger, and my selfe; since the number of women in that Isle is not great, he sent out Traseas; Nicetis, and a servant, to enquire what women went unto Elephantine: but after an exact search, they found only two wanting; so that Amenophis not doubting but Sesostris went out of the Isle in disguise, he was extremely troubled, but knew no remedy, for there was not one Boat to be had in all the Isle to send after them, all being gone out to fish: but towards night, to put him out of all doubt of our flight, the two women returned, and gave him the letter, saying, they were much amazed when they found her whom they thought to be a Shepheardesse, to prove Sesostris: yet Amenophis did hardly beleieve them, and was as angry with them, as any so wise a man as he could be, with them which had failed rather out of simplicity then malice: However, without more delay, he sent Traseas, Nicetis, and a servant, with orders to stay two or three daies in Elephantine, and walk up and down the streets, Temples and publique places, to see if they could meet with them, not daring to go himselfe for feare of discovery; But do what they could, no tidings was to be heard of us, so that Amenophis was the saddest man alive: But since he saw that the violence of his passion had driven him away, he thought that perhaps the same passion might bring him back unto this Isle; yet he durst not call back Timareta so soon, lest Sesostris should have some design to take her away in her return, and so he might perhaps lose her for ever, not having her in his power which might invite his returne; nor durst he quit the Isle, lest Sesostris should return when he should not be there, so that he was forced to stay by himselfe to lament his miseries; yet was he never out of hope, for his knowledge in Astrology shewed him such happy presages for Sesostris, that maugre all malice of his fortune, he trusted more to the signes of the heavens, then to his sufferings upon earth; yet was he extremely sorry for the absence of Sesostris, for he understood that his stratagems to raise a party against the usurper, proved not effectuall, and that his private friends in Thebes, and Heliopolis had so well transacted; that the people did not only begin to rise, but men also of great quality began to declare themselves, especially in Thebes, where the spirit of revolt was ripe amongst the people, because Amasis when he came first to the Crown, to oblige the people unto a declaration for him, did tell the inhabitants, that he would restore their Town unto its antient lustre: for, Sir, you know that heretofore it was the prime town of all Aegypt, before the ever renowned Menez caused Memphis to be built, which since that, hath been the usuall aboad of all their Kings, by reason of the situation which is most Majestique, most pleasant and lovely in the world; so that as Memphis increased in wealth, Thebes decayed; and the inhabitants of Thebes knowing, that riches, greatnesse, and magnificence of towns, ariseth from the presence of Kings, they petitioned Amasis, that according to his promise, he would inhabit amongst them: nor had Thebes been so ready to declare for him, but in hopes of this: yea seeing him so far from keeping promise with them, that he caused his Tomb to be built at Memphis, as in the place where he would both live and dye: the friends of Amenophis found it an easie matter to make this a pretence for a revolt, and to engage Heliopolis in the interest of Thebes, because of the great traffique and commerce which was ever between those two Townes: This Amenophis saw, that if he had Sesostris in his power, he had a faire opportunity to make him known unto the people, and perhaps to cause an universall revolution in all Aegypt; for it was easie to make this Prince known, having Ladices Letter in his hands; and also having Traseas and Nicetis with him, knowing that Sesostris was the same child he brought into the Isle, about four or five yeares of age; also he had one of the Princes servants with him. In the mean time, since Amenophis could never effect his designes, unlesse he trusted and imparted them unto some: there was a man of good quality in Thebes, who knew that the sonne of Apriez was living, though he knew not where he was; for Amenophis would never impart the place of his retreat unto any, lest he should run some hazard; yet he could do no lesse then to send unto him, who said it was now a time to bring the sonne of Apriez, and to excuse the matter by saying, that this Prince was sick, and that assoon as he was in a condition to come unto Thebes, he would bring him. On the other side, Timareta, Page 95 though well pleased with so pleasant a Town as Elephantine was, and to be out of the course habit of a Shepheardesse, yet she did most sensibly lament the want of Sesostris; but she lamented in secret, not daring to complain unto any: and whilst Amenophis and Timareta were thus full of sorrowes, Sesostris was fuller then they: and, truly all the way we travelled towards some rendezvous of Warr, he talked of nothing but Timareta, and he grew so dull and melancholy, that there was a little quarrell almost risen between us: Then Sir, be pleased to know, that when we understood there was a province which revolted against Amasis, the question was, whether we should take the part of Amasis the usurper, or the side of the people which revolted from him? I being something elder then Sesostris, and remembered all the imprecations and curses against Amasis when he came to the Crown, my inclination and judgment was to fight against him: But Sesostris was of the contrary opinion, and would fight in the Army of Amasis against the revolters: my arguments were, that Amasis was an usurper; that all respects were due unto the legitimate King; that they of Thebes were no rebels, but just enemies unto a Tyrant, and consequently I thought it most just to take their part: On the contrary Sesostris he argued, that though Amasis was an usurper, yet they of Thebes were unworthy of assistance: for, (said he) if they were faithfull unto their Prince, why did they acknowledg Amasis? and since they did acknowledg him, why doe they now forsake him? were there a Prince descended from the royall race of our Kings unto whom the Crown should descend, then should I certainly fight on their side; or if they had only a design to revenge the death of Apriez, I would be on their side also, but since I hear their aimes are only at their private interests, and grandure of their Town, and for that they trouble all the Kingdome, it is but just if they perish: Also, I have heard Amenophis say, that it is better to obey one Master then many, and that a good Tyrant in peace, is better for the people then a just warr: Moreover, without any further reasons, I find my heart so inclinable to take the part of Amasis, that it is sufficient I tell you, that I can take no other. After this Sir, I submitted unto Sesostris, but it was with much ado; then we went unto the Army of Amasis, who then was under the command of Heracleon, who at present is your prisoner, and who was then the Kings favourite, not only because he was the man who had the greatest hand in setting him upon the Throne, but because his person pleased him; and though this warr was of that importance as might very well oblige Amasis to go into it himselfe; but the reason why he did not, was, because he was very sickly. At last Sir, we came to the camp, and seemed as men who would serve as volunteers: but Sir, as Sesostris had an excellent faculty in using a pike-staffe under the notion of a Shepheard, he had a better in using a sword under the notion of a souldier, for never was seen in Aegypt a man of so fine a garb in armes as he; he attracted the eyes of all, both officers and souldiers, but as his admirable behaviour did invite their looks in the camp, so it did much more when he fought: for Sesostris did things which certainly did surpass all that they could imagine of his valour: yet Heracleon was not a witness of it, for at the very first charge he was wounded, and so exceedingly, that he was carried out of the Camp, and could not return all that Battle, which was commanded by his Lieutenant Generall, whose name was Simandius; so the valour of Sesostris was not known unto Heracleon, but only by report: But Sir be pleased to know, that though we came into this camp only as simple volunteers, unknown unto any, yet the valour of Sesostris made us quickly known unto all the Army, for he did so highly and happily save the life of Simandius in a battle, that his fame flew as far as Heracleon and Amasis also: But Sir, the admiration was, that Sesostris who would be known for no more then a Shepheard, would have us change our names, though the names of Sesostris and Miris were so generall and common in Aegypt, that it was not likely we should be known: But the truth is, he was so afraid of being known to be a Shepheard, that he did as much as he could have done to hinder his being known to be the sonne of a King, if he had known his royall birth: so that taking upon him the name of Psammetites, as long as he was in the Army; it was under that name, and not Sesostris, that his reputation was divulged, both in the Army of Amasis, and in that of the enemy, and a hundred heroic acts, made him look upon as a man extraordinary. Simandius, in recompence that Sesostris had saved his life, would have given him a good command, but since he was resolved to return shortly unto Elephantine, to see whether his adored Timareta was returned to the Isle, he would not accept of it: However Sir, though Sesostris did miracles under the notion of Psammetites, and that in saving the life of Simandius, he only prevented the defeat of his army, yet the enemies side was very strong, and seemed to maintain their revolt very strongly: The Army wherein we were, scoffed at a report in Thebes, that a sonne of Apriez would ere long be in the head of their forces; Sesostris Page 96 was the first who affirmed that the enemy gave that out only to make their revolt seem more just, and that if it were true there were a sonne of Apriez, he would ere now have appeared in those skirmishes already fought: But after all this Sir, the time of year for field being spent, and Simandius being forced to retreat with his forces into Winter quarters, because the Nile began to swell, he would needs carry him who was so famous under the name of Psammetites, unto the Court, that he might receive from the King a recompence due unto his courage; but Sesostris to excuse himselfe with more civility from going, told him, that he would come to the Court as soon as he was in a condition to appear in it, without shame unto him, & therefore desired permission first to go home: Then Simandius asked where his home was, and Sesostris (as it was agreed between us) answered, it was at a town called Canopea, which gives the name unto one of the seven mouths of Nilus: so Simandius being glad to know the place where he, who saved his life, lived, did presse him no further, contenting himselfe with his promise of returning to court: yet he forced Sesostris to receive a very rich present of Jewels, and amongst the rest, a great medall of Gold, of which Amasis gave him many to bestow upon the like occasions, on the one side of which was the Kings picture, and on the other, that of Ladice, whose memory was still very dear unto him, not only because he ever loved her, but also because by her meanes he came to be King, though farre contrary to her intentions. But Sir the admiration is, that as Timareta had a great resemblance of the Princesse Ladice her Mother, so this medall had a great resemblance of Timareta, so that after we had taken leave of Simandius, and had looked upon this medall with more leasure, Sesostris rejoiced more at this adventure then is expressible; yet could not suspect any thing of the truth; for since this resemblance was not exactly perfect, and since he verily beleeveth Timareta was really the daughter of a Shepheard, he conceived it to be only an act of chance, for which he ought to render thanks unto the Gods: The very sight of this medall made us to return to Elephantine, with more hast, and more joy then we came from it, for after this happy adventure, he made no doubt but to find Timareta in the Isle: At last Sir, we arrived at Elephantine, and went to him with whom we were before entertained, who was much astonished to see us return in a better equipage then we were in at our departure. In the mean time, since Sesostris returned only for Timaretas sake, we were no sooner come to Elephantine, but he endeavoured to know whether she were returned to the Isle, and remembering very well that it was the day on which Boats did commonly come to the town, he walked towards the Port, and so happily, that he saw comming a Boat full of Shepheards, and Shepheardesses, yet would he not shew himselfe, but sent a servant which he had entertained during his voyage, to ask whether a maid called Timareta was at that present in the Isle? and being answered that she returned a few daies since, Sesostris without one minute of more delay, resolved upon a return also: but since he conceived that all the Shepheards would wonder to see him in that habit, and perhaps mock at him, he put on again his old habit of a Shepheard, which he left off when he went unto the Army; for my part I perswaded him to appear before Timareta in the same habit wherein he was, but he would not, and I am confident that if he had been really a Shepheard, he could not have done what he did, but being the sonne of a great King, though ignorant of it, his soul was above that kind of vanity, and thought it enough to let her see his martiall voyage had been happy, by giving her those Jewels which Simandius gave him, except that medall which had that fair resemblance: so Sesostris following his design, and I following him, we left our men and equipage of warr at my friends house, and waited for the people who were to return into the Isle, and who were extremely joyed when they saw Sesostris; he found also amongst them one of those women which helped him out of the Isle, after which Sesostris enquired for Timareta, Amenophis, and Edisea, but especially of Timareta, he understood that this fair maid was returned into the Isle with Edisea, but a thousand times fairer then ever he saw her; and that two daies after she came, Amenophis departed with a servant which he had along with him. Though Sesostris loved Amenophis very well, maugre his rigour, yet at this time he was very glad of his absence, and since he could talk of nothing but Timareta, as long as that little navigation lasted, she was all his discourse both with me and the Shepheards, who all knew he was in love: When we drew near our desert, he thought he saw some upon the hill in the midst of the Isle, where he had engraved some words upon the Sicomors; but it being too farr off to discern whether it was a Shepheard or a Shepheardesse, he asked me whether I saw one at the roote of that tree which grew just upon the very knab of the hill; he had no sooner said so, but that Shepheardesse who lent him her mantle at departure, began to speak: I'll lay my life said she to him, that it is Timareta, for since she returned, she is almost alwaies Page 97 there. Sesostris hearing this, did not doubt but it was she, so that his imagination supplying the defects of his eyes, he thought he discerned her stature and her habit, and thinking that she was only there to think upon him, he was extremely joyed; and his desire to see Timareta was so great, that he leapt the first out of the boat, almost before it touched land. In the mean time Sir, to let you know how unsearchable are the secrets of the Gods, and how vain all humane providence is, give me leave to tell you both how and why Amenophis departed: Be pleased to know then Sir, that those who began the commotion at Thebes, and Heliopolis, seeing no Sesostris appear, began to murmur against Amenophis, who had so long held them in hopes of seeing him, so that writing unto him to testifie their feares, that after they had assured the people, and published throughout all Aegypt that there was a sonne of Apriez living, after all this they should be forced to say, they were deceived, and that there is no such thing: Amenophis was forced to go himselfe (not daring to trust it in a letter) and satisfie them of all the passage: In the mean time, he caused Edisea and Timareta to return into the Isle, to the end, that if Sesostris returned, she might stay him, appointing Traseas and Edisea to tell him, that he had altered his opinion since his departure, and at his return would give him all possible satisfaction: also, conjuring Edisea to order it so, that the faire Shepheardesse might stay Sesostris if he returned: after which, Amenophis departed in a disguise and carried the Princesse Servant with him: And these were the motives Sir, which attracted Amenophis out of the Isle, and Sesostris in, and Timareta also: But to returne unto Sesostris, whom I left leaping hastily out of the Boat, the sooner to see his faire Shepheardesse; give me leave to tell you Sir, that he found her upon the top of the hill, and bottom of the Sicomore where Sesostris had imprinted his mind, and she every day since her return was reading it: this beauty he found in a musing posture, her eyes down, and walking softly, when he was coming hastily to her, to testifie his desires of seeing her, who being upon a sudden sweetly surprised with the sight of her dear Sesostris, and to see his face so full of joy, had good cause to think his heart was as full of love; both their joyes were so high, that they were not able to expresse them by their words, yet at last they spoke, but it was both at once, but yet they understood each other, for upon such occasions, regular set civilities are not the most obliging, but there is a certain disorder of spirit, & confusion of words, which plea seth much better, then any studied complements of quaint language, which perhaps signifie nothing, at most, nothing to the purpose: but after they had vented what their first raptures permitted them, Timareta saluted me, and Sesostris saluted Edisea, who followed Timareta some twenty paces from her: these two lovers were both so equally disordered with a pleasing surprise, that Timareta in speaking to me called me Sesostris, and Sesostris called Edisea Timareta: this little reciprocall error had different effects, for Sesostris was very glad to heare Timareta use his name in lieu of mine, nor was he sorry for calling Timareta, in lieu of Edisea, thinking she would thereby know, that his thoughts did run on her: but as for Timareta, she was vexed at her selfe for being so surprised, that she blusht for shame: This pretty error was not only the joy of Sesostris at the first meeting, but it was highly augmented to see Timareta a thousand times more faire and charming then she was at his departure: she was grown taller, her neck was in another, but better modell, she was grown plump, her complexion was polished, her eyes more lustrous, her behaviour more gracefull and free; all which, made her infinitely more amiable. Moreover, the beauty of her mind was as much bettered, as that of her body, and her being at Elephantine, had so taught her the air and garb of the world, that she seemed to be, as indeed she was, a great Princesse, disguised in the habit of a Shepheardesse: Sesostris for his part, was grown infinitely more amiable also, his behaviour was more high, and his spirit more bold and refined: Thus these two young persons, finding each other worthy of fresh admiration, it is no wonder if their affections were greater then before, yet for all this, there was some such alterations in the way of Timareta, as made Sesostris have many an angry houre; for as this young beauty did certainly love more then before, so she did expresse it lesse; so that at the first private conference which they had together, after the return of Sesostris, he complained of her cruell change in her behaviour, who being now more circumspect then when she was young, would not let all her heart be seen in her tongue: I beseech you fair Timareta said he unto her, from whence proceeds this alteration which I perceive in you? and why do you treat me more seriously and more coldly then before you used? You may (replied she and smiled) leave out one of your last words, which you used, since I have done nothing which can make you think I treat you more coldly; I confesse I have left off a little of my childish simplicity, and merriments of my infancy. Ah Timareta, replied he, do not under the colour of that cruell expression deprive me of that sweetness which Page 98 heretofore you blessed me withall; but let me at the least take some consolation in things that are past, though I cannot in the things present. To shew you that I am not rigorous (said Timareta to him) I promise you never to forget how I owe my life unto you, but at the same time I conjure you to forget all the innocent passages of my infancy, not to regulate in mea[su]re the rest of my life by what is past; for truly Sesostris, I have spoke a hundred thousand things, which makes me blush to think of them, and which I shall never speak againe: Why? (said Sesostris) do you think it just, you should treat me worse then you did, because you have more spirit and witt then you had? and because you are more faire, and consequently I more your captive, therefore you should be more rigorous to me? I conceive said she <...> d and smiled, that now there is more decorum to be observed; and though I should love you, yet I should not tell you so, but it is your part only to guesse at it: It must needs be confessed said Sesostris, that this fashion is a little too Tyrannicall and unjust, for am I not the very same I was when you lived in more freedome with me? No, said she unto him, you are now a much more refined man: But admit I be replyed he, must you therefore use me worse? No, replied she, but I doe it to get more of your esteem: Ah, Timareta, answered Sesostris, rigour is an ill expedient, whereby to get the esteem of a lover: I assure you said she, I think it is a better then indulgence: For all your rigour <◇> (said he, and shewed her the medall which Simandius gave him) you cannot hinder me from having your picture: 'tis true, said he, it does not fully resemble you, but however it is not more unlike you, then your self is, to what you were unto me in that age when you suffered me to look on your eyes without turning them away. Timareta taking this medall, and looking upon it, was extreemly surprised, to find the figure of a woman on the one side of it, whose aire did much resemble hers; so that having a longing desire to know how he came unto it, and how it came to resemble her, she began to be importunate with him to tell her: Then would he according to his intentions, have given her all that Simandius gave him, yet by no means would she receive them, but pressed him still to tell her, how he got so much riches, and asking him further, how after this he could return to be a Shepherd: Give me leave (said he unto her) to begin my answer, where you ended, and to tell you, that I am a Shepherd because you are a Shepheardesse, and when you leave being so, I will then cast away my Crook; and for all the rest (said he, seeing mee coming towards them) you may know them from the mouth of Miris. As I heard these last words, I asked Timareta, after I had saluted her, what it was I should tell her, and she telling me, I made a relation of our voyage; but since I was to acquaint Timareta with the valour of Sesostris, he would needs impose silence upon me; but seeing he could not, he rose up and went to Edisea who was coming towards us; so I made an exact relation of all his acts, how great a reputation he had gotten under the name of Psammetites, and which way he came by the medall; but whilst I related all these things, I perceived such joy in the eyes of Timareta, as plainly appeared Sesostris was not a little in her favour. In the mean time Sir, what assurances soever Edisea gave this amorous Shepherd, that Ame[n]ophis had changed his mind, and promised at parting, that at his returne he would give him full satisfaction; yet he had a mistrust in all these faire words, and if Timareta had not been as wise as faire, Sesostris had certainly carried her away out of the Isle, before the returne of Amenophis: but she was so angry at the very first motion of it, that he never durst think of it afterwards, for she continued three whole daies, and would not speak unto him, though he courted her with all imaginable plausibility: yet after a thousand petitions for a pardon, and as many promises to submitt totally unto her will, Sesostris made his peace, and resolved according to the orders of this fair Shepheardesse, to rest quiet untill the returne of Amenophis; so that after this reconciliation, wherein I was a mediator, they lived together without the lest jarre, unlesse only such as are essentiall reintegrations of love, as are every day, both in and out a hundred times; yet was their tranquillity much molested by the death of Edisea, who being gone, Timareta had no reasonable conversation but in the company of Sesostris. Traseas doubtlesse was a man of much spirit, and was much civilized by the long communication of Amenophis; Nicetis his wife was also a little more sociable, by the company of Edisea: but for all that, they were nothing suitable to the youth and aire of Timareta; and therefore having no other agreeable company, she was the more joyed in that of Sesostris, yet ever with much reservednesse, making it appeare, that she would give her selfe no more liberty, then Edisea her governesse would were she living: yet this reservednesse had nothing in it but modesty, without any rigour or severlity; so that after all teares were dried up for the death of Edisea, Sesostris was without any inquietudes, but to see Amenophis returned not; and because he thought the longer his absence was, the more was his happiness deferred: But Sir, his longing expectations of Amenophis Page 99 were all in vaine, for he was faine into a desperate Adventure. For be pleased to know Sir, that as he was going to the places where all the Officers of that faction which he had raised, were covered, he was so unfortunate, as in going through the Town of Nea, which is in the Province of Thebes, and where there was a sedition raised, that Amenophis and his servant, chanced to be in the midst of this Tumult, against their wills: In the mean time, as ill lucke was, one of the principall men of the Town was hurt, and was so near Amenophis and his servant, that they with many others were taken as authors of this sedition, the party of the hurt man prevailing against the other. Thus was Amenophis and his servant a long while prisoners; for being strangers, they had no support, Amenophis not daring to make use of any his friends in Thebes, since those who were masters of this Town were for Amasis: So than he was forced to trust onely unto his innocency: But those who were reall Criminals, and were taken with him, they had kindred and friends in the Town, they were released, and the innocent more closely kept in their Prison. Yet could they not proceed unto judgement against them, because they would first see of him who prosecuted against them, being in his bed; it was long before they could be certain whether he would mend or end, live or die; so that the punishment being to be more or lesse rigorous according to the event, Amenophis and his servant were kept Prisoners, not being able, or daring if they could, to apply themselves unto any, Amenophis was extreemly grieved at one thing, for he found that he had lost Ladices letter to Amasis in the Tumult, by means of which he hoped hereafter to make Sesostris and Timareta known, and which he would needs carry with him, both because he would by it justify himself unto his friends, and because he would not trust it any where but where he was himself. But whilst he was in this pittifull Condition, the Nile did swell, & afterwards returned again within its ordinary banks, as alwaies it used towards Winter. Heracleon drawing his Forces out of the winter Garrisons, did suppress those which revolted, and almost quite defeated them, so that they were forced all to retreat into Thebes. Yet Heracleon could not besiege them, but contented himself with being Master of the field, and have, by this action, obtained greater favour with the King. This happy successe perswading Amasis, that his best course to keep the People in their obedience, was to shew himself in all his Provinces, and to Perambulate all his Kingdom; he began to go from Town to Town, to win their spirits, and to imprint a new Respect. And that his voyage might seeme onely a Progresse of Peace; the King would have all his Court with him: at last Sir, he came to Elephantine: and hee was no sooner there, but the imperfection and weaknesse of his eyes did so augment, that hee thought he should have quite lost his sight: but that which did most affright him, was a terrible apparition which he then saw: I am confident it was rather one of those mysterious dreams, which sometimes foretells men of future accident, then a reall apparition: however it it was, Amasis said, that when he awaked one night, an hour before day, he saw, or at least thought he saw a gloomy light, by the help of which, he perceived the Ghost of Apriez, and distinctly saw the wounds he received; when he was most barbarously massacred: The body was all bloody and disfigured: but the great amazement of all, was to see following the dead King, the Princesse Ladice, in a great sad mourning Mantle, who looking upon him with a menacing kind of action, and angry eyes, began to speak these words, in such a lamentable, Penetrating and terrible a tone, that Amasis was almost out of his wits. Know (said shee, and shewed him this unfortunate King) that this unhappy Prince whom thou didst destroy, hath left a Son: and if thou dost not restore unto him that Crown which thou didst pull from the head of his Father: thou shalt never see any other more pleasing object then this thou now seest, but shall see it, or worse continually. Yes, too ambitious Amasis, (pursued the Ghost) than shalt neither see thy Subjects, nor the Scepter which thou most injuriously holdst: nor the infant which I left thee, nor the common light: but thou shalt eternally see me upbraiding thee with thy Crime, untill thou enterest into thy holy Tombe: After this a thousand flashes of Red, Blue, and Black Flame appeared, wherein the bodies of Apriez and Ladice vanished: These Flames were accompanied with so great a noise, as he thought the Chamber shook: so that passing out of these affrighting flames into a dismall obscurity, and out of a horrid noise into a deepe silence, Amasis was so troubled that hee knew not what to think or resolve upon: his wonder was doubled, when he was told in the morning, that it rained a whole hour together in the night: For Sir, since Rain was never seen in that part of Aegypt, the Prodigie did the more affright him. But he had another cause of fear: For newes was brought, that Apis, whose Birth had rejoiced all Aegypt a little before, was dead with the flash of Lightning and a thunder; I will not explain what this Apis was amongst us, for I know Sir, you cannot be ignorant of it: By these you may know that Amasis Page 100 had some causes of fear, and the more, because the Statue of Osiris which he erected before his Palace, fell down in the night; yet would this Prince conceale his astonishment, and sent to consult with the Oracle of Latona at the Town of Bulte, which is the most renowned of all in Egypt: But this Oracle did not give him any satisfaction, for it answered him in obscure terms. That if he would have his Posterity Raign after him, he must restore that Scepter which he had usurped, unto him who had right unto it: or otherwise he should not only lose his sight, but his eyes and life. Amasis then seeing himself so cruelly threatened, and finding that really his sight did weaken, began to strive against his ambition, and would have overcome it, yet hee could not bring it about: so that endeavouring all manner of waies to secure himself, he began to transact as if he apprehended nothing, in his heart he was full of continuall apprehensions: This being the state of things, they brought Ladices Letter unto Amasis, which Amenophis lost in the Tumult, and which was found by an Officer of Amasis in that Towne, who sent it unto the King, not knowing who lost it: It coming unto the hands of the King, he no sooner saw it, but notwithstanding the weaknesse of his eyes, he perfectly knew the Character: you may easily imagine that he read it with wonder, and application; and the more because he was extreemly joyed to understand that Ladice had left him a child: But Sir, one thing chanced which is worthy of observation: For Ladices letter was so tumbled in the tumult, that it could not be discerned whether it mentioned a Son or a Daughter, but it was more like to be a Son then a Daughter. He saw in the place where shee spoke of a child which she left; it was this

Know then that I have left you a—which you shall never see unlesse you render the Scepter unto the young Sesostris.

In the mean time, since he understood by this letter, that when Ladice writ it the young Sesostris was alive; yet he never thought of restoring the Scepter unto him. But intended onely to leave it unto the Child which Ladice left, whether it was Son or Daughter. He had also a conceit that perhaps Ladice was not dead: and he was so blinded with ambition, that he began already to dispose of this Child, though it was not in his power, nor knew where to look, it, no, nor was certain of its life: Then he told Heracleon, that since his late Father helped him unto the Crown, it were just he should transerre it into his house: and therefore he promised him, that if he could find the Child which the gods had given him, he would then pay those debts which he owed unto his house in generall, and unto his valour in particular: passing his word, that if it proved a Daughter, he would marry her unto him: and if a Son, he should marry the Princesse his Sister, whose name was Liserina: who knowing that her brother was at Elephantine, came thither to see him; this Princesse being then not above three furlongs from that Town. In the mean while, this letter being found in a publique place, none knew who lost it: So that Amasis was much perplexed; and the more, because it appeared by this letter, that the Son of Apriez lived when it was written; yet hee was perswaded that now he was dead, because he appeared not at Thebes, and in the head of the revolted Army: However to be the better satisfied, he remembered that Amenophis departed from Says with the Queen, and knew that he was of the Town of Elephantine; also he imagined, that he could perhaps resolve him of what he so much desired to know, and therefore he would cause a strict search to be made in all that great Town and places about it, he would also ask all his kindred that he found: But my mother hearing of these intentions, she went presently out of Elephantine: So that she onely being able to give them any intelligence of him, their search came to nothing. But at last the Governor of that Town, understanding that no search had been made in our Isle; but the King hearing of it, as if hee were prompted by a powerful instinct, commanded a search to be made there, and an account of what was found to be given unto him. The Kings Command being the same hour executed, we were much astonished to see the officers of Elephantine come betime in the morning into our Isle, who went from Cabine to Cabine, asking who dwelt there; so that ours being the greatest in all the Isle, they were sure not to baulk it. Thraseas answered for all his Familie, whom they desired to see, so that Timareta, Sesostris and I appeared before the men, who no sooner saw us, but they began to examine very closely who we were. But Sir, before I precisely acquaint you with the answers of Thraseas: give me leave to tell you, that some daies before Amenophis departed from the Isle, the Princes servant who knew he was to depart, and who exceedingly loved Sesostris, desired Thraseas extreem earnestly, to have an especiall care of him if ever he returned into the Isle, and not to let him go out again. Thraseas being a man of good wit, could not chuse but be full of curiosity, and imagine that Sesostris Page 101 and Timareta both were of some Noble births: for Amenophis had confessed that the Queen and Ladice were women of great quality, who fled from the persecution of the new King; also he had some glances of the abundance of Jewels belonging unto these two Princesses, which Amenophis caused his servant to hide, before he departed the Isle: Traseas tried all manner of waies a hundred times over, to know who Sesostris and Timareta were, but all in vaine; but at last he thought he had found a way to oblige this servant unto a confession: he told him therefore, when the Servant desired him to have such a care of Sesostis if he returned, that he would have no care of him, unless he would tell him who he was: At first, the servant refused, as he had many a time before; but at last upon a thousand promises of inviolable fidelity, and the servant finding Traseas ever both faithfull and affectionate: also thinking it would be advantageous, if he knew that Sesostis was the sonne of Aprieze, and legitimate King of Aegypt; and after he had sworn unto him by Osiris and Isis, that he should never betray him: Know Traseas (said he unto him) that thou art in a possibility ere long to be above thy quality; for this Princesse who was buried here was the wife of Aprieze, and the mother of Sesostis, and she who dyed in giving life unto Timareta, was the wife of Amasis: so Traseas thou maiest have in thy power, the sonne of the legitimate King, and the daughter of the usurper: Judge after this, whether thou beest not the happiest of men, since which side soever fortune turne, thou wilt have in thy power that person who ought to weare the Crown of all Aegypt. After the servant had told all he knew, Traseas was extreemly joyed, and promised inviolable fidelity and secrecy. After this Sir, you may well imagine, that when Traseas saw these men in his Cabin, who asked so precisely who Sesostis was, who Timareta was, and who I was, he had good reason to be astonished; but to prevent all crosse interrogatories, and lesse in danger to contradict himselfe, he said we were his children, and that Nicetis was our mother, never naming Amenophis at all: At first the answer of Traseas did surprise both Sesostis and me, yet imagining there was some secret reason which we were ignorant of, we did not contradict him. In the meane time, those who made such strict inquisition, looked upon Sesostis with admiration, and upon Timareta with as much, and put many questions unto Traseas, unto which he answered very directly; but so did not Nicetis, for though she heard her husband say, we were their children, yet when they began to examine her, and ask, how their family did subsist, in lieu of a direct answer, she said, that having but one daughter, they might easily subsist: so that the men finding a contradiction between her and her husband, presently supposed some hidden matter in the wind, and the more, because Traseas endeavouring to mend what his wife had said, replied, that Nicetis did not call Sesostis and me her children, because he had us by another wife, but for all this we were her children: however, Nicetis not liking what her husband said, she began to grumble, that when Amenophis returned he would not think well that any should take his sonne from him. The name of Amenophis was no sooner pronounced, but one of the officers belonging to Amasis, being amongst them who made the search, made no doubt but they had found what the King desired to know, for he knew that the King had clapt up all the kindred of Amenophis, and he knew further, that he fled away with the Queen and Ladice: so that drawing his company aside, he left them in the Isle, and went immediatly to acquaint the King with his discovery: Amasis no sooner heard all these circumstances, but he thought them probable conjectures to find in that Isle what he sought for, and would goe himselfe to be better informed in a businesse of so great importance: and being then in the Princesse Liserina's chamber, where Heracleon also was, he would have them go with him; for, said he unto them both, you have as much interest as I have, in the businesse I am about, since I have already told you, if I have a sonne, he shall marry the Princesse, Liserina, and if a daughter, she shall marry Heracleon: so Sir, the officer of Amasis confirming his report, with many probable conjectures, Amasis made no question but to find satisfaction: He embarked then with the Princesse Liserina, Heracleon, and five or six persons of quality, and no more, for upon this occasion he would have no greater attendants; so they came unto the Isle, and in landing, you may imagine, Sir, what prayers unto the Gods the ambitious Heracleon made, that Amasis might find a daughter, and you may also imagine how Liserina wisht him to prove a sonne. In the mean time, Traseas observed, that this officer returned unto Elephantine, and he no sooner had a hint that Amasis would come into the Isle, but he imagined that he came to enquire, what was become of the Queen, of Sesostis, and Ladice; so that Traseas reasoning after this manner, and having no time to instruct Sesostis, because there were many observant eyes upon them, he walked only towards him, and in passing, Page 102 told him, it concerned his whole fortune not to contradict him: as soon as he had said so, without any wonder or disorder in himselfe, he sat down before his cabin, Sesostis standing by, and leaning upon his Shepherds hook. But Sir, as those who have any designs to please are no waies negligent in their cloaths, wherein the handsomest persons, may lose something of their complacence, Timareta and Sesostis were so handsome that day, and so gallant in their habits (though only in the homely simplicity of a Shepherd and a Shepheardesse) that none could look upon them without admiration. In the mean time, the King drawing near the Cabin, Traseas rose up, and went to look upon him, seeming as if he could not beleieve that the King could have any thing to say unto him: Sesostis, Timareta, and I followed him; on the other side, the King coming straight towards us, that officer who before had seen us, pointed to us with his hand as he spoke unto the King: a man of quality led the Princesse Liserina. But Sir, Heracleon no sooner cast his eyes upon Timareta, but he made a million of secret prayers unto the Gods, that she might prove the daughter of Amasis: and Liserina no sooner saw Sesostis, but she most earnestly desired he might prove the Kings sonne: as for Amasis, he passionately desired a successor, and not a daughter: After he had looked upon Sesostis and Timareta, he took Traseas aside, and without any witness but Heracleon, he charged him to tell the truth, after which he asked him where Amenophis was? and what was become of the Queen, the young Sesostis, and the Princesse Ladice? For I am sure (said the King (though he knew not but by conjectures) that they were in this Isle. Traseas finding by the manner of the Kings speaking, that he was not so well informed as he said he was, resolved to prosecute his former designe, which was, Sir, not to confesse that Sesostis was the sonne of Aprieze, lest then he should perish in the hands of his enemy; but to tell him on the contrary, that he was the sonne of Ladice and himselfe: For, argued he unto himselfe, so Sesostis doe raigne, what matters it whether it be as the sonne of Aprieze, or as the sonne of Amasis? Traseas being thus resolved, did not deny, but that the Queen was in this Isle; but for the furtherance of his project, he seemed as if he were ignorant that she, who came with the Queen was his wife: he confessed that the Queen and Sesostis came into this Isle, with another Princesse who dyed three daies after her arrivall, and her death gave life unto a sonne: adding, that four daies after a contagious disease happening in the Isle, the Queen and the young Sesostis dyed also, and since that, Amenophis gave the name of Sesostis unto the sonne of this Princesse who dyed in child-bed of him. Where is the Child? (said the King) Sir, (replied Traseas) this is he I speak of, who thinks Amenophis to be his Father, and whom of late, I have said to be my sonne, because Amenophis was wondrous carefull to conceal him, though I knew not his reason for it, but was so bold as to say he was mine. But where is Amenophis said the King? Sir, replied Traseas, I doe not know, only I am sure he recommended Sesostis unto me. Oh Heracleon, said the King, questionlesse this Traytor who carried away the Queen and Ladice from Sais, had a design to arme my owne sonne against me, by perswading the people that he was the son of Aprieze: yes, yes, Heracleon, 'twas he that made the people of Thebes beleieve that he was alive, and doubtlesse his design was, to have my sonne to be taken for that Prince. But Traseas (said the King who knew his name) may I give credit unto your words? must he whom you shew unto me weare the Crown after me? Yes Sir, replied Traseas, if the Princesse Ladice were your wife: moreover Sir, doe not think that I conceal the sonne of Aprieze, command me to prison, and if any other Sesostis but this be found, then put me to death. But, (said Heracleon, who was nothing pleased that Amasis should have a son after such fair promises) the danger is not in your concealing Sesostis, but the point is, to know certainly that this is not Sesostis the sonne of Aprieze, and that he who came from Sais dyed, and not the Child of the Princesse Ladice. Traseas hearing Heracleon urge this, began to confirm his words with a thousand deep Oathes: But whilst Heracleon and Traseas were in contest about it, the King remembering the Apparition of Ladice, and all the rest of the prodigies, his heart began to tremble, the guilt of his crimes so gnawed upon his conscience, that he could have wished for a sonne of Aprieze, unto whom he might have rendered the Scepter, so that not insisting upon such niceties as Heracleon did, he did beleieve that Sesostis was either his owne sonne, or the sonne of Aprieze, so that which soever he was, he deserved to raigne, he resolved to acknowledg him after he had well examined others in the Isle, who spoke nothing in contradiction of what Traseas said. In the mean while, all the youngers of the Isle were assembled to see the King, and not daring to approach too neer, they got tenn or twelve of them upon a thatcht Sheep-fold, the better to look upon him, but the timber being rotten, both Sheep-fold and Shepherds tumbled down together, and it fell so neare the Princesse Liserina (who being much taken with the beauty of Timareta, Page 103 had called her unto her) that she could easily see the wonderfull accident which this little disorder caused: For Sir, be pleased to know it happened to be in the very same place where Amenophis before his departure had caused all the Queens and Ladices Jewells to be hid, so that two Boxes in which they were, being broke open with the fall, one might perceive a thousand Rich Diamonds glistening amongst the rubbish of this old sheepfold: The Princesse Liserina no sooner espied them, but she cried out, not being lesse amazed at the sight, then those shephcards with their falls: The screeke she made, caused the King to turn towards her, and she telling him what she spied, he came to her, and himselfe saw the cause of her wonder: so that commanding all the Jewells to be gathered up, and brought unto him, he presently knew the case of a Picture which Ladice was wont to wear, and which was very remarkable, and likewise many other Jewells which he had seen both the Queen and Ladice wear. After this, making no question but they had been in the Isle, he gave more credit unto the reports of Traseas, & questioned not but that Sesostis was his Son. But Heracleon, having yet a mind to hinder that belief, observed unto Amasis, that Sesostis was too big and tall for that age which his Son could be off, and therefore could not be his Son. Traseas answered unto this objection, that it was every daies experience to find some of fourteen or sixteen years of age as well grown as others of twenty, and the King adhered unto that argument. In conclusion Sir, Amasis believing in his very heart he was either his Sonne or the Sonne of Aprieze; he would examine the matter no further, knowing that it would be a stronger support unto him to have Successor, then not. He since confessed, that if at this time it had appeared clearly in the eyes of the World, that Sesostis was the Sonne of Aprieze, he would not have treated him as he did. But seeing it appeared he was not his Sonne, he could not make him passe so, and restore the Scepter unto him, unless it did appear to be a Restitution, therefore he would not make the businesse so intricate as perhaps he should if he had not had that thought. But he enquired as much as he could to know whether Sesostis was his or the Sonne of Aprieze. Whilst he was thus busied, Simandius who came with the King, and had stayed behind speaking with some of his friends, and being now come up, he began to look upon Timareta, whose wonderfull beauty attracted the eyes of all the World, but afterwards turning towards Sesostis, who yet saw not him, he presently knew him to be the valiant Psammmites unto whom he was debtor for his life; so that coming to him, whilst the King was in talke with Traseas, Heracleon, and Liserina: Is it possible, (said he unto him) that the valiant Psammmites, who knows how to use a sword so gloriously, had rather take a sheephooke in an Island, then come to the Court, where preparation of great recompence was made for his virtues? Sesostis knowing Simandius, was exceedingly ashamed to be seen in so meane a habit, and hee blusht; but endeavouring to recollect himselfe, Sir, said hee unto him and smiled, he thinks it would be as much for your honour as mine, if you seemed at this time not to know me. No, no, said Simandius, I cannot endure any false Glory, and therefore though you be but a simple shepherd, yet you merit to be a King, and I must publish to the world, that I am a debtor unto you for my life, and the King for a victory. Amasis then turning himself with intention to call Sesostis, and acknowledge him for his Son, Simandius taking Sesostis by the arme, presented him unto Amasis, Behold Sir, (said he unto him) look upon the person of this lovely Shepherd: this is the valiant Psammmites which I told you of, who only won the battle. The King was surprised at the words of Simandius, that he told him he was grossly mistaken, for you call this Shepherd Psammmites, said he, and every one assures me his name is Sesostis: I cannot tell Sir, replied Simandius, how they call my preserver in this Isle, but I am sure he called himself Psammmites in the Army. Sesostis perceiving that the changing his name, did extreemly puzzle the King, Simandius and Traseas, who knew not any thing of his martiall voyage, began to speak, and satisfie their wonders; since Simandius will needs have it so (said he with an excellent grace,) and that I must have the honour to be known unto your Majestie, I must needs confesse, that in changing my profession, I changed my name also: And that whilst I was a Souldier, I assumed the name of Psammmites: But why did you return to this Isle and take a Shepherds hook, (said the King even ravished with joy, that he whom he should acknowledge for Sonne, was worthy to be so,) rather then to come unto the Court? Sesostis then being put to a Nonplus, would not say that it was for the love of Timareta, but to colour his return, he said, that since he went out of the Isle without his Fathers consent, he repented, and would return to ask pardon. However it be Sir, said Simandius to the King, this Shepherd is the most valiant man in your Majesties Kingdome: and I am confident that the Great Sesostis, and the renowned Psammmites, both which names he bears, were neither of Page 104 them more valiant then he? At least not more great then he is like to be (Replied Amasis) for I do declare unto you all and all the World, that this Sesostis whom you see here, is my Sonne. In saying so, Amasis would have embraced him: But Sesostis throwing himself at his feet, told him with much humility and wonder, that he was unworthy of this honour: Yet rise he must, for the King did so command him, appointing all those about him to regard him as successor. It is imaginable Sir, that this declaration was nothing pleasing unto Heracleon: but on the contrary, that it was all joy unto the Princesse of Liserina. On the other side, the fair Timaretta, seeing her dear Sesostris, ready to change his Sheephook for a Scepter, was infinitely ravished. But this her joy had no sooner filled her eye, then her heart began to sigh in secret, when she considered that now she was like to lose Sesostris, and perhaps, for ever; Sesostris whose great Soul was most sensible of glory, could not chuse but be glad to see hee was now no Shepherd: But when in the height of all his joyes, he looked upon his fair Timaretta, and considered that now he must leave her, his sorrowes did so mixe and moderate his joyes, that the King could not enough admire the greatnesse of his Soul, which was so little moved at such surprising and advantageous newes. In the mean time, Heracleon (whose fate was to have a Soul which was tyrannized over by the most violent passions) in the midst of all his sorrowes to see the Princesse Liserina more happy then himself, could not chuse but look upon the fair Timaretta with much admiration. He checkt himself a hundred times for looking upon her, yet looked upon her a hundred times whether he would or no: In the meane time the King finding more cause to think Sesostris his Sonne, since he had taken his part against the Rebells of Thebes, did not pause upon what he had to do, or what he had done: but after he had given the Princesse Liserina all those Jewells which were found in that Isle, which he said belonged unto him, either as successor unto Apriez, or as husband unto Ladice; and after he had told the Shepherds he would give them as much as they were worth, and told Traseas he would make him a happy man, he turned to Sesostris, and asked him whether hee would goe with him unto Elephantine? Sesostris hearing the King aske that question, beseeched him not to shame him so much as to carry him thither in that habit, but that he would be pleased to let him stay in the Isle until such time as he was in a better equipage: also Sir, said he unto him, it is but fit you give me one day or two to prepare my self for Grandure, lest the Luster of it upon a suddain should dazzle my eyes: Noe, noe my Sonne, replied Amasis, there is no fear, but he who can surpasse the bravest men of all Aegypt in valour, is sufficiently prepared for the quality unto which he is born. For all this Sesostris would not consent, but used such handsome arguments as moved the King unto so much complacencie, as to satisfie his desire, thinking indeed, that the people who are alwaies most taken with outward appearances, would not be so well pleased to see him in a Shepherds habit. So it was resolved to leave him all the day following in the Isle, for an equipage proportionable to his quality could not be prepared in lesse time. Yet the King would not leave him without some of his Servants; therefore he commanded the Captain of his Guard to stay in the Isle with twelve of his companions. Amasis, by reason of the horrid apparition, and other things which took up his thoughts, never minded what a resemblance there was between Timaretta and Laldice. As for Heracleon and Liserina, they had never seen Ladice. However, Amasis retired, after he had bestowed a complement upon the Princesse Liserina which Sesostris understood not, but she well enough: So that she looking upon this lovely Shepherd as a great Prince, as a great Prince who hereafter should be King, and who should make her a Queen, she was as complacentiall, as civil, and as loving to him as possibly she could be. Since shee was very fair, she did not doubt but the heart of Sesostris would become her Conquest; nor did shee imagine he was in love with Timaretta, or ever would be, for she being of an ambitious disposition, she measured the mind of Sesostris by her own: And made no question, but if hee had any passion towards her, he would leave it with his sheephook: Thus Liserina left him, with as much joy in her heart as in the Kings, who was beyond all expressions ravished that he had a successor. But quite contrary with Heracleon, who after his hopes in seeing Timaretta, thought to enjoy the greatest beauty in the World, and the Prime Crown of all the Universe; yet now saw all the satisfaction of his ambition choaked. But after the King was gone out of the Isle, Sesostris must needs receive all the complements which the Shepherds would present him withall: For since naturally he had a soul full of all sweetnesse and civility, he would not so soon take upon him that state, which his quality conferred upon him, so that it was impossible for him to speake in private that day with his dear Timaretta; and the more difficult, because the Captain of the Guard desiring to be the first in favour with the new Prince, did not leave him at all. I also had much a doe to testifie my joyes at his happinesse: Page 105 Yet as well as I could I confessed my great desires of telling him I knew Amenophis was not a Shepherd, and begg'd his pardon for not telling him, excusing my self with the menaces of Amenophis if I did: Also Sir, alwaies thinking that Sesostris was his Sonne, I could imagine no end he had in it, but to conceale himself. But to return Sir where I left, be pleased to know Sir, that Sesostris, and Timaretta, did not speak unto each other but in the language of their eyes, and that neither so much as usual: for the respects which Timaretta began to have of him, infused such a constraint into her looks, as eclipsed all the sweetnesse of them; and which made Sesostris, who was accustomed to know the most secret thoughts of her heart by them, not to understand their Language: But the next morning being come; and knowing that the day following, they would carry him unto Elephantine, he resolved to talk with Timaretta: in order to which, love moved him unto the first Command upon those about him, though he was resolved not to take upon him as a Prince, until he had left off the habit of a Shepherd: But seeing that if he did not, he could not talke with Timaretta, and knowing that she was gone to the top of the hill without any company, but one Shepheardesse, hee followed her, and commanded the captain of the guard not to follow him: This Prince then being rid of all interrupters of his talk with Timaretta, went up the Hill, and when he came to the top, he found his fair Timaretta sitting at the roote of a tree, wiping her eyes as if she had been crying: Sesostris seeing his Shepheardesse in this sad condition, sighed, and with such reall sorrow, as I am confident, if fate had been in his owne choice, he would have preferred a Sheephook before a Scepter, and the gathering of sheep before people: After then he had a while contemplated upon the cruelty of his good fortune, he advanced towards Timaretta, with intentions to throw himselfe at her feet, and with the same respects he used: but the fair Timaretta, turning her head at the noise of his walking, and spying Sesostris, she more and more wiped off her teares, after which, striving to bring joy in her eyes, she rose up, and saluting Sesostris with a more reverent civility then ordinary: What do you think of me Sir, (said she unto him) for not finding some opportunity to expresse my joyes at your good fortune, and grandure unto which you are raised? But Sir, since my destiny is to live with Shepherds, not Princes, I durst not be so bold as to tell you my thoughts. Ah cruell Timaretta (said he to her) why why speak you thus unto me? can you think the alteration of my quality or fortunes, can alter my heart? No, no, Timaretta, deceive not your selfe, and wrong not me, I am the very same unto you now, that I was yesterday, and you shall find me the very same upon a Throne, that I am and have been in this Isle: call me no Sirs, I conjure you, for I declare that you, and only you shall reign Eternally in my soule: moreover my dear and lovely Timaretta, do not force your selfe to rejoyce at the good fortune which is fallen upon me, but on the contrary know, that you cannot more injuriously affront my affection, then to rejoyce at any thing that may set me farthest from you: do not therefore interest your self in the Fortune more then I my selfe doe; but if you will oblige me, confesse that I had some share in those teares, which I saw drop from those fair eyes, when I came first unto you. Since you have been a witness of my weaknesse (replied Timaretta and blusht) I will confesse you were the cause of my sorrowes, but I must confesse withall, that I did not grieve at your good fortune, though 'tis most true that the losse of you can only grieve me, and the more, because I see it is most just I love you; for really it were a miracle, if you should thinke upon an unfortunate Shepheardesse, amidst all the grandures of a glorious Court; and indeed you are obliged in point of honour, to hide the memory you have had of me, and never to give me any more testimonies of your affection: You see then Sir, that it is the losse of my owne good fortune which I lament, and not at your happinesse; for I doe protest unto you Sir, that as oft as I look upon you, and consider, that now your quality is most suitable to your vertue, I am more joyed at your good fortune, then I am able to expresse; and when I think how in leaving your sheep-hook, you get a Crown in exchange, I am extremely satisfied: For all this, I cannot chuse but remember, how I have lost Sesostris, and shall stay in this Isle without a deliverer; yet I beseech you Sir, remember, that my sorrowes neither are, nor never shall be injurious to you. All the while Timaretta was talking thus, Sesostris gazed upon her, with such abundance both of love and sorrow, that he thought he should either have lost his life, or his witts; and after a most attentive and sighing audience, he began to grieve at his good fortune in good earnest: Alas Timaretta (said he with a face full of sorrow) am I any thing more then I was? and will they pull me from you to morrow? Yes, said she, and you ought to pull me out of your heart also, and perhaps will. Ah Timaretta, cried he, do not adde unto my sorrowes, for they are so great, that they need no augmentation. No, no, Sir, (said she unto him) my language is more Page 106 reasonable then yours, and to shew you, that my affection and reason is not blinde, or that I preferre my own satisfaction before your glory, I doe declare, that there is no reason in the world but you should forget Timaretta, and that it is not fitting a great Prince should love a simple shepheardesse. Ah Timaretta, said Sesostris, this simple shepheardesse you speak of, is in my soule above all the Queenes upon earth: However, to morrow about this time you will be in a great and stately Court, and I shall be in a poor cabin, rejoycing at your happinesse, and grieving at my owne misfortune: thus living in a continual miscellany of teares for joy, and teares for sorrow, the unhappy Timaretta must drone away her daies in a desert, till the day without any hopes of ever seeing you again. Oh Heavens (said Sesostris, transported with love and sorrow) I beseech you let me see you every day: yes Timaretta (said he and kneelled to her) I am ready to forsake this Crown which hangs over my head, if you will for the love of me quit this Isle: come, let us go my dearest Timaretta, and seek out some other desert, where without any ambition, or Crowns, I may only raige in your soule, as you raigne in mine; let us try if we can escape this night following, perhaps I shall find a way to suborn my my gaurd: for I professe to doe nothing but what shall please you, and will I marry you at the first place we come at, if you please; I promise you also never to remember I am the sonne of Amasis, nor pretend to any greater glory then your love. Your promises, replied Timaretta, are infinitely obliging; but for all that Sir, your honour will not permit me to accept of your propositions; you must give me leave only to heare them, and you, but never to wrong you: Alas, added she, since my desires ayme only, that your glory may flourish over the the whole earth, that you may be the admiration of the people over whom you are to raige, and that you may be happy both in peace and warr; I cannot desire so much happinesse to my selfe, upon any condition of being an hinderance to your felicity, I know Sir, it is unjust to desire otherwise, but I cannot doe otherwise. I know moreover, that ambition is a passion so much stronger then love, that there is no likelihood, but the first step up unto that Throne which you shall one day mount, will make me lose the sight of you. For heavens sake (said Sesostris) tell me of no such contrarieties, but make sure of my affection by the waies which I propound. I cannot (replied she) for I would not have it cost you a Crown; nor can I ever hope, that the Prince Sesostris, can be as faithfull as the Shepheard Sesostris; or though he should, I can never be happy by it, since it cannot be, but by his being unhappy. However it be replied Sesostris, I am most certain, that I shall never love any but Timaretta: I cannot assure her (aded he and sighed) to put the Crown of Aegypt upon her head, for perhaps it will never be in my power: I will swear unto her three most certain truths, first, that I can never be happy without her; secondly, if I can I will Crown her a Queen; and lastly, she shall for ever raigne in my heart. I would I could beleeve you, replied Timaretta, but I must confesse, I cannot; for what testimonies of affection soever you give me, I can find no security in them, since the Prince Sesostris is not obliged to keep any promises made by the Shepheard Sesostris. But my dear Timaretta (said he) now I am no shepherd, though in the habit of one, I swear unto you by all that's sacred, that I will adore you eternally, and never any but you; so it is not the shepheard Sesostris who hath engaged his word unto you, but it is the sonne of Amasis, who as near as he is to passe from a cottage to a court, and from extream basenesse, unto the height of grandure, doth protest unto you, that he had rather die at your feet, then live upon a Throne without you. I beseech you Sir, said Timaretta, do not so much augment my sorrowes, by expressing your selfe so infinitely obliging, which will but make me more sadly lament my losse. But my dearest Timaretta, said he, you shall never lose my heart: I will wish I may not Sir, replied she, but I can never hope for it: Ah me, ah, said he, what shall I doe, that I may perswade you of that reall thirst in my intentions: Truly Sir, said Timaretta and sighed, I should be much puzzled to tell you what, for I am extremely glad you must be a King, I am very angry you are not still a shepherd, and I have thoughts so contrary unto each other, that I am ashamed of my owne weaknesse, and the more, because I am not able to hide it from you. Doe not call that weaknesse, my dearest Timaretta, said he unto her, which is so sweet a testimony of your constant affection; but since I doe you justice in being just unto by selfe, I conjure you to beleeve, that neither time, absence, ambition, nor any thing else in the earth, can make my mind alter from what I now professe; and beleeve me, there is nothing which I would not doe to serve you, nor is there any thing I ever will willingly doe which shall offend you, or interrupt your affection. After this Sir, Sesostris was silent, sorrow would not permit him to speak one word more: Timaretta for her part had not power to answer one word: 'tis true, they looked upon one another, and saw each others heart through their eyes, so that they had sufficient cause of satisfaction; yet part they must for night did call them; Page 107 and since they thought the next morning would not afford them the liberty of talking together, without too many witnesses, after all serious looks with a sad silence they bad each other adieu, and Sesostris being forced to part, he went down the Hill on the one side, Timaretta went down the other side to the shepheardesse, who stayed for her some twenty paces from thence: the next morning, those who were appointed to provide rich clothes, brought them, and Heracleon with abundance of the Court came to waite upon Sesostris, whose garb in those rich habits appeared so high, that Timareta was the more sad: gladly would she, if she could have stayed in her cabin, yet she could not; needs must she look at Sesostris as long as she could, but that she might be lesse observed, she got amongst other shepheardesses about the Port, to see him embarque. In the mean time, Heracleon coming into the Isle, met Timareta as she was going to the Port, and as sad as she was, he saw her so very fair, that he was more charmed with her beauty this second time, then the first, he had abundance of sadnesse in his countenance, and still looked upon her as long as he could, and at parting, was as sorry for her, as Timareta was to part with Sesostris: I must tell you Sir, that Sesostris and I agreed, that I should stay in the Isle to see whether Amenophis would return, to know from him what I should doe, this Prince assuring me, that as soon as he was settled in the Court, he would then make his affection to me appear. That which most perplexed me, was, that I could not comprehend why Amenophis should have such a care of Amasis his sonne: but not being able to reach the reason, I rested my mind in quiet; yet Sesostris conjured me with all the most obliging language possible to speak of him every day unto his shepheardess: and indeed so I did, for as soon as he was imbarqued, I followed Timareta to her Chamber: but alas Sir, how sad was our discourse? for she imagining, that she should never see, or at least speake to Sesostris againe as long as she lived, did so extreemly grieve as truly I never saw the like. In the meane time, Sesostris ariving at the Port of Elephantine, found there one of the finest horses in the World on which he mounted: there being also Horses enough for all that followed him: All the people of that great Town were in the streets to see him passe: A million of high Applaudes made the Aire Echo: all the Ladies in the windowes stood to see him passe, and the Princesse Liserina amongst the rest, who pretended to have no smal interest in the Glory of this Prince: you may well imagine Sir, how Amasis entertained him, whom he acknowledged for his Sonne, he expressed all possible signes of tendernesse, and the more, because Sesostris fill'd all the Court with admiration: for all imaginations being filled with this conceit, that since he was found amongst a company of silly shepherds, his education would appear but meane: yet when they saw and heard him speak, they could do nothing else but admire: The common people talked of nothing else but his handsome Garb: The Ladies of his spirit and civility; and Simandius of his Courage: so that within the compasse of eight daies, he had got as much esteeme, as if he had been in the Court all his life: Amasis overjoyed with having a successor, forgot not his promises to the shepherds of the Isle, for hee sent them much riches, quitted them of tribute, and gave them high priviledges and immunities. But as for Traseas in particular, and his family, he thought not this enough: Therefore for a testimony of his acknowledgement, he would have him dwell in a Castle which was some fifty furlongs from Elephantine, scituated between a great Lake, and a great Wood: And since Traseas, had no disposition to alter his profession; he made him the richest shepherd in all Aegypt: Also hee would have Timareta leave the Isle, and me also. But in leaving it, we left orders with the shepherds there to acquaint Amenophis if he returned where we were: In the meane while, Sesostris to testifie unto Timareta that he forgot her not; and that the beauties of the Court did not dazle his eyes, he sent a servant secretly the third day, with a letter to Timareta which contained these words

SESOSTRIS unto TIMARETA.

I Have now seen all that can be called fair in the Court, but I find not one comparable to your selfe: Fear not then that I shall ever after my mind: but be assured that I am the very same in Elephantine, that I was in our desert, and so shall continue untill the death of SESOSTRIS.

You may imagine Sir, how joyfully Timareta received this testimony of fidelity from Sesostris: Page 108 But perhaps you cannot comprehend that excessive sorrow which followed her Raptures of joy. For, said she unto me, what will it availle me to have Sesostris continue faithfull, since, considering the unsutableness of our qualities, he cannot continue his affection, unlesse he do that which in the common opinion of the world, is unworthy of himselfe? Is not this the very height of infortunacy, that the love Sesostris bears unto me should be a shame unto him? Constancy which in it selfe is a virtue, would be now a weaknesse in Sesostris if he should continue loving me: yet I must needs confesse, I wish he would not change, since wee are never like to see each other: And since so, we run no hazards neither in my reputation, nor he in his Glory; But alas, it shall never be said Sesostris has the heart of a shepherd in the habit of a Prince; therefore my dear Miris (said this sad shepheardesse) It is most fit that Sesostris should forget me, and I him: But alas, to me it is impossible, and therefore she dissembled her thoughts in answering the Prince in these words.

TIMARETA unto the Prince SESOSTRIS.

SIR,

I Cannot better acknowledge the honour which you are pleased to do me, then by conjuring you to forget me: and for ever to deprive me of the onely thing in the World which can delight me: The sacrifice which I offer is great: But how infinite is the debt owing unto the Prince Sesostris from the shepheardesse)

TIMARETA.

This letter did not so well please the Prince, as his letter did Timareta, nor was it long before he answered it, & before he moved her to write more sincerely and more obligingly. Yet Timareta, did alwaies write with so much reservednesse, that though Sesostris complained, yet he esteemed her the more. In the meane while, some daies being spent in publique Feasts, Amasis sent for Sesosiris, and told him that since he intended the Princess of Liserina for his wife, he would acquaint him with it, to the end he might apply himselfe to win her heart as he had already her esteem. Sesostris harkned unto this motion with much respect, but more sorrow, insomuch as he had much adoe to hide it: For his violent love of Timareta told him, he must never marry any other. Yet did he not contradict the motion which Amasis made: but told him, that it were fit to give the Princesse Liserina so much time as to forget she had seen him a shepherd: and he spoke so handsomly, and with so much judgement, that Amasis thought that Sesostris onely desired to have some assurance of the Princesse Liserinas affection before he married her, though it be not the custome of Kings and Princes to marry with that consideration. But the King thinking this smelt too much of a shepherd, told him, that Princes did not marry as other men, but married more for their people then themselves, and therefore they had not alwaies the freedom of their choice: In short, Amasis spoke with so much sovereignty, that Sesostris would not gainsay his will: but since the King thought he had consented, he told him that he would give him some daies respite, before he made a publication of it: When Sesostris parted from the King, he retired to his Chamber full of extream sorrow: Till now he looked upon Liserina with much indifferency: but since this, hee looked upon her with unalterable aversion: and as oft as he considered that Amasis would marry him unto her, he was ready to run out of his wits: for love does often drive one to hope for not onely things difficult, but even things impossible. Sesostris, sometimes hoped that happily Amasis would not force him to marry her, but that when it should please the gods to afford him a fit opportunity of retiring himselfe from the World, hee would then marry his fair shepheardesse, as well as many Kings of Aegypt had married with Graecian slaves. In conclusion Sir, Sesostris resolved to employ all his possible endeavours, to deferre the marriage, leaving the rest to the Conduct of the gods. In the meane time Heracleon was as full of restless thoughts as he, though in a different way, for certainly ambition was the torture of his mind. But since he could not alter the order of things as he pleased, how envious soever he was to see Sesostris so near the Crown; hee complied with him as with a Prince, whose friendship he would gain, though himselfe could not Raign: and endeavoured to divert him with a possible complacency: yet Sesostris could not affect the conversation of Heracleon: for besides his imperious disposition, he considered him as the brother of Liserina, who he thought did eagerly put on his marriage with this Princesse; insomuch as he could not possibly affect him. In the mean time, since Civility would not permit him to fall out with him, they were continually together. And Heracleon conceiving he could not possibly devise Page 109 any diversion more sutable to his age then hunting: He invited him very often to that sport, wherein Sesostris seemed to take great delight; more affecting to be in the fields and woods, where he might sometimes entertain his own thoughts, then to be in Elephantine, where hee was very often constrained to entertain Liserina. But, Sir, be pleased to know, that Heracleon and he being one day hunting together, the beast which they pursued, did lead them near the Castle where Traseas dwelt, so that riding along the Lake they saw the fair Timareta walking by the water side, and in such a profound study, that the merry cry of the dogs, and the shrill musique of the Horns could hardly make her look up, and see who passed by her. But at last the noise being so loud and near, she turned aside with a languishing look, as if she had been married unto a crabbed Husband, who interrupted her study: And she no sooner lifted up her eyes, but Sesostris and Heracleon knew her, and stoppt; letting the Chase run on. Timareta no sooner saw them stop, but she knew them also; and blushing, she seemed more fair then ever, and so charmed the eyes of Heracleon, that in talking to Sesostris he could not chuse but extoll her. Sesostris was grieved to the very soul, that hee durst not throw himselfe at the feet of his fair Shepheardesse, whom he so much respected all the while he was a Shepheard. But at last, his love surmounting all other considerations: Though I shall appeare a Shepheard in the habit of a Prince (said he, and laughed) as Achilles did a boy in the habit of a woman when he could not chuse but wear a sword, I must stay one minute, and speake unto this fair Shepheardesse; were it for nothing but to ask how he doth with whom I lived. For my part, said Heracleon, I am much joyed at the motion, onely out of a desire to please my self in looking upon her. After this these two Princes alighted from their horses, and went to Timareta, who continuing on her walk, went towards Nicetis, who was not far off, but she was prevented by these two Princes, who suiting their civilities according to her beauty, not her quality, did accost her as if she had been of their own. Their discourse with her was long, though nothing of privacy, or any thing of concernment; yet she spoke with so much spirit and grace, as when they parted Heracleon was no lesse in love then Sesostris: So that coming out of Elephantine with two, but love & ambition, he returned with three, since certainly he grew jealous as soon as in love; for though Sesostris in speaking to Timareta did keep a careful distance, and though Timareta on her side did examine every word, and did regulate their very looks, yet maugre all their precaution, Heracleon saw in their eyes some sparks of that fire which burned in their hearts, so that both his Love and his Jealousie begun both at once: But for his better satisfaction, in their way to Elephantine he asked the Prince Sesostris, whether it was possible he could so long live with Timareta, and not be in love? Sesostris, who for several reasons would not have it thought he was in love with this Shepheardesse, told him handsomly, that it was with beauty as with the Sun, continual looking upon it, makes it never admired; and he being brought up with Timareta from the cradle, he ever thought her fair, but never found matter of adoration in her. But since Sesostris could not say this without his face betrayed his tongue, as his tongue belyed his heart, Heracleon was confirmed in his opinion; he being a man violent in all things, and possessed with the three most violent passions that the heart of man is capable of, he presently began to endeavour wayes for the satisfaction of them all: But since Love was the passion most preldominate, he did oftentimes use to come and look for Timareta, not onely by that water side, but in the house where they dwelt, though she entreated him with as much wisdom as modesty not to put himself unto the trouble; and in every visit he grew so deep in love, that it almost stifed his ambition, and the more, because he found in her as much virtue as beauty, and an invincible resistance. As for Sesostris, since more eyes were upon him then Heracleon, he could not so easily see her, and it was onely once that he found an opportunity to steal so much time as to talk with her, and then he was so unhappy as it was known unto Heracleon, who was almost choaked with despair. In the mean time Amasis, thinking he had given long enough time for consideration unto Sesostris, began to publish unto all the world, that he would marry him with the Princesse Liserina. The first Ceremonies were performed: So that since all Marriages of persons of this quality are quickly divulged, it was not onely known at Elephantine, but the news was carryed as far as Timareta: But when the wise and prudent Timareta did plainly foresee, that as soon as Sesostris ceased from being a shepherd, the King would infallibly oblige him to marry, she grieved exceedingly, yet endeavoured all she could to hide her sorrows, but could not; for I have heard her expresse her self concerning Sesostris, so generously, so wisely, and yet so passionately, and obligingly, that I discovered more grandure of spirit and soul in her then ever before. In the mean while Sesostris was not lesse sad then she: Liserina onely, who courted the Crown more then the affection of Page 110 Sesostris, she had all the joy possible; yet she thought it somewhat strange that the Prince so full of spirit, as he was, should look upon her onely with eyes of civility: But the predominant passion of her heart being satisfied, she cheered up her selfe, especially seeing that in all appearance, nothing could hinder her marriage: the reports whereof, were so generally divulged, that none made any question of it: It seemed as if the ceremonies were to be performed at Elephantine, at which the King was well pleased; and she hoped her happiness was now so nigh that nothing could prevent it: But what she called happiness Sesostris called misery: and indeed his soul was so wholly devoted unto Timareta, that the Luster of her fair eyes dimmed all the other beauties of the Court: since hee saw the noise of his marriage was so loud as it might reach her eare; he could not rest until he found an opportunity to steale away and visit her; and to that end, hee went unto his Chamber one evening very timely, and took horse immediately at the Palace Garden dore, and went unto Tamareta: hee knew Traseas went not to bed so soone as others, because his flocks of sheepe were late in the field: But we were much astonished to see this Prince arise so late with one servant which used to bring his letters unto Timareta: who then was in the walk towards the Lake, where the Trees not being very thick, the light of the Moon, was light enough. A young shepheardesse who served Nicetis, was in the same walke where the Prince came to seek Timareta, after he had given me order to keep Traseas from interrupting them: Sesostris was full of most tender expressions to her: he offered her a hundred times the very same he did in the Isle, where their love had originall. Hee profered to renounce all Grandure, Court and Crown, so she would but follow his fortune: And this Generous shepheardesse did a hundred times conjure him, to doe nothing unworthy of that Grandure unto which he was raised, and to propose nothing unto her unworthy of his virtue: But say what she could, he was still in the same tune, and said he would never marry Liserina, conjuring her not to let any reports or appearances delude her, but constantly to believe, that he would never be anies but hers. Timareta contradicted this last expression of Sesostris, but it was very faintly, for she had not so much power over her self as to advise him unto a marriage with Liserina: but shee told him resolutely, shee would not have him quit the Court, nor carry her away: but when hee talked of his marriage with Liserina, her tongue could not betray her heart, all her expressions were blasted: Little and weak perswasion was in her Eloquence. Moreover, Timareta being very prudent, she thought not fit to acquaint Sesostris with all the visits of Heracleon. For since she knew him to be in favour with Amasis, she thought it not wisdom to sow any seeds of division between them. But on the other side, she thought it not discretion to say nothing to him: therefore she told him, that sometimes as his hunting chase drew him that way he would call: But since Sesostris had observed that Heracleons heart was wounded with the beauty of Timareta, though she spoke nothing of it, yet he beleevd him to be deeply in love: But yet he feared not to drive him far enough from the heart of this lovely shepheardesse, so that hee parted very well satisfied from her, and likewise she from him, considering the state present of their fortunes. In the meane while, Heracleons heart being torn in pieces by three unruly passions, he could not chuse but open himself unto a friend of his named Tanisis, whose spirit was not onely subtle, but capable of all villanies and cheats in the World, respecting neither Divine nor humane Lawes, and followed no other rule of life, but what would please or profit him: yet did he appear in the eyes of all the World in another vizard; and having spirit and wit enough, he palliated all his villanies with virtuous semblances, the better to compasse his ends: yet had he no intimate friend but Heracleon onely, but the League between them two was so great and close, that none could be greater. In the mean time, as I told you, Heracleon acquainted Tanisis with the present posture of his soule, so aggravating the Grandure of his love, of his jealousy and of his Ambition, that he perceived the miseries which he endured, required extreame remedies. And that let them be what they would, he was able to serve him. First Tanisis, who thought it more expedient to satisfie the Ambition of his friend, then his love, because himselfe had more interest in that passion then the other, told him, that at what rate soever it was, he must hinder the marriage between Sesostris and the Princesse Liserina: In order to which, he must so protract it, that Amasis who was not well, might first die, before it was accomplished, since it was likely he would not live long: It was thought that he advised to poyson him, to the end he might hinder Sesostris from being acknowledged his successor, and that he might be successor himself: As for the satisfaction of his love, Tanisis could not imagine, that the heart of a simple shepheardess could hold out against a man of Heracleons quality: he advised him first to have recourse unto presents, and Page 111 afterwards to carry her away: As they were thus busied, and Heracleon saw nothing to doe but to put the advise of Tanisis in execution, one of his servants came to tell him, that the Kings Officer, who had been unjustly accused for raising that tumult which was in a Town within the Province of Thebes desired to speak with him. But, Sir, before I acquaint you with what this Officer told Heracleon, give me leave to put you in memory, that it was the very same man who found dying Ladice's Letter where Amenophis lost it, and who afterwards let it fall in Elephantine, where he was forced to retire untill his friends had procured his Justification. After this, Sir, be pleased to know, that when he came within two dayes journey of Elephantine unto one of his friends, he fell sick with sorrow, and to that height, as a Feaver seised upon him, which for some dayes bereft him of his reason, but after he was recovered, and enquired of the passages in the world, he was much surprised to understand that the King had that Letter which he lost, and the more to hear that Sesostris was acknowledged for his Sonne: For Ladice's Letter not being sealed, when this Officer found it, he read it, and remembered very well that Ladice told the King she had left him a Daughter, and not a Sonne: So that not knowing what to thinke, he wondered that Amasis knowing the Princesse his Wives hand should not give credit unto her words; for those with whom he was, were ignorant that the Letter was a little torn or defaced; so that to be better satisfied he writ unto one of his friends in Elephantine: but before he began to write, he looked in his Table-book, in which he had put dying Ladice's Letter before he was sick, and there miraculously found a little bit of the Letter which made it apparent, that Ladice left a Daughter, and not a Sonne: So that then apprehending the mistake of Amasis, and knowing how he had formerly expressed himself, that if it were a Daughter Heracleon should marry her, hee thought that he had found out a way to undeceive the King of his error, to make Heracleon happy, and to raise himself a fortune: And therefore he carefully sealed up this little bit of the letter, and as weak as he was he came to Elephantine in the night, going straight unto Heracleon's house, and found him in the company of Tanisis, as I told you. At first he desired to speake with him in private, but Heracleon telling him, that nothing was so secret which Tanisis should not know, he began to tell him, how he had found Ladice's Letter, and how he had lost it, and how he had found that which would convince Amasis of his error in thinking Ladice left him a Sonne; for it would be easie to prove it unto the King by that little bit of the Letter which mentioned a Daughter, and which was torn out of the Letter; so that comparing this bit with the Letter it self, he might find them so evenly jump, that the King might be put out of all error. Heracleon was beyond all expression glad, that he could render the birth of Sesostris doubtfull; but to goe surely to work, he would have this Officer concealed in his house, and examine all things at more leasure, conjuring him to have a speciall care of that which must take the Crown from his Sister and Sesostris, and put it upon his own head; for he made no question but Timareta was daughter unto Amasis: Yet could he not devise why Traseas should disguise the truth. But since it appeared that Ladice had a Daughter, it must necessarily follow that there was some imposture in the relation of Traseas: So that to sift the matter before it came to the King, Heracleon and Tanisis resolved to tamper with Traseas, and either by promises or menaces to screw the matter out of him: This course being resolved upon, Heracleon and Tanisis went to the house of Traseas, and came thither before the Sun was up, or Timareta awake. But the more to oblige unto a true relation, Heracleon would tell him at first what he knew: I come hither (said he unto him) to make you confesse the truth of the businesse which I know as well as your self, but to know what reason you had to tell the King a lye, and to make him most unjustly to acknowledge Sesostris for his Son, and to obscure that Daughter which the Princesse Ladice left him? Speak Traseas (said he) tell me your reason for it? but never goe about to maintaine Sesostris to be his and Ladice's Sonne; for know, that the King within these two dayes must see all that wants in Ladice's Letter, which will apparently prove the King is gulled, and that Sesostris is not his Sonne, and that all tortures that can be devised will be inflicted upon you to make you speak the truth: yet if you will trust me, and tell me truly why you put this imposture upon him, and where the Daughter of Amasis is, I will promise not onely to protect you, but to keep you in the Kings favour: And if you will confesse unto me that Timareta is his Daughter, and doe as I would have you, I will promise you a recompence much above that which Amasis gave you. Whilst Heracleon was speaking thus, Traseas was extremely perplexed; for he perceived by his manner of speaking, that hee knew all the truth: so that fear damping his spirits, he could not reason upon the matter; yet he perceived, that though Heracleon knew Sesostris was not the Son of Amasis, yet he did not Page 112 know him to be the Sonne of Aprie; therefore hee conceived him to be ignorant of it, otherwise hee would most certainly have intimated it unto him: So that after he had seriously considered with himself, he resolved to confesse unto Heracleon, that Timareta was the daughter of Amasis, conceiving it was that which he principally desired: for Traseas being a man of a quick wit, and spirit enough, and knowing that the King when he was in the Isle, said, if he had a Daughter he would marry her unto Heracleon: he doubted not but it was his own interest which he sought after: But as he resolved to confesse the truth, as relating unto Timareta, and to say she was the daughter of Amasis: So he resolved also not to discover that Sesostris was the Sonne of Aprie: for it was a horror unto his conscience to deliver the Sonne of his Legitimate King unto the hands of an usurper, who perhaps would put him to death: so after he had well consulted with himselfe, and seeing Heracleon multiply both promises and threatnings. Sir, (said he unto him) If you will solemnly swear that you will save my life: I shall confesse all I know, and as much perhaps as you desire to know: Heracleon then swearing unto him, Traseas confessed that Timareta, was the Kings Daughter: Adding, that Sesostris was his own Sonne: and that Fatherly indulgence prompted him to make him King in prejudice of Timareta; and then King also to get a better recompence, for finding the King a Sonne, then a Daughter: But, (said Heracleon unto him) It appears Sesostris passed for the Sonne of Amenophis, and not as yours, and you confessed as much to the King: 'Tis very true Sir, (replyed Traseas boldly, the better to colour his lie) but the reason was, because when the contagion did almost depopulate our Isle, and when the Queen and the Prince Sesostris her Sonne dyed, and spared this Sesostris whom now you know Amenophis with a thousand promises of recompence, desired me to let my son pass for his, never telling me his reason for it: and indeed I consented, knowing my Son would be more rich by passing for his Sonne then mine: so that all the shepheards in the Isle never thought Sesostris to be my Sonne: After this Heracleon and Tanisis began to whisper low one to another, and to examine what Traseas had said concerning Sesostris: For they saw Amenophis had a design to make Sesostris passe for the Son of Aprie: and they began to suspect that Traseas had not told the truth, but that Sesostris was really the Sonne of Aprie. Yet they did not conceive it expedient to dive too deep into the matter, for knowing that Amasis of late was much stung with remorse of conscience for all that was passed, they feared that if he should come to know that Sesostris was the Sonne of Aprie, and afterwards should heare of the affection between Sesostris and Timareta, he would marry them together to quiet his conscience, and to take away all colour of War: Therefore, though Heracleon did suspect Sesostris was not the reall Sesostris, yet he did not make his suspicions known unto Traseas; but resolved by the advise of Tanisis, first to let him become a shepherd again, and afterwards absolutely to ruine him. But Sir, after an exact consideration of all the consequences in this affair, they instructed Traseas, in all they would have him doe, Heracleon beginning to let him have a tast of his liberality. And to the end Traseas should not have time to repent or fly, or adventure Sesostris or Timareta, they obliged him to go presently with them unto Elephantine: Leaving two Servants which came with them, to conduct him, appointing them to follow Traseas some twenty paces from him, and no nearer, lest too much notice should be taken: But Sir, Heracleon, as it was plotted betwixt him and Traseas, went to the King as he returned from the Temple, and as he was entering into his Palace, Traseas fell down upon his knees most humbly beseeching the King to give him audience: Amasis turning about, and knowing him, thought that some had done him wronge, and he demanded justice, or that he had not received what he commanded should be given him: So that turning towards him, It is just, said he, that the man who found me a successor should obtain what audience he desires. Oh Sir, (said Traseas with tears in his eyes) I come not to demand any justice, but a pardon, since I am the most guilty man alive. Amasis being astonished at the Language of Traseas, in whose countenance, he saw fear imprinted, commanded him to follow, because he would not have all the people to hear: and being entred into his Chamber, where he would have none to follow, but Heracleon and Traseas. This shepherd fell down upon his knees again, Sir, said he to Amasis, you see prostrate at your feet, that miserable shepherd, whose ambition to make his Sonne King, has made himselfe the most culpable of men: For truly Sir, Sesostris is my Sonne and not yours: and Timareta whose beauty attracts the eyes of all that behold her, is really your Daughter. Amasis infinitely perplexed at this, began to look upon Traseas with much anger: How dost thou think I can believe thee (said he unto him) after such a fair tale when I was in the Isle? how can I believe this which now thou tellest me is true? who or what will you give me good security of it? for since thou art capable of such an imposture, may I not as well think thou wouldst make thy Daughter to Raigne in Page 113 prejudice of my Sonne, as thy Sonne in prejudice of my Daughter. From whence proceeds this remorse of conscience which thus exposeth thee to my fury? Hath Osiris appeared unto thee? or what hath caused thy repentance? Sir, replied Traseas (following the instructions of Heracleon) As soon as I heard of your Majesties intentions of marrying Sesostris unto the Princesse Liserina, my conscience did so extremely torture me, that I had rather suffer the punishment which I deserve, then to let a miserable Shepherd run any longer into such a fortune as he was unworthy of. Moreover, Sir, if the weakness of your eye-sight had not hindered you from seeing that extreme resemblance which Timareta hath of the Princesse her Mother, you would at first have known her for your Daughter; and this did induce me principally to deceive your Majesty. Heracleon would then have spoke something in favour of <...> seas, but Amasis not hearing him, asked this Shepheard a hundred questions, unto all wh <...> he gave such satisfactory quick answers, that Amasis was at a dilemma. However, he loved Sesostris so well, that his naturall inclination prompted him to maintaine him in the rank wherein he was, and to punish Traseas as an Impostor. But as he was in this mind, the Officer which was concealed at Heracleons house, and was instructed by him, sent unto the King by the Captain of his Guard, that he had some business with him whereupon depended the tranquillity of all his life, and that it concerned him to know it as soon as possibly hee could. Amasis with a disordered minde, commanded him to enter, and the sooner, because hee understood this man had cleared himselfe of that raising of Sedition, whereof hee was accused, I shall not tell you, Sir, in what language this man acquainted the King, how it was hee who found the Letter in Nea, how he read it as soon as he found it, and saw that it mentioned the leaving him a Daughter; how afterwards he lost it at Elephantine, and how miraculously he found that which would convince him of his error; for if I should make a full relation, it would be too tedious, Sir, unto you. However Amasis no sooner heard what he said, but being very impatient to see what he had brought him, he took the little bit of paper which the man had preserved; and the King joyning it unto the Letter of Ladice which was torn, it filled up so even and justly, and answered unto every corner, like wax unto a Seal, that there could not be the least suspition of any couzenage; for it joyned so close, that it was hard to be seen where it was tome: But as the King was much surprised to see this little bit of the Letter fit his place so justly; so was he much more, to finde, that then it was as plain as the Sun, that Ladice left him a Daughter; for the word Daughter was in that little bit which was added: nor could he suspect any forgery, but that it was writ with the hand of Ladice as well as the rest of the Letter. Amasis then being satisfied that Sesostris was not his Sonne, asked Traseas who he was? and he answered him as he answered Heracleon, to wit, that himself was the Father of Sesostris; and answered so fully unto all objections which Amasis could put unto him, that he could find no cause of contradiction. But since Heracleons passion did as well thirst for revenge uppon Sesostris as his Rivall, as to satisfie both his love and ambition by marrying Timareta, he told the King in a low voice, that he beleevd Amenophis had taken the sonne of Traseas intending to make him passe for the Sonne of Aprie; and according to his judgement, it were fit to observe him, lest he should goe into Thebes, and perswade the people that hee was the reall Sesostris. But Amasis, who did extremely affect Sesostris, whosoever he was, not onely because he had obtained him a glorious victory, but by reason of a powerfull instinct, he would not hearken unto the proposition. It is enough, said he, if I take from Sesostris the quality of a Prince, and not his liberty; and let his birth be what it will, it appears so gloriously in the world, that I cannot think it base: If any be to be arrested, it is Traseas, not him; and indeed the King committed him unto the custody of his Guard, and appointed two women of quality in Elephantine to goe unto Timareta. But since Heracleon would needs be the first that should carry this good news unto his fairest Shepheardesse, he beseeched the King he might wait upon the two Ladies thither, which he granted him, expressly charlging him, and the Officer who found Ladice's letter, and Traseas to say nothing without permission from him, of any thing which had passed amongst them. Thus the Prince Sesostris, being ignorant of what was doing against him, thought of nothing but that misery which his greatnesse caused unto him, not thinking he was like to lose it. In the mean time Heracleon went to Timareta, who was much troubled for Traseas as well as Nicetis, but much more was she moved at the sight of a Coach full of Ladyes, and when these Ladyes told her, they had commands from the King to carry her unto him, at first, Timareta answered, that it was not credible so great a Prince desired to see so simple a Shepheardesse as her selfe. Yet when she saw them in good earnest, she began to fear that Heracleon, who Page 114 she saw amongst them, would put some trick upon her: But he perceiving her thought, by the leave of the Ladies tooke her aside, and being separated some Paces from the Company, conjured her not to acquaint the King how he had revealed his secret unto her. Truly Sir, said she unto him, you think I do not know my self, but because I have been brought up with the Prince Sesostris, therefore that must make me familiar with the King his Father: No Madam said he unto her: ah Sir, (said she and interrupted him) I beseech you do not so extremely Jeere me: do not give me any such title as shepheardesses do not understand: I doe not give you the title as a shepheardesse (replyed he) but as a Princesse. For now, Sesostris is no more then a simple shepheard, and you are the Daughter of Amasis. Believe me Madam, (said Heracleon, seeing she gave no credit to him) what I speak is truth; and before to morrow night, you will see your selfe above all the Grandees in Aegypt, and Sesostris will <...> be llo all that can be called base. Oh Sir, (replyed Timareta all amused) Fortune is ne <...> so blind nor so unjust, as to cause such a Revolution: However it be, said he, these Ladies have orders to wait upon you unto Elephantine; And I to guard you, then being my self infinitely happy in the honour of being the first messenger of such good newes. This you tell me seemes so impossible (replyed she) that I cannot believe it; and though it should be true, yet I finde my selfe so unworthy of such an honour, that I shall never receive it. After this, they put Timareta in the Coach; but she would not goe, unless they would let Nicetis go with her. In the meane time, she being naturally handsome, and since she was alwaies uncertain whether Sesostris would come that way in hunting, she was never in her negligent dresse; Therefore she appeared so fair in the eyes of those Ladies who waited upon her, that they all admired her beauty: As for Heracleon, he thought himself almost at the top of happiness: For he imagined himself married unto the greatest beauty of all Aegypt, and unto one who would make him King. Moreover, he had the satisfaction, to put his rivall besides his Mistresse and Throne: So that meeting with that at one time, which would fully satisfie, both his love, his ambition, his jealousy, and his revenge, he was as happy as his own wishes could make him. But so was not Timareta, whose astonishment was so high, that she was not capable either of joy or sorrow; yet she inclined more unto the latter of these then the first. In the meane time, she arrived at the Court: Heracleon acquaints the King; and he bids her to enter. But she was not sooner two paces within the Chamber, and the King upon a sudden seeing as well as ever he did: he found in Timaretaes face such a prodigious resemblance of the Princesse Ladice his wife, that he made no doubt but Timareta was his Daughter: so that embracing her with abundance of tendernes, he acknowledged her for his own: and acknowledged her with as much joy, as he was at the miraculous change in his sight, which made him able to behold Timareta, and confirmed him in his opinion that the gods would protect him. Timareta seeing the honours which the King did her, knew not how to receive them: yet she told him with as great grace as modesty, that she was onely a simple shepheardesse, and farre unworthy such favours from so great a King: for since she thought it impossible that she should be acknowledged for a Princesse and that Sesostris should become a shepheard again, she would not answer the King as his Daughter. In the meane time, since the King made no question of what Traseas told him concerning Timareta, he also believed all he said concerning Sesostris; so that thinking his repentance had expiated his crime, he commanded him to be set at liberty, and to come before him. Traseas no sooner saw Timareta, but he asked her pardon, for offering to take the Crown from her, and giving it unto Sesostris. Timareta hearing Traseas say so, blusht, and looked down with her eyes: yet was it not for any anger at the injury he had done her; but for sorrow that she should be a cause of Sesostris his returning unto a shepheard again. In the meane time, the King caused all the Ladies to enter, and told them who Timareta was: so that this fair shepheardesse, becoming a Princesse in an instant, you may well imagine, she stood in need of as great a spirit as she had. And since Amasis had commanded the matter should be closely carried, lest Sesostris should know the alteration in his Fortune: he caused Timareta and all the Ladies to go into another room, and commanded to fetch Sesostris unto him. But as Timareta was ready to go out of the Kings Chamber, being prompted by a thought which she could not keep in, Sir, said she unto him, I beseech you give me leave, before I goe, to ask you whether Traseas who I ever thought to be my father, ever told you how I owe my life unto Sesostris: and that if I have the honour to be your Daughter, you are obliged to recompence him for my sake: As Timareta could not speak <◇>, without some disorder which appeared in her face, Heracleon had much more disl <...> in his heart: and the more, because the King desiring to know how Sesostris saved Timaretas <◇> e, This fair Princesse it unto him, with all possible aggravations, as if shee Page 115 had a desire, in taking the Crown from Sesostris, at least to procure him the Kings favour: 'Tis true, he had a strong inclination, to lend a favourable eare unto any thing that was in advantage of Sesostris. Therefore when Timareta had ended her relation, the King assured her, that he would esteem Sesostris as her deliverer: Then he parted from her, as soon as hee had commanded the Ladies, to see her in an Equipage suitable to her present quality: so Heracleon conducted her unto her Chamber. As for Nicetis she met her husband in the outer chamber. In the meane while, Amasis having sent for Sesostris, he perceived in his going to the King, that there was some extraordinary matter in the wind: for notwithstanding all their care's to conceale it, the noise of it was spread abroad. But though he saw wonder in all the faces he met, yet he could not guess what the matter was: but he was not long in ignorance, for as soon as he came unto the King, who prepared him as well as he could to make the newes as little sad unto him as he could: he told how he had been deceived, how that he was not his Sonne, and how Timareta was his Daughter, demonstrating unto him all his proofes: Morelover (said he, and gave him not time to speake) do not think that the man whom I esteemed worthy to be my son and really was so, shall ever become a shepheard again: No, no Sesostris, I do not intend it: but on the contrary, I will make a publique declaration that you shall have a Ranke above all my Nobility, and continue so near the Throne, as it shall be hardly perceived you have had a fall. Sir (replyed Sesostris, who had time to recollect himselfe whilst the King was speaking) since I received the honour of being taken for your sonne, without any pride or ostentation: So I receive the newes of my change, without a grudge, or despair, or sorrow: yet I must needs confesse, that if I had quitted this honour unto any other but Timareta, I should have been most extremely sad: but I know her virtue so worthy of her quality, that I stand in need of no comforts in my losse, since she is the gainer: Moreover Sir, I confesse my self infinitely obliged unto you for your Princely expressions, but yet I cannot accept of your offers: for truly Sir, if ever I come into the ranke of your Nobility, I will be something beholding unto my sword, and not altogether unto your goodness for the honour: And truly considering the present condition of my Soul, I am not yet resolved whether I should make use of my sheephooke or my sword: for I had need of a little time to examine whether I have found more or lesse misfortune in the one then in the other: Yet I most humbly beseech you to believe, that I never contributed any thing unto your Majesties error, since I never thought my selfe to be the Sonne of Traseas, but of Amenophis. But whatsoever I be Sir, I shall be alwaies affectionately devoted unto your service: But before I leave the Court, I beseech you give me leave to bid adieu unto the Princesse Timareta. I consent unto it most willingly (said the King) but not that you shall bid her adieu; Sesostris answered unto these obliging expressions, with much respect: and though Amasis would not have him go from the Palace; yet he would not lie there, but went unto my friend whom I brought him acquainted with, and where we left all our martiall Equipage. Hee was no sooner there, but he sent for me to acquaint me with the revolution in his fortune; yet I knew it before, by Traseas and Nicetis, who were returned home. But when I came unto his Chamber. Well my dear Miris, said he unto me, is not my fortune very fickle? and must not he be either insensible or mortall that dies not for sorrow at such an alteration? not that I do at all regret the Grandure so much as perhaps you imagine, for thanks be to the heavens, I have a soul which sores above all sorts of ambition: but that which grieves my soul is, that I am still at an unsutable distance from Timareta, either as a Prince or a shepheard; and I conceive, that though she possesse that honour which I had yesterday, and I that which she hath quitted; yet I am still further of inequality then before. For had I been a King, I might have created her a Queen: but Timareta being Princesse, must never make me a King; and therefore my dear Miris, if I doe lament the losse of a Scepter, it is not out of ambition, but onely out of love. Moreover I cannot look upon Traseas as my Father, untill Amenophis return, and assures me I am his Sonne: And since now there is no necessity of concealing our selves, I would advise you (said he to me) to appear in the world for what you are, to the end you may acquaint me with the passages in it: for when I have once seen Timareta, I am resolved to forsake it: not that I can so soon depart from Elephantine, since Heracleon is in love with Timareta: for though I am a shepheard, Aegypt shall never have a King that is my Rivall. There I endeavoured to perswade Sesostris, that he must not run any hazards of ruining himselfe; but stay in expectation of some change, which might happily be advantageous for him; that the return of Amenophis would perhaps better instruct us; and truly after all this, I was confidently perswaded that neither Traseas or Amenophis ever gave him life. In thinking to comfort me, replyed he, you drive me unto new sorrows; for admit I were that which you think I am, yet am I the most Page 116 miserable man in the World: and if I be not what you suppose me, still I am all unfortunate. In the meane while, Sesostris was not the onely one who complained: The Princesse Liseri'na had her full share of sorrow; ambition did no lesse torment her, then love did Sesostris: she told every one, that this was but a suspition of her brothers, who had a desire to be King himself: adding that certainly Sesostris was the Sonne of Amasis: and that Timareta was no more then a shepheardesse: and she spoke it so loud and confidently, that Heracleon moved the King to send for her, to command her silence; for in the humour Heracleon was, there was nothing which he would not sacrifice unto his ambition: In the mean time, how great soever the desires of Sesostris were to see Timareta; yet his sorrowes were so great that day, as he was forced to stay untill the morning, passing away the night in such restless thoughts, that he never shut his eyes: Timareta for her part, she enjoyed no delight in all her Grandure; but slighted all manner of diversions, or care in dressing her selfe: For all the magnificence of her Lodging, she took more delight in the remembrance of her Cabin where she could talke with Sesostris: and when she considered that she was like to lose him for ever, she was in a mind to part with all her Grandure which caused the misfortune: sometime she was more grieved to see her selfe a Princesse, and Sesostris a shepheard, then she was when she believed her selfe a shepheardesse, and him the Sonne of a King. There was none therefore whose joyes were full, but onely Heracleon and Tanisis. As for Amasis, for all the satisfaction which he had to see the living Image of his dead but dear Ladice, he had such a restlessness in his heart, as quite distempered him, so that he found no delight in any thing. But Sir, the next morning being come, Sesostris according unto the Kings permission, went to see Timareta, and entred into her Chamber, as she was dressed the first time, as a person of her quality: As for Sesostris, hee was in a plain handsome sute without any trimming, such as men of quality commonly use to wear when they would not be seen. But there was such a masse of melancholy in his heart, that he could hardly keep it out of his face: 'Tis true, he had some cause of consolation, for when he entred into Timaretas Chamber, he found her face so full of serious sorrow, amidst all her magnificence, that he might easily divine the cause: This vision was so pleasing, that it made him able to hide some parts of his sorrowes. But on the contrary, Timareta seeing so much constancy in the soul of Sesostris, did the more tender his heart by the teares which fell from her fair eyes: So that desiring to hide this disorder from her women, after Sesostris had saluted her with a profound reverence, she went unto a corner between her bed and fire, where he followed her, and began to speak; Madam (said he unto her) I beseech you take it not ill that the shepheard Sesostris should assume so much liberty as to entreat you would be pleased to give him that sheephooke your fair hand was used to carry, assuring you he shall receive it with more consolation then he did the newes and hopes of his being King of all Aegypt. Ah Sesostris, (said she and interrupted him) I do not take it well, that your spirit should be so free after your change, as to talk of any such thing. I remember, that the first time you saw me after the King had acknowledged you for his sonne, you looked upon me with eyes full of teares: 'Tis true Madam (said he) but I am now so affraid my sorrowes should be ill interpreted, and that you should think I grieved at the parting from that Grandure which now is yours, that I mastered my self, and hid some part of my sorrowes; yet if you will be pleased to assure me, you will not think ambition to be the cause of my sorrowes, I shall shew you all my sad resentments: But that I may with more freedome do it, I beseech you be this day onely the shepheardesse Timareta: you will be a Princesse all the rest of your life, and it is but one hour which I shall desire to deprive you of that honour: I assure you, replied Timareta and sighed, that I shall be unto you, ever the same I was. True it is, I will not engage my selfe to live with you as I have done, for you know decency does not allow it; but I promise you, that the change in my fortune is not able to change the least thought of my heart. And I shall ever think my self most unhappy in my condition, because it is different from yours. I do not think that after this you will complain of me; Nor do I complain of you Madam (replied he) but I do extremely complain of my unhappy fate, which raised me up to throw me down again, and which onely raised you to make me more miserable. But Madam, however I beseech you do not deny me that which has absolute dependency upon your selfe, and which neither contradicts virtue nor decency: Me thinks (replied Timareta) after what I have already said, I need not tell you, that I will not deny you any thing you shall ask, so it bring just conditions with it. Since so Madam (replied Sesostris) let it not offend you, if I conjure you to believe that your quality hath nothing augmented those respects I had of you, and that quality which within these two daies I had, did nothing lessen the passion of my soul to you. Moreover Madam, that you may not take it ill if I preserve the same passion still in my heart; remember I beseech you, that since I was not capable of Page 117 change in becoming the Son of a King, so I am not capable of any alteration in returning to the quality of a Shepheard: So that adoring you out of a compulsive necessity, against which there is no resistance, you would be unjust if you were offended at it. Moreover, Madam, since in losing my chief happiness I have not lost all my reason, I know very well that I can hope for nothing from you; that it is my duty to adore you, and never see you; and that that it is onely death that must terminate my sorrowes: All that I can in reason ask, is, that you will be a little angry at fate for putting a greater inequality in our qualities then in our inclinations. However, since you give me leave to speak unto you now as unto the Shepheardesse Timareta, I must tell you that there is one thing that you can doe for me which will keep me from dying with grief. If it be in my power (replied she) and that it be not against the rules of virtue and decency, certainly I shall do it. I have so deep a respect of you, replied Sesostris, that I dare hardly speak it; but since I am confident in your goodness, I must tell you, Madam, that all the favour which I beg is, that you will not marry Heracleon, when I was in the same quality you now are, I was firmly resolved never to marry any but you. But, Madam, since the laws are not equal betwixt us, I shall not ask so much, but onely except Heracleon from all the Princes in the world. Not but that I am most confident the day of your marriage with any Prince will be the day of my death, but my death will be lesse sharp if it adde not felicity unto Heracleon. If you had not given me leave to expresse my self, Madam, I should not have spoke so boldly as I doe. But since if you please to remember, that the Prince Sesostris offered to throw away his crown if you pleased, and to seek out some desert Isle, where he might live with you, I hope you will not think the Shepheard Sesostris too insolent. I think him so unfortunate (replied she) that though he were too bold, yet I should not be offended at him: But to answer directly unto what you ask me (added she) I promise you to use all the endeavours that in all handsomnesse I can, never to marry Heracleon. And I promise you more then that; for if I cannot oppose the Kings will, I will have recourse unto death. Yet I doe not by this exact any great obligation from you, for I have such a strong natural aversion against him, that I will thwart his intentions, as well out of love to my self, as out of love to you. But the thing which I would have you take for a favour is, that if the gods would leave me to my own choice, I had rather be a Shepheardesse with you, then Queen of twenty Aegypts without you. Oh, Madam, said Sesostris, how much am I obliged to you for these expressions which will infallibly hasten my death, and hinder me from droning out a longer unhappy life? For after this I must dye with grief to see my self driven to such a sad necessity of losing one so infinitely generous. No, no, Sesostris (said she unto him) I would not have that which I speak to comfort you be an augmentation of your sorrowes; but on the contrary, if I have any power of you, I would have you live and love me, and that I may still have so much consolation as to think, that in what place soever you are, you keep your affection for me. That which may bee an assurance unto you of mine, is, that when you were the Prince Sesostris, and I Shepheardesse Timareta, what inequality soever there was between us, yet I should not have taken it well you should forget me, though I had desired you to do it: So that you are no farther off my quality then I was of yours, you need not fear I should forget you, though I see you not. After this, ask me no more: Doubtlesse I doe too little for the Shepheardesse Timareta, but perhaps a little too much for the Princesse of Aegypt. As they were thus in talke, one came to tell Timareta in all haste, that the King would speake with her, so that she must part abruptly from Sesostris: Yet she bade him adieu as the Shepheardesse Timareta, and though in a tumult, yet tenderly, and in such an obliging manner, that though the passion of Sesostris was very violent, yet had he no cause to complain. He retired then unto the lodging which he made choice of for his retreat, where he related unto me this sad discourse, as he used to doe all others. In the mean time Timareta in going to the Kings chamber, understood that he sent for her to tell her, that having engaged himselfe unto Heracleon, that if hee had a Daughter to marry her unto him, therefore hee would acquaint her with it, to the end that she should begin to look upon him as upon one that was to be her Husband. It is so short a while, replied Timareta, since I had the honour to know I was your Daughter, that me-thinks it is injurious to make mee so soon acknowledge any other authority then yours; therefore, Sir, I beseech you, let me a while enjoy the honour which I have. As the King was ready to answer Timareta, and tell her that he would be obeyed, he fell into a sound which lasted near an hour, and when he recovered out of it, he found that he had quite lost his sight; and whilst he was in his sound, his imagination was filled with the same apparition which formerly he had seen, but with this difference, that the menaces of Ladice were more terrible; so that he was not in a condition to talk any longer unto Timareta Page 118 concerning her marriage with Heracleon, for he was so troubled that he knew not what to resolve upon, not daring to tell all his griefe; For since he was not ignorant of Heracleons ambition, and knew what that passion could offer, hee durst not expresse how much he was troubled at the menaces of the gods, if he did not restore that Crown which hee had usurped: So that keeping all his sorrowes to himselfe: Oh yee just gods, said he, which punish me with such severity, though deservedly, How should I restore the Scepter which I have usurped? The sonne of Apriez is dead as well as himself, and there remains none living of his line; yet you let me understand by these horrid visions, that the Child of this unhappy King is not dead, but you do not let me know where he is: I had some suspitions indeed that Sesostris is the true Sesostris, and you who know the secrets of hearts, do also know that when I declared him my successor, I thought him to be as much the sonne of Apriez as mine owne: yet I must confesse that had I then known him for the sonne of that unhappy King, I should not have restored him the Scepter, because I was unwilling to part with Sovereign Authority, and to make a restitution in that manner before all the World: But now I have changled my mind, I cannot believe that Sesostris is the sonne of Apriez: for why should Traseas cause the sonne of his legitimate King whom he had brought up, to descend from the Throne? What likelihood is there that he should make one of the greatest Princes in the World to become a shepheard? There is more reason to think that Amenophis should take away the sonne of this shepheard with a designe to make him passe for the sonne Apriez, and to send him to Thebes when he saw opportunity: Yet for all this the gods do tell me by the Oracles, that I must restore the Scepter which I have usurped: and by most affrighting visions assure me that Sesostris is living: what should I do then? what can I resolve upon? As Amasis was in this restless mind, Heracleon came unto him, Timareta being returned unto her Chamber: And since Heracleon was a man who mocked at all these prodigies and advisements of the gods, he looked upon this accident which happen'd unto the King, as a thing which would be advantageous unto himself, which would the sooner hasten on his marriage with Timareta, and more assure him of the Crown: Yet he durst not that day speak unto the King, who on the other side durst not tell Heracleon all the inquietudes of his soule. In the meane time Sir, be pleased to know that Amenophis and the servant were so happy, that hee whom they fain'd Amenophis mortally wounded, did not die of his wounds: and so it chanced that whether hee was sick, the affaires of the Towne changed faces, and the weaker party becoming the stronger, he left that side he was of to take the other. Thus in this generall revolution, Amenophis found his safty, for the Prosecutor changing sides, would prosecute no farther, but suffered him to take his liberty. In the mean while, Amenophis after he had conferred with the revolvers, who had raised fresh Forces, and had assured them there was a Sonne of Apriez living, and that he would infallibly bring him unto them, he returned unto our Isle in hopes to find Sesostris: But Sir, you may imagine his wonder, when he heard in all places where he passed, that Amasis knew by Ladices letter that he had a Sonne; that he had found this Sonne in an Isle near Elephantine, and that his name was Sesostris. Amenophis at first, thought all these reports to be but Fables; but finding the nearer he came to Elephantine, the more they were confirmed it, he knew not what to think. Yet his astonishment was nothing in comparison of that amazement he was in, when he came within a daies journey of this great Town, and heard that he whom Amasis had acknowledged for his Sonne proved to be no more then a simple shepheard, and was returned to his former condition; and that Amasis acknowledged a shepheardesse, whose name was Timareta, for his Daughter: I say you may easily imagine how all these things surprised Amenophis: How ever he conceived it expedient before he attempted to go into the Isle, to know more certainly of the truth; so that he resolved to go unto Elephantine in the night, and lodge with his sister: But he was much perplexed to understand when he came there, that she was not in Town: so that Amenophis not daring to trust himselfe with the Domestiques of the house, and the Father of him with whom Sesostris and I lodged being his intimate friend, he resolved to make the Sonnes house his Retreat, whilst he enquired of the posture wherein things are: So that we were not a little astonished, when my friend, who knew how dear Amenophis was unto us, brought him into the Chamber where we were. I cannot easily expresse unto you Sir, both our joyes and his. He asked us a hundred things, and we in lieu of answers, asked him other questions. In the mean time, the master of the house leaving us to the freedome of talke: I beseech you (said Sesostris, who had an extreme desire to know who himself was) Tell me who I am? Am I the sonne of Amasis, or the sonne of Traseas, or your son? you are none of all these (replied Amenophis) whose am I then? (replied Sesostris) you are Sir, Page 119 (replied Amenophis) since it is now time to tell you, the Sonne of Apriez, and the legitimate King of Aegypt, and I come to fetch you, that you may accomplish a designe which hath been a long time in plotting. Sesostris was so surprised to hear this, that he doubted whether he had well understood him, so that he desired Amenophis to repeat what hee had said. Then Amenophis gave him an account of his design in concealing his birth, and told him it was he who raised all the revolts in Thebes, Heliopolis, and other places. Then Sesostris and I told him all the adventures both of Timareta and himself, which did no lesse surprise Amenophis, then his relation did us: The actions of Traseas did most puzzle him; for hee did not belevee that the Princes servant had revealed his secret. However it be said Amenophis, I had a designe to carry both Timareta and you unto Thebes, and then acquainted Amasis, that Apriez had left a Son, and Ladice a Daughter, so that when hee knew, wee had a person so deare unto him in our power, wee might have brought him unto some reasonable termes. But since that the posture of things are otherwise, Come, Sir, let us goe to Thebes, whither I will conduct you, and let the unjlist Amasis, see you are not his sonne but enemy, if he will not restore the Crown which is your due: I know very well, Sir, that when you parted from our Isle, you had a great affection unto Timareta; and though absence cannot cure you, and though she be Daughter unto the Usurper of your Dominions, you may yet love her, and you must make a just War to conquer her, and so enjoy at once both your Kingdome and your Mistris. Remember that your very name obliges you unto high things; and the Gods have given you spirit and heart enough to equall, and perhaps to transcend the most illustrious of your Ancestors. You know that when I taught you to be a faithfull and courageous Shepherd, I taught you by it to be a great and generous King. Begin then the conduct of your people whom the Gods have lawfully subjected unto you, and know that the War you shall attempt is most just, and cannot chuse but prove propitions. It is to expell an Usurper; it is to revenge your father, most barbarously massacred: it is to revenge the death of your mother, whose sorrows onely put to death: it is to crown your self with glory in the eyes of all Nations; it is to get your own Kingdome, and your Mistris. Oh Father (said Sesostris) for I cannot call you otherwise, I must tell you, and tell you without basenesse, that I cannot, nor will not leave loving Timareta, though she be the Daughter of an Usurper. I doe affect glory, and fear no dangers, but I love Timareta, and fear to offend her. Timareta (replied Amenophis) is questionless worthy of your esteem, not onely for her beauty and excellency of spirit and virtue, but also for the generosity of her mother, who was as faithfull a Subject as Amasis was perfidious: And for these reasons I am not against your loving her, but agree if Amasis consent, that you may marry her: But to effect that, and to oblige Amasis to give her unto you, you must be in the head of an Army; you must ask her as the sonne of Apriez, and let him know that Sesostris the Shepherd, and Sesostris the Prince are not the same. Oh Father (replied he) this Prince, and this Shepherd you speak of are but one person, yet have different desires, and I doubt whether one can yeeld unto the other. The Shepherd ought to yeeld unto the Prince (replied Amenophis.) Reason would have it so (replied Sesostris) but Love will not consent unto it. If you doe but consider the present posture of your fortune (answered Amenophis) you will find, that Love as well as Reason requires you should follow my advice: For the Shepherd Sesostris cannot pretend any thing unto the Princesse Timareta. 'Tis true, replied he, but Sesostris the Prince ought not to pretend any thing unto the Daughter of his Enemy: That you may cease being his enemy, answered Amenophis, you must become his master, you must fight with him and conquer him, and then give back Timareta that Crown which you have with justice taken from him. These, Sir, were the arguments which Amenophis used unto Sesostris, to convince him in point of love, and to invite him unto Thebes; but the passion which had taken up a strong residence in the soul of this Prince, would not permit him so suddenly to resolve upon so difficult a matter: He desired of Amenophis two dayes of consideration, but indeed it was to finde out an expedient how to acquaint the Princesse Timareta with his true birth, and to hinder Heracleon from marrying her, yet he could not possibly compass either: for it being the custom of all mercenary minded vassals to follow fortune at the heels, and change as it doth, when Sesostris would have entered to have seen Timareta, those who were at the Palace gate, and kept it for Heracleon, did treat him like a Shepherd, and would not suffer him to enter. This course entertainment did so incense him, that he doubled his fury against Heracleon, though he did not know that this triviall disgrace was caused directly by him: His grief was, hee knew not how to ruin Heracleon, for he was too generous to attempt any unworthy way, nor was it an easie Page 120 matter to invite him to fight with a Shepherd, neither could he force him, because he went alwaies well attended, nor did he ever stirre out of the Palace since Timareta was acknowledged Princesse. However, Sesostris could not resolve upon departure from Elephantine untill he had made sure of Heracleon for ever marrying Timareta: nor would he goe unto Thebes untill he had first asked advice of his dear Princesse: So that when those two dayes given by Amenophis were expired, he must allow him more: for since the noise of Heracleons marriage with Timareta grew louder every day, the jealousie of Sesostris augmented accordingly, and the more, because hee saw lesse hopes of revenge upon his Rivall. In the mean while Amenophis was vexed to the heart, that he could not get Sesostris out of Elephantine. But to make some use of his vexatious abode in the Towne, hee went privately in the night to visit divers persons of his acquaintance whom he knew would not discover him, to the end he might dispose them unto any great design, if occasion were. But whilst Timareta grieved for Sesostris in the midst of all her grandure, the Princesse Liserina grieved for the losse of a Crown, and Heracleon thought of nothing but how to become King, to murder Sesostris, and to marry Timareta; and whilst Sesostris had a mind full of vexatious thoughts, and had a hundred plots in his brain, all opposite to one another: Amasis was most cruelly tormented, not onely with sorrow for the losse of his eyes, but also with anguish of spirit, and sting of conscience for his wickednesse; he thought alwaies he heard the voice of Ladice threatening him, and the more was his misery, he observed that Heracleon began to take much authority upon him, and began to transact like a man who pretended to have all the power shortly in his own hands: But one extraordinary accident chanced, which did infinitely trouble him. Be pleased to know, that there is a generall Feast observed throughout all Aegypt, called the Feast of Lamps, which is celebrated unto the glory of Isis, and which is the onely Feast amongst us, whose ceremony is alike observed in all Villages, Townes, and Cities; and the day being come, they adorn their Temples with Garlands, and strow all the streets with flowers, and set before their doors all that they have most rare. And when the Sun is set, and night begins, they light not onely an infinite number of magnificent Lamps in every Church, but also in all the streets and publique places, in all their doors, windows, and towers; about all the walls of the Town, upon the Masts and Prows of every Ship in the Port; and this they doe to the very least village or cabin of a Shepherd: so that at this time all Aegypt is as light as day in the darkest night. And since amongst us it is beleaved, nothing is more acceptable to the gods then Perfumes, nor any thing more wholesome, or better to purifie the Air, every one addes unto his Lamp a Bonfire of Aromaticke wood before his door; so that in an instant there is such a pleasant vapour in the air, as perfumes all the fields about the Town: They use to sing also quantity of Songs in honour of Isis, both in their Churches and streets, but a large relation of this is not necessary unto my discourse: But this Feast being kept whilst we were there, every one hoped, that the presence of the King would make it more glorious, though the accident which happened did trouble all those who were lovers of quietnesse and peace. But, Sir, the hour being come when the Ceremony began, there was so much light, that all the Town seemed on fire: Amasis according to the custom went to the Temple in a Coach, and Timareta with him; Heracleon went on Hors-back next after the Kings Coach, and all the Court followed. But, Sir, the wonder was, that in all the streets where the King passed, all the Lamps seemed to extinguish, their light became dimme, their fires went out, and their perfumes changed their pleasant smell: The shrill shrieks and cries of fatall Birds were heard, and the accident did so amaze all the inhabitants of Elephantine, that they were full of fearful ejaculations and cries, which moving the King to ask the reason, and they were constrained to tell him; yet to sweeten the Kings apprehension, Heracleon used all possible skill to find out the naturall cause of this Prodigie; but Timareta was so affrighted, that she communicated her fears unto the King her Father; yet would he needs goe on unto the Temple, but the same dismall sight and noise was still heard there as well as in the streets: So that this Prince not seeing as others did, heard nothing about him but murmuring of voices, which let him know that the people were affrighted; and he beseeched the Gods to let him know what it was they would have him do which might appease them. After which he returned unto his Palace, yet more perplexed then before. As for Sesostris, he had the happinesse of seeing Timareta in the Temple, but yet he was not so happy as to be seen, though notwithstanding all her feares, he observed shee looked all about for him. This being the posture of affairs, it chanced that an old servant belonging to Amasis knew that servant which was with Amenophis as he was standing in the streets to see the King pass; so that since they were well acquainted heretofore, he wondered that Page 121 he should shun him, and seem not to know him: at first, he thought that perhaps he was deceived; but the care which the other took to avoide him, was it which confirmed him in his opinion, also he had a private marke in his face which made him very knowable: yet he could not speak unto him, for the presse of people did part them: The servant belonging to Amenophis being at last come unto the dore of his house where we lodged, he entered, and got out of sight from the Kings servant, who then returned unto the Palace, for this servant being one of those who waited about the Bath, he was to prepare one for the King his Master. However hee was certain that the man whom he had seen was the same which departed from Says, with the Queen, the young Sesostris, Ladice and Amenophis: so that considering well with himself, he thought it fit to acquaint the King, and did so as soon as he had opportunity: And since he named the house where he saw the man enter, the King was much amazed at it, for he knew it to be the house where Sesostris lodged: so that apprehending a servant unto the late Queen of Aegypt, was with Sesostris who he suspected to be the sonne of Apriez, he began to think, he was not mistaken when hee thought so: but as hee was ready to command him who gave him the intelligence, to enquire better, concerning the truth, hee had further intelligence from one of his servants that Amenophis was in Elephantine, plotting some great design: Amasis no sooner heard this, but he sent the Lieutenant of the Guard, to bring him by maine force unto him; appointing also Sesostris to come, and expresly charging that Heracleon should not know any thing: These orders were secretly given, and as punctually executed, for he knew nothing of any passages since he was busie in Counsell with Tanisis and others all that day, consulting concerning his marriage with Timareta: But whilst he was deliberating upon a thing which he thought certain, and never looked at waies how to bring it to passe, Amenophis, Sesostris, his servant, and I were brought unto the Palace. You may very well imagine Sir, how this touched Amenophis to the quick, for since he was ignorant of the King repentance, he was in extream fear lest Sesostris, should perish, or at least be kept a prisoner, if he were known to be the sonne of Apriez: He began to prepare himself for a deniall, and to give Sesostris such instructions as he thought most expedient, to perswade Amasis that he was not sonne unto Apriez, in case he had any suspicions of it: But Sesostris told him that he would not passe for what he was any longer, for, said he, I would have Heracleon know who I am: and I had much rather Amasis should know I am the sonne of his enemy, then that Timareta should look upon me as a shepherd, and Heracleon as a man unworthy to measure a sword with him: he would have said more, but he was prevented by the Lieutenant of the Guard, who broke off our discourse and conducted us: But Sir, when we came to the Palace, Amasis would speake with Amenophis in private: so that carrying him into his Closet, we stayed in his chamber: But Amenophis was wonder-struck when he heard Amasis speak: Well Amenophis, said he unto him: I pray acquaint me with such things as I desire to know: I do not ask you what is become of Apriez his sonne, with any intentions of harme unto him, for know, that I am not the same I was, I have lost my ambition in losing my sight, and the justice of the gods lies so heavy upon me, as teacheth me to be just also: And therefore I desire to know certainly of you whether the sonne of Apriez be living, and were he is? Amenophis hearing the King to speak thus, knew not, whether or no hee should trust him: But Amasis perceiving by his pumping for an answer, that he had no confidence in him, assured him with an oath, that if the sonne of Apriez were living, hee would restore the Crown unto him, by giving him his daughter. Amenophis was now perswaded, and after high applaude of the Kings most generous resolution, he began to tell him the whole truth, making an exact relation of all passages, which happened unto Sesostris, unto the Queen, unto Ladice, unto Timareta, and unto himself, since he went from Says; handsomly aggravating the valour of Sesostris in the Combate with the Crocodile to save the life of the Princesse, and giving him such hints as he might thereby guesse at the affection which Sesostris had unto his daughter the Princesse Timareta: After which, hee added a most excellent rhetoricall discourse, perswading him to stand firm in those resolutions which he had taken, and shewing him that he can no way Raig so safe and securely, both with externall and internall serenity of soul, but by causing Sesostris to raig: nor never so securely settle the Crown upon his Posterity, as by a marriage between Timareta and him: for, said he, which other way is it possible you should restore the Crown, and settle a satisfactorie peace throughout all Aegypt. But Sir said he, that your Majesty may not suspect me of any forged suppositions, it were requisite you sent for Traseas, Nicetis, the nurse of Timareta who yet lives; and some shepherds which are in the Isle, and were then so when I arrived there, and by all these your Majesty may know that Traseas had never a sonne, and that Sesostris is the sonne of Apriez, and Page 122 the very same I brought with me when I came into that Isle; for though his age hath much altered his resemblance, yet there is resemblance enough to know him to be the same. Amasis, was so well perswaded by the arguments of Amenophis, that he scarce needed any further satisfaction; and the Gods had infused such a strong belief into his heart, that he was perswaded fully all was true which Amenophis had said: Yet not to be deluded in a matter of so great importance, he sent for all those Amenophis named, who confirmed all he had told the King: For Traseas no sooner came face to face before Amenophis, who bad him speak the whole truth ingenuously, without any disguise, but he very sincerely did so. Thus there needed no more for the knowing of Sesostrius, then the testimonies of Traseas, Nicetis, Timareta's Nurse, the servant of Sesostrius, and all the Shepherds, who all concurred in the very same relation. Then Sesostrius entered, and Amasis spoke unto him in such a generous manner, that the hearts of all the hearers were mollified. Sesostrius seeing this happy turn in fortune, did answer Amasis with wonderful wisdom and generosity, which appeared to be in a higher degree than the generosity of the King: For since his love to Timareta was all his thoughts, he behaved himself towards Amasis with the same respect, hee did when hee was thought to be his Father. In the mean time, since this Prince knew that Heracleon would most sadly resent this news, he would not have it published until better opportunities for it: So we returned that night unto the places where we were before. But, Sir, that which confirmed the King most in these resolutions which he had fixed upon, was, that after he had sent for Heracleon, and with all possible prudence acquainted him with the reasons which moved him to break his word, and that he received his reasons in such a manner, as let him know he had no mind to part with Timareta: In lieu of fearing any revolutions in the State, or apprehending the resentments of Heracleon, he found such quiet rest and satisfaction in his heart, as he had not enjoyed a long time before. So that dismissing Heracleon, he told him, for his last reason, that he could not dispose of that which was not his own; and that he never made any promise of Scepter, or Timareta unto him, but in case Sesostrius dyed; but since he was alive, all promises are null. Heracleon, with as much injustice as insolency, called that weakness which he should have phrased virtue; and told Amasis, with insufferable boldnesse, that he deserved more shame in restoring a Crown, then he did glory in getting it. But in conclusion, Sir, Amasis imposing silence upon him, he was forced to retire. Amasis remaining in as much tranquillity of mind, as the other went away disordered. Yet he gave special order that observant eyes should be had over Heracleon; for since he loved him, he would not willingly lose him, nor be forced to drive him away from him. After this, he went to bed and slept, and in lieu of gasty apparitions, and terrible dreams as he used to have, his imagination was full of sweet and pleasing things. Ladice appeared unto him, but it was in full lustre of that beauty which formerly he adored; in commending him as much as before she menaced him, and exhorting him to goe on with what he had so well begun; and to augment the wonder, whether the joy and agitation of his spirits had dispersed some melancholy vapours, which caused his blindness, or whether the gods would either punish or recompence him according to the various thoughts of his soul, when he awaked, he found his sight restored; so that being transported with joy and delight, he sent for Sesostrius and Timareta, and went with them unto the Temple, to render thanks unto the gods, himself declaring unto all the people that Sesostrius was the Son of Apriez, and telling Timareta that she was much obliged unto a Prince, who though she was the Daughter of an Usurper, yet would give her the Crown of Aegypt; yet Sesostrius did publicly declare, that he would not wear the Crown until after the death of Amasis, but would be onely regarded as the first of his Subjects. You may well imagine, Sir, how great was the joy of Sesostrius and Timareta, when being returned to the Palace, and this Prince had the liberty to wait upon her to her chamber, and to talke with her freely before he returned unto the King, as he was desired, that he might be advised with concerning the best expedients of publishing the matter throughout all the Kingdome, and principally at Thebes and Heliopolis, to the end all Warres might cease. I hope you will pardon me, Sir, if I do not relate any joyes and delights of this juncture; Sesostrius & Timareta continued so short a time happy, that I cannot do it; nor will I relate all the resolutions the King took with Sesostrius, and Amenophis; nor how great was the peoples joy when they knew there was a Prince descended from their Antient Kings who should succeed Amasis. But give me leave to tell you, that in consideration of the happy event of this adventure, the King pardoned Traseas the untruths which he had told: Sesostrius did the same, and Amenophis followed their example. As for the Princesse Liserina, she had some comfort, to see her brother put by the Kingdome: for she conceived him onely to be the cause why she was not Queene. Page 123 But as for Heracleon, the motions of his heart were most violent: and Tanisis incensing him by his wicked Counsellors, there was no abominable proposition which they made unto each other, which they did not harken unto without any horror or repugnancy: But at last, after they had propounded Crime after Crime, they resolved, that considering the juncture of affaires, there was no way but to kill Sesostrius, and the King also. And in the meane time to publish that Amenophis was an impostor, who foisted in a pretended Sonne of Apriez: And to farther that design, they resolved, that the King should first be killed, to the end it might be published that Sesostrius killed him: and for a pretence, to raise a tumult, during which, Tanisis should kill Sesostrius, having men for that purpose with him. This horrid designe being resolved upon, all their endeavours were to put it in execution with all speed. Tanisis, accustomed unto all villanies, had alwaies such men at his beck, who never look after any thing but recompence, but never enquire whether a thing be just or unjust: But the difficulty was, how to get him unto the Kings Palace, at that time when the act was to be executed: Yet since Heracleon had many Creatures in the house, he found out one that was neither rich nor virtuous: moreover he had been once turned out of office by Amasis, and at the request of Heracleon restored: This man at the salutation of Tanisis, did ordinarily keepe the Guard upon a little back staires which went between the lodging of Sesostrius and the Kings Chamber: So that thinking the man most fit to give entrance unto those whom they would imply to murder the King, and the sooner, because it might easily be imagined that Sesostrius was the Assasinate, considering the place which he Guarded, therefore Heracleon put on Tanisis to suborne this man: But Sir, I will not make any longer relation of an act so horrid: but in short, let me tell you, Tanisis suborned this Officer, who promised to let in whom he would: and the businesse was brought unto so near a point of execution, that men were ready to cry out the King was killed, and that it was Sesostrius killed him: and lest there should be any failing in the enterprise, Heracleon had provided a boate upon the Nile, which ran on the back side of the Garden, that he might thereby save himselfe if need were, and also laid horses some thirty furlongs from Elephantine. In conclusion Sir, this being the Juncture of things, the King had intelligence by one of those whom he had set to eye Heracleon, that certainly he had some plot in hand, though he knew not what it was. Amasis hearing this, feared that Heracleon had some ill designes upon Sesostrius, not thinking of any thing against his person: So that to prevent any danger, hee doubled the Guards towards the lodging of Sesostrius, and by consequence weakened his own, which was favourable unto the designe of Heracleon. But the gods being just, they did not favour him but unto his own ruine. For Sesostrius knowing that the Guards were doubled at his dore, would know the reason, and called him in who commanded the Guard, who at first said he knew nothing, but that accidentally the Guards were stronger on the one side then the other. But Sesostrius, finding that this Souldier knew more then he would tell, he was very urgent with him, and so farre, that at last he told him, it was supposed Heracleon had some ill design, because he was seen that night go out of the Palace, and speak unto an officer which had the Guard upon the back staires, and was heard to promise him great recompences. This officer saying to excuse his silence, that he durst not tell it, lest he should not be credited, and become exposed unto the hatred of Heracleon: Sesostrius no sooner heard this, but after promise of recompence for his fidelity, he went to acquaint the King, though it was late, and he knew that he was retired to his rest: and certainly it was by the inspiration of the gods. However it was Sir, Sesostrius went: and went not that way of the back staires, but by the great common way, lest he whom the souldier suspected and commanded that side, should think he was discovered, if he should see him so late unto the King, who was fast asleep, when Sesostrius came unto the Chamber with two of the guard and my self. But the strangest of this accident is Sir, that just as they opened the Kings Chamber dore to goe and wake him, and tell him Sesostrius desired to speak with him, we saw the wardrobe dore open at the same time, and many men with drawne swords enter into the Chamber, which had a Lamp burning in it. Sesostrius no sooner saw this, but drawing his sword, he ran with a most magnanimous generosity between the Kings bed, and these Assasins, not considering him as the usurper of his Kingdome, but as the father of Timareta. So that the King being wakened with the noise of them that would have killed him and them that defended him (for the two Guards and I followed Sesostrius with our swords drawn) the first object that he saw, was, that Sesostrius killed one of the Assasins, and wounded another, he also observed that he still stood betwixt him and them as much as he could. I cannot easily tell you, Sir, what an affrighting object this was unto Amasis, but it lasted not long, for the incomparable valour of Sesostrius repulsed all the wicked Assasins. Page 124 Tanisis who led them up, felt the weight of Sesostrius his arm, being wounded in two places: So that after this fear seising upon all the Conspirators, they went out of the Chamber and Wardrobe: Sesostrius would have pursued them further, but Amasis rising up hastily, would not let him: So that making the doors fast on that side, and guarding them until all were awake in the Palace, the King sent two of the Guard down the back stairs, to know the number of the Conspirators, and to report all they saw unto him: Also hee sent other two to cause all his Officers to come unto him, and amongst the rest, Simandius: In the mean time those who failed in the execution of that designe, rallied about Heracleon; for hee stayed in the Court with those whom he had appointed to murder Sesostrius: But since he saw his designes did not hit, and that hee could neither kill the King, nor Sesostrius, hee pitched upon another plot, which was to carry away the Princesse of Aegypt: Hee knew shee had but few men with her, and that shee lodged farre off the Kings lodging: For Elephantine not being the ordinary residence of our Kings, the Palace where he lodged was very irregularly built: So that Heracleon finding more facility in this design then the other, he did easily execute it. Causing then her door to be opened in the name of the King, he entered, and took away Timareta maugre all her teares, cries, and entreaties, and this great Princesse had scarce time enough to dresse her self. Yet she had this advantage in her misery, that her women went with her. In the mean time, those men whom the King sent to discover the Conspirators, hearing some women cry, returned in all hast, and told the King that they were in the Princesse Timareta's chamber: So that Sesostrius hearing this, ran like a man in fury to defend his Princesse, but he came too late; for Heracleon and Tanisis were both already embarked. You may easily imagine, Sir, how this Prince was grieved, especially when he saw all his pursuits of Heracleon were in vain. That which favoured his flight, was, that none imagined that he was embarked in the Nile, but that he was still hid in Elephantine. The next morning it was known that Heracleon landed at the place where he had layd his horses, and that Tanisis stayed by the Rivers side, and dyed in the arms of some Shepherds who found him in that place, though no news could be heard of Heracleon, or which way he took; and though Sesostrius used all possible endeavours to finde it out; for he wandered two whole moneths, hardly knowing whither he went: Amasis for his part caused a strict search to be made all over the Kingdome, and all in vaine: So that at last Sesostrius was constrained to stay with the King until he had further light where Heracleon was. In the mean time, all those who took up Armes for the Son of Apriez, layd them down againe. And the King went to Thebes, carrying Sesostrius with him, whose sorrows were beyond expression. From Thebes they went to Memphis, where the King met with an Ambassador from Croesus, who demanded ayd according to the alliance which was between them: So that Amasis sent those men who served in the war of Thebes, who had been witnesses of the valour of Sesostrius, under the name of Psammetites: Amasis willing Simandius to command them; but a while after these Forces were departed, a Letter which Heracleon writ unto one of his friends in Aegypt, did happily fall into the hands of Sesostrius, which let him know that he was in Lydia: So that Sesostrius not communicating his design unto any but me, resolved to steal away from Amasis, and Amenophis, to serve in the War under Croesus: And this he did with abundance of reluctancy, for he was infinitely charmed with the fame of your valour and virtue, and loth he was to take any side but yours. Yet Love being the predominate passion of his soul, he resolved to serve Croesus, thereby to obtain Timareta: So that Sesostrius stole away from the Court, and I followed him: At parting he writ unto the King, acquainting him with the cause of his voyage; also unto Amenophis, desiring him to appease the King, assuring him he would never return unlesse he brought back Timareta, also desiring him to move Amasis to write unto Croesus, that he would make a strict search for Timareta, and return her to him. At last, Sir, we arrived at Sardis, where Simandius was before us with the Forces he commanded, who were as full of joy as wonder to see my Master. I need not tell you, Sir, how Croesus, the King of Pontus, and the Prince Myrsiles received Sesostrius very well: But I assure you, hee was infinitely grieved that hee could hear no news either of Heracleon or Timareta, after all his care and search with Croesus, made upon the Letter of Amasis. In the meane while as things stood, honour would not permit Sesostrius to goe out of Sardis to seek his Princesse from Town to Town throughout Lydia; also the approach of the Army presently made it a thing impossible for him: So Sesostrius in lieu of looking for Timareta, was engaged to fight, and he did so courageously, that he deserved immortall glory; and, Sir, you know that your Battalion was the onely one that day which was not broken. But, Sir, be pleased to know, that the Prince Sesostrius Page 125 was not wounded by any of your men, but by the base Heracleon. I cannot tell you, Sir, how he came mingled amongst us, or how he came to know my Master; but when we were fighting with the valiant Abradates, and when Sesostrius did things worthy of your esteem, had you been a witnesse, this Traytor Heracleon came behind him, who thought he had no enemies to fight with but what were before him, and wounded him in such sort, that hee fell down dead amongst our Heroes. As I was the onely man who observed whose arme it was who gave the wound, so I was the onely man who revenged the death, as I thought, of the Prince Sesostrius, and as I was redoubling my fury, when I perceived it to be Heracleon, I was <...> dred from killing him outright, by a squadron of your men, Sir, who pursuing their victory, came betwixt Heracleon and me; so that I was forced to get into a Body of our men, where I stayed untill after you had gained the battell, and untill our shewing our firm resolutions, obliged your great heart to put a difference between us, and them that fled, and to treat us with so much generosity, as moved us to think, that after you has saved the life of the Prince Sesostris; you would also out of your goodnesse make the wicked Heracleon confesse in what place the Princesse Timareta is: For truly, Sir, we have saved the life of the Prince Sesostris in vain, if he do not find the Princesse whom he adores.

My own misfortunes have so taught me how to have pity upon the miseries of others (answered Cyrus) that I must needs have much compassion upon the Prince Sesostris; and I assure you I will zealously interest my self in any thing that relates unto him; and to testifie as much, I will goe my self to make Heracleon confesse where the Princesse Timareta is; and I beseech the Gods that I may restore her unto the Prince Sesostris in releasing Mandana. After this Miris retired; for it was very late, and Cyrus had but little time to rest; yet he did not sleep until he had bestowed one quarter of an hour in remembrance of his dear Princess; though it was with much sorrow at her unjust Jealousie, whereof she had given him such a cruell Testimony.

ARTAMENES, OR, CYRVS the GREAT. THE SIXTH PART. BOOK III.

Whilst the most illustrious Cyrus was lending an eare unto the adventures of Sesostris, and the crimes of Heracleon, the last of these hearing what care Cyrus had of Sesostris, he was in such a fury, as all his wounds opened, and such a violent Feaver seised upon him, that intelligence was given unto Cyrus, that he could not outlive the night following: Cyrus then hearing in what condition he was, in remembrance of his promise, went to see him, and to win him either by fair means or foul to confesse where Timareta was, but he found him not in a condition to be talked withall, for he raved, and was out of his wits; yet Cyrus had as good intelligence concerning this Princesse in his raving idle talk, as if he had his reason free: For as soon as he saw the Prince at the side of his bed, and his imagination being filled with thoughts of Timareta, he thought Cyrus to be the King of Pontus, and began to thank him for giving Sanctuary unto the Princesse Timareta in the Cittadell of Sardis. Afterwards changing his discourse, hee spoke sometimes of Sesostris as if he were dead, and sometimes again as if he would kill him: so that his mind not settling upon any one object, it was not possible to draw any certaine intelligence concerning Timareta out of him: Yet since a Prisoner confessed unto Cyrus, that there entered a Lady of great quality into the Cittadell of Sardis, he thought there was some ground to be taken of what Heracleon had said, yet he would not give this hope unto Sesostris, untill he had more; but Heracleon having lost his speech, and a little while after his life, then he sent Miris unto him to acquaint him with the death of his Rivall, and what great probability there was, that the Princesse Timareta was in the Cittadell of Sardis. After which, according to the custome, he went to give all necessary orders, and to visit his Troops, leaving the care of Heracleons Funerall unto those about him. He went also unto the Tent of Araspes, whose wounds were not so vexatious unto him as the sorrows of his soul: From thence Cyrus went to hold a Councell of War, wherein it was resolved, that within two dayes they should give a second assault: So that this Prince employed all his time in seeing the Engines, in instructing those who were to make them, in giving good counsel unto all the Officers, and in encouraging the souldiers. The King of Assyria, and Mazares did the like, and all the rest of the Kings and Princes in the Army were exceedingly zealous to promote the designs of Cyrus. Anaxaris in particular was not the least forward in the service Page 127 of this Prince: And the Prince Sesostris being almost perfectly recovered of his wounds, was so very much joyed that there was some likelihood of Timaretas being in Sardis, that he would needs go unto the Camp, especially when he heard that an assault was to be given unto the Town: for though the forces of Amasis came with intentions to defend it, and the Egyptians unto whom Cyrus shewed favour, had not submitted but upon condition not to be forced to fight against Croesus, yet now things looked with another face: and Sesostris heard that Croesus spoke unworthily of the Egyptians, who onely resisted the Enemy in the day of Battle: This did so incense all them of that Nation, that they were resolved to fight for Cyrus: But since the resolution was taken whilst Sesostris was not in a condition to command them: this Prince, whose generosity was more scrupulous then theirs, would not suffer them, before he entreated Cyrus to let him send a herald unto the King of Lydia, to ask whether the Princesse Timareta was in Sardis or no, and whether he would restore her? this he did, that he might find a way to doe it without a wound unto his honour. He departed then from the Castle where he was, but first he took leave of the Princesse Araminta, unto whom he had already made many visits, to thank her for the care she had of them, during the violence of his sickness. He bad adieu also unto the fair Cleonice, unto Doralisa, and all the rest of the Prisoners. Sesostris then after he had received a thousand civilities from all these fair Prisoners, went unto the Camp, where he was entertained by Cyrus with all the honours due unto his birth, virtue, and merit: And after Cyrus had offered him all assistance in his power, Sesostris desired he might send a Herald, to enquire and demand Timareta, which according to his desires was done. But this message was in vain, either unto Croesus or the King of Pontus: for the more persons of quality they had in their power, the more secure they thought themselves, and therefore would not restore Timareta. Croesus therefore answered, that it was true he had her in his hands: But he would not restore her, unlesse Amasis would send strong reliefe as might raise the siege of Sardis. So that Sesostris receiving this answer in the presence of Cyrus, turned smilingly toward him, and told him that in his apprehension, since it was more easie to take the Town of Sardis, then to relieve it, it were better for him to receive Timareta from his hand then from Croesus: therefore in lieu of relieving the Town, he would help to take it; and was very glad that he was certain she was in the Town, which could not chuse but be taken, since the invincible Cyrus would assault it: My hope is, replied Cyrus, that since the valiant Sesostris will fight for Timareta, he will teach me by his example, how to fight for Mandana. In the meane time, Cyrus treated Sesostris with all civility, and would have all the Grandees of his Armie visit him, and do him all honour, so that Sesostris that day saw all the Princes which were in the Armie, who were so well satisfied with him, and so taken in with his spirit and civility, that he was infinitely esteemed. And to do him the more honour, Cyrus would have him comm and one Brigade of the Assaulters, so that the morning being come, all orders being given, all the Engines fit, all the Ladders ready, & every one prepaired to fight, they began an hour before day, to fill the ditch about the Town in diverse places with faggots: which was so readily done, that the assault was given almost in an instant: and this great Towne, was set round with ladders except that side which looks towards the mountaine Tmolus, which seemed inaccessible: Cyrus was in that quarter next the Cittadell which was the most dangerous: The King of Phrygia assaulted that side towards Pactolus. The King Assyria, that which was opposite to it: And Mazares commanded that which was between Cyrus and the King of Assyria: Sesostris that side which looked towards the Plaine: Tigranes and Phraartes another towards the principall Port: and Anaxares another quarter: Hidaspes, Chrisantes, Andramites, Aglatides, Persodes, Hermogenes, Leontidas, and all the brave men of the Army commanded under these Princes. The King of Hircania Gobrias, and Gadates, remained at the Camp, and commanded the reserves; to execute all the commands of Cyrus, and to send reliefe where there was need: The orders of this assault were not onely judiciously given, but most courageously executed: and the more, because the Lydian resistance found matter enough for the valour of all these great Princes and Souldiers: Both besiegers and besieged were all fury, both in assaulting and defending: There was such a vast number of Ladders, and men to carry them, that if the Lydians had not been encouraged by a man whom love made think nothing difficult, certainly they never would have opposed so great a storm, and so generall an assault, but he infused such spirit into them, and they fought so courageously, that they made their enemies admire them: for though they were assaulted by the most valiant Princes of the World, and by stout souldiers used to gain battles, conquer Kingdomes, and take Townes; yet they resisted them so sturdily, that they seemed invincible: they did not onely send clouds of arrowes, showers of stones, and throw down, Page 128 Ladders, but fought hand to hand with heroique fury, against those that came upon the top of the walls: But Sir, though Cyrus did things prodigious, and all the rest of the Princes wonders, especially Sesostris; and though every one fought with all their force, yet they were not able to carry the Town that day: Yet it was very remarkable, that except Tigranes who was slightly hurt in the hand by the fall of a ladder, there was not one of those Princes either killed or wounded. 'Tis true Cyrus was oft in extreame danger, for he exposed himself so oft, that he was of treddy to be thrown down from the top of the ladder, or else to be knockt in the head with stones which the Lydians threw: Yet he came off safe, but so sadly, that never any was more, for he found it a matter of great difficulty to force this Town: so that calling a Councel of Warre whilst a Cessation of hostility was made for four hours, to draw off their dead, it was resolved, to force it no more, because it could not be taken by storme, by reason of the high walls, multitude of Inhabitants, and abundance of Souldiers which defended it: but they began to draw a line about it with forts, hoping to take those by famine who could not be taken by force: And the next morning without more delay, Cyrus went with the Engineers of his Army to view the ground, and to consider at what distance they should make it, and how they were to raise forts to defend it: It was no sooner resolved upon, but Prisoners and others began to cast up earth: Cyrus himself, being a while an example to encourage the laborers: so that the Inhabitants of Sardis seeing their Town ready to be inclosed: and that the besiegers went not about to raise their siege as they hoped, their joyes for the last repulse of the enemies was quite quashed, and they began to murmur: some said one thing; some another; sometimes they would make them believe, that Cyrus cared not for Mandana, then they would perswade them, that he would discampe if they did courageously sustaine this assault, yet it seemed they were like to be exposed unto all the hardships of a long siege: So that they fell unto a fresh mutinie, for nothing is more terrible to the people then fear of Famine: The thing which much augmented their disorder, was, that when the siege began, there were many strangers in the Town who were forced to stay against their wills, and who now would have gone out if it had been in their power: amongst this multitude of strangers, there was one Lician Ladie of quality, who coming unto Sardis to see a sister which was married unto Doralisas Uncle, was there shut up, having with her one daughter, one Neece, and one of her friends, all three very fair and amiable: Every one was sorry that these three beauties and strangers should be shut up in a besieged Town. They did earnestly sollicite Croesus for leave to write unto Doralisa, who they knew was the Princesse of Pontus, since the death of Panthea, that she would obtain leave of Cyrus for three Ladies who were not of Sardis, to come out of the Town, and go unto their own homes. And since they knew Andramites was in love with Doralisa, also in favour with Cyrus, they hoped he would mediate for them: Therefore halving obtained a Herald from the King of Lydia, they writ unto Doralisa and Andramites, giving their letters unsealed unto this Herald, who according to his Commission, went out of the Town unto the head of the Trenches where he stayed, and where an officer and four souldiers came to conduct him unto Cyrus. This Prince no sooner knew the Cause of his coming, but he sent him immediately unto Doralisa; and sending her word by him who conducted the Herald, that he consented unto what was desired: so Doralisa and Andramites in lieu of coming to ask a favour, were obliged to come and thanke Cyrus: Then the Herald returned with much satisfaction, the time being set when Cyrus would send a Convoy to guard these Ladies at their coming out of the Town: Then the Herald rendering an account of the happy successe of his voyage; that Lician Lady, named Lycaste, accompanied with a Neece named Parmenides, her daughter called Cypide, a sister of Parmenides called Apallice, and one of her friends named Candiope, went to thank Croesus and take their leaves of him: The Prince Myrsiles accompanied them to the Gates of the Town, in consideration onely that they were cosens of Doralisa, whom he ever highly esteemed: and certainly this stood in need of a person of some authority to conduct them thither: For though the Inhabitants might have been glad of these Ladies going out of the Town, yet they murmured: yet the prelsence of Prince Myrsiles restraining them, they let them go out in a Coach, Parmenides riding on horseback, and followed by all the Train of Lycaste, and her own: A Herald of Croesus, riding before, to conduct them unto the place, where Andramites in the head of fifty horse waited for them. But as if Fortune did strive how to make the most innocent actions of Cyrus seem culpable, it chanced that the Princesse Mandana, and the Princesse Palmis halving got a day of leave to take fresh air, upon the Tarrasse, from which all the Plain is discovered, they were there just as these Ladies went out at the Gate next the Cittadell; so that wondering to see a Coachfull of Ladies go out of a besieged Town, they began to observe them, and follow them close with their eyes, so that they saw when the Herald conducted them to Page 129 the place where Andramites stood, and observed how Andramites received them, Mandana perceived, or at least imagined, that he received them with much respect, and afterwards that he led them towards the Camp: Since all he did, must needs be by the orders of Cyrus, his actions could not be indifferent unto her; and she conceived that these Ladies could not come out of Sardis but by the permission of Cyrus; therefore she had so violent a curiositie to know who they were, and why Cyrus should shew them such a favour, that she could not chuse but ask the King of Pontus, the next time she saw him, which was every day at such hours as his businesse of War could best spare him, and when the melancholy of Mandana permitted him; therefore she no sooner saw him, but addressing her speech unto him: I would gladly know, Sir, said she unto him, who those Ladies were which yesterday went out of Sardis, and who have obtained more favour then I can? The King of Pontus, not being ignorant of her thoughts, answered her craftily, that those Ladies obtained a Pasport from Cyrus, because they were Cosens unto a Lady whose name was Doralisa, who the Queen of Susiana loved very well, and who at this present is with the Princesse Araminta. Thus this Prince, though he spoke nothing but truth, yet spoke very much against his Rivall. Mandana not doubting but that Cyrus permitted these Ladies to come out of Sardis onely in consideration of the Princesse Araminta, and not at all of Doralisa; yet since she would hide the agitation of his spirit as much as she could. I wonder, said she, since the Princesse Araminta has such a power over the spirits of Cyrus, that there are not more Ladies which make use of her credit with him to get out from hence; for I believe he can deny her nothing. I believe (replied the King of Pontus) that my Sister makes better use of that power which she hath over the soul of Cyrus, then you doe of that which you have over me: You, I say, who every day ask things impossible, or at least things which if not denied, will give a death to him you ask them of. I know not what she asks (replied she) yet I am sure, I ask nothing of you but what is just, and which you ought not to deny me. Though I agree, replied he, that what you ask is just, yet I cannot agree, Madam, that I ought not to deny it: For Love is a passion which cannot acknowledge any empire but his own. Therefore never wonder, Madam, if I doe not hearken unto what you say, since you never speak any thing but in opposition to my passion. Though I should confesse, Sir (replied Mandana) that Love does not admit of Reason, yet it must admit, and submit unto necessity: Therefore to what purpose is all your obstinate endeavours to defend Sardis, and to win my heart, since the first of these is very difficult, and the other absolutely impossible? It were better policy for the King of Lydia to think of preserving his Crown, and for you to think of procuring your liberty by giving me mine. I will consent (added she, in a mind extremely incensed against Cyrus) that you shall not deliver me into the hands of any Prince who is your Rivall, since I would have you deliver me unto none but the King my Father. Ah Madam (replied he, the better to know her thoughts) can I believe you had rather be carryed unto Ecbatan, then to remain in the Camp of Cyrus? Doubt it not, replied she, but believe, that my soul is in such a condition, as I will neither be favourable unto you, or him. How, Madam, replied he, can you cease from loving Cyrus as well as my self? I assure you, said she, I begin to love none in that way you would be loved. I have told you, Sir, a hundred times, that you have an infallible way to get my esteem and friendship, which is, to keep me no longer a Captive: For though in reason, when any one ceaseth from persecuting, it is enough the persecuted party cease from hating, without so much generosity as to forget all past injuries, which the common people of the world are not used to doe: But I will now repeat the same I have said a hundred times before, Doe but release me, Sir, and I will ever both esteem, and become your friend. I wish to the Gods, replied he, that I were able to be contented with your offer, or that I could perswade you to a little more. As for my self (replied she) it is absolutely impossible, therefore it must be you that must change, since I cannot, that the Warres may cease, which causeth so many miseries, and which in all likelihood will last a long time: at least, I am perswaded Cyrus has no design to end it quickly, since hee lets so many out of Sardis. The King of Pontus hearing Mandana speak in this manner, was as joyfull as his bad condition could permit, for he perceived her mind was much incensed against Cyrus; and truly he was not mistaken: He was no sooner gone out of her chamber, but Mandana called for Martesia: What doe you conceive (said she unto her) of the passages we have seen this day? Could you ever believe that the civilities of Cyrus should transcend his love? However, you see how he carries himself, and can you yet maintain that he is still the same he was unto me? Was ever the like seen? Would Cyrus famish a Town, and yet suffer many people to goe out of it? For I doe imagine (said this incensed Princesse) this is not the first time he Page 130 hath given Pasports, at the request of Araminta. But, Madam (replied Martesia) those you saw goe out this day, will not at all alter the Siege of Sardis, nor retard the taking of it. Ah, Martesia, replied Mandana, doe not defend the unfaithfull Cyrus, since I am confident, he would never have let them come out, but that he had a mind thereby to oblige the Princesse Araminta. I confesse the coming out of these Ladies doe not much impede the taking of this Town by Famin, but I know that it is not the custome of Love, to doe things by the rules of Reason; and I assure you, I should have liked it better that Cyrus had uncivilly refused these favours for his love of me, then to have justly granted them unto the Princesse Araminta. But whilst this great, and unhappy Princesse, took the bare civilities of Cyrus for a crime, hee would have given her greater subjects of complaint, had she known how he entertained these strangers Ladies who came out of Sardis, though in truth she had no reason to accuse him, since what he did was out of his civill and obliging nature, which thought it a peece of injustice to deny a person of Doralisa's merit such a favour as could not prejudice Mandana: Nor did he more then what Mandana her self would have advised him unto, if she had not been prejudicated with an unjust jealousie, which disordered both her spirits and heart. This Prince who never did any thing but in a gallant manner, appointed Andramites to conduct them into his own Tent before he carried them unto Doralisa, and received them with all imaginable respects; and certainly it was hard for any to doe otherwise, for they were very handsome, and would have invited civilities from those that had no particular relation to them. Lycaste, though well in years, yet had a remnant of beauty; and though one could not say she was very fair, yet it must needs be confessed she was very handsome: Cydipe her Daughter, though no perfect Beauty, yet she had a great repute of it; and though she had not all those regular lineaments of exact symmetry, yet she passed for a great Beauty. Her aire was exceedingly attractive and free; but though she did attract eyes, yet Arpalice did charm them; since certainly never was a more lovely woman looked upon: She was fair and lively; every part of her face was admirable: There was something in her eyes both so glorious and sweet, as had all the charms both in grey and black colours: So that joyning an excellent spirit unto a fair body, it might be rightly said, she was one of the most lovely persons in the world. Candiope was not so fair as her two friends, yet very amiable, not onely in her great and noble air, but in her quick and insinuating wit, able to make others reveal their secrets, without imparting her own. Parmenides who was with these Ladies, was handsome, and of a comly presence, though she had a kind of surlinesse in her physiognomie. The rest of the people with them, were onely the women of Lycaste, Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope, and Parmenides, with some men servants. In the mean time Andramites conducting them unto Cyrus, who then had with him Anaxaris, Aglaridas, Ligdamis, Hidaspes, and Feraulas, this Prince entertained them with much civility, asking pardon for shutting up in a Town, and putting them unto the inconveniencies which they had received: But truly, said he, you may accuse the King of Pontus, and the King of Lydia rather then me, since if they would, they might have prevented all by releasing the Princesse Mandana. We have so much care to applaud you, Sir, replied Lycaste, that we cannot accuse. I have more reason to thank your honoured Cousin, Madam (replied he) who gave me this opportunity of doing any service unto persons of your quality and merit. And indeed, Madam, I think my self more obliged to you then you think I am: For I am confident that the Lydians seeing these three fair ones which accompany you, would have fought more stoutly in their defence then they will now they are out, at least their Lovers will fight with lesse fury. I assure you, Sir, replied Arpalice, for my part, all my Conquests shall never hinder yours. I had thought (said Cydipe, and looked upon her Cousin) that you would have answered for Candiope and my self; but since you have not, I assure you, Sir (said she, and turned towards Cyrus) that you have lost more then got by the coming out of Arpalice, and (if I durst say it) by Candiope and mine; for we did nothing else every day, but accuse the two Kings of Lydia and Pontus of Injustice, for not releasing the Princesse Mandana. Doubtlesse, replied Cyrus, the Lydians are very faithfull to that Prince even in unjust things; for if they were not, three such Beauties as you, maintaining so just a cause as mine, would certainly have moved a Sedition in my favour. As Arpalice was ready to answer, Chrisantes brought in a prisoner, whose handsome garb attracted the eyes of all beholders, by the air wherewith he entered into the Tent of this Prince, but as soon as he was entered, it seemed he was not unknown unto these Ladies. Lycaste expressed much wonder at the sight of him; Cydipe seemed much surprised, Parmenides very melancholly, Candiope very glad, and the fair Arpalice blushed deeply, and shewed such a sweet disorder in her eyes, that it was easie to see that she had more interest in this prisoner then the rest, Page 131 who for his part was not a little surprised to finde those persons in the Tent of Cyrus, whom he thought to be in Sardis: His respects unto Cyrus kept him from testifying either his wonder or his joy; and let Arpalice know onely by some stolen looks, that he was more a prisoner unto her then unto Cyrus. In the mean time this Prince observing the severall motions in the countenances of these Ladies, made no question but this man, who Chrisantes brought in, was of their acquaintance, therefore beginning to speak; Since I see, Madam (said hee unto Lycaste) that this prisoner is not unknowne unto you, and since it seemes by his aire, that it is just he should not be long in Fetters, will you bee pleased to give mee leave to enquire before you, where hee was taken. Sir (said Chrisantes unto him) I assure you that you never took a Prisoner since the Warre began, who better deserves his freedom, nor who better deserves to be carefully kept, then this who I bring unto you, since certainly the Lydians cannot have a greater aide, then the person of such a man as he. The commendations you give, replied he modestly, is more glorious to them that overcame me, then to my selfe: Victory, said Cyrus, is not alwaies an infallible argument of Valour: sometime the vanquished are more gallant men then the vanquishers: But I pray Chrisantes, where met you with this Courageous Enemy? For I find his modesty so great, that there is no asking him: Sir, replied Chrisantes, I cannot tell you what were the motives which moved this valiant man to go into Sardis: but this is truth, that a little before day, he leaped into the ditch at a place which we had raised the last assault, and he hid himself behind a heap of saggots which the enemies had not yet burned: by chance a Centinell standing at that sconce which you raised last, perceived him, and observed that he looked towards the walls of the Town, and made a signe unto those upon it, that they should open a little Postern dore near that place: so that the Lydians believing that certainly he had some intelligence of importance to bring them; and that perhaps he brought some news of that belief which the great King of Pontus made them long for: they intended to open it unto him, and for his more safe entry, they would make a salley: But the Centinell who spied him, told me what he spied, before they opened the little dore: and I thought it more expedient to take him then to shoot him: Then I caused a hundred men to make ready, and get betwixt him that would enter into Sardis, and the little dore which they opened for him; sending at the same time, six of the most resolute souldiers to bring him unto me: but since they could not go unto him without discovery, those upon the walls killed one, and wounded two of them with arrows, so that there was but three who came up to him: and then the Lydians durst not shoot, lest they should as soon hit him that would come into the Town, as those who would take him: and thus this valiant Prisoner was in the midst of three stout souldiers without any other aide but his owne valour: all this is nothing, said the Prisoner, since I was taken: But since that would not have beene, replied Chrisantes, unlesse I had sent six more, after you had killed two of the first, I think I cannot sufficiently extoll you. Whilst Chrisantes was speaking thus, one might perceive by the eyes of Arpalice, that the applauses which were given this Prisoner did not displease her, and that she gave a most attentive eare unto it: and much more, when Cyrus asked this generous Prisoner what his name was? whether he was the King of Lydia's subject? whether he had employed him upon some negotiation with some neighbour Prince? or whether he brought any newes of a pretended reliefe, wherewith Croesus did flatter the people of Sardis? Sir replied he, my name is Thrasimedes, and the place of my birth is Halicarnassus, so that I am neither the King of Lydia's subject, nor engaged in his interests: why then (said Cyrus) would you chuse the more unjust side? and why, since your valour cannot be idle, would you not rather stay in our Army then attempt to get into a besieged Town? Thrasimedes was then at a nonplus, for he had no mind to tell the true cause of his design to get into Sardis. Then he began to make many imperfect answers: but since he saw Cyrus was nothing satisfied with them, he feared that if he did not tell the truth, hee should still remaine a prisoner of warre, and by consequence be separated from that person he loved. Therefore resolving suddainly with himself, Sir, replied he, as I have been a long admirer of your glory, so I would not have you suspect me to have any disposition of becoming your enemy; Therefore I must confesse the truth, though perhaps the fair Arpalice before whom I speak, will be angry with me; be pleased to know therefore that my affection unto her, invited me into Sardis, where I know, she was engaged: And therefore Sir, since Love onely made me so bold, all the applauses which Chrisantes gave unto me, are due unto the fair Arpalice: And to testifie that I speak the truth, I am so far from desiring to go into Sardis, since Arpalice is not there, that I begge so much favour from you, as to let me fight against the Lydians upon the first occasion which presents it self. Since you are more a Prisoner unto the fair Arpalice (replied Cyrus) then unto me; it is she that must appoint you where Page 132 is her pleasure. Truly Sir, (replied she in a great confusion at what Thrasimedes had said) I do not think I have any right to dispute with you for this illustrious Prisoner: but though I had, yet I am so much obliged unto you, and I know he so much admires you, that to pay a debt which I owe you, and to please him with command, I enjoyn him to serve you, as long as he lives. Truly added Lycaste; Arpalice has good reason for all she saies: and truly replied Cyrus, if she be rigorous unto the valiant Thrasimedes, she is the most unjust person in the World. Whilst Cyrus was speaking thus, Parmenides seemed much discontented, yet he durst not openly expresse it, onely the fair Arpalice his Sister knew his thoughts by his silence. But as Cyrus was ready to tell Thrasimedes, that since he was onely a Prisoner of love, he was no Prisoner of War, Hermogenes brought another Prisoner, whom he said came from the walls of Sardis into the ditch by the help of a long cord, by that way which looks towards the River, and being seen by some souldiers, they took him without any resistance, telling them he had no other side but to change sides; and that being spied by those who kept Guard upon the walls, when he came down, he was in a thousand dangers of being killed by shots of ar[r]owes against him. But the admiration was, that when this Prisoner who seemed to be a man of qualitie, entered into the Tent, Cyrus observed that he was not unknown neither unto Thrasimedes, nor Lycaste, nor Parmenides, nor Cydipe, nor Candiope, nor Arpalice: His pre[s]ence, though handsome, was not equally joyfull unto them all: for all except Parmenides who was glad to see him, were either angry or melancholy. So that Cyrus having a fresh curiositie to know who he was, and what designes he had, began to ask very pressingly: Inso[m]uch as this Prisoner named Menecrates, who was a lover of Arpalice, and by consequence the Rivall of Thrasimedes, and who knew well that Parmenides was a faviourer of his designe, began to tell Cyrus ingenuously, that he had no other designe in coming out of Sardis, but to follow Arpalice whom he loved; but since this beauty had not the like thoughts of him which she had of Thrasimedes, she began to oppose what he said: me thinks (said she unto him very sharply) if the illustrious Cyrus be just, he should not give much credit unto what you say, for truly (said she with a disdainig smile) to come out of a besieged Town where they are ready to dye for hunger, is not an argument of any great matter of love: and therefore I doe not conceive that your fair tale of love ought to excuse you from being a Prisoner of Warre: since he declares himself to be yours (replied Cyrus and smiled) it is not just he should have two masters; and therefore I will not dispute with so fair a one as you: Lycaste, hearing Cylrus say so, and seeing that out of his generosity he would release both Thrasimedes and Mene[crates], whom she knew would quarrell, Sir (said she unto him to prevent it) your actions speake your great soul: but if I may be suffered to make a request unto you, it should be, that you would be pleased either to keep these two Captives still in your Prison, or else absolutely command them to live friendly together. Since they are none of my Subjects (replied he) I will onely entreat them to let me judge of that difference. Sir (said Parmenides then) since the difference which is betwixt Menecrates and Thrasimedes, is of such a nature as it can never be known, unlesse you know the whole story of their lives: and since their adventures are not heroique enough for the care, it will suffice, if you will be pleased out of your goodnesse to keep Thrasimedes with you, untill Menecrates hath manifested his innocency unto Arpalice, who is the cause of their difference. Since Cyrus observed that Arpalice did favour Thra[s]imedes more then Menecrates, he told Parmenides that he would keep them both untill hee had time to hear the cause of their quarrell: That in the meane time; Andramites should con[du]ct Lycaste, Cydipe, Arpalice, and Candiope, unto the Castle where the Princesse Araminta was, and where they might conveniently remain, untill such time as he could determine the difference that was between two men, whose Enemies qualities obliged him rather to make them friends then Enemies. Thrasimedes having a good opinion of the justnesse in his cause, did thank Cyrus for the honour he would do him in being his judge: but as for Menecrates, he was not so well satisfied, no more then Parminides. Yet their respects of Cyrus stopped their mouths, especially when they perceived Lycaste render a million of thanks unto Cyrus for preventing a misfortune, by his prudence, which might happen either unto Thra[s]imedes or Menecrates, or both. After which, the Ladies took their leaves of Cyrus, so satisfied with his civilities, that they could talk of nothing else. Thrasimedes and Menecrates remained rather as men that were guarded then as Prisoners of Warre: The first of them was committed unto the care of Chrisantes; and the other unto Feraulas. As for Parmenides, hee waited upon Lycaste unto the Castle. Ligdamis, had also orders from Cyrus, to guard the Ladies, since it would be a great joy unto him to see his dearest Cleonice. Cyrus at going out of his Tent, presented his hand unto Lycaste, to conduct her unto her Coach, though she did earnestly refuse it. Andramites presented his hand unto Cydipes; Ligdamis to Arpalice, and Page 133 Parmenides unto Candiope. Arpalice in passing by these two lovers and Prisoners, shewed a different respect unto them: For she saluted Thrasimedes with a very obliging civility, and Menecrates with such cold looks; as were enough to freeze him into despair, especially since the affront was in the presence of Cyrus and his Rivall: After Cyrus had put these Ladies in[t]o their Coach, he bestowed some complements upon the two Rivals, and then he called a Councell of Warre. In the mean time, as gallant as Andramites and Ligdamis were, they left the Camp with joy: the first of these, because he was performing an acceptable peece of service unto Doralisa, and the other, because love was predominate in his heart, above all desires of glory: also the Ladies whom they were to guard were so amiable, that the service was very pleasant. All the way, they talked of nothing but Cyrus: At last being come unto the Castle, Andramites carried them straight unto the Princesse Doralisa's Chamber, to the end shee might present them unto the Princesse of Pontus; Andramites giving orders that they should lie in these lodgings where Sesostris did lie. In the meane time, as shie as Doralisa was, and though she was of an humour to do a hundred good offices, rather then to receive one, and never cared for giving over many thanks, yet she could not chuse but be much joyed at Andramites, for bringing these persons thither, who were so near and dear unto her: yet her complement unto him was but short: for though she had an excellent grace of speech, yet she did seldome use any aggravations: and those who knew her heart, counted one of her words for a thousand, and would think her very courteous: so that though she said little, yet Andramites was well contented: and she was so busie in welcoming Lycaste, Cydipe, Arpalice, and Candiope, that she had not leasure to give Andramites many thanks. It being a long time since Lycaste had seen her; and since Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope, and Doralisa had seen each other since they were Children; they were full of complements. It was not long before the wit of Doralisa, began to sparkle as well as her eyes, for being in one of her pleasant and charming humours, she did so quibble with Lycaste and all the company, that she was the fullest of witty diversion in the World. But after the Ladies had a little rested and reposed themselves, they made ready to go and see Araminta. And Doralisa knowing that the Prin[cesse] was to be seen, conducted them to her Chamber: But first, she must present them unto Cleonice and Pherenice, and all the rest of the Lady Prisoners, who in respect of her came to see them, and went with them to the Princesse Araminta: But Cleonice having a desire to honour these ladies as cosens unto Doralisa, as new comers and strangers, she would have them go before her: and Ligdamis being obliged to present his hand unto Cydipe being next the dore as she passed, and Parmenides had already given his hand unto Cleonice; Doralisa perceiving it, told Cydipe in a low voice, how she thought her selfe obliged to acquaint her, that she did but ill recompence Ligdamis for the paines he had taken in being her guard, since by separating him from Cleonice, she separated him from her that was most dear unto him. 'Tis true (added she) that I think his design was as much to see as to guard you, therefore you are the lesse obliged unto him: Doralisa speaking with a design to be heard. Ligdamis complained against her inhumanity in insulting so cruelly over a man who had brought her the most pleasant company in the World, and which should be a cause of much rejoycing in it: I do not know (said she unto him) how you can phrase that inhumanity, which proceeds from my pity of you: This is not the first time (added he still walking) I have observed, that there are some miseries which you have no compassion upon in your rally; and the unfortunate Andramites knowes well that I doe not lie: since both of you speak, replied Cydipe, you will make me understand things very well: I assure you (replied Ligdamis) I can never make you perfectly understand Doralisa: perhaps you believe (said she and laughed) you have twitted me sufficiently in telling that I am not easie to be understood; but since I am resolved to treat you very civilly this day, I professe unto you, that I take it for a great commendations: and that I would not be like some men I know, who the very first day one sees them, vent all the stock of wit they have, and shew every cranny of their soules. Ligdamis had answered Doralisa, but they were so near Araminta's Chamber, that that discourse must end to salute the Princesse, who received all these Ladies with abundance of sweetnesse; not onely out of her naturall civility, but also to the more to oblige Doralisa: After the first complements were past: she asked them concerning the King her brother, whom they commended very much unto her: afterwards, she asked them, whether they were not extremely weary of a besieged Town? and on the contrary, if they were glad to be out of it? so passing from one question to another, unto which every one in their turnes had their vies, Araminta began to extoll the beauty of Arpalice, of Cydipe, and of Candiope, and said that it did not seem Sardis was yet put unto any great extremities, since they brought out such Page 134 fresh complexions: adding that Croesus would never have let them come out, but to drive all the besiegers into despair. Arpalice, Cydipe, and Candiope did all blush at the commendations: Afterwards Andramites began to tell Araminta the admirable effects of Arpalices beauty: relating, how one ventured his life to go into Sardis, because he thought her there; and another ventured his life in coming out, because she was not there: I doe not know said Araminta, which of these two men is most lovely, or most loved, but I wish it were rather he that would have gone into Sardis, rather then he who came out: I conceive Madam (replied Parmenides who favoured Menecrates) that it is not alwaies just to judge of things, by some happy events, which are onely effects of chance: For truly he who was in the Town had no way left to testifie his love, but to come out of it. 'Tis very true, said Araminta; but since hee who goes into a halfe starved Town, ready to be taken, is in greater danger, then he who comes out of it, I must needs wish him better fortune then I do to the other: I assure you Madam, (replied Arpalice and blushed) to speake in reason, I can neither commend the act of him that would go in, nor of him that came out, since according to my apprehension, the one would have headlong run into the danger, and the other would have shunned it. Whilst Araminta was talking with these Ladies, Ligdamis talked low with Cleonice: and Andramites did the like with Doralisa: but since he had to do with one whose wit was above the speare of most others, when he spoke low unto her, either she answered him not at all, or else very little, or very sharply; therefore he never durst speak above three or four words at once unto her, esteeming himself very happy if she did not answer him in such a sharp tone as was able to turn the sweetest words in the world into wormwood. After the visit of these Ladyes had lasted a reasonable time, they went unto their chambers. Andramites and Ligdamis stayed in the Castle untill they were ready to goe to bed, and then they would return to the Camp in the night, lest they should lose any opportunity of honour, yet they would not depart before they had received the commands of the Princesse Araminta, who charged them with a complement unto Cyrus. After which they had adieu unto all the Ladies; but whilst they were performing their severall complements, Arpalice took Doralisa aside, and after she had pulled down her hood to hide her blush, she desired her to conjure Andramites in private, that he should have a speciall care that no new dispute should arise between Thrasimedes and Menecrates, telling him, that perhaps when Cyrus was busie about great affairs, they would not be so strictly guarded but some misfortune might fall out between them. Adding, that it would be an unspeakable grief unto her, if either of them should dye in any consideration of her. Since it is not so easie a matter as perhaps you think for me to make any request unto Andramites, said Doralisa, doe not think I will undertake it, unlesse you will promise to tell me, what interest you have in these two prisoners: For though Curiosity be not my custom, and though I am ignorant of many things, because I will not ask them, yet I must needs confesse, I have such a desire to know the cause of such extraordinary events, that I will consent unto what you ask me, if you will promise what I ask you. I have so much interest in them (replied Arpalice) that I cannot deny you. Since it is so (sayd Doralisa) I will doe as you desire mee. And indeed, Doralisa taking Andramites aside, as if she had some businesse which concerned him to communicate unto him; and though shee was of such an humour as did not love to ask any one to doe a good office, yet she put a no[t]table difference between making a request for another, and one for her selfe: And therefore, though with much adoe she entreated Andramites to have a care of Thrasimedes and Menecrates untill the King had reconciled them, assuring him she would take it for a great obligation; and adding, that he might take her making any request unto him as a mark of that esteem which she had of him; for, said she, there are but four persons in the whole world unto whom I would be obliged, though there be an infinite number that I would oblige; yet if I could preserve my self from being obliged unto any, I should be very glad; but since this is not in my power, and that I must be obliged unto one, I had rather it should be unto you then any other. Though your language, Madam (replied he) cannot be catalogued in the number of favours, which one might hope for from her he adores, yet I will take it to be such a one, since it is the greatest I ever had from you. But as you have done me the honour to assure me, that I am in the number of those three or four persons unto whom you would suffer your self to be obliged: I beseech you tell me whether I be the first, second, or perhaps the last of that infinite number which you would oblige? I assure you, said she, and laughed, I cannot answer you directly I would; for I have assigned no places in my heart, all those who are there are in a confusion without any order of rank, so that I cannot tell which is first, or second, &c. But Andramites (added she) this is not the business which I desire of you, and therefore unlesse you would have me repent of my request, and be sorry for giving Page 135 you an occasion of obliging me; speak not a word more, unlesse it be to bid me adieu. Give me leave, Madam, said he, onely to tell you, that I depart the most—For Heavens sake Andramites (said she, and interrupted him with a laugh) speak not a word more, unlesse you be well assured that what you say will not anger me; for since the request I made unto you concerns one of my friends, I should be glad you would not put me to recall that request which I have made unto you, and therefore it is better that I interrupt your speech, and leave you; and indeed Doralisa, making him a serious reverence, as if she had done her businesse, left him, and went unto Arpalice to tell her that Andramites would doe as she de|sired. All this while Ligdamis was bidding adieu unto his dear Cleonice, with whom he was alwaies upon constant termes of amity. Thus Andramites and he returned to the Camp, and left all these Beauties together, who did not part untill Lycaste was forced to tell them, it was full time to retire unto their rest. In the mean time, since it did nearly concern Arpalice, that Cyrus in reconciling Thrasimedes and Menecrates should know that he could not pro|tect the last of these in prejudice of the other, unlesse he made her most miserable, she consult|ed with Candiope (who was her dearest friend, and close confident in all her secrets) upon the best expedients. For my part (said Candiope unto her) if the case were mine, considering the credit which Doralisa hath with Cyrus, both by her self, by Araminta, and by Andra|mites, I would open my heart unto her, and tell her the whole truth. She hath already de|sired (replied Arpalice) that I should doe as you advise me, and I have promised her. Why then doe you ask my advice upon a thing (replied Candiope) which is already resolved? Be|cause I have promised more then I can perform (said Arpalice) for though it be a great weak|nesse to be timorous in relation of any thing which is not a crime, yet I must confesse I cannot my self tell Doralisa what is requisite she should know, thereby to engage her in my business. Then I must say (replied Candiope, and smiled) that you are very rigorous unto Thrasimedes, if you dare not tell Doralisa that which a whole Province knows: for is there one in Licia which knows not that Thrasimedes is in love with you? No, said Arpalice, but there is none except you, and Thrasimedes, who knows that I love him; and it is but a while since hee could guesse at it, nor yet knows so well as you doe: Therefore you would infinitely oblige me, if you would spare me many a blush, and would take the pains to relate all my imperfections unto Doralisa: You are well acquainted with the original of our affections, and I beleeeve your self is the greatest cause. But dare you trust your self unto my discretion? (said Candiope unto her) are you not afraid that my ill memory will make me misreport your words? and perhaps alter some of them, or make you speak too obligingly unto Thrasimedes? As Arpalice was going to answer, Doralisa came into their chamber, who after shee had told Arpalice, that she was glad to see by her complexion, and quicknesse of her eyes that she had slept well, she asked whether or no she remembred her promise? Candiope knowing very well what Doralisa meant, laughed, and told her, that Arpalice was not very well disposed to perform her promise; telling her afterwards all the discourse which was between them: So that there was a very pleasant conference between these three persons: For my part (said Doralisa) after she had heard the difference between them) I cannot think Arpalice ever did, or said, or thought any thing which she may not tell me, and therefore I am perswaded, that it is rather out of vanity then modesty that she will not let me understand her adventures from her own mouth rather then from anothers, since it is not possible any should know ano|thers story so well as themselves: But the truth is, one shall not speak of themselves so well as others will do. Most true (said Candiope) Doralisa hath found out a good reason to stop your own mouth; for you would rob your self of a thousand applaude which I shall give you, and which really you deserve: Yet I cannot phrase your way to be a vanity, but rather a desire of glory, and you desire to get Doralisaes esteem, therefore desires that she may know you the better by my reports then your own. I pray you tell her what you please, replied Arpalice, so you do not put me to say any thing: And indeed so it was concluded, that Candiope should relate all the adventures of Arpalice. Then Doralisa and Candiope agreed, that as soon as dinner was past, they should carry Lycaste, Cydipe, and Arpalice unto the Princess Araminta, where they would leave them, and return unto Doralisaes chamber: And so they did; for they were no sooner entered, but shutting the door, and Candiope leaning upon a table of Ivo|ry inlayd with Ebony, she began her discourse with a Complement, thus.

The History of ARPALICE and THRASIMEDES.

YOur Reputation, amiable Doralisa, being such as makes it dangerous to speak ill before you, might well silence me from making any long discourse in your presence, if it did not meerly concern a person who is most dear unto you, and deserves to be so unto all those that are capable of her extraordinary merit: and her interest being more considerable then my own, I will begin that relation which you expect, as if you had never heard of our Coun|try, of our Town, or of Arpalice her self; for though you be very near in alliance of blood, yet you never were in Licia, but alwaies at Sardis or Susa, never saw each other since you were five years of age, when Lycaste came to Sardis, I conceive it convenient to begin as if you knew her not at all. Be pleased to know therefore, that Arpalice was but seven years of age when she lost both her Father and her Mother, and that Parmenides was not of a fit age to govern himself, therefore a Brother of Lycaste, their Uncle, was their Tutor; who having no Wife, put the young Arpalice unto Lycaste, who hath brought her up with as much care as she did Cydipe. The Father of Arpalice holding an intimate correspondencie with a man of Quality named Amphidamas, who was of the same Town, and had but one Sonne, and one Daughter, he ordained by his last Will and Testament, that Arpalice should marry his Son when she came at age: That which caused the great riches of Arpalice (though she had a Brother) was that they were not both by one Mother: And since it is the custom of our Country, that Mothers give ranks unto Families, and not the Fathers; and the Mother of Arpalice being exceeding rich, declared by her testament, that she should marry Menecrates: And that her intention was, that he should have the greatest part of her estate, if her daughter would not marry him. It may very well be said, that Arpalice was never Mistris of her self, since she was engaged before she had either reason or discretion. Menecrates was then four years of age, and Arpalice seven, when every one said unto them, that they were destinated to live together, and that they were so fast, nothing could ever part them; but before I ac|quaint you how they lived together, I must tell you, what the manner of living is, in our Town. All the world knows, that Licia in generall is a mountainous Country, very craggy and uneven; and very barren in many places; therefore you may imagine, perhaps, that those who inhabit there, will smell of the rudenesse of their Country: But there being some land in Licia exceedingly fertile, it may be said, there are as gallant compleat men there as any is in the world: Also the Metropolis of our Country which is called Patara is one of the most famous Towns in all Asia, not onely for its beauty, but also for the magnificent Temple of Apollo, whose Oracle is so famous, and many Strangers resort thither to consult with it: Also many come out of curiosity to see that famed mountain of Chimera: This Mountain, I say, whom the renowned Bellerophon rendered famous, whose top is full of Lions, middle of wild Goats, and bottome Serpents; so that many Strangers resorting unto Patara, it is most plea|sant living there. Moreover, though the Government of our Country be in the manner of a Republique, yet a King of a Court may be seen there as well as in a Monarchical state: For there is a President of the Councell, whose authority is so great, that he wants onely the name of being Sovereign of all Licia: So that all the Offices of State being in his dispose, he is as much courted, and as much honour done him, as if he were absolute King: So that their way of living is much more pleasant then in other Republiques, where every one is di|vided into severall Factions; and the contrary, the authority of one man attracting together all the compleat Gallants of a State into one Town, and after into one house; this question|lesse makes society most agreeable, and spirits more polite, it being the source of all delights, and gallantry. And I can assure you, we had the advantage to live in a time when there were more compleat men in Licia, then of three ages before. This is the place, fair Doralisa where Arpalice was educated, and lived all her time: I shall not need to tell you what shee now is; for it is apparent she is one of the greatest Beauties in the world: You may see shee has been ever fair, not like one of those beauties, who make people beleeeve they use enchant|ments, and who after they have been ugly in their infancy, become fair in six moneths; yet Arpalice did not onely promise beauty in her most tender years, but abundance of spirit; a spirit so gallant, so high, so noble, so passionate for liberty, and such an enemy to all subjection and constraint, that I have heard say a hundred times, a pleasure commanded did lose the pleasure of it: You may imagine therefore, that nothing could fall out more opposite to her humour then to be engaged at seven years of age, to marry Menecrates: not but that he was exceedingly handsome; but though he had been the handsomest man upon earth, yet he would Page 137 never have got the heart of Arpalice, out of his reason also, that she did not chuse him; and truly, I think another thing did much disunion the spirits of these two persons, which was, that Menecrates was of an imperious nature, and an enemy to any thing that crossed his in|clination; so that it may be said, that Arpalice loved liberty, and Menecrates loved licentious-nesse. But to return unto the beginning of their lives: be pleased to know, that Lycaste and her brother who were the Tutors of Arpalice and Parmenides, did think themselves obliged to see the last will of Arpalices Father and mother executed: so that they used all their endea|vours to incline the heart of this young Lady to love Menecrates: on the other side, the friends of this pretended lover did so expresly command him to court his young mistrisse, that being not at an age to disobey them, he was continually with her: at least, at such times when he was not busied with his Tutors, who taught him such things as one of his quality ought to learne: and they saw one another so oft, that it may be said, they saw one another too often to love. The three first years both of them being very young, it was not observed, that there was any stronge aversion in the heart of Arpalice towards Menecrates: nor any great affection in the heart of Menecrates towards Arpalice: But alwaies doing as their Parents bad them; Menecrates send a thousand pritty knacks for tokens unto Arpalice which she received very civilly more for the love of the things, then the sender: if they danced or walked, it was alwaies together; and they never enjoyed any pleasures asunder: yet this lasted not long: for Menecrates being seaven years elder then Arpalice, when he was eighteen, & she but eleaven: so that having lost his Father, he began to live after some mode, and to use her like a child, & entred into the world with all the liberty of a young man of an impetuous spirit: Yet his designe was to marry Arpalice, & to keep her in hand with some trivial tokens, but in such a negligent manner, that as young as she was, she took notice of it, and slighted him. However be pleased to know, that Menecrates having no mind to lose Arpalices estate, contracted an intimate friendship with Parmenides, for he concurring in age, he loved the brother better then the sister: Also there was a sympathy of humors between them: but though he had screwed himself into his affection, yet he did not neglect Arpalice. Thus did he swim in all delights and pleasures, and belie|ved himself, as some fort of men use to do, who though they be married, yet make a pro|fession of Courtship and Gallantry. When he was in any of his Gallantries, either he would not come before Arpalices window; or if he did, it was so late, that she should not see him: if she were at any meeting, he took her out to dance not above once, or twice at the most, and then would leave her to go and talke with some other whom his heart more liked: All the ad|vises of his mother and friends were in vain, when they told him that Apalice had more wit then years: that he did ill to use her so; that he would move her unto an aversion; which in|deed he did, for all his care was to please himselfe, telling all those who spoke unto him, that he would let Arpalices beauty grow a little, before he would apply all his Courtships and respects unto her: things being upon these termes, and Arpalice being some twelve or thirteen years of age, he designed to travell with Parmenides, and not to return untill three years were expired: So that during his absence, the beauty of Arpalice grew to be (as now you see it) a very miracle, and was an admiration to all Lycia: Cydipe was also very fair; and the sister of Menecrates called Cleoxine, who was much about the age of Arpalice, was also very lovely; so that it might very truly be said, these three were the greatest ornaments of our Towne: and since I saw them every day, it was easie for me to get their friendship: and truly of all the three, Arpalice did most take my heart: and such a knot of friendship was tyed be|tween us, as nothing can dissolve: In the meane time; though Arpalice was a wonder of beauty, yet none durst engage themselves to serve her: she charmed the eyes of all that looked upon her, and every one defended themselves against the enchantment of her beauty: the com|mendations which every one gave her, was to shun her with all care, lest she should exact more love and adoration then hopes: every one lamented that it was not permittable to serve her o|penly; and vented a hundred things which confirmed her, in her love of liberty. Yet custom, reason and modesty willing her to follow her own humour, she concealed her resentments as much as she could: Yet in the secret of her heart she had an extreame unwillingnesse to be for|ced unto the most important action of her life which ought to be most free: she knew very well, that she made all those despair that thought upon her in love: and she knew also, that the reason why she denied all, was because she was promised unto Menecrates: Moreover, she perceived that all the friends of Menecrates, kept observant eyes upon her. So that she lived in such a constraint, as a Lady of quality called Zenocrite, who had a pleasant wit in Rallary, termed her the fair slave; and this name was so much used amongst us, as we called her by it as much as by her own name: for she being of a sweet pleasing spirit, she would not be angry at Page 138 any Rallary, and the truth was Zenocrite was such a person as might say what she would without any exception: and truly there was more Gallants frequented this Ladies house whom I last named, then any other in the Town. Zenocrite is fair, of a good person, her Physognomie subtle, though she had a kind of languishing aire: she spoke things as if she never thought them: yet spoke them more sprightly then those that did think them: she had an admirable fancy, and would turn things most pleasantly: she would sometimes tell a story in most elegant termes; and would sometimes be satyricall in four words: yet was she of a good and generous nature: and if she spake in the disadvantage of any one, it was more out of an excess; of reason and sincerity, and out of an impetuosity of wit and fancy (which she could not hold in) then out of malice. The rarest of her qualities was, that the sadnesse of her spirit did often time cause joy in others: For where she lamented the miseries of the time, or of ill government, she did it in such a pleasant manner, that she did more delight company by her complaints and murmures, then others could do in their most frolique humours: she had all the newes, which she did alwaies polish in the relation; not that she changed it, but, that in her Comment upon it, she was most agreeable company. Moreover, there being alwaies abundance of company at her house: Liberty was alwaies free, those that would be sad might be so, those that would be frolique might be so, those that had no mind to speak might be silent; so that every one might find there a satisfaction for his humour: to conclude my description of her, Zenocrite was a person every way extraordinary; you may conceive then, that Arpalice having so fine a spirit, and living in the Neighborhood, did see her very oft, and this priviledge she had, that Zenocrite spoke of her, as a person whom she esteemed very much; and I think that I may truly say the conversation which Arpalice had with her, did not a little confirm her love of liberty: and when she did aggravate the injustice of those who do absolutely dispose of the wills of others, not knowing whether it be sutable to their minds or no, it must be confessed she spoke reason; and truly it is very strange, to see fathers oblige the Children to marry, not knowing whether they love or hate; whether their humours be sutable or opposite: and if they can but passe away an afternoon without wearinesse, no matter for all their lives after. Since all that Zenocrite said seriously, observed and exactly related, the friends of Menecrates did all they could to hinder Arpalice from seeing her so often; but Arpalice had alwaies been well used there, say what they would, shee would not be kept from thence: telling them, that since Zenocrite was a woman of no lesse vertue then wit, she knew not why she should not see her: the thing which most nettled them was, that in seeing Zenocrite, Arpalice saw all the Gallants in Lycia: yet since they were forced to be patient, and to set some spies to observe whether any one Courted Arpalice, manlygre her engagement: but all their observant paines were in vain, for since, Menecrates was a man of high quality, and since it was known that Parmenides desired this marriage should go forward, notwithstanding all Arpalices charmes, and what inclinations soever they had to her, all those who fell in love with her, did stifle their passions, and would not regularly apply themselves to serve her: Thus every one did commend her and esteem her, but none durst love her: I leave it unto your imagination, how perplexed she was to see, that if she were free, she might chuse as she would; and yet she saw she was forced to marry Menecrates whom she could not endure: how oft has she made her complaints unto me? and how oft has she wished, that she were poor so she were free? This being the posture of things, the friends of Menecrates receiving continuall letters from him, intended to send him Arpalices Picture, that he might see how she was improved, hoping to make him the sooner return: They addressed themselves unto him who had the disposition of her, to get Picture taken, and commanded it with such peremptory authority, that obey she must. Yet shee deferred it as long as possible, and there was no pretence which she did not make use of, to excuse her selfe: one day she had an ill dresse on, another day she had not slept well in the night, and therefore did not look pleasant enough to have her Picture taken: another time, she had promised a visit, but at last, after all these delays and excuses she must obey. For my part, I have wondered a hundred times how they could take her Picture with any resemblance, considering the fretting melancholy that was in her aspect, and the impatience she did fit in; for she changed her countenance continually, according to the variety of thoughts in her mind: she did almost never sit still, but was alwaies restlesse and ready to rise; and truly if the Artificer had not been a man of an admirable fancy, and the most excellent man in his art that was in the World, he could never have done what he did; for notwithstanding all the restlesse impatience of Arpalice he took her Picture marvellous like her. As much incensed as she was against Menecrates;Page 139 for all her spite against the Picture drawer, yet she was very glad to see it, when it was finished; for in what humour soever one is in, you know, one would not wish long to appeare ill favoured. So that Arpalice cheering up her selfe by little and little, consented that they should send her Picture unto Menecrates: and since it was in a very little modell, it was put into a very fine Case, and sent unto him, yet Arpalice would not have it sent as from her, nor that they should send him word, she consented unto it. But I beseech you admire a little at the wonderfull juncture of things; when Menecrates received this Picture, he was at Apamea, where was also a Halicarnasian man of quality, named Thrasimedes, who had no other designs in his being there but as a Traveller. And as you know, the Phrygian Musique is most admirable, there was a place in that Town where at certain daies was kept a consort of voices and Instruments, unto which all the Gallants resorted, when they had leisure: some onely, because they loved Musique, and others out of love to company, which was infallibly to be found there. So that Menecrates, Parmenides, and Thrasimedes, all three men of much spirit, and curiosity, failed not to be there: And as we commonly see, those who are strangers in any Town, though they be not of the same Country, yet have a disposition to converse together with those of the same Province they are of; So, it chanced that Thrasimedes sought occasions of talking with Parmenides, and with Menecrates, and finding them both to be men of much spirit, he accustomed himself to talke ofter with them then any others; and since in such places as that, it is not usuall to talke of very serious or important matters, they began to discourse of the difference which is in the beauty of women, according to the severall places where they are borne: So that passing iusensibly from one thing unto another, they asked each other reciprocally, if there were any excellent beauties in the places where they were born? And since Menecrates was the first which asked the question, Thrasimedes answered him, that there were many very lovely ones in his Country; but, said he, for all that, I am most unhappy, for the truth is, that at this present, there is hardly an excellent beauty in all the Halicurnassus, though some ten or twelve years since, there were a thousand most rare ones: and it may be said, that the starres in our Court are set, and shine not: It is not so in our Town, replied Parmenides, for there are an infinite number of rising starres and growing beauties. And to let you see one of them, said Menecrates, look upon the Picture of one of our fair ones. In saying so, he shewed him Arpalices, which he received that morning. Thrasimedes, no sooner saw it, but he confessed, he never saw any so fair, asking often, whether it was not one of those Pictures which more shew the excellency of the Artist then the reall resemblance of any one: whilst Thrasimedes said so, Parmenides was called away, by some that would speak with him; so that staying still with Menecrates, he began more and more to admire the beauty of this Picture, and asked him, whether it was the Picture of any with whom he was in love, or of some of his kindred? for I suppose, said he, it must be one of those two; It is neither of the one nor the other, replied Menecrates, for I assure you, that Arpalice whose Picture you see is not my Cosen, nor am I in love with her: Is it possible (said Thrasimedes) you should know this person and not love her? Doubtlesse I can, replied hee, and very easily. 'Tis true, when I came from the place where she is, she was not so fair then, as now, and they write unto me that she is more charming then her Picture. Whilst Menecrates was talking thus, Thrasimedes looked still upon the Picture with much admiration; but at last, he restored it unto him again, and talked of other things. At their going out from thence, they went unto one of those houses where gaming is used, and which is open to all commers, for Phrygia being near neighbour unto Lydia, and as you know the Lydians are the inventers of most games of chance, so play is used as much at Apamea, as at Sardis. Menecrates and Thrasimedes, coming into this house, (where Parmenides was not) Menecrates presently began to play, but with such ill luck, that he lost all he had about him, except the Picture of Arpalice, whose Case was of Gold with a circle of Diamonds. So that having no money to play, and being desperate; he offered those he played against, to play the Case of the Picture, but Thrasimedes not giving them time to answer, told Menecrates, that if he were resolved to play that Case, he desired it might be with him, and upon condition, that the Picture might be in it, he would stake the double value to what it cost. Menecrates did pause upon it a little, but his hot desire of play, and greedinesse to win back some part of what he had lost, being prevalent with him, he accepted of Thrasimedes his offer, yet desired no more for a stake then the just value of the thing: he was the sooner induced unto this resolution, because he thought Arpalice could never come to know how he played her Picture, & as for Parmenides, he did not fear that he would be angry, for there was such a strong linke of friendship between them, that nothing could break it: But to be short, Menecrates lost the Case, Picture & Page 140 all; and Thrasimedes wonne it, yet offered afterwards to lend him money to play, but he <...> fretting at the unkindnesse of fortune, he went home as melancholy at his losse as Thrasimedes was merry at the winning it; yet Menecrates did fret more at his ill fortune in general, then at the losse of Arpalices Picture in particular; for having a greater love to play, then to her, he was more sensible of the one then the other. Also knowing, that in all likelihood the substance of that Picture which he had lost, would infallibly be his, he did not <...> resent the losse: As for Thrasimedes, he was not of that mind, for he was better pleased in winning this Case and Picture, then if he had wonne a much more considerable value in money: So that fearing Menecrates would engage him to play it again if he saw him, he <...> shunned meeting with him, which he might easily doe; for having but two dayes to stay i <...> Apamea, he would not appear in his sight, yet he went to bid him adien, and Parmenide <...> also, but as chance was he met with neither of them, and so he took his journey without seeing them, I shall not be so tedious as to tell you unto what Town he went; since it is not pertinent to my story; but give me leave to tell you, that in all places he came at, he carefully observed whether he could see any woman so fair as that Picture: But whether really he met with none who had so much beauty, or whether he found none that pleased him so well as that of Arpalice, certainly he gave her the preheminance in his heart. After then he had wandered through divers places in Lower Asia, as he was ready to return unto Halicarnassus, he began to chide himself for being of that humour, who had rather see things which are lesse rare, because they are farther off, then things of more worthy observation, because they are at home: And that Caria, and Licia doe joyn, yet he never had been at Patara, though men from all comers of Asia come thither to consult with the Oracle of Alpollo; and many also come into Licia to see the Mountain of Chimera: Thrasimedes therefore resolved to see our Country; and he added unto his generall curiosity of seeing all the R <...> ties of our Town, his particular desire of seeing Arpalice. Then took he his way unto Patara, where he arrived in the most pleasant season of all the year: But before I relate how he lived, it is convenient I tell you his admirable adventure which happened unto him, the first day he came unto the Town. Know then, that Thrasimedes remembring hee knew a man whom he had seen in Halicarnassus, sent to enquire whether he was in the Town before he entered himself, to know whether he might lodge at his house according to the Laws of Hospitality, which all Nations doe reverence. He sent therefore a servant unto his acquaintance, with a Letter importing this request: Hee was some fifteen Furlongs from the place when he sent this servant; and it was in such a very delightfull place, that he resolved to stay there with another servant who walked his horse, untill the other returned; for it is not the custome of Travellers for to goe with any great Traine: Since it was not late, he thought he had time enough to stay for a returne of him he sent unto the Town, and since it was in a wonderous pleasant place, hee was the more invited to stay: For imagine a little Valley, surrounded with Hills, intermingled with Rocks, at the bottome of which ran a little Brook that crossed the valley, on the banks of which grew abundance of wild Willows, which made a most pleasant shade. As an addition of delight unto the prospect of this place, there was a neat house, built upon one of those Hills, and as one walked unto it by the side of the River one might see between the point of two Rocks (which seemed purposely for that to separate) the Town of Patara a far off: This was the place, amiable Doralisa, where Thrasimedes stayed waiting for his servant: At first when he lighted from horse, which he gave unto his other servant to hold, he began to walk along the River side in this pleasant shaddow of Willows, and walked so long forward, that his servant lost the sight of him; yet since he commanded him to stay in that place, and knew he would return, because the way which Thrasimedes walked was quite contrary to the way towards the Town, his being out of sight never troubled him. In the mean time after Thrasimedes had walked himself weary, he sate down at the root of a tree, where he fell into a deep contemplation, and musing upon past adventures; but his musing being none of those kinds that are caused by the running of Rivers, or the ruffling of leaves, when the wind blows them, or which comes upon one without any cause, it is requisite you know, that he had been in love in his own country, and travelled onely to cure himself of that passion which he had unto one who betrayed him, and who indeed had more lightnesse then beauty. In the mean time anger and absence had cooled his passion, which to say truly he could never call love; yet in all his Travels he could not meet with one Beauty which hee preferred before this of his perfidious Mistris, except this of Arpalice: So that conceiving the sight of this Picture was a remedy wherewith to drive out of his imagination the Idea of Page 141 that person whom he would forget, he continually carryed it about him ever since he wonne it; and being in this pleasant solitary place, he drew this Picture out of his pocket, and began seriously to contemplate upon it. He lay almost all along, his head leaning upon a little tuft of grasse which grew at the foot of a Willow, holding in his hand the Picture of Arpalice; but after he was well composed in his own thoughts, and agreed that the person whom he would not love was not so fair as that Picture, his musing did grow more confused, and he thought upon just nothing, no not so much as upon the Picture which he held in his hand: So that it being very hot, and he being up betimes, the murmuring of the brook, the ruffling of the leaves, the singing of the Birds being all inviters unto sleep, especially a man who had neither any great joy or sorrow in his soul, Thrasimedes fell asleep: The Case which he held in his hand falling out of it:

Whilst Thrasimedes slept thus, you must know, that Lycaste, Cydipe, Arpalice, and my self, with many others were come out to walk unto this pretty neat house, which I told you was built upon one of those hills which compassed about the valley where Thrasimedes slept: For since it belonged unto Zenocrite, we frequented it as if it were our own. In the mean time be pleased to know, that there was a great League between Arpalice and my self, and therefore we never took delight in our walks, unlesse we talked together in private, so that we alwaies took some occasion or other to separate from the rest of the company, and impart our thoughts freely unto each other. It chanced that day, that having something or other to tell Arpalice, I entreated her that we might talk together; so upon the first opportunity we parted from the company, and went out at the back Garden door, where there was a good path unto the Rivers side: And after we had walked a little way, Arpalice stopping suddenly, beckned unto me to hold my peace, and shewed unto me amongst the Trees, Thrasimedes asleep, as I told you before: At first Arpalice seeing by his habit, that he was a man of some quality, her design was for us to turn back, being unwilling to be seen in such a solitary place with so little company: But since I saw we were not far from our retreat, I was bolder then Arpalice, for I would needs look upon Thrasimedes a little nearer, wondering to see such a man sleeping in such a place, not seeing any horse or servant which he had. I went then some steps nearer him, whether Arpalice would or no, and taking her by the gown forced her to follow: But she and I had no sooner passed by two ranks of trees, then we espied the Case of the Picture which fell out of Thrasimedes his hand, as I told you before: We no sooner saw it, but a fresh curiosity raised our spirits, though we did not yet know it to be the same which was sent unto Menecrates, for the grasse did halfe hide it. But the wonder was, that Arpalice, who till then was the most timerous, did now grow the bolder of the two, and being prompted by a strong curiosity, after she had looked about whether or no any came, and after she had observed the Stranger slept soundly, she went to take up the Case; she was so taken with observing the face of him which slept, as shee took up the Case, hardly so much as looking upon it; but retiring back with the same warinesse wherewith she approached, we went to look upon the Picture which we suspected to be in the Case, yet with intentions to put it into the same place where Arpalice found it; for you may imagine that we had no designe of playing the Theeves: And indeed I had taken out of my pocket a little Inkhorn and paper, intending to write some conceit within it, to the end that this sleeping man whom we thought to be a Lover, might see the Picture of his Mistris was taken from him, and that he might read a reprehension for his negligence. You know, sweet Doralisa, how pleasant such adventures as these are to people of our age, and therefore Arpalice and my self were exceedingly delighted with this conceit: But when Arpalice and I were behind the Willows, and looked upon this Case, we were extreemly surprised to see it was the same which was sent unto Menecrates, or at least extraordinary like it; yet it was such a far fetcht conceit to think it was the same, that we did give our own eyes the lye, and did not open it with any thought to finde Arpalices Picture. You may well imagine how we were astonished, when we saw it to be the very same which was sent unto Menecrates. However since we were over near the Stranger to reason upon this adventure without danger of waking him, we went farther off, still looking behind us to see whether the man did not rise up and follow us. But at last, being got unto the foot of the Hill, we asked each other how it was possible the Picture should come into his hands? For my part (said I unto Arpalice, and smiled when she asked me the question) If I credit my own eyes, I cannot doubt but that it is the same which was sent Menecrates, and in reason I have some cause of suspection, that there is some secret peece of gallantry betwixt you and this Stranger, which you conceal from me. This thought is so injurious (replyed she) that I can not beleieve you speak it seriously. Truly (said I, and laughed) I cannot tell whether I should Page 142 be in jeast or earnest; for how do you thinke I should give a just judgement upon a thing so full of admiration? the thing which most perplexes me, replyed she, is, that I know not how to be satisfied of this adventure: there is no way, replyed I, but to waken him; oh Candiope, answered Arpalice, I am farre from your opinion: for I am just now in such a fear that hee should wake, that for all my great desire to see what he will do when he finds that he hath lost my Picture, as I am resolved to retain: And since I believe he will grieve more for the losse of the Case, then the Picture, I will send the Case unto him by a servant, after I have taken out the Picture: therefore I intreat your assistance in finding out such a one, as I may trust with it. For my part, I do confesse, I had a good mind to have some discourse with him. But as we were in contest about it, one of our women, who had been looking us all out, came to tell us, that the Coachs, were ready, that Lycaste stayed for us: so that all our businesse was, to find out some fit officer, to watch this stranger, and to follow him unto his lodging. Yet we could meet with none but a Gardiner, whom we instructed as well as we could; and obliged him by promises to do as we desire. The truth is, he seemed so dull, that we had little hopes in his negotiation, nor durst we trust him with the Case to give unto this stranger: Yet he promised us, to come the next morning, and give us intelligence: and truly we had not much time to instruct him, for no lesse then four messengers came for us, in lesse then a quarter of an hour; when we came unto the rest of the company, they chid us for leaving them so long: Lycaste told us in halfe earnest halfe jeast, that persons of our age could not have any such long secret conferences, but they must stand in need of some favourable construction: For my part, said Arpalice (who could not endure constraint) if any should offer to take from me the liberty of my silence, I think I should talke continually: And on the other side, if I should be commanded to talke alwaies, I would be dumbe as long as I lived; And truly (said she and smiled to colour her design of talking with me) I have such a longing desire to talk unto Candiope in a low voice, that I do not think I can forbear: after this, she came and whispered something in my ear. At first, they thought much we should whisper thus, and were continually interrupting us; but at last, they let us alone: and wee talked as much as we would, not onely in the Coach, but also in that Garden which wee went to see: Then did wee racke our imaginations to guesse, which way possibly this stranger could come by this Picture; but all our thoughts could not hit upon the truth. We could not suspect that Menecrates gave it unto him: nor could we think the man stole it considering his habit and handsomness, to imagine that Menecrates had lost it at play, was a farre fetched thought: The best that we could imagine was, that he had lost it, and they found it. But at last, we returned home to the Towne, where we were no sooner come, but we were informed that the husband of Lycaste named Menophiles, was returned from his journey of eight daies, which he had taken, & that he had brought home with him a stranger, who seemed to be a man of quality, but so much wounded, that the Chirurgeons came to dresse him. Lycaste no sooner heard this, but out of a curiosity and compassion together she went immediately unto the Chamber where her husband was with this stranger: Arpalice and I, moved with the same curiosity, followed her; but Cydipe would not, because she was apt to sound if she were in the room with a wounded man. As soon as we stept into the Chamber, Menophiles beckned that wee should make no noise; and to prevent it he came unto us into the outer room, where he no sooner was, but Lycaste asked him very earnestly who this was of whom he had such care? It is, said he unto her, the most valiant man in the world, and the handsomest. It is a man whose life I would save, and who hath saved my life. But after this, ask me no further, for I neither know his name nor his Country; but where did you meet with him? said Lycaste, I met with him, said he, by the Brook side which runs under the Hill upon which Zenocrites house is built, where I met a servant holding his horse, and passing on, I came unto that place in the valley, where there is a little path which leads unto Zenocrites Garden. You may well imagine, dear Doralisa, that Arpalice and I were very attentive unto this relation of Menophiles: which he continued, being come unto the place, said he, I saw him whom I speak of with his sword in his hand, against four souldiers, defending himself, and fighting like a Lyon. And though I had sent all my men another way, but onely one Lacquey, yet I would needs relieve him: when they who were upon him saw me with a sword in my hand, they divided themselves, two to undertake him, and two upon me: they no sooner turned towards me but my Lacquey ran away, so that I was engaged with these two, who at first killed my horse: after this, they wished me not to meddle in a quarell which did not concern me; and seemed to have no other design upon me, but to keep me from stopping their intentions of killing this man; but one of them turning about, and seeing one of their fellowes which was upon this stranger fall, Page 143 fell upon me with all fury: I defended my self as well as I could, but certainly I had been killed, if this stranger had not come into my reliefe as soon as he had killed the other who fought with him. So that the two who were upon me, seeing their fellowes both dead, and observing that Zenocrites Garden dore opened, they had recourse unto their heeles: This <...> nger and I pursued them, but in vain. In the mean time this valiant man was much wounded in the Combate against two, and lost blood by following them who fled: then turning back to thank me for what I had done, he fell dead at my feet: in the mean time, Zenocrites Garden dore opening as I said, and the Gardiner seeing the passage, called all that were in the house to assist, and so I got this illustrious wounded man unto the place where now he is, intending to proportion my care of him according to his merit. After Menophiles had ended his relation of the passage, Lycaste asked him a hundred questions, which Arpalice and I never minded: for we made no question but this man whom Menophiles spoke of, was the same we saw sleeping: So that we were both of us full of wonder, but not long, for understanding that this stranger enquired whether any one found a Picture about the two souldiers which he had killed, Lycaste went into the Chamber, and we followed, perceiving him plainly to be the same we saw sleeping; yet he did not know Arpalice: for his weaknesse would hardly give him leave to open the curtain, and Arpalice did more then halfe hide her selfe, behind Lycaste and me; so that she knew him, but he could not know her to be the same person, whose Picture he had lost. Yet as weak as he was, he returned a very sprightly complement unto Lycaste, when she told him, he was in a place where he might freely command any thing in it: but since the Chirurgeons would not have any to talke unto him, this conference lasted not long: but Arpalice and I did not so soon as give over our discourse upon this surprizing adventure, but we resolved not to speak a word concerning this Picture, untill we were further informed of all circumstances; but since I know you desire to know the cause of this combate, I will tell you what we heard the next morning. Chance would have it, that four Souldiers passing by Thrasimedes as he was asleep, he walked just as they were within four or five paces of him; and just as two of them looked upon him and laughed: whether it was at something which concerned not him, or whether it was at his so starting out of sleep, it is not known. But Thrasimedes walking, seeking for his Picture, and not finding it, did think these souldiers who looked upon him and laughed, had taken it: but to move them unto a restitution, he shewed no signes of anger, and calling to them, friends, said he unto them, it seems you deserve to be listed among the Lacedemonian Souldiers, therefore I desire you to restore, what you have taken from me, and in recompence I shall with much willingnesse give you the full worth of it: The Souldiers wondering to hear Thrasimedes to say so, thought that hee was not well waked, began uncivilly to laugh aloud, and to tell him in an insolent jeere, that they were very sorry he had not a better dream. In short, Thrasimedes being fully perswaded that these Souldiers had the Picture which he had lost, said something which let them know his thought, unto which they reported so extravagantly, as Thrasimedes in his anger could not forbear Menaces: In so much as all four at once, assaulted him, either with intentions to make him fly or to kill him. But the odnesse of the businesse, was to see how he still affirmed that these Souldiers had the Picture; when he related his adventure unto Menophiles and Lycaste, aggravating the misfortune that hee should kill two of them and yet not find it: but knowing that those two which fled, had it between them. In the mean time, the servant of Thrasimedes being returned unto the place where he left his master, to tell him that his friend was ravished with joy that he would lodge with him, he found the servant which walked his horse, who told him that Thrasimedes commanded him to stay there, and that he was gone to walk along the Brook side. Then both the servants followed the Brook; but they found onely the bodies of these two souldiers which were dead, and not yet taken away: Then were they much troubled; In the mean time, since it was very late, and they hearing no tidings of their Master, one servant went unto Zenocrites house, where the Gardiner telling them what he knew, told them also that it was in vaine for them to think of getting into the Town, that day, because the Gates would certainly be shut before they could get thither. The next morning the Gardiner according to his words came unto us, and brought with him the two servants of Thrasimedes, to let us understand the name and quality of their Master, which being known, all cares to assist him were doubled. However this being not enough to satisfie the curiosity of Arpalice, she caused one of her women who had wit enough, to aske the servant whether the Picture which his Master had lost, was the Picture of any of his owne Country with whom he was in love, thinking thereby to pompe the truth out of him: and Page 144 indeed the servant without any subtilty, told her how his master had wonne it at play in Alpamea, but told her not who lost it, or whose it was, since he never saw the Case opened in which it was. I leave you to think, amiable Doralisa, how vexed Arpalice was when shee heard Menecrates set such a small esteem upon her Picture. I assure you (said she unto me the first time she heard it) Menecrates in losing my Picture hath lost more then he is aware of; for after this affront, that poor pittance of complacency which I observed towards him, shall lessen. I pray consider a little, how do you think he would use me if I were married, since he is carelessse before he is my husband? As violent as Arpalice was, and angry, truly I could not condemn her; yet she was much perplexed, and would not have it known how she had been the innocent cause of this misfortune; yet she had an earnest desire that all the world might know what new cause of hatred she had of Menecrates. However, we did not think it fit to make it known, that we took this Picture which had caused so sad an accident; only to give it out that we knew that Menecrates had lost it at play, and however to have patience for a while. In the mean while Thrasimedes recovered, and the Physicians and Chirurgions all reported him to be past all danger, so that he began to enquire who it was unto whom he was so much obliged; but since the names of Menophiles and Lycaste did not acquaint him that Arpalice was in the same house, he could not know she was there: But being pleased to know, that Arpalice being alone with her Aunt, she was obliged to follow her into the chamber of Thrasimedes, and it chanced also that Menophiles who went in the first, having something to tell Lycaste in private, he took her towards the window, and left Arpalice alone by the bed side of this illustrious wounded man. Imagine, I beseech you, how infinitely was he surprised, when the person whom he saw was the substance of that Picture which he had both wonne and lost; yet was he a while in doubt, because he found her fairer then her Picture; but being confirmed in his opinion by the extremely resemblance which hee found in every part of Arpalices face, unto her Picture, he was even ravished with joy at the encounter: Arpalice carefully observing him, did easily perceive the surprise, and joy of Thrasimedes, but since hee was not yet in a fit condition for any long conversation, their visit continued not above a quarter of an hour: But whilst it lasted, hee desired Lycaste, as hee had done Menophiles before, that hee might be carried unto a friends house which he had in Patara <...> but since she knew Menophiles would not suffer him to goe out of his house untill he was perfectly well, she spoke unto him with all possible civility, and so retired. She was no sooner gone, but he who Thrasimedes knew in the Town, came to see him: So that he being extremely desirous to be better informed concerning Arpalice, whose Beauty struck him with so much admiration, he understood her to be the Niece of Menophiles and Lycaste; that she was promised unto Menecrates, and that she was Sister unto Parmenides: So that by this he came to know that Arpalice was to marry a man whom she affected not, and one who did not much care for her; for since he had got her Picture so easily from her, and heard it from his own mouth, that he was not in love, he could not doubt it. But how is it possible (said he unto himself) that one so fair as she should marry, and not be loved? For without all doubt she is able to create love in all that have soules. Really (said he unto his friend) the fate of Arpalice seems to be worthy of much compassion: For though Menecrates be handsome, and hath spirit enough, yet since he cannot love her, he cannot be worthy of her. However, replied his friend, it is not an easie matter to alter her fate; for if she refuse to marry Menecrates she will lose the greatest part of her estate. She had better lose it all, replied Thrasimedes, then lose her liberty. But if Arpalice be wise (said his friend) she will not refuse him; for as fair as she is, she will find but few lovers when her estate is gone. All men, replied Thrasimedes, are not so covetously minded as you think them; and if I should fall in love with Arpalice, I should make you alter your opinion. In the mean time, we had no sooner acquainted Zenocrite how Menecrates had lost Arpalices Picture, but she set it all over the Town in such a pleasant manner, so full of anger and wit, that nothing else was talked on for eight dayes together. Also she would receive it from Thrasimedes own mouth, and in order to that she would visit him as soon as he was in a condition to be seen; and coming to visit Lycaste, as she was in the chamber of Thrasimedes, she would let none goe in to acquaint her, but went straight her self: As soon as she was entered, she sent to desire Cydipe, Arpalice, and me, who were in another chamber, to come unto her in the chamber of Thrasimedes: and I think it was the very day that he fell in love with Arpalice: For her joy to hear Zenocrite so bitter and witty against Menecrates, made her seem so dear, that he was not able to defend himself against her charmes. After the first compliments were passed, Zenocrite was wonderful well acquainted with the whole Family Page 145 of Thrasimedes, for it was one of her qualities that she knew almost all Asia: So that passing insensibly from a conversation of civility, into a jollity of mirth, she asked him sharply before Lycaste, how much he staked against Arpalices Picture, when he played with Menecrates: For I imagine (said shee) that since hee has no judgement either of Pictures or Diamonds, he would venture it for a little. It is not long of me, replied Thrasimedes, that much was not staked against it, since I offered him to stake the double whatsoever it cost, only for the Case; as for the Picture (said he, and looked upon Arpalice) all my estate is not equall to the price of it. But, Madam (added he) how came you to know that Menecrates lost the Picture of the fair Arpalice? It seems, said Lycaste, that you are a stranger in this Country, else you would not wonder that Zenocrite should know it. The passage is so remarkable (said Zenocrite) to see a Lover play away the Picture of his Mistress, that it must needs be known all over the World. But I wonder why the friends of Menecrates should be so ill advised as to send Arpalices Picture to him: For in my apprehension there is nothing more ridiculous then these Family gallantries, which in the sight of all the world are done by the consent, if not the force of friends. If I had known this (said Arpalice) Thrasimedes should have been better then he is: For Menecrates should never have had my Picture, and by consequence this misfortune which hath happened unto him should never have been. Do not call that a misfortune, Madam (replied he) which brings me the honour to be known unto so many noble persons. You may say what you please (said I unto him) but I think three dangerous wounds which you have received may very well be called a misfortune. Three are some misfortunes (replied he) which produce great happiness; and I may very well rank this to be in the number of them. For my part (said Zenocrite) since you do not dye of them, I am glad it happened so; for I must confesse, I have such strange aversion unto all such Lovers as are by the last Will and Testament of Parents, and who are certain to marry their Mistress the first day they see them, that I am glad they meet with some rubs in their progress: For take away feares, hopes, and miseries from love, and a lover is quite unspirited: And to prove what I say, doe but imagine the most compleat Gallant of the World, and conceive him to be with her whom he is to marry, the three or four preceding dayes before the Marriage, and imagine all his Brothers, Sisters, Nephews, Nieces, Uncles, Aunts, Fathers, Mothers, Grandfathers, and Grandmothers came to rejoyce with him, I am most confident you will confesse with me, that nothing will put him more out of countenance, be he never so professed and declared a Lover: For my part, it does so wound my eyes and imagination, that I cannot endure it. This is the case of Arpalice, who ever since she was born had her Lover before her eyes without love, whom she alwayes looked upon as one that must be infallibly her husband whether she can fancy him or no. Whilst Zenocrite was talking thus, Thrasimedes looked upon Arpalice most attentively, and observed that his friend was pleased with what she said; but so was not Lycaste, who was angry at it; but Zenocrite being not accustomed to consult with the thoughts of others to expresse her own, continued talking, as she begun, all the rest of the day, knowing very well that Arpalice was not angry at her. Sometimes she would describe these kind of Lovers, afterwards represent the soulesse spirits of their Mistresses; then she would compare them with real Gallants, and observe such notable differences between them, that it was not possible but to concur with her in her opinions. But (said I once unto her, and interrupted her) then it is requisite to banish quite all manner of courtship and gallantry: For since a legitimate and ordained Gallant is not a Gallant, and that virtue will not admit of it otherwise, it must be concluded that it must not be admitted of at all. When I said so (replied Zenocrite) I did not directly mean as you understand it; for those Lovers which I condemn, are either those who are not really so, or who are long before hand declared to be so: For indeed to cause Gallantry to produce handsome effects, he who acts it, must love, and never consider whether he shall, or not marry; for when thoughts of marriage doe arise in the heart of a Lover at the same <◇> his passion doth, I will maintain he is not Gallant as he is, who not knowing why he loves, nor which way to obtain love, yet does continue to love: Restlesnesse is one of the sweets of love; and I doe not think there is any conversation more wearisome, then that of a Lover who hath nothing to desire, nor nothing to fear, or hope for. For my part (replied Thrasimedes) I doe beleieve a Lover who hath nothing to complain of, is not in love: For let him be in as great favour as possibly he can, yet he ought to think that he is not enough in favour. Certainly, replied Zenocrite, it is most dangerous to sit down and say, I am satisfied and contented; nor is it very obliging: But as for Menecrates (said she, and rose up) I assure you, I would not for any thing, but he had lost Arpalices Picture, because the accident hath so diverted Page 146 me, and will still divert me. After this Zenocrite retired, and also all the rest of the company, leaving Thrasimedes to entertain his own thoughts; and truly he was very indifferent; for the beauty of Arpalice did so pleasingly take up his mind, that he thought upon no other thing. In short, amiable Doralisa, not to trouble you with a relation of all the first thoughts of Thrasimedes, let me onely tell you, that his weakness was so great, as it was a long while before he was sound, and so he saw Arpalice almost every day; and as his wounds which he received from her did heal, so her beauty made them deeper in his heart. He hath told me since, that at the first he did strive against his passion, but not being able to vanquish it, he submitted, and entirely abandoned his heart unto it. Since Thrasimedes had abundance of spirit, and witty gallantry, he soon got the esteem of Arpalice; he had also the good luck to please Zenocrite. For my part, I must confesse, I had an easie inclination to become the friend of Thrasimedes; nor did I hinder those advantageous thoughts which Arpalice had of him. In the mean time, as much in love with her as he was, he durst <◇> shew it unto her: For as the posture of things was, it was as offensive to talk of any such matters, as unto a married woman. However, since he knew she had an aversion unto Menecrates, he did not despair: But since he knew that the grand secret of love was to please and divert, he courted Arpalice and all her friends with all manner of delights: The first diverting entertainment which he gave her, was so extraordinary, that I must needs relate it. Imagine then, that we were in a great chamber, with Lycaste, Zenocrite, Cydipe, Arpalice, and many others, and my self: First, we heard an admirable harmony of Musique in the street, Zenocrite looked upon us, and asked for whom this was intended? adding, that she beleived some declared Lover who never does things handsomely, was at the charge of it. For my part, said Cydipe, I am sure it concerns not me; and me lesse then (you added Arpalice.) Perhaps it is intended to the company in generall (said I.) It is not the custome (said Thrasimedes) to give publique entertainments; for though every one who hears it, have equally their shares in it, yet I doe beleieve there is a particular intendment of it unto some one. Afterwards we began to descant who it should be, and we named all the men of our acquaintance, but could not agree amongst our selves which of them it should be; for if I named one, Cydipe would tell me that could not be, because she knew he was engaged in other company; if I named another, Zenocrite would assure me, that she knew he was not in a condition for entertainments, but was that night in a melancholly mood; if Lycaste thought she had guessed him, we all let her see that she was deceived; and as for Zenocrite, she her self confessed, that she could not imagine from whom this gallantry should proceed: But whilst we were giving our verdicts, Arpalice spoke not a word, and seemed as if she would not take so much pains as to find it out. Would not any one say (said Zenocrite) that Arpalice is a Stranger as well as Thrasimedes, and that she knows no body here. My silence (replied she, and smiled) argues that I am not guilty of that fault whereof all women are accused, who (they say) love to be talking when there is something that should be listened unto with attention, and who ask questions when they should be silent; and for my part, I conceive they are to be blamed who do so: For how can we take any delight in the Musique (said she) if we doe not silently hearken unto it? Yet Arpalice could not impose silence upon them; for their curiosity to know who it was that gave them this entertainment, did transport them above all other considerations. We sent a subtle and witty boy out of a back door, who knew all the men of quality in the town, with orders to observe & enquire who was the director, and at the charges of the Musique: But we were all exceedingly surprised, when at his return he told us, that except the Musique there was not one person in all the street. This boy had no sooner reported this, but Zenocrite, more subtle then the rest, told us that she would trouble her self no farther to know who gave it, but onely to know to whom it was intended. Me thinks it is as difficult to find out that as the other (said I.) It is because I am ignorant that I knew it (answered she.) This Riddle is so obscure (replied I) that I confesse I cannot understand it, and I beleieve it will puzzle Thrasimedes to untie the knot. Yet I am confident (said she) that he will confesse I am not mistaken: Then whispering with him, she asked him whether it was unto Arpalice, or Cydipe, or my self that he intended this Musique? Thrasimedes was extremely surprised. He should guesse him, and did earnestly deny it, but the more he said she was mistaken, the more he did confirme her in her opinion. So that Zenocrite being ravished, that she had hit the mark which we had missed, her thoughts did passe from one to another, amongst us all but Lycaste, unto whom she would not impart any thing: For my part, she had no sooner heard her thought unto me, but I concluded it certain, and Cydipe did the same, and indeed so did all the rest of the Ladies. As for Arpalice, whether she did dissemble her Page 147 thoughts, and suspected that Thrasimedes was in love with her, or that she really did not credit our thoughts, she alwayes said that we were all mistaken; but she continued not long in that Tone, for the next morning, I sent for one of those that was of the Musique, who had formerly taught me in that quality, to come unto me, and conjured him to tell he, who employed him the night before: He being one who ever would trust his greatest secrets of his heart unto me, did ingeniously confesse it that they were before no other house, but before Lycastes, that he who employed them was a very Gentle servant, who very liberally rewarded them, and enjoyed secrecie; that he had the tone of a stranger, and did every way so fully describe the man, that I knew well enough that it was the servant of Thrasimedes, who employed them, and I imparted the secret unto Arpalice. There chanced also a more surprising accident then this; for being pleased to know, that the same night we had this Musique, we all agreed to walk two dayes after to a stately and magnificent house some forty furlongs from Patara, which belonged unto a man, who was never better pleased and joyed then when himself was not the Master of it, and when his Porter told him there was much company in it, and when he heard they were delighted with it, and thought it to be a most admirable peece of Architecture: And indeed he was so taken with the beauty of it, and expressed his joy that others should be of the same mind, as one Lady did absolutely make it her own. The pleasure which others took in it was his; but at this time he was in the Town upon some occasions. This, amiable Doralisa, was the house which we intended to goe unto, in the presence of Thrasimedes, all of us expressing our sorrows that he was not in a condition to goe with us, and every one describing unto him the beauty, conveniency, and excellencies of this house. Lycaste commended the Architecture, and the Scituation of it; Zenocrite a vast Arch standing upon thirty and two Columns, and a stately Staircase: Cydipe extolled the Hall which might well become the magnificence of the Egyptian Kings; for my part, I commended the pleasant Prospect, the Gardens, Fountains, Grotts, and Statues: But as for Arpalice, who was all that day in an humour to be opposite unto others, she told us of a certain little solitary Closet which she preferred before all that we extolled in this stately Fabrique. Not but that I know, said she, all these things which you commend are essentially more beautifull, yet this best pleaseth me, and I intend that day when you walk, I will walke onely with my eyes, and stay in that closet which I speak of. Imagine (said she unto Thrasimedes, to justifie her choice) that this Closet which suits so well with my inclination is so seated, that though it be open on two sides, so that one may see two wayes as far as sight can reach, yet one cannot meet with any but solitary objects. The Gardens which one shall see on one side are all Grasse and Gravell Walks, set with green trees. The Fountains all of Rustique work; the River, though naturall, seemes to be artificiall. Beyond the Gardens one shall discover a great Forrest, and beyond it Meddows, Pastures, Rivers, but not a Town, House, Hill, or Wood to hinder Prospect: So that if one were the onely one in all the Universe, yet one should hardly be more solitary then in that place. I beseech you then imagine what delight may be taken in such a closet: I can find magnificent Architecture, and handsome chambers in many places of our Town; but I cannot any where find the pleasing solitude of this closet. As you are pleased to describe it, Madam, said Thrasimedes, <...> ow voice, it is not possible but to be of your opinion, and to think that which you commend, deserves to be preferred before any thing which any other commends: After this, we had much other discourse which is not pertinent to my story; but the day of our journey being come, we went unto this house according to our appointment, and we were as frolic as our hopes: First, at the corner of the Forrest we were saluted with a consort of Hoboyes, admirably delighting: When we were in the Hall, we heard another Consort of Voices at the higher end; and when we were in the Chamber, a most rare Voice and a Theorboe: Admiration made us all silent to hearken unto this Harmony: After this we had a most admirable fine Banquet, in so much as Zenocrite said, that most certainly it was given by some man who had some amorous designs. However, since the man appeared not, none knew what to think; but as at the first Musique, so at this, I doubted not but it was the gallantry of Thrasimedes: Yet since he had been wonderous civilly treated by Lycaste, I did not know whether this was onely an acknowledgement of the favours he received, or a testimony of love, but I was not long in this ignorance, for he was pleased to know, that the servant of Thrasimedes, who of his condition, was the wittiest man alive, did take such order with the Porter, that he might carry a letter, & lay it on the Table in the Closet which so much pleased Arpalice, obliging him to open the closet unto none unless her self; giving him such instructions, as he did according to his mind: And indeed, when Lycaste & Zenocrite desired to enter, he told them he could not open Page 148 it, because his Wife who was in the Garden had the Keyes: So, making that his excuse, hee reserved it whilst Arpalice came: But staying until he had an opportunity to let her enter alone; & she returning back to ask him why they could not enter into it, he told her, that since she was alone he would let her enter, and the reason why he denied it before, was because his Master had charged him not to let many enter. Arpalice taking him at his word, desired to enter, consenting that he should lock her in if he would, so he came to open it within an hour: So the Porter did open it, and locked it again as soon as she was entered, making as if this were a great favour which he did her. At first when she entered, she told me that shee went unto the Windows to enjoy the Prospect; but turning aside, she saw lying upon a Marble Table, a Letter, which had this Superscription. To the Fair, and solitary Arpalice.

You may easily conceive, amiable Doralisa, how this adventure surprised your Cousin; and if the Letter had been sealed, certainly she had not opened it; but when she read it she found these words.

MADAM,

YOur Beauty hath driven me to such a fatal necessity, as that I cannot hide the misery which you have caused, and I conceived that I could not more handsomely acquaint you with it, then in such a solitary place as pleaseth you. Had I seen that your eyes had observed mine, and understood them, I would not now have written, that I doe infinitely love you, but since I saw you did not understand that language, I thought it more respect to write then to speak unto you: Yet if I be deceived in that, I am ready to repair my fault, and will tell you on my knees, upon the first handsome opportunity, that the Grandure of my passion cannot be equalled by any thing but your Beauty.

THRASIMEDES.

After Arpalice had read this Letter, she was exceedingly unresolved what to doe: Shee thought that to take it was too obliging unto him that wrote it; and to leave it, was to shew unto any that entered what Thrasimedes had written: But at last she thought of a way which was safe both wayes, which was, to blot out what Thrasimedes had written: yet first shee would take a copy, though it were but to shew it unto me; and so shee did; and so shee thought Thrasimedes could not accuse her of too much indulgency: and shee had no sooner blotted out what was written in the Letter, but the Porter came and opened the door, telling her that the company wanted her: Then she went out, but covered her face with her hood to hide her blushes, and could not speak one word unto the man: Shee was no sooner out, but spying me in a window towards the Garden, she came unto me, and acquainted me with the businesse, shewing me a copy of the Letter: For my part, I must confesse, I told her, that I thought the proceeding of Thrasimedes to be very gallant. So do I, said she, but let me tell you, I think it a little too bold, and very offensive to me; for he cannot chuse but know the bad condition of my fortune, and how I am engaged unto Menecrates, and consequently I neither can, nor ought to suffer him, as I might if my fortune were otherwise. If love, said I unto her, were not a violent domineering passion, I should thinke Thrasimedes were obliged to hearken unto reason, and follow it: But, Arpalice, if hee bee in love, as very likely he is, it were unjust if you should think he acts by the rules of Reason: and to speak with reason, I cannot see why Thrasimedes should not think he may become a Rival unto him that did carelessly play away the Picture of his Mistress: We had talked much more, but time called us homeward; where when we were arrived, Lycaste, and Cydipe went unto the Chamber of Thrasimedes, but Arpalice would not goe, feigning to be a little ill: He being a man of a quick spirit, easily apprehended the reason why Arpalice came not, and therefore feared extremely that she was incensed, yet very glad he was she had received his Letter: As for Lycaste, though she did believe Thrasimedes had given the Musique, and Banquet, yet she never dreamed of any particular design in it: So that she did highly commend the magnificent liberality of this unknown man, who had so sumptuously treated them. But after he was gone, and the servant of Thrasimedes coming in, he acquainted his Master how Arpalice had read his Letter, and blotted it out. At the first his fears were predominate, but afterwards hope tempering his fears, he waited with much impatience Page 149 to see Arpalice, that hee might guess by her eyes whether he had any hopes to have any share in her heart: but his longing desires were not so soon satisfied: for Arpalice continued still her seigned sicknesse, purposely because she would not be obliged to go with Lycaste into his Chamber; and her reason was, because she knew that Thrasimedes intended ere long to remove from the house; yet he had not left his Chamber: but since he could not see Arpalice, and not being able to live long in that anxiety, he began to stirre abroad as a man in health: Gladly would he have stayed a little longer, if he could have seen Arpalice, but since he could not enjoy that happiness, he told Menophiles in the morning, that he intended to trespass upon his generosity no longer, but would lodge with an acquaintance he had in the Town: Menophiles was very unwilling to part with him, but at last, Thrasimedes prevailed, and though he was yet something weak, yet changed his lodging. 'Tis true, the house unto which he was to go, was not farre distant, yet he dressed himself that day, in his richest halbit, and as a man who was to see the onely person whom he preserred before all the World. At first, he went unto the Chamber of Lycaste, where Cydipe was, and where he thanked her with as much spirit as civility, for all the courtesies he had received. But since he feared that when he would go unto Arpalice, who kept her Chamber, Lycaste would go with him, he made his visit very long, in hopes some would come in, and so he might more easily see Arpalice alone; and indeed it happened according to his wished hopes; for there came in much company, and whilst she entertained them, he went into the Chamber of Arpalice with more hast, then his weaknesse would well allow him. Since she foresaw, that since he had been at Lycastes Chamber, he would come unto hers also, she sent for me, lest he should find her alone, but as I was ready to go unto her, some company came in which stayed me, so that Thrasimedes was more happy then she intended he should be, for he found an opportunity to talke in private with her: there being none but one servant in the room; as earnest as the desire of Thrasimedes was to see Arpalice, as soon as ever he saw her, he was fuller of fears then joyes, because he found her so serious, that he apprehended the enterprize in which he was engaged more difficult then he imagined: Yet she received him with civility enough, but it was mixed with such a cold strangeness, as had no obliging sweetness in it. However, Thrasimedes being resolved to lay hold upon such a favourable opportunity, after the first complements were past, and Arpalice desired him to sit down, I thought Madam (said he unto her) to have found you so sick, as would have moved compassion in all those that saw you, but for ought I see, you are in such a condition, as make all those who see you to need pity themselves; and I believe you affect solitude onely to prevent the making men miserable: I assure you, though it be good to do so, (replied she) yet one knows not how to avoid it: for there is no place so solitary where a misfortune may not happen. I understand you very well, Madam, said he unto her, and I can see how you reckon the boldnesse which I presumed to take in disturbing your solitude in the Closet in the number of your misfortunes. But I beseech you Madam, is it such a grand misfortune to be told, that I adore you? and is it a crime, that I am not able to live unlesse you know I am totally devoted yours? I neither begged your esteem nor your affection; but onely presented mine; I beseech you, why then do you receive me with such a hollow hearted entertainment? I have long since heard say, replied she, that it is the custome of those who are in fault, to complain first, before they be accused. I beseech you Madam, replied he, what crime have I committed? Am I the cause that you are the fairest person in the world? Can I chuse but admire you, have I not a heart that is sensible? or if it were a crime, have you not sufficiently punished me for it? have you not most cruelly blotted out what I had writ? and deprived me of your sight three daies together? surely that is punishment enough to expiate all the crimes which a violent passion forced me to commit. Had you told me, replied Arpalice, that your design was onely to make me hate my solitude in writing so craftily that letter which I found in the Closet, doubtlesse I should then have pardoned you: but since you persevere in your crime, and continue talking as you do, I must needs express my dislike of it, and that I am highly offended: It seemes then, that you are as rigorous as fair, replied he, but though you be, yet I beseech you Madam, do me the favour to tell me what punishment you have reserved for Menecrates? for I see no reason or justice, that you should punish me for adoring you; and recompence him for slighting you: I conceive it no good plea, replied she, to justifie ones selfe, by the crimes of others; and though Menecrates be culpable, yet that does not at all excuse Thrasimedes from being culpable also: Pray Madam, replied he, do me so much honour as to tell me what my crime is? you have writ unto me, replied she, and thats enough: are you offended because I tell you truth (replied Thrasimedes) It is no matter, said shee, whether what you say be true or false, your crime is in telling Page 150 it: Do you thinke me as culpable, replied he, in speaking sincerely, as in telling you a lie? How ever it be, said she, you have offended me, and I am the more apprehensive of your fault, because I had the greatest inclination in the world to be your friend: Oh Madam, said Thrasimedes, if so, It is impossible you should hate me, because I love you: or if it be, not because I have told you, but because I have told you in an ill manner; your distinctions are very nice; (replied Arpalice and smiled) But never to trouble your selfe further with a search whether I am offended because you love me; or because you have writ unto me, or because you have writ to me in an ill manner, be assured, I am offended: I beseech you Madam replied he, since I have offended against my will, tell me which way I should appease you? In doing that, said she which is contrary unto the thing which offended me: Then replied he, I must most horridly hate you; but since that is not in my power, I must endeavour to appease you some other way, which Madam shall be, by a most humble respect and profound silence: yes Madam, since what I say offends you, I will not any more speake of my passion, untill I can obtain my pardon, and that your eyes assure me of it. I assure you, said she, if you understand their Language very well, they will never tell you any thing, which may persuade you, I can forget the offence, which you have given me. Alas Madam, replied he, I do not desire you should forget it as long as you live; but that you may remember as long as life lasts, that I am the most zealous and respective Lover that lives upon the Earth: As Arpalice was ready to answer, and perhaps sharply, I came in; making a thousand excuses, that I came no sooner, I perceived that the minds both of Arpalice and Thrasimedes were so distracted, that they knew not what I said, and I began so to talke unto them, as I moved Arpalice to blush and Thasimedes to smile, who told me he would come and thanke me for the favour I had done him: but to tell you truly, I thought my selfe little beholding to him for the favour, because he did visit me rather as the friend of her he loved, then for any other reason. After he was gone out of Arpalices Chamber, she related all their conversation unto me; but for all her anger against Thrasimedes for speaking so openly of his love; yet I knew she did not hate him, but that there was a strong inclination in her heart to esteem him. I pray Arpalice, said I unto her, tell me wherein you think liberty consistes? you, I say, who declares your self to be an enemy unto all manner of force and constraint; who would enjoy it in the most triviall things: who never thinkes any recreation pleasant, unlesse you might chuse it? who thinks that which others call decency, to be an insupportable severity: who was alwaies used to say, that the only advantage which men have above women is liberty; and that the greatest pleasure of Travellers is, that they are not subject unto the Lawes of the places where they passe: and who conceives the chiefe felicity of friendship to consist in venting unto each other all that is in their hearts freely without compulsion: and yet I see this great Lover of liberty, does suffer her selfe to be a slave: I pray, said she unto me, what moves you to speak thus? Reason, replied I, for do I not know that you hate Menecrates extreamely? I do confesse it, replied she, and do not I know, said I, that you do lov*rasimedes? Did he behave himselfe to|wards me as I would have him, replied she, I do <...> fesse indeed, that I think I should not hate him: for his person does please me; and his spirit is infinitely agreeable unto mine, and hee does almost perswade me that he esteems me. I pray tell me, said I unto her, how would you have him behave himselfe towards you? and what would you have him say? but withall Madam, I would have you speak sincerely: would you have have him (said I unto her, seeing she answered not) not respect you more then any other? that he should not prefer to talke with you before me; that he should look upon you like a man who thinks upon nothing? that he should never talke unto you but upon things indifferent, as having no particular design to please you, that he should never commend you; nor do any thing which might perswade you that he loves you? speake I conjure you, and ingenuously confesse that if he should do thus, he would not be so much in your opinion as he is, though he hath a little over freely told you, that he loves you. You are so free this day, (replied Arpalice and laughed) that I thinke you will make me a hater of Liberty, since it moves you to utter so many things which displease me, though they do not anger me so much as I would. I beseech you said I, consider seriously, and resolve with your selfe what you will do with the poor Thrasimedes, for I perceive he is so deeply in love with you, that I am confident he will never returne into his owne Country: For my part, said Arpalice very sadly, I do not thinke you would have me so miserable, as to marry a man whom I cannot love, nor do I think you would have me love Thrasimedes, whom I can never pretend unto: but I thinke Candiope, that you are either out of your wits, or else will drive me out of mine; otherwise why do you not expresse your selfe quite contrary to what you do? It is because I cannot betray my owne thoughts (replied I Page 151 and laughed at her anger) and because I have no mind to contradict yours. Then did Arpalice by degrees confesse unto me, that she never saw a man in all the world whom shee could affect, except Thrasimedes. But not to trouble you with a tedious relation of all wee said at this time; let me only tell you, that it appeared Thrasimedes had no intention of going so soon from Lycia: For he put himself into a magnificent equipage, and co <...> ed the acquaint|tance of all the Gallants in our Town: But as for the Ladies he never visited any unlesse the friends of Arpalice, and amongst them, I was one whom he often visited, and with whom he held a great intimacy of friendship. He was so amiable and handsom, that he was the object of an universall esteem, and it had been strange if Arpalice had slighted him. Hee was none of those light apo*ring lovers, who care not what they talk before their Mistrisses, o* who excessively commend a black Beauty before one that is fair; but on the contrary hee is so judicious, so exact, and discreet in his passion, and without any affectation or constraint in his actions, that if at any time he commended any in the presence of Arpalice, it was so as it might appeare hee thought Arpalice the most fair, and most worthy of commendations: And I beleevve never any had a finer art to keep himselfe within in his owne ranke then hee had. As oft as I have seen him with Arpalice, in the Temples, at Visits, in Walkes, and Assemblies, I never saw him intrusive, nor ever put any out of their places, yet was hee perpetually with her, and therefore you may imagine, that if shee had a heart absolutely insensible, shee could not chuse but bee much taken with such a perfectly accomplished man as Thrasimedes, and with one who was so knowing in the art of procuring love. I will omit all the relation of all those rigours which she shewed unto him at the first, and how she slighted the merits of such a man: For perhaps you will hardly think it possible she should treat a man so roughly, whom she esteemed so highly: But let me tell you, that the pa on of Thrasimedes did manifestly appear, that the friends of Menecrates tooke it to heart, and though they esteemed Thrasimedes very well, yet they thought themselves obliged to tell Arpalice their minds. Untill now Arpalice did constrain her self, but as soon as Menophiles and Lycaste spoke unto her concerning Thrasimedes, and commanded her to let him know, that he must not any farther engage himself in her service, she ceased to resist her inclination, and did so peremptorily revolt from those that commanded her to banish Thrasimedes, so incivilly, that she began to slack her rigour to him: Yet would not she permit him to speak openly of his love, but without any anger or sharpnesse, imposed silence upon him. This being the state of things, news came that Parmenides and Menecrates would return within two dayes. This report had diffe|rent operations in the heart of Arpalice; for her love unto her brother made her joyce to see him so soon, and her hatred of Menecrates, made her strangely apprehend his return. On the other side Thrasimedes had so little assurance of the heart of Arpalice, that he knew not what to resolve upon, nor how to behave himself towards Menecrates, therefore he determined to find out a way how to speak with Arpalice in private: But since it was not her custome to give him any such opportunities: And since all he had to say required longer time then common conversations, which lasted not above a quarter of an hour, he bethought him|self of an invention which did admirably well serve his turn. Know then, that to bring about his design, he bestowed a visit upon me; and after much common discourse, he began to talk of Menecrates, asking me confidently, how I thought Arpalice would receive him: Afterwards falling from one discourse to another, he told me that he had a very great de|sire to give an entertainment unto Arpalice, before Menecrates came: For, said he, if one may credit Zenocrite, she dares not so much as lift up her eyes after he is arrived. For my part, though I knew Thrasimedes was in love with Arpalice, yet I did not suspect hee had any secret design in his words; and he was so accustomed to treat us with fresh entertain|ments, that the proposition did not at all surprise me. I asked him then what kind of treat|ment this should bee? telling him it must be quickly if hee would have it before the ret|urn of Menecrates. Thrasimedes perceiving me so easily deluded, told me, that Arion, who was so famous throughout the world, was arrived at Patara; but since he had a desire to pass* unknown, he would not be got to play upon the Harp, unlesse one had some intimate friendship with him; but being well acquainted with him at Corinth, hee could prevaile with him, provided it was not before much company. This may easily be, replied I; for it may be at Lycastes house. The company would be too great there (replied he) for there will not be *ewer then *ycaste, Zenocrite, Cydice, Arpalice, and your self; and you may well imagine, that it is not possible to make Zenocrite keep any long silence to oblige Arion to play his best; for you must know that such a man whose voice useth to charm the very Page 152 Dolphins, will not take it well that Ladies will not be attentive: Me-thinks I see him already lay his Lute or Harp upon the Table at the first word which Zenocrite speaks, and will neither play, nor sing any longer. What then is the best course, said I unto him? The best way is, replied he, that you invite Arpalice hither to your house to morrow after dinner upon some pretence or other, that she come alone, and that you give it out all that day, that you are not within, and admit of none but Arion and your self, who will come together. Thrasimedes had no sooner made this proposition, but I accepted of it; for since my Father allowed me all the liberty I could desire, knowing I would not abuse it, it was an easie matter for me to do according unto this proposition: and since I beleevved Arpalice would not dorr at it, I made a positive promise unto Thrasimedes, who having a Halicarnassian friend, who played pass|sing well upon the Harp, and sung as well, he made use of him in lieu of Arion. To shorten my discourse as much as I can, I obtained of Arpalice to come and see me, and the truth is, I forced her, for she did long deny me, but perceiving me grow angry, she came thither the day following very timely: You may imagine that Thrasimedes failed not to come, nor to bring his pretended Arion with him: but I forgot to tell you, that he desired me to treat him with much civility, and to commend him highly: He told me also, that the best way to make him sing, and play well, was to entertain him well before he began to sing: for it is the humour of all the Musitians in the world, to love applaunders, and therefore if any would have him doe his best, they must commend him, and allow him patience in relating some of his amorous adventures, or his adventure of the Dolphin. If that be all, said I unto him, let mee alone to doe all the civilities which are fitting: And indeed, the next morning when hee came, I was as good as my word: and Thrasimedes had so well described his Goddess unto him, that he did all which was desired of him: So that this counterfeit Arion, who was a man of wit and spirit enough, began to addresse all his discourse unto me according to the instructions of Thrasimedes, whilst one of his men was to bring his harpe: At first, the discourse was generall amongst us all four; but he fell insensibly to talke onely unto me: t*hin king thereby to oblige him unto a better humour of singing, I willingly hearkened unto him, and desired him to relate his admirable adventure of the Dolphin which was so famed over all the World. And indeed he began such a circumstantial relation, that I thought hee would not have finished before the next morning, and so he would not sing nor play that night. Moreover Thrasimedes had told me that he was phantasticall, and I was so fully per|swaded of it, that I durst not seem so weary of him as I was. In the meane while, Thrasimedes desiring not to lose such a favourable opportunity as had cost such paines to compasse, came nearer Arpalice then before; Madam (said hee unto her, in a low voice) me thinkes since Candiope permits Arion to relate his past misfortunes, you may as well allow me to relate my present miseries: But I beseech you Madam (added he, perceiving by her looks that she prepared to deny him) be not so inhumane as to deny me a hearing: the harp of Arion will presently prevent me without your rigour, therefore I beseech you let me speak. Arpalice thinking that ere long the Harpe of Arion would come, and that then the pretended Arion would begin to sing and play, did not impose silence upon Thrasimedes: So that this lover, not fearing to be interrupted by the Musique of Arion, began his discourse. Madam (said he unto her) I cannot think my self so unhappy as that you should not know I love, and love you infinitely: all my actions speak as much, my very looks may assure you of as much, and certainly it is impossible that there should be so much love in my heart, and you ignorant of it: So, Madam, I will use no perswasive arguments to let you know I love you; for I presuppose you know it: but I will onely ask you, how it is your pleasure I should behave my self unto this lovelesse Rivall who will shortly arrive? for I doe professe and de|clare, Madam, that I cannot change my heart. Moreover give me leave to assure you, Madam, that if I were so happy as to be more in your esteem then he, the engagement which obligeth you unto him should be no obstacle unto my happines: For though I know that if you refuse to marry him, the last Will and Testament of your Parents deprives you of the greatest part of your estate, yet give me leave to tell you, that I have enough to recompence that losse, since certainly my estate is as much as both yours and Menecrates, if both put together: Let him enjoy then what the Laws of your Country gives him, and I beseech you grant me that which, both reason and love requires, I mean, your affection. Your expressions are so full of generos|ity, replied Arpalice, that I cannot be offended at them: But after my thanks to you, I must tell you, that how much soever I esteem you, and what aversion soever I have unto Menecrates, and how great a repugnancy I have to be forced, yet I must confesse, I have not power to make any other expressions then such as I have all my life: Therefore, generous Thrasimedes, if you Page 153 doe esteem me, you will pittie my misfortune, and make no ill attempts to alter me: And if you will oblige me, live with Menecrates as you did at Apamea, and live with me as with a person neuterall and indifferent. How, Madam, said he, doe you think there is any equity in your language? Can you think it possible I can live with you in a neutrality, and indiffe|rency? Would you have me live with Menecrates as I did at Apamea? I beseech you, Ma|dam, consider what you say; think what a lamentable fate it is to marry one who loves you not; and what injustice it is to drive a man into despair who infinitely loves you, and who will infallibly die if you have no care of his life: For heavens sake, Madam, put a difference between Menecrates and me. Consider, I beseech you, how he will receive this honour which you doe him without any joy, and conclude that he who can so easily play away your Picture, will perhaps as easily part with your person as it: For my part, Madam, the attaction, which I bear unto you, makes me receive the least of your favours upon a thankfull knee; and in testimony of it, I pray see how great a veneration the heart of Thrasimedes holds of you. In saying so, he let her see how carefully he had kept the Letter which he had writ unto her. Doe not think, Madam (said he) I carry this so carefully about me, for any other reason but because it was touched with your fair hands, when you cruelly blotted out the first testimonial of my love. Imagine, Madam, I beseech you, with what reall reverence I should receive a reall favour: Oh, for heavens sake, put not a vast treasure into the possession of a blind man, who knows not the value of it. Let him have the liberty to punish himselfe by a new choice; and doe you make choice of a heart which knows how to adore you accor|ding to your infinite merit: Doubtlesse you will find in mine as much reverence as passion, and as much fidelity as love. Advise well with your self, Madam, and consider what is your best course: The very least syllable you can pronounce may regulate all my actions; and truly upon your answer depends the fate of all my life. I am not so full of vanity (answered she) as to believe all you say; but I have so good an opinion of you, as to hope you will not deny the request which I shall make unto you, which is, that you will for the love of me live civilly with Menecrates, lest if you do not, something might reflect in my disadvantage, which should infallibly fall upon you: For in the humour I am in, perhaps I am not so just as to accuse those of my misfortune who are the real causes of it. If you will honour me so far as to promise me, replied Thrasimedes, that you will never make Menecrates happy, I shall promise you to live civilly with him: But, Madam, if you make me absolutely despair, I shall hardly answer you as I do. I assure you (replied Arpalice, and sighed) I should despair my self, if I thought nothing could prevent my marriage with Menecrates; and I am confident if such a misery do befall me, I shall hardly believe it the very preceding minute. Whilst Thrasimedes was talking with Arpalice, she looked continually whether Arions Harp was brought; not that she did hate him who was speaking unto her; but because she feared to give him either too obliging, or too sharp answers, and therefore she would gladly have their discourse interrupted: For my part, I looked as earnestly as she for the coming of the Harp: For since Thrasimedes told me, that there was a notable difference between the discourse of Arion and his Musique, I longed to hear it; and indeed he spoke very elegantly, so that thinking hee would sing a hundred times better then he spoke, I had a conceit he would then charme me: But at last, after a long stay, according to the plot of Thrasimedes, the Harp came: And as soon as I saw it, I presented it unto this pretended Arion, thinking I could not oblige him more then by my impatient desire of hearing him; but he having no such desire to be heard, took it, and layd it upon the Table again: saying, he would first finish what he had begun, and what I had commanded him to relate: So that fearing to anger him, I sate down again, and hearkened unto the rest of his Dolphin adventure, which he did tell even to the least wave of Sea in which the King of Fishes did triumph: describing him so circumstantially, as he did not omit so much as a Scale or Fin of the Dolphin, nor the curles which he made in the water: yet I was so simple as to think that all his long winded descriptions were onely consequents of his Poeticall humour, and that his manner of speaking was onely a little too full of Tropes and Figures; though I observed all along that he spoke very elegantly: But at last, after a long relation of this adventure, he took up the Harp and played: Arpalice also drew nearer, and imposed silence upon Thrasimedes: but the counterfeit Arion told her, that she needed not make such hast, for his instrument was not yet in tune, and it would be long before hee could bring it into fit order for Harmony, all the favour he desired was, that she would bee pleased to speak low, addressing his speech afterwards unto Thrasimeaes, conjuring him to give an example unto Arpalice: And indeed this Musician was very long in tampering, and tuning his Harp: twenty times did he twine up and down the strings; sometimes it was set Page 154 too high, sometimes too low, sometimes in the same note it was before: he broke above twenty strings, still something was out of order: then would he lift up his eyes towards heaven, and turning towards the company seem to be very angry: Afterwards would he offer at a tune in a kind of confused manner, so as one could not judge whether he was skilfull, or ignorant in Musique: And indeed this subtle friend had all the fretting humours of a peevish Musician, and seemed so hard to please in tuning his Instrument, that he gave Thrasimedes, time enough to talk, he would lengthen out the time by intermixing a discourse of Musique: and omitted not one term of art: he told me of three sorts, of the Phrygian, of the Dorian, and of the Lydian: he had up the Diatonique, the Cromatique, the Diapason, the Mese, the Paramese, and a hundred other conjuring words, which I understood not, nor ever shal remem|ber; and all this in such a Magisterial tone, as if Amphion, Linus, or Orpheus had spoke. In the mean time, be pleased to know, that I thinking I could not do a greater pleasure unto him that was my Musique Master, then to acquaint him, I sent for him, appointing him to be brought into my Closet by a back paire of stairs: And indeed when this pretended Arion had tuned his Harp, this Musician was in my Closet, with all the women of my house. You may imagine how impatient he was to hear this man, whose fame went over all the world. In the mean time, since I knew he was not lesse famous for his Verses, then for his Musique and Voice, and thinking those which he sung when he thought he should have dyed, would be most ad|mirable, I would needs entreat him to sing them; therefore I explained my meaning, and courted him unto it: you may imagine that he could not satisfie my desire, since the true Arion would never impart those admirable Poems unto any; but the friend of Thrasimedes having wit at will, excused himself very handsomly: He told me, that it was a song so sad, and so full of lamentable expressions, that it would move more sorrow then joy. I, who desired that he should have a good opinion of my ability in matters of musique, desired to think that Arpalice and my self were not of the humours of most women in generall, who affect onely light pleasant Aires; but on the contrary, we delighted most in melancholly tunes, which sad and soften the hearts of hearers, and move them unto compassion. Oh, Madam, replied he, I dare not consent unto your desires; for I am confident, that which moved the Dolphins unto compassion, will move too much sadnesse in you. Seeing then that I could not move him to satisfie my desires, I pressed him no farther, but let him sing what he pleased: All this while Thrasimedes was expressing his love unto Arpalice, who fearing to give too much hope unto her Lover, rose up, and came nearer the counterfeit Arion, who perceiving his friend had done his businesse, and would talk no longer with Arpalice, and therefore he resolved to sing: But though he did it very well for a man of Quality, who made it not his profession; yet my ex|pectation being high, I was astonished when this friend of Thrasimedes began to sing so mean|ly. But whatsoever I was, the Musician in the Closet was much more. However, Arpalice and I durst not let our wonder appear; but seemed as if we thought he sung admirably well: yet I could not chuse but tell Arpalice in a low voice (whilst he was tuning his Lute for ano|ther Air) what I thought: Do you not think (said I in her ear) that Dolphins only can think this Harmony admirable? For my part, said she, all I can say is, that if Arion speaks no bet|ter then he fings, certainly he has tired you. I assure you (said I unto her) he does not sing so well as he speaks; and I am confident, that it was by words, not songs, he charmed the Dolphin. Though Arpalice and I resolved to speak but one word, yet I found my self in such a laughing vein, that I talked a long time purposely to keep me from laughing out: But that which gave me the first ground of suspition was, that whilst I was talking to Arpalice, I ob|served this feigned Arion tuned his Instrument, looked upon Thrasimedes, and was so tickled with a laughing conceit, that he had much adoe to contain as I: yet did he counterfeit the Musician still, and did it very well: But finding his friend desired no longer discourse, and seeming to be angry at what Arpalice and I did, he laid his Harp upon the Table hastily, and would sing no longer: Arpalice having not observed so much as I, began to make a thousand excuses, and desired him to continue his singing, but he, with the pettish humour of a Musician, said, it should be some other time. For my part, I stood silent, and he making use of my silence to colour his refusall of Arpalice, told her, that he perceived I was not pleased, be|cause he would not sing the same verses which he sung when the Dolphin saved his life, and therefore he would stay untill such time as he had a little recollected his memory. Since you owe your life unto them, replied Arpalice, it is not credible you should forget them. Whilst she was talking thus, Thrasimedes, who was not sorry his plot was discovered, because it would be taken for a mark of love, came unto me, and asked me with a smile what I thought of his friend. Me-thinks (said I unto him in a low voice) that this Arion speaks so well, Page 155 and sings so ill, that I think him more fit to divert company by his discourse, then to char <...> Dolphins by his voice: For my part if I had been a Dolphin, I should have taken more delight in hearing the Waves dash against the Rocks, then in his songs. However (said Thrasimedes unto me) his Harp gives not more satisfaction then his eloquence. I cannot say so (replied I) for his discourse pleaseth me much better then his Musique. After this Thrasimedes told me, that Arion had a desire not to be known, and therefore would be called Philistion as long as he stayed in Town. And the best conceit was, that this borrowed name which Thrasimedes mentioned, was the right name of the counterfeit Arion, who after as much discourse as spoke him to be a man of much spirit, went away with Thrasimedes, who told me so much as I did not doubt of this trick which was put upon us: So that fearing lest it should make some noise in the Town, I went presently into my Closet to entreat the Musician not to tell Arion was in Patara: but a woman of Arpalices, and another of mine, over-hearing that name, it was a hard matter that a secret should be kept amongst three, especially since the Musician was even ravished that Arion sung so ill. 'Tis true, he did not report that he heard Arion in my chamber, but he said he heard him: The two women durst not tell all the truth which they thought they knew, but they told all the women of Zenocrite that Arion was in Town, and that Thrasimedes was acquainted with him: So that the next day the news was publike, and every one asked whether they had seen Arion? But the best conceit was, that the same day Zenocrite came unto Lycaste, where I was, with Cydipe, and Arpalice, Thrasimedes came also, and brought Philistion with him as Philistion, that is, as a man of Quality in Hallicarnassias, and not as Arion: For my part, though I did believe he had put a trick upon us, yet I knew not for whom I should take this Stranger; but I was much perplexed, that every one who came that day to Lycaste, should all talk of Arion: Some said one thing, others another, according to the various reports of Relators: For my part, said Zenocrite, I despair not of knowing him, for I am told he is a friend of Thrasimedes. I must confesse, when I heard Zenocrite say so, I thought it some affront which she put upon Arpalice, and me; and that she had known something of the precedent dayes passage. On the o|ther side, Thrasimedes and Philistion knew not what to think: But at last Thrasimedes said, that he had not as yet seen Arion, and that if he did meet with him, he promised Zenocrite to bring him unto her: He had no sooner passed this promise, but all the company desired the same favour, and Philistion was as earnest of it as any of the rest: So that Arion desired to see Arion. In the mean time Arpalice and I could hardly hold from laughing; yet she restrain|ed her self as well as she could: She had much adoe to bring some angry Idea into her fancy to prevent it; but at last the thought of Menecrates his arrivall the next day, gave a stop un|to all her mirth. In the mean time Thrasimedes came to me, and asked me pardon for the imposture which he had used, making me an exact relation of all, and conjuring me to pittie him, and doe him all good offices unto Arpalice. I shall not relate all that he said unto us, for it would be too long: nor how Thrasimedes was persecuted by all those who desired him to make them acquainted with Arion, nor how Zenocrite did play upon the return of Menecrates: But let me tell you, that Arpalice seeing Menecrates did return the next day, and ap|prehending, that perhaps within a few dayes they would enjoy her to marry him, she was so exceedingly sad at the thought of it, that she fell sick, and so sick that she kept her bed. To tell you truly, I am perswaded, that as things stood, her esteem of Thrasimedes did augment her aversion unto Menecrates: However, her dislike of him made her sad and sick: So that partly sad, partly sick, she kept her bed all the next day, and I stayed with her, because she de|sired I should see how he would accost her; and indeed the meeting was very vill on Menecrates his side, though with much indifferency, but with an extream coldnesse from Arpalice: She being in her bed, and, as she said, sick, no great notice was taken, but he seemed more disposed to look upon Cydipe, who was very handsome that day, then to talk with Arpalice; and he did it so openly, that one could not doe him a greater pleasure then to with|draw, and leave him alone with her: But the strangest thing is, that this Lover, who at his return found his Mistris sick, was so little troubled at it, that he stayed very late talking with Cydipe in Lycastes chamber, and was in the merriest mood in the world that night: I leave you to judge whether this was not enough to augment Arpalices aversion, who was in|deed so really troubled at this proceeding, that she was really sick for fifteen dayes; and Menecrates did not visit her above one quarter of an hour every day, employing all the rest in pleasures, and courting Cydipe, who infinitely pleased him: Also he did visit Thrasimedes, and so did Parmenides: For though they had told him of the passage concerning the Picture, and had hinted as much as might perswade him that Thrasimedes was in love with Arpalice; Page 156 yet since himself was not, he cared not, and consequently did not choak his civilities unto Thrasimedes, who ever since the day in which he confessed his trick, did continually tell me of his love to Arpalice. In the mean time since she would not do Menecrates so much favour as to seem angry against him for playing away her Picture, but onely continued cold towards him, without any mention of the true cause, she was very desirous of some time to resolve upon what course to take, and would goe into the Country with Zenocrite, who asked leave of Lycaste, telling her, that fresh air was the best thing to recover her health: So that Arpalice went with Zenocrite for fifteen dayes: Menecrates not knowing whether she was improv|ed or no, since he had onely seen her in the dark: So she went out of her bed into a Coach; and was not very sick; for she being much more sick in mind then body, stirring made her better. For my part, I stayed at Patara, with orders to write news unto Arpalice: and indeed I gave her a full relation, and had matter enough for it: for Menecrates was so taken with the beauty of Cydipe, and Parmenides so deep in love with Cleoxene, Sister unto Menecrates, and the counterfeit Arion seemed not to hate me, so that I had matter of news enough: But when I sent all this news unto her, I sent two severall Letters, one to her self, another to shew Zeno|crite: for though she was a very generous person, yet there were some secrets which one would hardly trust themselves with; and though she was her confident in a hundred things, yet they were such as related more unto others then her self: Thus Zenocrite knew all, but knew it by such as had no interest in it: And thus I left it unto the discretion of Arpalice, what she thought fit to impart unto her: And she told her with joy that Menecrates applied him|self unto Cydipe, but with sorrow, that Parmenides loved the Sister of Menecrates: I writ to her also in rally, how Thrasimedes visited me so oft, that Philistion had not opportunity to express half the esteem he had of me. In the mean time the love of Thrasimedes being violent, the absence of Arpalice seemed long unto him, and needs must he write unto her: Since hee knew I used to send unto her, and since he had made me tell him the day when I writ unto her, he came unto me as I was ready to make up my Pacquet; and knowing I sent her all the witty and pleasant things I could glean, he gave me some verses, which he had two yeares since, but since I never saw them, I took them for a novelty; So that after he had read them unto me, I sent them unto Arpalice: But as Thrasimedes gave them unto me, he silly slip a note into them which I perceived not: So that when Arpalice opened my Pacquet she was much surprised to find a Letter from Thrasimedes, whose hand she knew very well, and wondering I should undertake to send it without any mentioning it unto her. The Letter was thus written.

To the Fairest Person in the World.

MADAM,

I Do not only beg a pardon for my own presumption in writing to you, but for Candiope also, whom I have deluded: Yet, Madam, how can I chuse but ask how long this cruel absence will last, which deprives me of the happinesse in seeing you? and I must needs ask also, whether you will for ever banish that man out of your heart, who infinitely loves you, and cannot possibly live without you. I should subscribe his name, but I beseech you name him your self, to the end I may have the honour of being pronounced by the fairest person that ever was.

As this Letter was as full of respect as Gallantry, it did more please then anger Arpalice; and the delusion which Thrasimedes put upon me had a happier successe then he could wish: yet shee seemed to be angry, but it was in such mild termes, as it was evident her anger proceeded rather from decencie then any sharp resentment: yet Arpalice did not answer the Letter of Thrasimedes; but sent it unto me; and if I could as well remember her Letter unto me, as I doe this which I have related, I should make you confesse she writes as well as she speaks: For truly it was the most facetious peece of wit that ever I saw: She observed the severity of a prudent person in anger, and yet had many expressions concerning Thrasimedes infinitely obliging. 'Tis true, she charged me not to shew her letter, but to tell you the truth, I saw she had been so elaborate in writing, that I thought she had no desire to be obeyed: for when she writ onely unto me, her Character was wont to be more careless, and worse legible; she used not such exact expressions, nor elegant phrases. So that I shewed it unto Thrasimedes, chiding him soundly for the trick hee had put upon mee, but to qualifie my anger, I shewed him Arpalices Letter, wherewith he was extremely charmed, not onely because it Page 157 was admirably penned, but also because it was obliging unto himself: He used all his Rhetorique to get a copy of that place which concerned himself, but I would not suffer him. 'Tis true he read it so oft, that he could not chuse but remember it. In the mean time, this daies conference did so perfectly perswade me of the real affection Thrasimedes bore unto Arpalice, that for the good fortune of them both, I wished Menecrates so far in love with Cydipe, that he would marry her, and think no more upon Arpalice: And I assure you, that during this absence I did what I could to advance it: I never saw Cydipe in a negligent dresse but I chid her, lest it should be any hinderance; and whatsoever she say now, she was then glad Menecrates preferred her before the greatest beauty in all Licia: And indeed she was a ful of complacency to him, as any virtuous person could be. 'Tis true, she was universally civill unto all; so that many were not so subtle as to perceive: but that never deceived me; for I easily perceived she was glad Menecrates loved her. In the mean time, Parmenides, who was deep in love with Cleoxene, durst not shew it unto Menecrates, because he was afraid to incense her: And knowing that Arpalice did not love Menecrates, he thought best to keep upon good termes with Cleoxenes Brother: And for the better understanding of this adventure, you must know, that Cleoxene had as great a spirit as beauty, but it was such a subtle secret spirit, that those who thought they knew her best, did sometimes find they knew her not at all: and indeed, at that time she passed for a person indifferent, who valued not the love of any, but delighted in all pleasures in generall, and loved nothing else: who did not apply her selfe unto any pleasure in particular; who kept not secret confidence with any, but told all the world, she could not conceive any thing was necessary to be kept secret: Yet this person whom I have described unto you, held an intimate correspondency for above a year with a brother of mine, whose name was Lysias, and none ever suspected any thing. 'Tis true, Lysias was as discreet, as Cleoxene was subtle, and I should never have knowne this correspondency, if by chance I had not found Cleoxenes Letter, whose hand I knew, and which moved my Brother to impart his secret unto me for fear I should reveale it. You may imagine (after this which I have told you) that Cleoxenes put my Brother into much perplexity: yet since he thought her rigour proceeded from her indifferency, the worse she treatled him, the more he loved her: For as those who are of a proud and lofty spirit, as he was, either quickly recoile, or more resolutely fall on, Parmenides not doing the first of these, did the second, and did so hastily court Cleoxene, that if Lysias had been capable of Jealousie, doubtlesse, he would have feared such a Rivall: But as Cleoxene carryed the matter, he was not at all jealous, and the assaults of Parmenides did rather divert them, and augment their affections: For Lysias was more circumspect, and Cleoxene was more exact, and more obliging. Moreover, they made me promise and swear such faithfull secrecies, that I never acquaintd Arpalice with this affection, who thought Cleoxene to be as indifferent, as indeed she was amorous: And I have heard her wish a hundred times that she were of her temper, and had a soul so disingaged as she thought Cleoxene had. As for Philistion, he behaved himselfe towards me, as if he were perswaded, it was not handsome for a man of spirit to stay so long in a Town without some peece of Gallantry: and I carryed my self towards him, as one that was not sorry he should esteem me so much above others, as to talk of me when hee returned into his own Country. Thus Philistion having a heart not over deeply engaged, was very pleasant, and obliging company: Menecrates thinking upon nothing but how to please Cydipe: Parmenides of nothing but how to move the heart of Cleoxene, Cleoxene sporting at his passion with Lysias; and Philistion and I having no further designs, but to esteem one another, Arpalice returned with Zenocrite, but so admirably fair, and so perfectly recovered of her sicknesse, that she was cried up as a fresh new-come beauty: and I beleieve she returned with full intentions to treat Menecrates coursly. Know then, that Zenocrite brought her into her Aunts chamber, where she found abundance of company, amongst the rest, Menecrates, who was talking unto Cydipe when she entered: Zenocrite addressing her self to Lycaste, I have brought Arpalice back unto you (said she unto her) because I would not lose the complement you owe me, for bringing her back so fair and spritely, after I had her from you so melancholly and sick: for I assure you (said she craftily) if every one be of my mind, they will confesse with me that she was never fairer, no not when her Picture was taken, which was sent unto Menecrates, and which he lost unto Thrasimedes. I beseech you, Madam (said Menecrates unto Zenocrite, with as much impudence as shame) do not so sharply twit me, for losing a Picture which by your own confession did not perfectly resemble Arpalice, since she is fairer now then she was at that time; and to tell you truly, I did it rather to publish her beauty then to wrong it, when I put her Picture into the hands of one who travelled. Page 158 I assure you (said Arpalice, with as much fury as a beauty could sparkle) that though Thrasimedes were not half so compleat a man as he is, yet I should think my Picture better in his hand then yours: For I am more obliged unto him who had a desire to win my Picture, then unto him who will venture to lose it. I cannot well justifie my self in that (replied Menecrates, extremely ashamed) I am perswaded (replied Zenocrite) that you will be more puzled to justifie your self in private then in publique, and if your case were mine, I would never go about it. If he did (said Arpalice) it would be in vain. I had better then take the counsell which is given me (replied he.) You had need of that counsell, and more (replied Zenocrite) and went away. I thank you for yours (replied Menecrates, and presented his hand unto her to conduct her unto her Coach) being glad to be out of that place where hee was so non plus'd: And though he stood in much fear of Zenocrite, yet hee had rather shee should chide him a thousand times in private, then to be twitted so in publique. After he had done his civilities unto Zenocrite, he returned unto the company, which was not now so terrible unto him, since Zenocrite was out of it: yet he durst not come near Arpalice, for his behaviour unto Cydipe during her absence, did extremely perplex him. But since he had eyes subtle enough to see that Arpalice was a thousand times fairer then ever he saw her; and since she perceived he did observe it, she was very glad of it, thinking she could not have a more noble way of revenge, then to let him see, she was not worthy of so much scorn he had of her: also she received all the applaude and commendations of her beauty with great joy, and I much wondered when I saw her admit of all extollings of her beauty with so much delight; and she set her self out more to spite the Lover whom she hated, then to please the Lover whom she loved. Thrasimedes was no loser by it, and it may be said, that she recompenced him, purposely to punish Menecrates. Thrasimedes was so much in favour with her, that he had continuall private conference with her. In the mean time, it being late, all the company went from Lycastes chamber, but not all alike satisfied: for much difference was between the satisfaction of Thrasimedes and Menecrates. The last of these finding Arpalice so faire and charming, that he was ashamed of his behaviour towards her: yet since he looked upon her as one whom for all this he should marry, his care was onely to know how he should carry himself between Cydipe and Arpalice: But the next morning he changed his mind: for a friend of his coming to see him, and beginning to discourse upon the present condition of his soul, he understood by him, that Thrasimedes came into my chamber with Arpalice, without any company but Philistion and my self, who had appointed that day, that all my servants should say I was not within, and he was by severall circumstances so fully satisfied, that there was a correspondency between them, that he began to hate Thrasimedes, and to lessen his love unto Cydipe, also to love Arpalice a little more; and resolved neither to lose her estate, nor her self, his love of Cydipe was rather a fancy then a real passion, where she thought; and you must know, that Menecrates being fully perswaded in four or five daies that Thrasimedes was in love with Arpalice, that he was not hated, but that himself was, he grew extremely vexed, and spoke not unto Cydipe as before: but in the first place, in lieu or winning Arpalice by his services, he summoned Parmenides to perform his promises, in executing the Last Will and Testament of his Father and Mother, who ordained him to marry Arpalice. In the mean time, Parmenides, who had a particular interest, not to satisfie Menecrates, told him, that he had conference with all those who had any power over his Sister; and not to let slip such a fit opportunity, he asked his Sister in marriage. For my part, said Menecrates, I freely give you all the power I have. Parmenides answered the same for as much as concerned Arpalice. Thus they did both of them dispose of that which was not in their power: And I assure you, they quickly found it: for as soon as Parmenides spoke unto Arpalice, she told him, that she would not think of any marriage matters so soon: yet she would not absolutely tell him, she would never marry Menecrates, because she knew him to be very imperious, and might have occasion to accuse her, if she declared she would nor fulfill the Will of her Father, therefore she told him onely, that she would take some time to resolve upon it, chusing rather to tell Menecrates his doom then her Brother: But when Parmenides saw he could not prevail with her, he told her of his affection unto Cleoxene, conjuring her to take it into her consideration. Unto this shee answered, that since all her amity could not make her change her thoughts of Menecrates, he might think also, that Cleoxene would not be ruled by her Brother, and so his happinesse or misery depended upon Cleoxene, and not upon Menecrates. After this Parmenides did still importune her a long time, and Arpalice resisted; and so not yeelding unto each other, each of them were left unto themselves. On the other side, Menecrates solicited for Parmenides unto Cleoxene, who continuing in her indifferency, Page 159 desired him to beleieve, that the same humour which caused his disingagement, kept her from engaging her self: so that she did not refuse Parmenides in particular, but all men in generall, conjuring him to sollicite her no more concerning Marriage: So that neither Parmenides nor Menecrates could give each other any good account of their Loves: and well may I say of their Loves, dear Doralisa; for I assure you, as soon as Menecrates imagined that he should not marry Arpalice, he fell desperately in love with her: So that he ranked himself in the quality of professed, and not declared Lovers, as Zenocrite defined them, and as she soon perceived it; and I think she was one of the first that published it to the world. As for Arpalice, she was both sad and glad: For she was glad Menecrates loved her, to the end she might be revenged of him; but her fears lest some quarrell should arise between Thrasimedes and Menecrates made her sorry: As for Cydipe, I am perswaded that Menecrates made her alwaies beleieve, he had no intentions to marry Arpalice, but onely to shew it was not long of him, to the end he might enjoy her estate in case she refused Marriage. In the mean time Thrasimedes was not without his share of perplexity, to see how Menecrates changed his minde concerning Arpalice; so that there was none who were happy but Philistion and my self: The cause of our happines was, because we had so much esteem and affection unto each other, as to please, and speak freely of every thing, and because we were not so deeply in love as to disquiet our selves: So that keeping within the just limits of amity, we laughed at the miseries of all others, except those of Arpalice and Thrasimedes, in which we were extremely concerned: But at last Menecrates, not being able to endure the severity of Arpalice, resolved to force her unto a private audience: In order to that, he addressed himself unto Parmenides to obtaine his wish, and to carry him in the morning into Arpalices chamber, whilst she was dressing <◇> self: As for Parmenides he left him with her: So that seeing he could not be rid of Menecrates without hearing him, she gave him audience; but it was with such a sad countenance, and such anger in her eyes, that he had hardly power to speak: But yet the Beauty of Arpalice did so exaspe^{te} his passion, that it did at last augment his boldnesse: so that be|ginning to speak as soon as he saw her disposed to hear, Madam, said he unto her, before I complaine of your severity unto all the world, I will take the honour to talke with you, and confesse that I have merited your hatred and scorn; also professe, that I will endeavour fo^r the future to be worthy of your esteem and affection. It is not my custome (replyed she, care|lessly) to be capable of any contrarieties; and therefore since I doe hate you, you can hardly perswade me to esteem you. Since there is no impossibility in it (replyed he) I will not despaire, for I am fully resolved to give you most infallible testimonies of my love, such as I hope will work upon your heart: And truly, Madam, I am not the same Menecrates I was when you were a child; but I must confesse unto my shame, that I did not then love you, and was a long while culpable: But now I have changed my thoughts, and am as much in love with you now, as I was indifferent before, and would it be just in you to treat me now, as when I did not love you? It is so improbable, replyed she, that a man who hath scorned me all his life, even so far as to lose my Picture, can change his mind so soon, and passe from one extreame unto another, that I wonder you will offer to perswade me unto it. I have already told you, Madam, that I doe not intend to justify my self for the time past, but I beseech you put a difference between the time of my guilt, and time of my innocency. When you have lived as long innocently (replyed Arpalice sharply) as you have done culpably, I shall then consider whether I should punish or recompence you, and so equally forget both your injuries and your services, that I shall be all indifferency. Madam, said he unto her, if love were a passion which one could command when one will, then I should confesse you had reason to upbraid me for not loving you from your cradle; but since it is not, and since it was the pleasure of the Gods that I should not love you untill you became the most lovely beauty in the world, ought you to hate me for that? Thrasimedes (added hee) whom perhaps you hate not so much as you doe me, has not long known you, and could not love you untill he did know you; and why I beseech you may you not look upon me as well as him? There is such a vast difference betwixt you and him (replyed she very angrily) that I cannot look alike upon you: for without putting my self to the trouble of considering whether he love me or not, I am certain he hath not scorned me as you have done: But to make use of your own arguments, I will not accuse you for loving me till now, upon condition you will not accuse me that I can never love you hereafter. Hereafter, replyed Menecrates, is not a thing which one can positively make answer for. I assure you (said she) if you can but promise me that you will not love me till death, I can promise to hate you as long as I live. However (said she) since by parting with part of my estate, I can be disengaged from you, I will throw it away upon you Page 160 with joy; but I beseech you doe not imploy Parmenides, nor Meophiles, nor Lycastes brother, nor Lycaste her selfe to torment me, for all they can do shall not alter me: After this, Menecrates would have protested unto her, that he would never take any advantage of her Fathers will, and that all his aymes were at her; but she would not heare him any longer, telling him it was Church time, and that she would have him be gone; insomuch as indeed he was forced to go; but he went in a miscellany of sorrow, anger and love, that he could not forbear complaining unto all he met. In the mean time, one of Arpalices women, and one of mine, hearing Philistion called Arion, they thought that Arion was his right name, and that Philistion was but borrowed: so that they being of such an humor as was incapable of keeping any secrets, they told every one that this same Philistion, who they said was in love with me, was not a man of any fashion, but that he was the famous Musitian who was so much cried up, and who could not be found all about the Towne: so that these women telling it unto such as acquainted Menecrates with it the same day, he was so ill satisfied with Arpalice, he told it unto all the world, thinking it would anger both Thrasimedes, and me also; for he knew me to be one that stood upon terms of honour, and that this report would not please me. Thus in the compasse of a day all the Towne told one another, that Philistion was Arion, and all beleevied it, except four or five who knew the truth: yet Arpalice and I were the last that knew it: But at last Zenocrite told us, conjuring us to tell her the truth: As she was making this request, Philistion came in, who knowing what was reported of him, came laughing into Zenocrites Chamber where we were, and told us all he heard; but since Arpalice and I were nothing pleased with this report, because we feared some ill consequences, we could not chuse but blush, so that Zenocrite beleevving some truth to be in these reports, began to presse us very earnestly to confesse the truth unto her. I know very well said she, that Philistion by his admirable aire should be a man of qualitie, and that he hath an excellent spirit; but I know also Arion is no common Musitian, he can compose verses rarely, and has seen so many gallant men, that I am perswaded he himselfe is one; and therefore if Philistion should be Arion, it is no dishonour unto him to tell it. Whilst Zenocrite was talking thus, Philistion made his heart ake with laughing, Arpalice and I also could not hold, maugre our anger: But at last Philistion, to let Zenocrite see he was not Arion, sent for a Harpe which he played on before her, and afterwards sung; but it was long first, for his laughter would not let him. It was good sport to see how he strived that day to sing ill, that he might make it knowne he was not Arion; as much as he did to sing well in my Chamber to make us think that he was he: and indeed he sung so, that he left no sus|pition that he was Arion: since Zenocrite could not possibly think he could so dissemble his voice, and therefore we were necessitated to confess the truth. But whilst we were talking of this adventure, Menecrates and Thrasimedes quarrelled: the first of these having told the other something which relished not, concerning the pretended Arion; so that going out together, they fought, and perhaps had killed each other had they not been parted; yet Thrasimedes had the better of it. This accident making a great noise, we quickly heard it at Zenocrites, and you may imagine how much Arpalice and Philistion were troubled at it: Philistion went out immediately to look his friend, who, they said, were both committed unto custody untill they were friends. I shall not make any particular relation what talk this produced, let me only tell you, that Thrasimedes being exceedingly beloved, and all the world disliking that Arpalice should be forced to marry Menecrates, hose that stirred in this businesse, did equally oblige Menecrates and Thrasimedes to <...> ve quietly the one with the other, and that the one should not take it ill if the other courted <...> palice, who only was able to make them happy or miserable; and thus was the reconcile| <...> nt made up between them: yet Menecrates resisted it as well as he could, saying it was not <◇> they should permit Thrasimedes to pretend unto Arpalice: adding, that they were both engaged unto each other from their infancy. Unto which Thrasimedes answered, that halving it from his owne mouth at Apamea, that he did not love Arpalice, he had good reason to think he would no further sue unto her, and therefore he would not check that passion which her beauty had created in his heart: and the reasons which Thrasimedes urged being found reasonable, they were agreed upon the conditions aforesaid. But Philistion being not satisfied with what Menecrates said of him, about three daies after they fought, and Philistion made it appear that he could use a sword better then a Harpe, for he got the better, and gave a slight wound unto the other in the arme. These two Combats caused others also, for Parmenides and Lysias fell out concerning this businesse, and fought. Truth is, it was no wonder my Brother should come off with the honour, for in fighting with Parmenides, he Page 161 he knew him to be his Rivall, but Parmenides knew not that Lysias was his indeed. Deer Doralissa, nothing was talked on for a month together but quarrels, which were caused by this imaginary Arion; but at last the storme being over, both Thrasimedes and Menecrates began openly to court Arpalice. Parmenides he was still deeply in love with Cleoxine, whilst Lysias was her Paramour. In the mean time, since Parmenides imagined that the more rigorous Arpalice was unto Menecrates, the lesse favourable would Cleoxine be unto him, he did extremely perswade her; Menecrates did no lesse unto Cleoxine, because she treated Parmenides no better: so that these two Brothers were intolerable torments unto their sisters, as if they had been imperious and crabbed Fathers, or capricious and jealous Husbands. Arpalice and Cleoxine took this persecution not alike, for Cleoxine cared not at all for it: but it was not so with Arpalice, for she indured the tyranny of Menecrates with intolerable impatience, so as I could not chuse but pity her: I also had my share of perplexities, because Philistion continually pressed me to imploy all the power I had with Arpalice, in favour of Thrasimedes: I knew very well that her inclination leaned that way; but Parmenides used such pres|sing solicitations against it, that she could not resolve upon it. As she was one day much troubled with the persecution of Parmenides, and as I much pittied her, I advised her to tell her brother, that she would willingly sacrifice her selfe for his sake, so it might do him service, but that she would not venture her selfe so farre upon uncertainties of his good fortune; and that therefore she would engage her selfe to marry Menecrates, assoon as he had married Cleoxine, knowing well by my brothers intelligence, that it would never be. But in what a perplexity were I, (said Arpalice who was ignorant of the love between Lysias and Cleoxine) if my brother should marry the sister of Menecrates? I can assure you (said I unto her) he will never marry her: and after I had told her all I knew, she took my counsell, and told Parmenides accordingly, charging me to tell Thrasimedes, that it should not trouble him, if he heard any reports to his prejudice. In the mean time, Arpalice had no sooner told Parmenides that she would marry Menecrates assoon as he had married Cleoxine; but Parmenides the more to oblige Menecrates unto a pressing his Sister to be favourable unto him, told him what Arpalice said; so that Menecrates did double his persecution of Cleoxine, and importuned his sister much more then his Mistresse. I forgot to tell you, how I had a design to doe a good office unto my Brother, for I knew that Cleoxine had promised, if Menecrates did much presse her, and would force her to marry Parmenides, she was then resolved to tell him the reason why she could not, and would then make Lysias happy; so that by this means, I should at once be serviceable unto Arpalice, Thrasimedes, Lysias, and Cleoxine, and should also oblige Philistion. On the other side, Cydipe, who doubtlesse did think Menecrates loved her, did continually advise Arpalice to prefer Thrasimedes before Menecrates. Thus every one having a hid|den designe, we were all put to our wits, especially when we were all together: Mean while, what assurance soever I gave Philistion, to give the same unto Thrasimedes, yet he could not move him to rest satisfied: he told me one day, that if Arpalice did not honour him so farre as to give him some assurances of her affection, his friend would fall upon some violent resolution, and that his passion was too violent to be satisfied with trifles, and therefore she must at least give him some pleasing words. After this I pressed Arpalice (who came one day to see me because I was not well) to speak unto Thrasimedes as unto a man whom she loved. I pray you said I unto her, what great difficulty is in the businesse? why should you not give him such satisfaction, as will cost you only a few words? A few good words replyed she, are of greater consequence then you imagine, yet I doe not say that I will never give them: but if I be Mistresse of my reason, I shall not give them till needs I must: for these few words <◇> speak of as a small matter, are yet the utmost limitt that modesty or vertue allows: till they be spoke, the good or bad fortune of a lover is in the power of his Mistresse; then is she his Mistresse, he her slave; but when these few words are past through the eare into the heart of a lover, then doth he expect some proofs of this affection, and asks it, not as a slave, but as due unto him, and so never asks it with submission: and therefore my deer Candiope, let me tell you once for all, that these few words which you would have me to speak unto Thrasimedes, seem to be so full of crime, that I dare not speak them, and therefore I declare unto you, that all I can say unto Thrasimedes is, that I desire he should continue loving me. And also at last, said I unto her, that you consent he should hope to be loved againe. I assure you (said she, and both laughed and blusht) your capitulations are in vaine, for it hath so fallen out very often, that I never told Thrasimedes any thing which I resolv to tell him: and on the contrary I have told him what I resolved not to tell him; and this is the reason why I avoid as much as I can speaking with him in private; for I must confesse, that nothing in the world angers me more, then when I have been either more obliging, or more cruell then Page 162 I would be. However, said I unto her, though you will not talk with Thrasimedes in private out of affection, yet doe it out of prudence: For certainly at this time there is a necessity to make use of that power which you have over him, lest he should fall upon some violent and desperate course. Arpalice hearing me say so, thought at first she was obstinate, yet at last yeelded unto my desire, upon condition I would think she did it out of prudence, not affection; though she confessed if ever she affected any, it should be him: But the difficulty was, to find fit place of secesie for conference; and Arpalice and I were both unaccustomed unto secret meetings, that we were both puzled to construe it. I no sooner propounded one expedient, but Arpalice found a thousand difficulties in it: at her house, Lycaste and Cydipe were alwaies there: in my chamber the adventure of Arion did thrive but badly: in a Church was all the world: So that she scrupled at all, though there was no crime in the matter: walk we could not without more company; and after a long reasoning upon it, we found no satisfaction in any place: But at last chance did that for us which our inventions could not. As we were thus in conference, one came to tell me that Thrasimedes and Philistion asked for me: At first Arpalice thought I had put a trick upon her, that I dissembled sicknesse purposely to make me come and see her, and that this was a compact between Thrasimedes and mee: so that she would needs goe away, and I would not let him enter untill I had undeceived her. Well (said she to me) I shall not speak over obligingly this day unto Thrasimedes; perhaps it were better for him I went away. But for all that, I made her sit down; she would have sat upon my bed because least seen, and indeed she did so hide her self, that none but Thrasimedes could have known her; yet he did, and seemed beyond all measure joyed at the meeting. At first, talk was generall, and Arpalice had so little share in it, that she hardly knew what we said: But Thrasimedes addressing his speech particularly unto her, and Philistion beginning to speak low unto me, the talk divided, and we were the best part of an hour without any interruption: I cannot give you an exact relation of the conference between Thrasimedes and Arpalice; for both of them told me severally afterwards, that they could not repeat it: All I know is, that Arpalice said she spoke over kindly unto Thrasimedes, and that she repented: and Thrasimedes told me that she gave him not one favourable word; yet he was satisfied, though he had no great reason for it, unless he thought he saw in the eyes of Arpalice maugre the darknesse, a more obliging sweetnesse then before she used. However Arpalices went away the first, and would not let Thrasimedes wait upon her: She was no sooner gone, but Cleoxene came in, who according to her accustomed jollity, began to chide me for being in the company of two such Gallants, asking me if I had spent all the afternoon with them? whether we had any more to say? and whether she interrupted us? Hearing Cleoxene speake in this manner, in lieu of answering precisely, and telling her Arpalice had been there, I told her laughing, that there was no danger in interrupting a discourse of three persons, since it was likely many secrets would not be imparted: 'Tis true, said Cleoxene, and if all the world were of my mind, there should be fewer mysterious matters then there are. This is the reason I am always so indifferent, affecting rather to have no secrets in hand, then to run the hazard of hiding them, and cannot. Yet there are many things, replied Thrasimedes, which are very pleasing, and cannot be hid. Love is a passion so generall, said Philistion, as it must needs be in the number of those things which cannot be long concealed. If ever I should be culpable of it (replied Cleoxene) I am confident none should perceive it. Then you would not love at all (replied Thrasimedes) On the contrary (replied she) I should love better then another. You would live then in an extream constraint (said Philistion to her) No, answered she, I should be in lesse constraint then others who are so full of their gallantry. I must confess (said I) though I have no intentions to make use of your secret, yet I should be glad to know it. As Cleoxene was ready to answer, Lysias knowing she was in my chamber, came thither: presently after, Parmenides brought in Lycaste, and Cydipe: Menecrates also came in: But that which most amazed us was, that Zenocrite having met with Arpalice, who telling her I was sick, forced her to come back with her, the second time: So that when she came into my chamber, and not knowing I had kept her first visit from Cleoxene, she told me, to colour her second, that I was not obliged unto her for it, for she came more for Zenocrites company then for mine: My hope was at first, that Cleoxene would not remember how she asked me, whether I had spent all the afternoon with Thrasimedes and Philistion, and that I did not tell her Arpalice was there. But these hopes lasted not long: for all the company rising up at Zenocrite and Arpalices entrance, she came unto me, and asked me, laughing, what pleasure I took in concealing it from her? I assure you (said I unto her in a low voice) my intention was not to hide Arpalices being here from you, and you see she her self does not conceal it. Page 163 It was because you had not well agreed upon it, replied she, and smiled: after which she returned to her place, and all the company being set, Philistion began the discourse where we left, when it was interrupted by the entrance of Lysias. He thinks (said he) and looked upon Cleoxene, that you ought to impart a great secret unto Candiope when Lysias came in. 'Tis true, said she, but it must be in private, and not in publique. Zenocrite not being accustomed to let things be talked of in her presence which she understood not, did presse to know it, and so urgently, that though it was the greatest secret of Cleoxenes life, yet she resolved to speak as confidently as if it were a thing onely to help out discourse: So that after a relation of what had been said before Lysias came in, Cleoxene went on, and asked whether she was in the right, when she said, those who meddle with matters of Gallantry, without cunning enough to hide it, have not more pains then pleasure, and doe not deserve a faithfull Lover. For truly, said she, if there be any sweets in love, I conceive it must be when one is loved and loves, and it is not known unto any, because then one is not exposed to envy, nor detraction, nor to the displeasure of seeing jealous Rivals quarrell and fight: But one does quietly enjoy an empire which is not molested by any thing; such doe know all that others know; but others know not what they know: and I am perswaded it is with love as with fire, the more it is inclosed, the better it is kept; and indeed, doe you not see, that those loves which none are ignorant of, doe evaporate, and quench in a short time? All the World doe so talk of it for a while, that the Lovers themselves do insensibly forget to talk of it: Judge then, I pray, whether two who are in love, and keep their affections close from all the world but themselves, be not more happy then others? Doubtlesse they are, replied Zenocrite: But what would you have this close Lover doe? and how can he hide it, if he doe all that is requisite in love? What becomes of that multitude of things which they say are inseparable from that passion? For my part I am an enemy unto these declared Lovers, and think them so ridiculous, that I am perswaded there is a mean between those you speak of, and them: For if you take away sighs and sorrows, vexations, fears, jealousies, and raptures of joy, cares to please and divert alterations in countenance, magnificence and liberality from a Lover, you take away all things that can expresse his affection, and all that can render him agreeable. No, no, replied Cleoxene, a concealed Lover is not such a one as you describe; he sighs, but it is in secret, he mourns, but it is not because none understands it but his Mistress; he has his vexations, but he dissembles them; he is jealous, but it is onely as much as augments love, and not quench it; he has his raptures of joy, but they are in secret; he has a most diligent care to please his Mistress, but his diligence appears onely unto her, since it is her pleasure she should hide his passion: And as for liberality and magnificence, since they are virtues which may appear in all brave men, and are not confined onely unto Gallantry, he may be liberrall and magnificent in a hundred things and occasions which relate not unto love; and by consequence this close Lover may use them without any discovery of his passion: In the mean time he enjoys a treasure which none does envy, because none thinks he enjoys it. Whilst Cleoxene was talking thus, I durst not so much as look upon my brother, or Arpalice, and Lysias durst not look upon Cleoxene or me: as for her, since she was fully perswaded, that none knew the correspondency between Lysias and her self, she spake with as much confidence and boldnesse, as any disinterested neutral, or indifferent person could: And indeed, Parmenides, who had so much interest in her as to observe her narrowly, did not think her to be capable of any light kind of amity, therefore was far from thinking her possessed with a violent passion: So that esteeming himself more happy in having a lukewarm Mistress, whom he thought loved him as well as any, then to be like Menecrates whom Arpalice loved less then she did Thrasimedes, he gave a pleasant audience unto Cleoxene: As for Menecrates and Thrasimedes, they hardly heard what was said, for their thoughts were all taken up with looking upon Arpalice, who neither looking upon him whom she loved not, lest she should please him too much, nor upon him whom she loved, lest her looks should be censured, she gave an attentive audience unto Cleoxene and Zenocrite, who held all the discourse that day; and continued it a long time with variety of pleasant things: Yet towards the end, every one began to speak of other businesse, and talked what they thought good, except Menecrates, who could not speak one word in private with Arpalice. As for Cleoxene, she spake low unto Lysias, and none took notice of it; and she had the pleasure to see her passion so closely carried, that Parmenides himself took it no worse that Lysias could talk with her, then with any other: And since she could not chuse but laugh when she spake to Lysias, to see how handsomly she deceived the world, Parmenides desired his private Rival to tell him what she laughed at: You may imagine how this pleased Cleoxene; but as for Cydipe, I believe she Page 164 was not so well satisfied: at last the conversation ended, and since Cleoxene had not forgotten what she apprehended of Arpalice, and since she laboured to perswade her brother, that he must never pretend unto Arpalice, to the end he should not presse her to marry Parmenides, she told him that Arpalice had made two visits that day, and that the first was to meet Thrasimedes, telling him how she came to know it. I leave you to judge what operation this had upon the heart of Menecrates: Cleoxene did what she could to perswade him, to make good use of the knowledge he had that Thrasimedes was preferred before him, thereby to cure him of his affection unto Arpalice: But since he knew his sister did not love Parmenides, he thought upon serious considerations, that no great credit was to be given unto her words: therefore he referred it unto the next day, to know whether it was true that Thrasimedes and Philistion were a long time alone with Candiope and her, and when he found I spoke truth, he was extremely angry; and so much, that I can expresse it no better then by telling you, that he was in a minde never to love Arpalice againe: so that not consulting any longer whether he should quash his passion or not, he began to speak unto Zenocrite concerning Arpalices visits, as an appointed meeting with Thrasimedes, declaring openly, that he would no longer molest the pleasures of Arpalice, nor ever thinke of her againe. Zenocrite hearing Menecrates say so, was very much perplexed, for she wondered Arpalice should appoint a meeting with Thrasimedes, and on the other side she was glad to see, that as long as Menecrates his anger lasted, Arpalice would be freed from him, and at liberty to make Thrasimedes happy; yet since she knew Arpalice loved her reputation above her private satisfaction, she would justifie her, and therefore told Menecrates, that this which he called an appointment, was but a casual accident; but least in justifying Arpalice she should revive the love of Menecrates, which seemed extinguished, she added, that being his friend, she thought her selfe obliged to tell him, that it was a grosse inconsideration in him to thinke of ever marrying a woman whom he had so extremely slighted; as for her part she verily beleeves him to be past all hopes of ever obtaining her love, & therefore it <> much better both for himself and Arpalice to let her alone, & trouble himselfe no further <...> & indeed Zenocrite being very eloquent, she made such good use of Menecrates his anger, that she fully perswaded him to think no more of Arpalice, so that without more delay, she engaged him to give her commission to tell Parmenides of it, Menecrates conjuring her to assure him, that this should be no hinderance unto him concerning his Sister. Menecrates was no sooner gone, but she sent for Parmenides, to tell him that Menecrates had no more thoughts of Arpalice, but that he was ready to do him any good office unto Cleoxene. Parmenides hearing this, was in a bitter chafe against Arpalice: and his reason was, because he thought that now he would be more slack in his solicitations of Cleoxene: so that leaving Zenocrite, he went to Arpalice, and intended to give her a very bitter lecture, afterwards he went unto Menecrates to tell him it was now full time to presse Arpalice unto marriage with him; but since he was yet in his violency of anger and jealousy, he thanked him for his offer, and assured him once more, that he would be more close in his businesse to Cleoxene, then hitherto he had, though he do not now pretend any thing unto Arpalice. Thus Cleoxene thinking to rid her selfe from trouble, did augment it. But I beseech you admire a little at the fantastick fate of things: that which could not be obtained neither by Thrasimedes nor Lycias, did fall upon these two lovers by reason of the violence which Arpalice and Cleoxene endured through the tyranny of their brothers: for Arpalice seeing her selfe so unjustly tormented, resolved to confesse unto Thrasimedes, that she would love him, upon condition he would attempt nothing either against Menecrates or Parmenides: & Cleoxene, who had made such a mysterious secrecy of her affection to Lycias, resolved also to confesse ingenuously, that having neither Father nor Mother, she thought her selfe unblamable, if she followed her owne inclination in marrying Lysias, whom she had long loved; and indeed she told Menecrates as much, who not being able to finde any fault with her choice, either in his condition or person, he blamed her only for her secrecy; yet adding, that since he had passed his word unto Parmenides, he could not recall it, and therefore if she married Lysias, it should be without his consent. In the mean time, Arpalice, who could not indure the reports of her appointed meeting, since it was untrue, resolved to make it knowne that their meeting was by accident, not appointed; and indeed made it apparent: so that Menecrates finding his anger was unjustly grounded, it ceased, and he went unto Arpalice that very same hower, whom he found alone. You may easily imagine she was not a little astonished to see Menecrates at her feet, whom she thought had for ever desisted her company: Indeed she was so surprised, that she had not power to hinder him from speaking and asking pardon: 'tis true, it may be said, that though she was a Page 165 while silent, yet it was to speak unto with him more anger: For he had no sooner spoke what he thought fit to obtain his Pardon, but she was as sharp as possible could be, and charged him never to see her again: and the truth is, she forced him away. As for Parmenides, it was not with him as with Menecrates; for as soon as he knew, that there had been a long concealed affection between Cleoxene and Lysias, he thought no more upon her; but to retaliate generosity for generosity unto Menecrates, he assured him, that he would hinder the Marriage of Thrasimedes with Arpalice. Thus in lieu of former promises of marrying each others Sisters, they now promised onely that they should not marry their Rivals. This being the juncture of affairs, Thrasimedes received news, that his father was sick of a long, but mortal disease, & commanded him to come immediately unto him. Imagine how great his sorrow was, not onely because his Father was in danger of death, but that he should be so far off Arpalice, at a time when his presence was so requisite in Lycia. But to abbreviate my story, be pleased to know, that before his departure, Philistion and I so pressed Arpalice, that at last she promised unalterable fidelity unto Thrasimedes, who was extremely sorry to part from her: and Philistion being also to return, he departed with him; expressing more affection to me at parting then I thought he had: You may easily imagine that the absence of Thrasimedes was as pleasing unto Menecrates, as it was sad unto Arpalice: 'Tis true, she treated him so sharply, that he got no advantage by it, but onely a riddance of a Rival. In the mean time, Cleoxene seeing she could not obtain the consent of her Brother, did marry mine, after an assembly of many friends, who liked her choice: So that there was an end unto all Parmenides his hopes, and desires; nor did Menecrates see his Sister since: 'Tis true he was never in the same place with her: for you must know that Lycaste having some businesse unto Sardis, went thither a few dayes after the departure of Thrasimedes, and the marriage of Cleoxene: So that Parmenides being willing to be far from her, and Lycaste desiring him to goe this journey with her, he came to Sardis with her, with Cydipe, and Arpalice. For my part, since my Fathers Mother was in Sard <...> was glad to finde an opportunity of such good company. Thus came we all unto Sardis leaving Menecrates in Lycia: But at parting, Arpalice, and I writ unto Thrasimedes and Philistion, to acquaint them where we were, and that we should not hazard any Letters in our absence, which was like to be long; and we came to Sardis a little before the beginning of the War; yet we could not beleieve that Cyrus would be so forward in the Siege of that Town. Thus for a time were we without any trouble, but Menecrates followed after us: You may well imagine how his journey angered Arpalice; and though she treated him as sharply as possible, yet did he not alter his design of being where she was. Moreover, since the businesse of Lycaste could not be quickly dispatched, we must have patience. The greatest of our perplexity was, that every day we heard of the progresse of Cyrus, and that his Army approached, Lycaste then thought upon return, but was prevented by a sickness, which caused her to keep her bed untill Sardis was besieged. Then you must know, that Menecrates thinking the reputation he had got in the War would move Arpalice to treat him better, he did so signall himself, that Croesus and the King of Pontus obliged him to take upon him a very considerable command: So that when we through your favour came out of Sardis, he durst not ask leave to follow us; for as things were, he knew Croesus would not give it. However, not being able to abide in a besieged Town, not onely because his Mistris was out, but also because doubtlesse he apprehended that Thrasimedes was before the Town, he leaped over the ditch to follow him. The adventure was more rare, because Thrasimedes knowing we were in the Town, was taken the same day by the men of Cyrus as he attempt[ed] to get into the Town. After this, I beseech you judge, whether it doe not meerly concern your fair Cosen, that you should know all I have told you, to the end you may move Cyrus to reconcile these two Rivals, to end all their differences, and let Arpalice marry Thrasimedes. One thing hath happened which may facilitate the Marriage, which is, that Parmenides to comfort himself for the losse of Cleoxene, doth look upon Cydipe, who perhaps will admit of his affection, seeing she cannot obtain the love of Menecrates as she thought: So that I am confident Parmenides will consent that Thrasimedes marry Arpalice.

Candiope having ended her story, Doralisa did assure her, that she would write a Letter unto Andramites (though she did not use to doe such favours unto any) which should move him to negotiate so with Cyrus, as that this happiness of Thrasimedes should be so established, as nothing could molest it. Then did she craftily ask her, whether Philistion was in the Town; for methinks (said she, and smiled) that since he came out with Thrasimedes, hee should be with him. I assure you (replied Candiope, and both blusht, and laughed) I should have thought so also; but since I did onely see Thrasimedes, I could not enquire of him; and Page 166 to tell you both truly and sincerely, the friendship that is between Philistion and me stands upon such termes, that whensoever I see him, I must accuse him of infidelity, for there being no promises between us, but to esteeme each other as long as we live; I have reason to think that he may doe the same for me wheresoever he is, that I doe now for him. As Doralissa was ready to reply, she was told that Lycaste, Arpalice, Cydipe, Cleoxine, and all the other prisoners were come from the Princesse Araminta, and were returned every one to their owne Chambers by another way then which they intended, and which they yet knew not; so that Candiope went to finde out Lycaste, and left Doralissa at liberty, to write unto Andramites; though it was something against her minde, yet she used such phrases, as though her letter was long, he could not finde one word which spoke any advantage unto him: for Doralissa hinted at nothing but according to her friends intentions concerning Thrasimedes and Menecrates; but as good luck for him was, the servant who carlied the Letter did not finde him in a condition to make any long reflection upon the rigour of Doralissa; for having in hand some great important businesse concerning Cyrus, he only writ two words unto Doralissa, that he would most punctually obey her, after which, he went unto this Prince, and assoon as he was in his Tent, Cyrus asked him, whether the predictions of the Telmissians unto the first King of Lydia, were true? that if he caused a Child which the Gods had given him to be carried round about the Walls of Sardis, the Towne should be impregnable in all places where he could passe? This beliete is so generally received, replied Andramites, that I cannot chuse but wonder at the general revolt which is amongst the inhabitants of Sardis, who seem so confident in the strength of their Walls, that they never trust unto the promises of their Gods, but when the danger is farre off and not likely to happen: For I remember when news came to Sardis that you had taken Babylon, I heard many men of courage say, that their Town was happy in not being exposed to that danger; and that is was under the protection of the Gods assoon as it was built: Yet I remember I heard say at the same time, that the first King of Lydia, who received this odd command from the Gods, for so it seemed unto those who consider not, that it is the way of the Gods to bring great things to passe by small meanes, and to hide their intentions from the sons of men, had made the situation of Sardis so, that the Walls and this Child could not be carried round, but the place where he could not be carried, is so inaccessible of it selfe, that there needed no greater security then nature it selfe had given unto it; and it is on that side where yet you never made an assault, and which seemes so inaccessible, that though it selfe cannot reach it, also the Lydians keep such feeble guards there as it seems to trust to the strength of it. 'Tis true said Cyrus, I think they have reason to trust nature with the strength of that place, and need not fear the taking of Sardis in that place: yet there is a report amongst the souldiers, that there is a quarter of this Town where it may be taken, and that it is impregnable every where else: therefore it must needs be this you speak of (added he, and seemed not to neglect the advice of the souldiers) & you know how such things as these whether there be a possibilitie or not in them, yet they make deep impressions in the spirits of a multitude; & you know how despair does faint the hearts of souldiers, & what a error is struck into a great Army, when once they think the Gods are against them; therefore though I know the place you speak of be inaccessible, yet I will view it, and give out as if I approved of the advice which the souldiers give me: and accordingly the King of Assyria, Mazares, Sesostris, Tygranes, and Anaxares being come unto him, they all took horse as well as he, and were guided unto this place by Andramites, which the souldiers said was the only place to which must let them into Sardis, since the guard was weak on that side, Cyrus might view it with lesse danger; and those few Lydians who were upon the Walls did mock at those who looked upon that place of their Towne; yet they shot many arrowes, though they imagined they would doe no execution, by reason of the excessive height of the Rock where they stood: Also Cyrus had erected a little sconce on that side, to umbrage his men when they came to view that place which struck terror into all beholders; for it was a great sharp rock, so steep that it was terrible to behold, and where it was not imaginable any could go except Goats; upon the top of this Rock were walls so low that the souldiers might lean over them; and which indeed was rather a bare Parapet then a wall; the passe over the Ditch there, was not very difficult, but the Rock was so steep and high, that the Mountain Tmolus which was over against it, was not more inaccessible: Also all the Princes which looked upon it, and had <◇> it before, would never have taken so much pains as to view it the second time, but only because they would not seem to despise the advice of the souldiers; yet Cyrus knew it more prudence to attempt a hundred vain offers, then to neglect one that was necessary, and therefore Page 167 he looked upon this steep sturdy Rock more seriously then any of the rest; and as hee was in deep contemplation of it, an accident chanced which perswaded him, Sardis might be taken: It chanced that a Lydian Souldier being upon the wall, and looking over the Parapet, let his Helmet fall, which tumbled down the Rock to the bottome of the ditch; the souldier was very angry for the losse of his Helmet, especially because his companions jeered him; and therefore he tryed if he could get down and fetch it, just whilst Cyrus was in the Sconce looking upon this Rock, who seeing the Souldier descend, shewed him with wonder unto the rest of his company, and observed him very attentively, but they saw him more like a man who would rather precipitate himself, then one that would ever come down; yet they were amazed, when they saw by degrees turning and winding, he came down: 'Tis true he made many stops to chuse steps, but at last he alwayes found them; and Cyrus took notice that the Rock was full of wild grasse-tufts which kept the Souldier from slipping: So that descending sloping from tuft to tuft, he came at last to his Helmet, and took it up with joy, beginning to ascend the same way he descended, and to goe up more easily then he came down, because the precipice did not so much affright him. Cyrus admiring this wonderful accident, told the King of Assyria, that since this Souldier could ascend this Rock, a hundred thousand might doe the same: So that diligently observing the way he took, they took such good notice of it by certain yellow Flowers which grew there accidentally, that they were regular marks unto their eyes: Cyrus tooke a Table-booke out of his pocket, and drew this Rock so plainly, that the way which this Souldier went was evident to his eye: so that he did not doubt of the taking of Sardis. The King of Assyria, and Mazares were as confident as he: Sesostris also hoped by this way to find his dear Timarcta; and Andramites was perswaded by this descending and ascending of this Souldier, that the predictions of the Gods were true: As for Anaxaris, he did not oppose the intentions of Cyrus, but he thought it so difficult, that he could not hope for any happy successe in the attempt. After they had descanted upon the enterprise, they returned to finish their resolves, with the advice of other Princes in the Army of Cyrus; and to attempt this enterprise, the great difficulty was, that they knew not how to mount this Rock, neither by day, nor night that was dark: for by day they would be discovered, and easily repulsed; and by night it was hard to hit so dangerous a way: But since Cyrus had a soul of a vast capacity, and in a moment could see all things that made an enterprise either feasible or impossible: He considered that the Moon was at the full, and not rising till the Sun was set, she would shine to help them in climbing the Rock; he knew well, that if she shined so much as to let them see, she would also let them be seen, but he knew also, that in all great enterprises of Warre, something must bee put to hazard. Also Andramites did so assure him, that slight guards were kept on that side, as without delay he resolved to give three Alarm assaults the night following, on the side furthest off the place where he intended the true one, whilst Cyrus in the head of five hundred men, and all the brave men of his Army, would goe, and either the climbe the Rock or dye, not being able to suffer, that a common Souldier should doe more for his Helmet, then he would doe for Mandana. In the meane time, since he conceived it impossible to bring so many men up that way, as were sufficient to take the Towne: His designe was to carry up so many onely as might make him Master of the next Port, and there to let in the Body of his men, and in order to that, hee appointed a Body of Infantry, and another of Cavalry to bee in readinesse near that Port, unperceived by the Lydians, giving a signe when they should advance and enter: And indeed this Prince gave out all orders, as if he were assured his enterprise would take effect; and also he gave all requisite orders in case it should fail: He made choice of the souldiers who were to follow him, and appointed them all to carry Pike-staves in their hands, to lean upon them in climbing the Rock, and to fight with them when they were up, having no other Arms for this expedition but a light Buckler, a Sword, and a Pike-staffe, which was to serve for severall uses. In the mean time, since the life of Cyrus was exceedingly pretious, the Kings of Phrygia, and Hircania, who were to give these Alarms, did what they could to hinder this Prince from this attempt in his person; or at least to dissuade him from being the first in climbing this Rock: But he was so perswaded the enterprise would faile, if he did not execute it himself, and so confident it would prosper if he did, that it was impossible to make him change his opinion. Chrisantes made use of that freedom which he ever used with him, to qualifie that helroique heat which for the love and glory of Mandana did so often precipitate him into danger, hee would perswade him, that the enterprise would prosper better, if hee would let his souldiers climb first; but hee answered, that hee was perswaded his souldiers would climbe Page 168 better if they followed him, then if he followed them; and therefore he was firmly resolved not to change his opinion. Cyrus passed over all that day with abundance of impatience: And the King of Assyria with as much, and Sesostris no lesse. Mazares, though he was out of all hopes of ever being happy, yet did most earnestly desire the liberty of Mandana, as if she had loved him. But the hour of acting this enterprise being come, and all things in readinesse for the execution, Cyrus cheered up the Souldiers which followed him; and promised such large recompences, if the design prospered, that though they had been but half valiant, the very prize before their eyes was enough to set an edge upon their courages, and exasperate their valour. He gave them three things principally in command: First, to follow him, and doe as he did: Secondly, not to speak one word as they climbed: and thirdly, never to look behind them, lest the terrour of the precipice should astonish them. After this, Cyrus would gladly have moved the King of Assyria to march only in the middle of the Souldiers who were to follow him, but doe what he could, he would be the second: So that Anaxaris was put in the middle of that File which was to climb; and Tigranes to be last, to prevent any from recoiling: Sesostris, Phraartes, Persodes, Andramites, Feranlus, Ligdamis, Leontidas, and all the Heroes dispersed themselves amongst the first hundred Souldiers which followed Cyrus, to encourage them by their example. All things being then ready, Cyrus with all his men one by one went down the ditch, by a tract which was not very difficult; first carefully observing the plot which he had drawn of the Rock, that he might the better remember the tract he was to hold in climbing: And it seemed that he had both well observed, and remembered it; and though the Moon did shine but dimly, yet it was enough to discover the yellow flowers, which were directions unto them; and though he saw some difference in the colour of them by this gloomy light, yet he began to mount, climbing neither too softly, lest he should slip, nor too fast, lest his Souldiers could not follow; still striving to remember the way which the souldier took who fetched his Helmet: and he hit it so well, and led them up so happily, that he got to the midst of the Rock without any noise, or any stop; so that beginning to hap well in the enterprise, and being desirous to judge of that which he had to climb, by that which he had already past, he turned his head, and notwithstanding the obscurity of the night, did plainly see the long File which followed, every souldier his leader, and which reached to the bottome of the ditch; but as he observed them, he heard a great noise upon the top of the Rock; indeed it was the Lydians who were walking their round: Cyrus hearing this stopped, and lay close to the Rock to prevent discovery; and according to his orders of imitation, he who was next him did the same, and so every one to the end of the File did imitate his leader, and stirred not a jot till Cyrus thought fit to march: But, alas, how full of sad thoughts was this Prince when he imagined his designe discovered, and perhaps all the Defenders of Mandana ready to perish; yet his consolation was to see, that if he perished, the King of Assyria who was next him, would perish also; for of all his Rivals he could least endure him, though he esteemed him very much: But his fears of being discovered by those that went the Round, were needlesse: For they thought that place so inaccessible, that they never did use to visit it, onely went by it as a passe from one Port unto another. Cyrus when he heard no more noise, but all quiet, he began to climb again with more hast then before, and also with more hopes, thinking to get unto the top of the Rock, and to become Master of the Work behind the Parapet before their enemies came another Round; and indeed he did so: for happily getting up to the top of the Rock, he, and all that followed him, went over the Parapet, drew their swords, and made ready to fight: he was also so happy as not to be discovered by any Century: Also to facilitate his designe, and according to his orders, the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania, seconded by Gobrias and Gadates, gave false Alarms on the other side to amuse the enemy: So that the Lydians being all gone to that side, Cyrus had leisure enough to passe his men unperceived. After Cyrus had left a hundred of his men to guard the same place hee came from, that hee might make good his retreat in case that hee could not become Master of the Port, hee marched on in the head of four hundred of his men, and so surprised the first Centinels that hee killed them before that they could give the Alarm; and passing on, he came to the Court of Guard which was kept at the Gate which he desired to become Master of: He surprised them and fell on so sharply, and suddenly, that they had not time to draw their swords and dy with Arms in their hands: Yet there was a few which fought stoutly: but at last, the valour of Cyrus, seconded by the King of Assyria, Mazares, Sesostris, and the rest of the Gallant men, did overcome them, and cut them all in pieces: when Cyrus was become Master of the Gate, and the Troopes who were commanded to enter, had Page 169 the signe which was made unto them; they hastily advanced, and entred Sardis, just as Croesus (who was advertised that the Enemy was within the Town) sent forces to regain what had been lost, imagining that the Gate was traiterously delivered up by some of his men, and never suspecting that Cyrus came up by the Rock. In the mean time, the Troops of Cyrus being entered, and horses being brought for all the Grandees, they mounted them: after which, Cyrus being now in the head of the Cavalry, he did vigorously repulse all that opposed his passage; he endeavoured to get a great place which was between the Palace of Croesus and the Cittadell: Commanding the Troops as they entred, to make good the principall streets and publique places, but above all things, to keep the Gate at which they entred. In the mean time, the false Alarms continued, which amused one part of the Enemies: Never was such a confusion as amongst the Lydians. All the souldiers that were off their Guards, would have gotten whither their duty called them, but could not possibly, because the streets were already possessed by Cyrus. The Inhabitants were so frighted, that they never thought of either Barracading their streets, or coming out of their Houses. The women made lamentable shrieks: The clashing noise of Armes echoed from all sides; The different noyse of Conquerors, and conquered, filled the aire with variety of sounds: But Croesus having at last assembled some souldiers, opposed Cyrus, who after that, got not one corner of a street without fighting for it: The other Troops which had orders to possesse other quarters of Saridis, met with resistance in severall places: In this great confusion one might see in severall places, wren croud into the Temples: into other places, some that were desperate, would throw all that they had out of the windowes, to qualifie their Enemies: Indeed, the disorder was so great, the Tumult so terrible, and terror so universally struck, both into the hearts of the Lydian Souldiers, and also into the Inhabitants, that they were at their wits ends. Croesus, in so great a disorder had no way left but to endeavour his retreat into the Cittadell with the Prince Myrsiles; to the end he might make such a Capitulation as at least might secure his person; and not doubting but since he had Mandana in his power, he could atleast obtain his liberty: This unfortunate King, did extreamly wonder that the King of Pontus never came at him, all the time of this great disorder; yet upon consideration that his love of Mandana caused him to keep the Cittadell, hee thought it lesse strange. Seeing then that Sardis was lost: That his Enemies were masters of all the principall streets: That almost all the Ports of the Town, were quitted by his men, and were in the power of Cyrus: He did retire, as I told you into the Cittadell. But since the first design of Cyrus was to get between the Cittadell, and the Palace of Croesus, to the end hee might take this unfortunate King, he effected it so well, that he cut off his way: and there it was that the Combate was hotly disputed: The approach of the Sun, having dimmed the light of the Moon, all manner of objects might visibly be discerned, and one might know another: So that the Lydians fighting in the presence of their King, both for his life and liberty, did things beyond beliefe. The Prince Myrsiles, though dumbe, yet his acts did merit eternall memory, but as valiant as they were, all were not able to resist the invincible Cyrus; who fought under the walls of the Cittadell, with the heart he did at Sinope under that Tower which the flames of fire were ready to consume, and in which he thought to find his Princess, being no lesse valiant under the name of Cyrus, then he was under that of Artamenes. At least I am sure of this (said he in himselfe in the midst of the Tumult) I have this advantage, that I am sure I shall release Mandana, if I be victorious: For my rivall has no Galley, to carry her away in, as Mazares had, nor can the Sea favour his flight: But whilst Cyrus did enivgorate his valour by his sweet hopes, Croesus intending to charge through the midst of his Enemies, which opposed his passage, to the end he might get into the Cittadell, got into the front of his men; repulsing all those that assaulted him with incredible valour: Indeed he rushed so amongst them, that he was compassed about; The Prince Myrsiles seeing him so engaged, came to relieve him: but before hee was able to get to him, hee saw a Persian Souldier, whilst Croesus was defending himself, ready to kill him behind, halving his sword already lifted up to run him through. The Prince Myrsiles seeing the King his father was ready to be killed, and he not able to help it, was sensible of so sad an apprehension, and straining to cry out with all his force, his tongue unloosed, and this Prince who never spoke before, did speak to save the King his fathers life; hee no sooner saw this action of the Souldier, but striving with extraordinary violence, he cried out, Souldier spare the King: this voice which was as plain as loud, penetrating the ears of that Persian, did stop his lifted up arme, and made him change his intentions of killing this Prince, into a design onely of talking him a Prisoner: But there was no great difficulty in that; for Cyrus coming up just as this prodigie happened, did find all the Lydians who heard the Prince Myrsiles speak, so almayzed, Page 170 that there was much lesse difficulty in taking both the King, and the Prince his Son: Also Croesus seeing no hopes, thought it better to render himself, then to be taken in a vain resistance. So that this unfortunate King turning towards Cyrus, and commanding the Prince his Son to cease fighting and follow him, there was a Cessation of Armes on both sides: Then Croesus turned the point of his sword towards himself, and hilt to Cyrus, he presented it unto him, telling him, that since he was not able any longer to resist against the Conqueror of all Asia, he would submit, both himself, his Crown, and the victory unto him. Cyrus hearing the King of Lydia say so, seemed much moved, and answered him in termes worthy of his Generosity. I receive your Sword (said he unto him, and took it) but it is with a promise to restore it as soon as you have restored unto me the Princesse Mandana, and surrendered the Cittadells wherein she is: Since I have surrendered my self Sir, said he unto him, you may imagine all in my power is yours. But Sir, I must tell you, that the King of Pontus is not in mine. Then Cyrus told him he would send immediately to summon him: after which Croesus and Myrsiles were committed unto the custody of Hidaspes, who carried them to their own Palace which was close by: and the sword of Croesus was put into the hands of Feraullus, with orders to restore it whensoever he should ask it: In the mean while, since Croesus had surrendered himself, there was no more fighting in any part of the Town, but in houses which Souldiers would have Plundered: But Cyrus whose mind ran all upon the Cittadell, would not let his Souldiers think of Pillaging this goodly Town, he sent Tigranes, Phraartes and Anaxaris to hinder them, and who accordingly did so: In the mean time, he who went unto the Cittadell from Croesus, to bid the King of Pontus surrender it unto Cyrus, returned, and reported, that the Lieutenant Pactias, who was Governour told him, that provided he could see an order signed with the hand of Croesus, he would without resistance obey him. So that Cyrus procuring this order, he sent it, and commanded that the Souldiers should come out; and appointed also such Troops as should enter at the same time: Also he drew up a great body of Infantry, in the midst of the Plain which was between the Fort and the Palace of Croesus. As for Cyrus himself, he was in the head of a squadron of Horse, to view the Souldiers come out of the Cittadell, and to see such as he appointed to enter; watching with great impatency, untill things were in such posture, as that he could enter himselfe, and have the glory of setting the Princesse Mandana at liberty; also to let her know by this act, that her jealousy was ill grounded. The King of Assyria, though he had many raptures of joy at his hopes to see Mandana, yet had he perplexities. I believe he did as much fear to see the meeting of Mandana and Cyrus, as he desired to see her at liberty: As for Mazares, though he had put on stronge resolutions to hope for nothing, yet had he much adoe to make his passion submit unto his reason: And at this time, he could not chuse but envie the happiness, which Cyrus was going to take possession of: So that there was none but the unconquerable Cyrus, whose joyes were pure, without any mixture of heart burnings: yet was he something astonished, that the King of Pontus did not all this while appear, nor look out of the Cittadell, to make some termes for himself before he did surrender it: but he imagined him, bidding his last adieu unto Mandana; and that he would not believe Croesus to be taken, therefore neither ought nor would surrender the Fort: But when he saw all the Lydian Souldiers come out, he was full of unexpressible joy, and supposing the King of Pontus was with Mandana, he sent Hidaspes to release the Prince Artamas: The King of Assyria, Mazares, and Sesostris, followed him, the last of these being as impatient to see whether his dear Timareta was in the Cittadell, as all the other Princes were to see Mandana at liberty. Chrisantes willing Cyrus not to enter the Fort, untill he saw the King of Pontus come out, but his caution could not keep Cyrus one minut from the sight of his Princesse: So that being spurred on by an impatience, proportionable to the heat of his love: and thinking that he had as many men with him as he had in the Cittadell, he entred hastily into the Cittadell, enquiring the way unto Mandana's Chamber: and having heard that the Princesse Mandana, and the Princesse Palms were together in the Prison, he asked if she were with her: a Souldier carried him unto a passage Chamber, which was common between both these Princess, and as he was shewing him, which was Mandana's Chamber, and with the Princesses of Lydia, the Princesse of Palmis came out of hers: but in lieu of her accustomed looks of joy, her eyes were all swell'd with tears: But notwithstanding all her sorrowes, she spoke unto Cyrus with as admirable a grace, as Cyrus did with generosity as soon as he entred into the Fort. Sir said she unto him, the Princesse Mandana hath ever made me hope to find in you all the favour that can be expected from a generous Conqueror, therefore I shall not despair to obtain so much favour from your goodnesse as to be put in the same Prison with the King my father, that I may help him to support his chaines. Cyrus, charmed with the virtue of this Lydian Princesse, assured her Page 171 that she was a Prisoner unto none but her selfe, and that he was extreamly sorry that he forced to make war upon the King her Father: But Madam, said he unto her, I hope you will pardon me, if I conjure you to help me to break off the chaines which fetter the Princesse Mandana: As Palmis was going to answer, Sesostris saw the Princesse Timareta enter, who having now no Guards upon her Chamber, came to desire the protection of Cyrus: The surpris of this Princesse was so great, when she saw Sesostris; that she could not chuse but cry out, so that this Prince going towards her, he presented his hand unto her with unconceivable joy, and then presented her unto Cyrus, just as the Princesse Palmis was about to answer his question concerning Mandana. So that he was forced whether he would or no to receive the complement of the Princesse of Aegypt, whose superlative beauty did attract the eyes of all beholders: he answered her most civilly, and she spoke with as much grace and elegance as wit; but all his answers were very short, by reason of his impatency to see Mandana, who he imagined would not appear by reason of her unjust jealousy. But he had no sooner answered Timareta, and told her she was more a debtor to the valour of Sesostris for her liberty then unto him, then the Prince Artamas entred with Sosicles and Tegeus, whom Hydaspes had released. Artamas not knowing whether he should first pay his thanks unto Cyrus, as his deliverer, or salute his Princesse: or whether he should more rejoyce at his liberty, or grieve for the imprisonment of Croesus, and being distracted between a Deliverer and a Mistrisse, Cyrus observed him; and being desirous to be rid of all that hindered him from seeing Mandana, he went unto Artamas, and presented him unto the Princesse Palmis, telling her that he was as worthy of her, as she of him. But whilst Cyrus was thus engaged to entertaine these two Princesses, before he went unto Mandana's Chamber, the King of Assyria had been there before him; and a servant opening the dore unto him, he asked where Mandana and the King of Pontus were? he no sooner heard the answer, but he cried out, and so loud that Cyrus heard him; and fearing lest some sad accident had happened unto Mandana, he went towards him, without doing any civilities unto the Princesse: what new fatality is now befall us, (said he unto him?) The greatest that ever could (replyed he, with such a fury in his eyes that struck to the heart of Cyrus) For Mandana is not here, the King of Pontus carried her away more then three hours before day: How, (replyed Cyrus in a sad despair) is not Mandana here? oh Madam, (added he, and turned to the Princesse of Lydia) why did you not tell me this sad newes at the first? Alas Sir (said she unto him, in a great amazement) I could not tell you what I knew not: for the Guards would not suffer me to go unto Mandana's Chamber to comfort my selfe, all the while the horrible noise lasted which I heard in the Town: So that thinking the same severity was used unto her as me, I never suspected her flight: Also the danger wherein my own eyes saw the King my Father, and the Prince my brother, did so distract my imagination, that I thought upon nothing else, and therefore I knew nothing of Mandana's flight: After this, Cyrus, the King of Assyria, and Mazares, went into Mandana's Chamber, where they found her not, and where there was none but the servant, who spoke unto the King of Assyria; and him Cyrus did examine concerning Mandana's carrying away: but he could not gather any great satisfaction; for the servant told him, that he did not see either Mandana or the woman depart: and that he saw none but Pactias who commanded him to stay in the Chamber, and not to open it, what noise or commands soever he heard, untill two hours at least after day. The Princesse Palmis, and the Princesse Timareta, coming into Mandana's Chamber, as well as Sesostris and Artamas, they were exceedingly grieved at the accident, especially the Princesse Palmis. For she having been longer with Mandana then Timareta, and had contracted an everlasting league of friendship with her; she had also more need of the protection of Cyrus, then had the Princesse of Aegypt. 'Tis true, her sorrowes were not comparable unto sorrowes of the three Princes whom love caused to resent the flight of Mandana most sadly: Nor did they know whether they should terme it a flight or a carrying away: However, to lose no time, they searched all the corners of the Cittadell for the King of Pontus and Mandana, lest they should be hid in some place; also Cyrus caused all the King of Pontus his men to be secured; and proclaimed throughout the Town, great rewards unto any that could tell where Mandana was, or onely which way she went. In the mean time, Cyrus carried the Princesse Palmis unto the King her fathers Palace, and the Princesse Timareta also; conjuring the Princesse Palmis to get out of Croesus what he knew concerning Mandana's departure, and the place of her retreat, assuring him of his liberty, if he could truly inform him, where she was: but all was to no purpose: for neither by the King of Pontus his Domestiques, nor by the Proclamation about the Towne, nor by Croesus, could Cyrus meet with any intelligence, nor was man in more despair then Page 172Cyrus: Nor was man in such a boisterous fury as the King of Assyria; nor was ever any more amused then Mazares: One said that certainly the King of Pontus was lurking somewhere in the Town, and that it was impossible they should get out: another said, they went out during the great confusion that was made, either by the River, or by the side of the Town, where the Line of Communication was not finished: and a third said, that Croesus must needs know, or at least conjecture where they were. They propounded expedient upon expel'dient, to find out the truth, but all in vain: and Cyrus had so many orders to give out, either for the security of the new taken Town, or for the Guard of Croesus, or for the search of Mandana, that he had no sooner given one command, but it was necessary to give another. He had no time to contemplate his misfortune; but yet he apprehended it in grosse to be so great, and his soul was so full of confusion, that he thought himself the most miserable man alive. But after he had sent to advertise the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania how affairs stood, and appointing them to send out severall parties of Horse to enquire of the King of Pontus and Mandana; and after he had given command at all the gates, that none should goe out before it was known who they were, and to guard the walls; as if the Town were yet besieged, lest the King of Pontus should get out by the help of Ladders; and after he had taken all the courses which either Love or Prudence could invent: Andramites came to tell him, how he understood from a servant of Pactias, Governour of the Cittadell, that his Master sent a Servant the last night for six of his best horses to bee brought unto the side of Pactolus, towards the great Rock by which the Towne was taken, and therefore it was probable that the King of Pontus, and Mandana were gone out of Sardis: Cyrus no sooner heard this, but he desired to speak himself with the man whom Andramites spoke with; and since the King of Assyria was not then with him, nor any but Mazares and the Prince Artamas, he went with them unto the place where this servant of Pactias sayd the Horses were carried, to the end he might judge which way they took: But Feraulus thinking it not fit that Cyrus should goe in a new taken Town with so slender a retinue, did hint it unto him: So that Cyrus commanding two horses to follow him, went unto the side of Pactolus: He was no sooner there, but Andramites who was that Country man, coming to the River, and seeing the Golden sand which is so famous throughout the world, he knew by it that the water was very low in that place, and that it was not impossible but it might be foorded, there being at some times of the year not waite enough to carry the little Boats which use to passe. Moreover, Cyrus observed, that the tracts of the Horses feet did not goe along the River Pactolus, but went into it: Also, there were some Fishermen, who came unto the side of the River to look at Cyrus, who said, that the last night they saw from their houses, which were close by, some horses passe over the River: one of them adding, that he also saw a little Boat, but the Alarm to the Town being so hot in all quarters, they would not stir out of their houses to see who they were; imagining that they were some, who fearing a Famine, had rather venture themselves among their enemies, then hazard to dye for hunger. Then Cyrus asked whether they saw any women? One of them knowing what they sought for, answered, yes, in hopes of recompence proclaimed; and others more sincere, answered, no: But indeed, though Cyrus saw, they knew not what they saw, yet he imagined, that infallibly the King of Pontus was out of Sardis, so that without more delay, he resolved to follow in person; yet not being cleared of all his doubts, he sent Andramites to tell the King of Assyria, that he left him in the Town to make all diligent search there, whilst he went without the Town in quest of intelligence. He would needs have the Prince Artamas to returne and comfort the Princesse Palmis for the misfortune of the King her Father: But Artamas being a debtor unto him for the liberty of his Princesse, would not forsake him when he was in quest of his own: As for Mazares, there was no doubt which way he would take: Thus these three Princes did happily foord the River with their men. In the mean time, Cyrus could not chuse but wonder at the weaknesse of Sardis on that side. 'Tis true, that as the River Pactolus did rise and fall in a short time, it was not above four hours in that condition: When Cyrus was on the other side of the River, he saw the prints of horse feet come out of it; but he saw within a short way they were so mingled with many other, that he knew not the right ones he would follow: When hee was about a Furlong off, he came to a place where three wayes parted, so that staying to conferre with Mazares and Artamas what course was best to take, they resolved to divide themselves, and did so, into three companies; Cyrus letting Feraulus goe with the Prince Artamas, because he knew not Mandana; all promising to return unto Sardis within three dayes at the ◊, or else to send news of their adventures: But when Cyrus was to chuse which Page 173 of these three wayes he should take, he was much put to it; for he had no sooner resolved upon one, but he repented; and to say truly, he would have been in all three, and at Sardis also; yet at last he made choice of that way which was towards the Sea-side, supposing that the King of Pontus would draw that way: But alas, what a miscellany of sad thoughts possessed the spirit of this Prince during this voyage. He talked with all he met, he sent unto all the houses he saw either on the right or left hand, but could not hear any tidings of them. As oft as he came unto any crosse way, he would again divide those men he had; thinking if he did not so, he should leave the way which Mandana took: And indeed he did so divide, and subdivide his men so often, that he had left but ten with himself, and at last but five, and having none of quality with him Ligdamis, who was fitter for him then any other, because he knew the Country very well. As he was in a Wood which was full of waies, he heard on both sides of him the noise of men on horsback, which were in the thick of the Wood, thinking also that he heard the voices of women: So that he knew not what to resolve upon; yet rather then misse Mandana, or at least not know whither they carried her, he divided his men again, and kept onely with him Ligdamis and another, and sent the other two on the two sides; then they struck severally into the thick of the Wood, in hopes to get where they heard noise of horses, men and women, Cyrus thinking that he heard the voice of Arianita; but the Wood being full of Leaves, Cyrus could not get to them, but those who followed him, finding a clearer passage, they got before him: Also he perceived, that the noise he heard was lesse and lesse: and in lieu of going forward he went back towards the high way; hoping when he was in the way, more easily to gain what he had lost: yet it fell not out as he imagined: for in his crossing the Wood to the high way, he could not hear any thing either of his own company or any else, yet he hoped to overtake them, and indeed hee galloped so fast, that he overtook Ligdamis, and the other man; and finding two wayes, he sent the man one way, and he with Ligdamis took the other; he had not gone above thirty paces, but he met with two country women with baskets of fruits upon their heads, whom he asked whether they met with any before them? but they answered, that about half an hour since, they thought they heard some horses passe by them, yet they could not see any thing: Such an odde answer, made Cyrus ask no more questions of these women, onely the way to the place where they heard those horses which they could not see; but the two women could not agree upon the place: So that Cyrus seeing he lost his time in talking with them, he went on his way: but all to no purpose, for he could not finde what he sought after, so that he began extreemly to despair; and the more, because his horse was almost tyred, and night came on: So that hee was forced to take counsell of Ligdamis, and to refresh their horses at the first Town they came at; but in going to it, the Wood by degrees grew thinner, and they came to a place where ran a violent Torrent, which fell impetuously from a Mountaine not far off, and separated the Wood from a pleasant Meddow, and ran so deep, that there was no possibility of passage, and the banks were so steep, that it could not be swomme with a horse: Cyrus coming to the sides of this Torrent, along which he must of necessity goe, he espied a woman sitting in the midst of this Meddow, whose head lay upon the knees of another woman: Upon the first rapture of this sight, needs would he crosse the Torrent, but his horse would not take it; so gave him time to consider what was best to be done, though he was ready to attempt any impossibility: Then did hee goe more into the Wood, that he might see the better, and was even wonder struck when he saw the one was Mandana, and the other Martesia; he no sooner saw them, but he called Ligdamis, who was behinde him, to shew them unto him; but as soon as he had said so, they vanished, and he saw them no more, and consequently could not shew them. This prodigious adventure did so astonish him, that he durst not beleieve himself: he went then as near as he could to the Torrent, to look at the place where he thought he saw Mandana, but he could see nothing; he could not imagine that whilst he turned his head to call Ligdamis she could get to a crosse way which was towards the foot of the Mountain; so that not knowing whether it was an apparition, or a phantasie, he stood still, and spoke not one word: his reason gave his eyes the lye, and perswaded him it could not possibly be Mandana which he saw; yet this Idea made such a deep impression upon his spirit, that after he had told Ligdamis what he saw, he asked him where one might get over the Torrent? But Ligdamis answered him, that they must turn back, and that they left a way in the Wood which would have carried them into that Meddow. After this, he told him, that he was absolutely resolved to goe unto the place where he had seen this fair Vision. Ligdamis dissuaded him, and said it was but labour lost: but needs would he goe unto the place notwithstanding. Then did Ligdamis carry him to a way where the Page 174 Torrent was more shallow, which they easily foorded, and made all hast to the Meddow, lest night should be upon them before they got thither; yet had they day enough to get thither: And when Cyrus was come to the place where he saw Mandana, he found the grasse all ruffled, and layed in that place, and shewed that some did sit upon it, and their footstepes were plainly discerned in the Meddow: for in all other places the Flowers and Grasse were fresh and untrodden, but in this place where they had been, and which way they went. Cyrus was so amazed at what he had seen, and did see, that he was almost out of his wits: As for Ligdamis, he was perswaded, that chance onely had so foiled the Grasse, where Cyrus said he saw this apparition, and beleieved what Cyrus saw, was onely the strength of imagination and love together. Then seeing that night came on, that it was a long way to the nearest Town, and that their horses were spent: he forced Cyrus to be going, and leave the place where he saw Mandana, or a phantasm resembling her, for he knew not what to think it was: But in their going they light upon that path which was newly made in the Meddow; but in the going out of this Meadow it was so dark, that neither Path, nor Men, nor Horses could be discerned, and he was forced to submit unto this conduct of Ligdamis; and going in the dark, he called to memory a dream which he had, in which he saw Mandana in a Meddow, and that she immediately vanished: To think how his dreame proved true, did much augment his wonder: Afterwards calling into his memory the long Catalogue of his misfortunes since he came from Persepolis at sixteen years of age, and considering that he yet was but four and twenty, he thought that if the Gods would have him live longer, and torment him with more misfortunes, they must invent some new ones, since there was none in the world which he had not gone through: 'Tis true, in matters of glory and war, he had been happy: but since all his Victories did not avails his Princess, he valued them rather as miseries then good fortunes: But whilst Cyrus was rapt in these sad thoughts, he still insensibly went on, onely following Ligdamis, who went before: At last, being come to a house at the foot of a hill, which stood some hundred paces from a Village, Cyrus lighted from his horse, and never enquiring whether the lodging was good or bad, he went into a little chamber which was shewled him: Ligdamis took care for every thing, that Cyrus might take the better rest: And Ligdamis would not let the woman goe unto the Town to provide any necessaries; for hee conceived, that if it should come to be know that Cyrus was the Conquerour of Croesus, and him that kept him prisoner, some well-wisher of that unfortunate King might seise upon Cyrus; therefore he chose rather to have bad entertainment, then run that hazard: However, the poor woman whose husband was not at home, made a thousand excuses, telling them that if her husband were at home, that entertainment might have been better: Cyrus asked her, whether she saw any women of quality passe by on horsback that day with such a man in their company as he described the King of Pontus to be? but she answered, No. Then Cyrus and Ligdamis after a homely repast went to their rest; yet Cyrus waked before day, and made ready to depart: When he was taking horse, the Master of the house being returned home to entertain him better then his Wife had done; though, Sir, I must tell you, that I can hardly repent of my absence, for I assure you it hath been very serviceable unto a distressed L^{dy}. A Lady? (replied Cyrus hastily) Yes, Sir, said he, and I left her at a Town about twenty furlongs from hence, where heretofore I dwell. Cyrus hearing this man say so, was very urgent with him, to relate where he found this Lady; what stature she was of, and how she was distressed? As for her distresse, replied he, I cannot give you an exact relation; but I can assure you she is very fair, that she hath cryed very much, and that a man who was with her, was very diligent to comfort her. Where did you find her, replied Cyrus, and when? I found her the last night, replied the man, a little before Sun-set, as I was returning from a place where I had some business; and I heard the man say, that her horse did throw her into the River, where she was in danger to be drowned; and that she was in danger to be drowned, and that she had so hurt her leg that she was not able to stand, or endure the jogging of a horse; so that I coming to the place where she was in this condition, I offered my selfe to help her; and the man who was in her company taking me at my word, desired me to carry him to a place where this Lady might have help; and I conducted them to this Town where I told you I had been: The man carrying her in his arms, and I leading her horse which threw her into the Torrent. Cyrus no sooner heard this, but hee desired him in all hast to carry him unto the place where this Lady was; but the man seeing him so very earnest, knew not whether he should shew him the way or no: yet Cyrus at last did promise him such rewards, that he made himself ready to be his convoy, and carryed him unto the very chamber where she was, without acquainting any in the house, for the people of that house where Page 175 she lodged being of his acquaintance, never examined him: Yet Cyrus asked them whether she was very much hurt, but they answered him, that she was much better then she was thought to have been; for the Chirurgion said her leg was not broken but onely strained: and assured them it would mend quickly, so she might rest some dayes. After this Cyrus went into this Ladies chamber, and knew her to be Arianita: He no sooner saw her, but going to her, and seeing none could understand him but Ligdamis: Ah my dear Arianita (said he unto her) what have you done with my Princess? Sir (answered she, much amazed to see him) I have left her much against my will, by reason of an ill accident which happened unto me, and I am not so happy as Martesia who is gone with her. But where is she? replied Cyrus: Into what part of the World hath the King of Pontus carryed her? Is it farre off? And can you not informe me which way I should follow. Alasse, Sir, replied she, you aske mee such questions as I cannot answer; for I know not whither the King of Pontus will goe; all I know is, that I left them yesterday a little before Sun-set, and that they resolved for to travell all night, and that it will be very hard for you to follow them, not onely because they are farre before you, but because they goe invisible: you tell me such wonders, replied Cyrus, that they transcend my understanding: yet I tell you nothing but what is true, replied she: therefore Sir, since you cannot follow the King of Pontus, untill you first know in what manner he goes, you must allow so much patience as to let me tell you. I would gladly ask you, replied he, how the King of Pontus got out of Sardis? whether he carried away my Princess, or whether she followed him? whether I saw her yesterday with Martesia in the midst of a meadow? and whether she hate me? I have also a great desire to ask you how you do after your fall, and carry you unto some place of better accommodation; but I must confesse I have a most earnest desire to follow Mandana, and deliver her from her unjust Rival: yet Sir, replied Arianita, you cannot follow them with successe, unlesse you know as much as I doe: Then I conjure you to tell me quickly, said this amorous Prince. Ligdamis would then have withdrawn to the other end of the Chamber, but Cyrus would have him be partaker of what Arianita would relate. So that after the dore was shut, and Cyrus sitting upon the side of her bed, he desired her to relate all she knew concerning Mandana. Sir replied she, I could tell you many passages concerning that Princess whom I have the honour to serve, and which I believe you would gladly know: but considering the present state of things, I will onely relate which is requisite to be known at this present; and tell you which way I come to be acquainted with the secret of the King of Pontus: That there was a man of quality with him, who certainly is most innocent of his masters injustice, and who pitying the miseries of the Princess Mandana, hath often lamented them unto me: And I assure you, that by his means we have received many civilities and comforts in our Prisons: And Sir I must tell you, that I think there is such termes of friendship between us, as I have some power over his spirit. And it is by him I know which way your Rival robs you of the fruit of your victorie in taking Mandana from you. Know then Sir, that when the King of Pontus perceived that you resolved to take Sardis by famine, when you could not by force, he thought himself lost, though he would not confesse it unto any but to Pactias, and him who told it unto me whose name is Timonides. Seeing then that your lines were begun, he knew that if once they were but finished, it would be impossible for him to get out of Sardis, and have recourse unto flight, therefore he fell into a most extream despair; Timonides told me, that then he did strive with himself to overcome his passion, but could not possibly, and the greatest reason was, because he had some hopes, that the jealousy which he had infused into the heart of the Princess, would make much to his advantage: In the mean time, he could not conceive it possible to get himself and Mandana out of Sardis; yet he was continually contriving waies how to compass it; and discoursed often with Pactias about it; who came unto the King of Pontus one morning, and told him, that he had found out a way to get Mandana out of Sardis: At first, this Prince was so transported with joy, that he embraced him, but afterwards conceiving it to be impossible, he would not so much as ask him what his way was: But Sir (said Pactias to him) I know you are not ignorant of the wonderful virtue which is in that stone called the Heliotrope; and you know, that the famous Ring of Gyges (which by making him invisible, got him a Crown) hath alwaies been carefully kept in the Royall family of Lydia; and that the Prince Mexaris, brother of Croesus, had it from the King his father. And I think I have heard you speak of an effect of this Ring when Mexaris one day made an entertainment for Panthea, when he was in love with her, and when Abradates was his Rival. Therefore I shall not need to relate, that there is a certain kind of lustre in this stone, dasles or casts a kind of a mist about the person who carries it, and makes them invisible: then Sir, you must know, that when Mexaris died he went out of Sardis, and out of favour with the Page 176 King his brother, because he would have carried away the Princess of Classomena: so that when the news of his death was known amongst the Kings Domestiques, they filched away the greatest part of his Treasure, before any orders could be given concerning them: and amongst the rest, they took this famous Ring of Gyges. A strict inquiry was made for the thiefe: for Croesus valued this Ring more then all the rest, but nothing could be heard of it. In the mean time one of the Officers of Croesus had a command in this Cittadel under me, and this morning dyed; but a little before his death he desired to speak with me, and told me, that he was a complice in the theft which was committed after the death of Mexaris: Adding, that having nothing but this Ring of Gyges in his possession, he gave it into my hands. I cannot tell whether he meant to give it the King or me, for he dyed presently. However it was, Sir, I have the Ring, whose effects are so wonderful, that I believe it may be serviceable to you: The King of Pontus was at first exceedingly joyed at what Pactias told him. But upon second thoughts he thought it would not serve his turn, for the virtue of this stone extended onely to him who carryed it, and therefore he was as much grieved as before. Then he fell into a deep and serious contemplation of it; and Love being a passion which fills the mind full of Fancy, and gives new and quicker fire to the imagination, he found out an expedient use of it: He considered, that as a Loadstone divided into severall parts doth still retain his whole virtue in every part, and will attract Iron; and that Amber, and Jet doe keep the qualities which Nature gave them, though they be divided; therefore the Stone in this Ring if divided might as well retain his efficacy in every part, and consequently he might make Mandana invisible as well as himselfe: He had no sooner apprehended this, but hee imparted it unto Pactias, who approved of his Fancy very well, not doubting but that the Heliotrope would admit division as well as the Loadstone: Hee added further to fortifie his opinion, that all inanimate things in nature, either Stones or Mettles would keep their qualities, though divided; and therefore the Heliotrope: But if it be divided onely into two, replied the King of Pontus, Martesia, and Arianita, and you must be left behind; and if you doe stay behinde when I am gone, I know Croesus will doe what he can to ruin you; and I know further, that it will be much more difficult to get Mandana away by her self then with Martesia and Arianita: Yet I cannot conceive, said Pactias, that this stone ought to be divided into so many parts: And as for me, never take any thought; for I will disguise my self, and get out the next alley which is made, untill which I will hide my self in Sardis: And as for the Princesses women, we will lock them up untill you be far enough off from being followed. Though this design was not very well examined, and though the King of Pontus saw it full of difficulties, yet the execution was resolved upon, hoping in time to surmount all the obstacles. Pactias then brought a Workman to divide this Heliotrope, and set it when it was divided; he brought him into a chamber of the Cittadel, where he was shut up untill he had done his work: But, Sir, as this Artist was dividing this stone, whose nature he was ignorant of, and which indeed was too big for a Ring, in lieu of dividing it into two, it shivered and fell into six peeces of different bignes: The King of Pontus, who would needs be present, seeing this accident, and fearing that this stone had lost its virtue, and was altogether uselesse, he was extremely angry and sad, and was very angry with the man; but making tryall of the peeces, he found that every one retained their whole virtue, so that in lieu of chiding, he thanked the man; for now he saw it would be much easier for him to get away Mandana, then if it were divided but only into two; and now he conceived his design, which before he thought impossible, to be onely difficult. In the mean time, before he set the stones, he considered how he should doe to get Mandana to carry one, and Martesia and I another; for he imagined, that for all her jealousy, he could never winne her to contribute any thing unto her carrying away: and considering, that to make this stone doe his effect, it must be turned towards the person who was to carry it, hee could invent no better way, then to fixe one unto the Pomell of the Saddle which Mandana was to ride upon, for that way the stone might be turned towards her, and almost as near her body as if it were in a Ring: So that conceiving no better way could possibly be found out, he commanded him who was to set the stones, to set three of them in silver onely, and in such a manner as one might put them in, and take them out when they would; and for the three others, he would have them set in Rings. Then the man considering upon the preposition which was made, he devised a way according unto the King of Pontus his desire; for he would place this Heliotrope in the Pomell of the Saddle, as if it had been onely the head of a Nayle, and did drive in many other Nayls, to the end that this like them might seem onely an ornament, and was placed so cunningly, that it was always turned towards the person who sat in the Saddle. This invention did so take the King of Pontus, that I did Page 177 presse on the execution of it very earnestly; and indeed it was done with as much ingenuity as it was invented: But whilst he was working, the King of Pontus was upon two designes at once: The one was, to augment those sparks of Jealousie which were kindled in the Princess; and the other was to be as cautious in his going out of Sardis as if he had not this miraculous stone. In order unto these two things, after those Ladies, who at the Princess Alramintas request you permitted to goe out of Sardis, were gone out—Ah Arianita (said Cyrus, and interrupted her) It was not at the Princess Aramintas request, that I permitted those Ladies to goe out, but at the instance of one who was Cosen unto them, named Doralisa, who was with the late Queen of Susiana. However, Sir (replied Arianita) Mandana does think it was at her request, and accuseth you of too little affection unto her, and of too much unto Araminta: But, I beseech you, Sir, be so patient as to hear me, and know, that after these Ladies were gone out, the King of Pontus caused one of the Guard to tell us the next morning, as news which he had from one who was taken prisoner, that you treated them with extraordinary civilities; that you sent them to the Princess Araminta, causing all imaginable honours to be done them in her consideration. Adding, that at present, this Princess had the ruling of the whole Army; that all addresses were unto her for any Office; that such Prisoners were released as she thought good, and indeed that you were so far in love with her, as every one was astonished at it, and saying that many condemned you for it. You may well imagine, Sir, that Martesia and I would never have told all this unto the Princess, though we had beleevved it; but he who told us, took such a time, as when the Princess was in her Closet, and spoke so loud, that she heard, and was extremely moved at it, and was extremely incensed against you, insomuch that she commended the King of Pontus his discretion, that he would not tell her himself. Alasse Arianita (cried out Cyrus) what dismal news is this you tell me? Believee me, Sir, said she, I doe not tell you that the Princess loves the King of Pontus; but to be sincere with you, I must needs say, she complains against you. She is so unjust in her complaints (replied this sad Prince) that the Gods to punish her, hath hindered me from releasing her: But, I beseech you, Arianita, goe on, and tell me all you know. I shall tell you then, Sir, that Mandana had such an incensed soul against you, that she could not sleep one wink all the night following, but accused you ten thousand times of ingratitude and inconstancy, and said she would never love any as long as she lived; resolving with her self to leave loving you, or at least to love you lesse: she was full of sad expressions unto Martesia and me, as were enough to move the hardest heart in the world, which if rightly considered, may give you more satisfaction then sorrow, because they are symptomes of her affection to you. Though the satisfaction you mention be but bitter; yet I conjure you to tell me all that Mandana said: for the respects I owe unto my Princesse are so high, that her very injuries shall not make me murmur against her. Alass, Sir, replied Arianita, if I should tell you all the Princesse said, I should not end this day: For I assure you, she spoke more that day in a quarter of an hour then at other times she was accustomed to doe in two hours. No, no (said she to Martesia, who entreated her to suspend her judgement of you till Sardis was taken) doe not thinke that the Victory of Cyrus will produce my liberty: This true, I wish him victorious (said she) and doe not yet hate him so much as to desire he should be overcome, but yet I would not have him release me; and I look upon that libertie which he should give me, as upon a thing that would grieve me more then any thing upon earth. Oh Heavens, said she, is it not possible that one of my quality, considering the state of things, should suborne her Guards? For as the case of Croesus stands upon bad termes, the King of Pontus his case is much worse: Why should not the hopes of a rich reward from the King of Medes move some of my guard to set me at liberty? I shall think you want either wit or affection to me if you doe not so much for me, or at least if you doe not attempt it. It is so ordinary to see men change with fortune, that I make no question but you may doe that for me, which will make me more joyfull then I am able to expresse. Imagine what a joy it would be unto me to get out of the King of Pontus his power, and not be beholding unto Cyrus for my liberty; but that I may upbraid him with his Inconstancy, and have no new obligations upon me to him. Consider, I conjure you, what considerable service this would be unto me, and how I should be obliged unto a recompence. But, Madam, said Martesia to her, though it were possible that Arianita and I should suborn your Guards, yet how can you ever think to escape? Do you not consider, though they let you goe safe out of Sardis, yet you cannot escape the besiegers? Oh Martesia, said she, never make that objection; for if I were once out of Sardis, assure your self I should well enough escape both the King of Pontus and Cyrus, especially if they let mee out on that side where Medes keep guard: Page 178 for I must needs think that they who are subjects unto the King my Father will so far obey me, as to carry me unto Ecbatan before they will carry me unto Cyrus: However, though they should not, but should carry me to that perfidious man, yet I should thereby take away the honour from him of delivering me: In short Sir, the Princesse used such arguments unto us, that she perswaded us it was not difficult to suborne her guards: Then I offered to speak unto Timonides over whom I knew I had some power, but she did expressly forbid me, telling me, that it must be unto the officers of Pactias, or Pactias himself, that I must break the matter, and not unto any man that had relation unto the King of Pontus: She gave us Commission to promise any thing in her behalf, assuring us that she would punctually perform whatsoever we promised: Then we talked that very night with one of the officers under Pactias, and falling into a discourse of the Princesse and her misfortunes, we told him that both he and all his company were also unfortunate, so that after all their fidelity and care in guarding Mandana, they could never hope for any recompence; since they were all ready to become the slaves of Cyrus. Afterwards, adding many other reasons, and joyning his own interest unto the pitty which he ought to have of so great a Princesse, we moved him to serve the Princesse, and that way to shelter himself from that storm which Croesus would bring upon him: This officer hearing us say so, did not absolutely reject our proposition, though he did not accept it, and we imagined that the difficulty which hee made was to draw on a greater recompence for the service which he should do in delivering the Princesse: yet that was not his thought: nor would he put us out of hopes to gaine him, lest if he had absolutely denied us, we should make the proposition unto some other, who perhaps would lend a more willing eare unto it then he did: But be pleased to know Sir, that he was no sooner gone from us, but he acquainted Pactias with the proposition which we had made, who conceiving that this would exceedingly forward the King of Pontus his design of carrying away Mandana, he imparted it unto him, and made him beyond all expressions joyfull, not doubting now but to get the Princesse out of Sardis very easily: and he did the lesse fear it, because the river Pactolus was so low, that he knew it was foordable at a place near the Cittadel: So that seeing the main obstacle which he found in his design (which was that, if he carried us by force we would cry out) was overcome, he thought how to execute the matter immediately; yet resolving to stay untill such a night as there was a alarm given on that side of the Town, opposite unto the Cittadell: In the mean time, Pactias appointed him whom wee had spoke unto, to hold us in hand, as if he intended to make his fortune by releasing Mandana, and that he should have carried the matter so cunningly, that we should not have the least suspicion, he would deceive us: And indeed, he acted his part so well, that Martesia and I did verily believe we had won him to us: for he seemed as if it went something against the hair of his mind, to betray his master, and yet seemed as if he were infinitely compassionate of the misery in which the Princesse was: And Martesia and I were so deluded in him, that wee also deluded Mandana; but the truth is, she was as much deluded by the words of him with whom we treated, as by ours: for since he told us, to delude us the more, that he would not undertake the businesse, unlesse he spake unto the Princesse; we did so bring it to passe, that he did speak with her, and concluded what we had begun: Thus taking the whole matter upon him, we had nothing to do but to be ready for a departure, when he should advertise us: And to make the matter seem more likely, he told us of the shallownesse of the River, adding, that unlesse it were so, he could not possibly deliver us. But the Princesse thinking that she must needs be at some expences in the execution of his design, she gave him a very rich Ring: which he took lest she should suspect him if he refused; so that now we were full of hopes. The Princesse was very sorry to leave the Princesse Palmis, but she knew that though she should shew her the way how she might get out of Prison, yet out of her respects unto the King her father, she would refuse it, therefore she did not impart her design unto her: but waited with much impatience for the execution of it: and we waited not long: for the Heliotropes being set, and Pactolus at an ebbe, Pactias having procured a boat to waft over the Princesse, Martesia and me, lest there should be any danger in riding the River; the King of Pontus bidding Timonides to be in a readinesse, and Pactias having given all requisite order for our going out of Sardis It chanced that about two hours after we were gone to bed, we heard a great noise in the Town: so that the Princesse fearing some sedition, she did rise, and dressed her selfe: And she was no sooner ready, but the men from whom we expected our liberty, came to tell us, that now we might easily make an escape whilst there was a disorder in the Town, occasioned by a false Alarm which he said Croesus gave, purpose to keep the Inhabitants awake: the reason why he told the Princesse it was a false Alarm, was, because the King of Pontus Page 179 feared, that if Mandana knew, Sardis was taken, she would then change her resolution, and not go out: for he knew not how high her jealousy was, though he had a great guesse at it: You may well imagine Sir, that the Princesse received this newes of her pretended liberty with much joy: So that telling the man she was ready, he left us, and returned about a quarter of an hour after to conduct us down a back pair of stairs where none could see us, himself and two of his companions, untill we came unto the Court of Guard, where we found very few Souldiers: for you must know Sir, that the King of Pontus would not have the Princesse see him untill she was out of Sardis, and past the Camp of Cyrus: therefore taking one Ring himselfe, and giving one to Pactias, and one unto Timonides, they followed us unperceived. I will not trouble you with a relation how the Princesse was amazed, when she was out of the Cittadell onely with three men, and us, and when she heard the horrid noise that was in the Town. But let me tell you, that the waies being very fair and sandy from the Cittadell unto the River Pactolus which was close by, we went in more fears then trouble: The King of Pontus and Pactias followed us, also Timonides who carried the Heliotropes, which were to be put into the Pomels of the Saddles as I told you: when when we were come to the River, we saw horses ready, and a little boate, into which the Princesse Mandana, our conductor, Martesia, and I entred: the two Souldiers, rode over the River upon two of the horses, and carried the rest in their hands. And give me leave to tell you Sir, that when the Princesse saw her selfe in the midst of the River, her fears began to vanish, and joy took possession of her heart: it plainly appeared, that she did not so much fear being taken by your forces, as by those of Croesus or the King of Pontus: Now shall I be presently out of the King of Pontus his power, said she unto Martesia and me, and shall not be beholding unto a perfidious Prince for my liberty: when we landed, he whom we called our deliverer, went where Timonides was, who was fixing the Heliotropes unto the Saddles on which the Princesse Mandana, Martesia, and I were to ride: It being night, and the Moon shining but dimly, also our minds being taken up with various thoughts, we never observed that the horses on which we rid were invisible, nor had we any leasure to descant upon what we saw or not saw: for as soon as wee were on horsback, we went away: I forgot to tell you Sir, that Martesia riding behind our conductor, the vertue of the Heliotrope sufficed for both: As for the two men who came in the boate with us, they went on either side Mandana to conduct her: And to the end these two Souldiers who were not invisible, should not be observed by your forces; Pactias had put them into Persian habits: also the King of Pontus, not trusting wholly unto the vertue of these Heliotropes, was so carefull in chusing his way, and passing between the Quarters on that side where the line of communication was not finished, that I am perswaded, though there had been none of these Heliotropes, he had passed safely. In the mean time, the King of Pontus let Mandana go first, that the two men that were visible might be guides unto all the company who saw not each other: commanding them, that if any of the Enemy came to take them, not to make resistance, but to let Mandana go next whom he alwaies rid, though she saw him not: Though our minds were so full of hopes and fears, and the night was so dark, that wee took no notice of this wonder; yet when we had rid a while, and I observed that we could not see any but the two footmen which ran by the Princesse, but could not see either Martesia or our Conductor, wondering what should become of the other horses which we saw at the water side, I confesse that fear did so possesse me, that I could not chuse but cry out: I thought that I had wandered out of the way as well as those two men: The cry which I made, caused the Princess to look about her, and seeing only the two men who held the bridle of her horse, she was as much surprised as I was: Martesia who was behind our Deliverer, and who committed her self wholly unto his Guidance, coming out of a deep contemplation, had her share in the astonishment, when she looked & could not see us: In the mean time Mandana stopp'd, and I also, and we were so affrighted, that the King of Pontus thought twenty times to discover himself, and comfort us: but he did not, still leaving the care of us unto him whom we looked upon as the Author of our Liberty, and he coming to Mandana, let her feel the hand of Martesia, assuring her that she needed not to fear any thing, and that the wonder which she saw was an enchantment only to set her at liberty: if you only were invisible, said she unto him, I should think you had found the ring of Gyges, which I hear Croesus hath lost; but I cannot see either Martesia or Arianita, and I perceive by what they say, that they do not see me: However it be Madam, said he unto her, I assure you that you have no cause to fear any thing; and the better to assure you, when none passeth by, you may speak either with Martesia or Arianita, and I perceive by what they say, that they do not see me: However it be Madam, said he unto her, I assure you that you have no cause to fear any Page 182 thing; and the better to assure you, when none passeth by, you may speak either with Martesia or Arianita, whom I will cause to come nearer you: whilst this man and the Princesse were talking thus, Martesia and I were in extream fright: yet being under the conduct of a man, who had so much power as to act such wonders, wee durst not but speak him very fair, thinking that since he was able to make us invisible, he was able to do what he pleased. The Princesse having the same thoughts, did not much presse him to tell her how he wrought these miracles, and thought it more expedient to concur with him only to carry her unto the place where she desired to go, to wit unto Ecbatane, and to stay at some Town where she might stay with safety, and have so much time as send her a fitter Equipage. Since we were yet in the place where we might meet with some of the Troops of Cyrus; hee he promised her all she desired, lest she should meet some and cry out: So that the Princesse putting a new confidence in him, she onely admired the prodigie, without any fear of his deceiving her: contenting her self with seeing onely those two men who guided her horse, and speaking unto Martesia and me. Thus then we passed the Camp of Cyrus, between two Quarters, we met some Troopers and Souldiers severall times; but since the two visible men were clothed in Persian habits, they passed for their own men, who were going from Quarter to Quarter: So that we travelled without any obstacle: And that which at first was a terrour unto us, became afterwards our diversion. Martesia and I had a hundred fantastical wishes: For my part I wished to see the King of Pontus to upbraid him with his injustice, at a time when he could neither see, nor follow us. Martesia wished to meet the King of Assyria, to tell him, that this device was better then the white habits in a snow, which he used to get out of Babylon; that we might have the pleasure of seeing him desperate, when hee could hear the Princesse, and not see her. As for Mandana, she hinted to us, though she did not name you, that she was desirous to see you, Sir, and that you might onely hear her voice. Thus we went on, not suspecting that the King of Pontus was so near as to hear us: Yet me thought, that as we went over a stony way, I heard more horses then we had in our company, but durst not expresse my thoughts. Thus we got out of the Camp, and about the height of the day the Sun began to be so hot, that the Princesse complained very much. And coming to a place where were two wayes, the one leading unto a thick shady Wood, and the other into an open Plain; the King of Pontus seeing the men who guided Mandanaes horse to take the open way, he forgot that he should not speak, and commanded them to turn upon the right hand into the shade. I leave you to imagine, Sir, how we were surprised when wee heard the King of Pontus his voice, which wee knew full well. The truth is, it was so great, that we cryed out all at once. The Princesse stopped upon a suddain, and leaping hastily from her horse, she became visible, and fell into such lamentable complaints, as would have moved pity from very stones. I no sooner saw her lighted from her horse, but I did the same, and so did Martesia, and went both unto the Prince; the King of Pontus was extremely perplexed; for since he had only four in his company, he thought it would be difficult to carry us away by force, therefore he went politely to work; for leaving his Ring with Timonides, he came and threw himself at Mandana's feet, giving her all the respective language that a violent and submissive passion could devise; beseeching her to pardon him, protesting he would still observe the same submission unto her as formerly, and assuring her that he would only endeavour to win her by his tears: adding, that if he could not obtain this happiness in a short time, he would then carry her unto Ecbatan: Yet all his submissive eloquence could not move the Princesse, who told him peremptorily, that she would absolutely die upon the place. Inasmuch as the King of Pontus perceiving her obstinate, and would go no further, he began to beseech her not to force him to fail in his submissive respects, and force her to follow him. And to shew you, Madam (said he unto her) that I am able to do it, know that I have fifty Horse with me, though you see them not. At first the Princesse did not believe him, but the King of Pontus causing Pactias and Timonides to speak, she did no longer question the truth; for she knew both their voices: So that exceedingly grieving at it, and chusing rather to follow her Ravisher, than to force him by a vain resistance unto any violence, she yielded, since she could not chuse, and got upon her horse. Yet first she told the King of Pontus, that he should never hope for any thing from her but hatred and contempt. In the mean while, since in lighting from my horse, I had let go my bridle, it was a piece of difficulty to find him againe, since he carried with him that which made him invisible; and Timonides was ready to take me up behind him, when this horse which was kept with that which Pactias rid upon, came unto him when he neighed; so that Pactias hearing him so near to him, layd hold on him, and I got up. Then after Page 183 that Timonides had given the King of Pontus his Ring againe, wee went on, but alas, it was with thoughts different from those wee had before, and certainly this Princesse did repent of her escape, yet I cannot tell you her thoughts, but by conjecture, for since that I never heard her speak: When we were come into the Wood, where we saw some houses, the King of Pontus let the Princesse stay under a shade, and brought some meat unto her, but she would take nothing, only a glasse of water, and that at the request of Martesia; after which we continued on our journey. In the mean time Timonides feared that I should complain against him, for not imparting his Masters secret unto her, therefore he rid allwayes next me, and I having a great desire to know how wee came to be invisible, conjured him to tell me, and assured him that if he would tell me the truth, I would pardon him. I had no sooner said so, but Timonides being glad that I would accept of his justification, bad me in a low voice stop my horse, and stay a little behind the King of Pontus; for seeing the two Footmen which guided Mandana's horse, we knew he was not farre off her: So that stopping our horses untill we were out of hearing, after Timonides told me with a thousand oaths, that he knew nothing of the designe untill the last night, that Pactias told him, he related all unto me: adding, that it would be long before the King of Pontus came unto any place of retreat, and that he was resolved to travell all night, and not to rest the Princesse untill break of day. In the mean time we were so attentive unto our discourse, that we never minded our way; so that being in a thick Wood full of severall wayes, we took a wrong one: and we minded it so little, that though wee met with two women with baskets of fruit upon their heads, wee never so much as enquired of them. Alas, said Cyrus and interrupted her, I met those women also, and what they told me was the reason why I took not that way which would have conducted me unto the Princesse. But I beseech you relate unto me quickly all that you know, that I may in all hast go and repair my fault: I shall quickly end Sir, said Arianita, for Timonides and I perceiving wee were out of the way, wee doubled our pace back, hoping to overtake them; but wee never could: Then this accident did happen unto me, for be pleased to know, riding along the Torrent, my horse slipped, and threw me into it, so that being much hurt, Timonides was much troubled with me; and I know not what hee could have done without the help of him who brought you hither. Ah Arianita, cryed Cyrus out, what will all you tell me avails me, unless you will let me have that stone which made you invisible, that I may make use of it, if ever I meet with Mandana: Alas Sir, replied she, one misfortune never comes alone, for be pleased to know, it fell into the River, when my horse did throw me: and as for that of Timonides, hee took it from his finger, when he came to helpe me out of the Torrent, and knew not where hee laid it, so that both of them are lost. As Cyrus was going to answer Arianita, a great noise of horses was heard in the Court. He no sooner heard it, but he went unto the window to see what made it, and saw it to be the Prince Artamas, and his retinue, who in his fruitlesse search of Mandana, heard there was a Lady in that house, brought thither by one man, and therefore he came to see whether or no it was the Princesse Mandana: When Artamas saw Cyrus out of the window, hee hoped that it was indeed the Princesse: hee lighted hastily from his horse, and came unto the Chamber where he was, Feraulus following him: but his joyes were presently converted into despair; yet hee saluted Arianita, of whom Feraulus enquired concerning Mandana and Martesia, whilst Cyrus, Artamas and Ligdamis advised upon the best expedients: but since hast was the most necessary course that could be taken, they resolved to separate themselves once more, and dividing the men which they had amongst them to search still towards the Sea side: For truly, said Cyrus, since Mandana hath two footmen with her, who are not invisible, and since she is when she is on her horse, it is not impossible to get some intelligence of her: Cyrus would needs see Timonides, before he departed, and since Arianita had told him he had done many good offices for Mandana during her imprisonment, hee received him not ill. Yet he was very urgent with him to confesse whether hee knew vvith vvay the King of Pontus his Master did take: and the sooner to induce him unto it, without any perfidious treachery unto his Master, Cyrus told him, that hee vvould engage his vvord to set that Crowne vvich vvvas taken from his Master, upon his head againe, if by his meanes he could find out the Princesse Mandana: But all all his importunities and promises were ineffectuall. So that Cyrus seeing he could draw no more out of him, he left him to Guard Arianita, when she was in a condition to go unto Page 184 Sardis, leaving Feraulus with him for a conductor: after which he took horse, and parting from the Prince Artamas, he went in quest of Mandana, though with lesse hopes then before he met with Arianita: But whilst this great Prince was wandering, through woods and Mountaines, and Plaines; Mandana was in a most desperate condition, especially since Arianita and Timonides were lost, for she knew the power she had over that man, and what good offices he had done her in Sardis, and had the same hopes in him when she was out: She had a great desire to stay in that Meadow where Cyrus saw her, untill Timonides and Arianita overtook them, and the King of Pontus could not hinder her for a while, because Mandana leaped from her horse, and Martesia also, so that he was forced to consent unto her: But since the Torrent was betwixt Arianita and Mandana, and this accident chancing, the King of Pontus his messenger could hear no newes of her: so that he forced her to get up, and Martesia also, just after Cyrus spied them; in the mean while, Mandana is forced to travell all night untill break of day: and then the King of Pontus, finding a little private house, suffered her to rest some hours; after which, he constrained her to take horse againe, asking her a million of pardons for the pains he put her unto; and his sorrow for being a cause of that excessive griefe which he spied in her eyes when she was from the Heliotrope, was as great as Mandana's; But his love having the predominancy over his vvirtue, his reason was not so clear as to be ashamed of his crime, but he went on still in a continuall course of committing it: Therefore passing on with Pactias, and him who rid before Martesia, and the two footmen which waited upon Mandana, he came the next day very late unto a little Port called Atarnes, where the Princesse had time enough to rest her self all night: and where indeed she did so, for her wearinesse did so stupifie her senses, that she slept with more tranquility, then one would have imagined her sorrowes would have permitted her. As for the King of Pontus, he being of an indefatigable constitution, and his passion being incompatible with sleep, in lieu of thinking upon any rest, his thoughts were all of guarding Mandana, and procuring a Ship: but since it was something difficult to find one ready to depart, and more easie to find one in the morning, he stayed till then, when indeed hee found one: so that Mandana was no sooner awake, but he let her know by Martesia, that she must prepare for a departure; she had a mind to make resistance; but since he had lodged her upon the very Port, and not above six paces from the ship, she thought her resistance would be in vaine, and the rather, because she would not suffer either Martesia or her to speak with any in the house where shee lodged, denying leave to go into the Temple: So that all Mandana could do, was to protract her departure onely one hour longer, finding out severall pretences for it, though she knew not to what end; for in her belief of Cyrus his love of Araminta, shee could not imagine hee vvould follow her: yet she made as many excuses as if she had expected some reliefe. As she was in this condition, and as the King of Pontus was in a Chamber which joyned unto hers, talking with Pactias, she espied out of her window, a man of most admirable Garbe, and rich in clothes, walking by himself: she looked stedfastly upon him, to the end that when he turned, she might see if she knew him, and whether hee could relieve her: As she had this thought, hee turned towards her, and to testifie her wonder at the sight, she cryed out: yet presently checking her selfe, and not creditting her own eyes, because he whom shee saw was at some distance, shee called Martesia, and shewed her the cause of her admiration: Look Martesia, said she unto her, look whether that be the perfidious Cyrus or no. Martesia coming to the window, did perceive that Mandana had good reason for her thought, and that it was Cyrus: Well Madam, said Martesia unto her, never say Cyrus is unfaithfull, that will leave the Siege of Sardis to follow you: Ah my dear Martesia, answered Mandana: I know not whether it be him or no, but I am sure, I am exceeding afraid, least the King of Pontus should either go out or come hither, least I should be a spectator of some sad accident: my greatest fear is, said she, because I see Cyrus by himself: certainly replied Martesia, he has company in the next house, which he hides to prevent suspicion: Did I not know, replied Mandana, that the Prince of Spilritides was Prisoner in Chalcedonia, I should alter my opinion, but since I know he is, I cannot doubt but he whom she thought to be this great Prince, and who indeed was the Prince Spilritides walked nearer her: Martesia then advised her, to shew her selfe, to the end, that if he were come to relieve her, he might bring out his men: Mandana without further arguing the matter, took the counsell of Martesia: So that looking out of the window just as Spilritides was within ten paces of her, and Martesia was ready Page 185 to make a signe unto him, this Prince whose mind was taken up with many a sad thought, seeing Ladies out of the window, and that he were obliged to salute them if he passed by, turned suddenly aside the other way, seeming as if he had not seen them, though he was the most civill man upon earth, when hee was not overwhelmed with sorrowes. In the mean time, Mandana seeing this, and thinking that this pretended Cyrus had seen her, and seemed as if he did not see her, she was even ready to sinke downe with sorrow: Well Martesia, said she unto Martesia, whether or no is Cyrus innocent now? and whether I were not just if I shewed him unto the King of Pontus, that hee might revenge my quarrell? However ungratefull and perfidious Prince that thou art, I cannot chuse but tremble, that thy Rivall should be so near thee and not know it: yet Madam I beseech you, said Martesia what can it possibly be imagined, Cyrus should do at Atarnes, if he did not follow you? for my part I am confident that he vvaites as you do for the hour that you are to embarque, that hee may then call out his men and receive you out of the pover of the King of Pontus: Wee vvill see that presently (said she vvith as much anger as hast) and indeed Martesia used her best persvasions to have a little patience, and to consider upon it: but her spirits vvere so incensed, that she vvent immediately and told the King of Pontus she vvvas ready to depart: Yet shee had no sooner told him, but she repented, but it vvvas too late. In the mean time, the Shippe being ready, the King of Pontus never thought of a vvay how to get Mandana to take a Heliotrope, but giving them all unto one of his men to carry, hee followed the Princesse, vvhom Pactias did lead, because she vvould not suffer her Ravisher to have that honour. But vvhen she vvvas ready to go out of the house, and imagined that perhaps Cyrus and the King of Pontus vvould fight in her presence, she could hardly find a heart to vvaike: Yet at last, thinking that if Cyrus vvwere there to release her, hee vvould bring men enough for it, and if he did not, that he was vvorthy of punishment, she went forward: she had no sooner gone three paces but she thought she saw Cyrus, who was so farre from interesting himselfe in the quarrell, that he slightly turned aside, and shunned meeting with her: this second adventure did so surprise her, that she was not able to retaine her resentments, but cryed out vvith as much anger as sorrow; Oh thou perfidious man, canst thou see me carried away before thy eyes, and not rescue me? These sharpe words reaching the eares of Spilritides, he turned his head to see who pronounced them, and whether shee addressed them unto himselfe, and turned just as the King of Pontus turned: So that thinking he had seen Cyrus as well as she, fearing he followed with much company, and remembering how hee owed both his life, and liberty unto that Prince, hee took Mandana's hand by force, and Pactias assisting him, put her hastily into the Shippe with Martesia, and the man he brought with him; and without staying for the two footmen, who waited upon Mandana, hee lanced forth immediately, and left them with the horses at Atarnes: In the mean time, since Spilritides conceived that Mandana's words were addressed unto him, and who thought that hee had seene the King of Pontus his face, though at first he took him not for the Princesse Araminta's brother, hee came to the water side, and called unto some Mariners in the Port to carry him into the Shippe which newly lanced out, and that they would helpe him to relieve a Lady who was carried away in it, conceiving that in honour he ought not to suffer this violence to be done unto her, though he knew her not: But call and cry and make what promises he vvould, they vvould not hazard themselves against those they knew not:

So that seeing he could not prevail with them, he set himself to look upon those that were in the Boat, who by that time were so far off in the River, that he could receive no satisfaction, for he knew not Mandana; and the King of Pontus his back towards him, and spoke unto the Mariners to make all the hast they could. But Spitridates observing that there were two men who came unto the Shippe, and were too late to get in, who afterwards went into the house over against the Port, he sent a servant thither, who came to tell him, there came a man unto the place where he lodged, who said that Sardis was taken: But these two men fearing they should follow the King of Pontus, would not tell who hee was unto the servant of Spitridates, who returned to his Master and told him that he could get nothing out of those two men: but assured him, that those who were shipped away, were persons of good quality, as may be conjectured by their horses which they left behind them: Spitridates being fuller of curiosity then before, seeing he had lost the sight of the Shippe, went himself to talke with these two men: but he no sooner saw them, Page 186 then he knew one of them to be a man who was heretofore in the King of Pontus his service when he was at Heraclea, before Arsamenes revolted: He no sooner saw him, but the Idea of the King of Pontus came into his fancy, and hee made no question but it was he, so that calling him by his name, the man knew him also, and they freshly renewed their old acquaintance: So that he could not deny but that hee was imbarqued, was the King of Pontus his Master, and that he having carryed away the Princesse Mandana from Sardis, came to imbarque at this Port. Spitridates, no sooner heard this, but he fell into an excessive griefe: for knowing that hee did so very much resemble Cyrus, that his owne mother took that Prince for him in Bythnia, he made no doubt but Mandana was in the same error, and that the infidelity which she upbraided him with all, thinking him to be Cyrus, was grounded upon the infidelity of Araminta. So that entring into a new despair and jealousie, hee altered his intentions of staying at Atarnes, waiting of the successe in the Siege of Sardis, and resolved to go and carve out his own Revenge upon that Prince whom he thought to be his Rivall, and to go and chide the Princesse of Pontus for her infidelity: Is it so, (said hee unto himselfe) that Araminta hath forsaken me, and followes the favourite of Fortune? However, unjust Princesse, I have done all that was possible to testifie my love of you: I have voluntarily, forsaken Crowns for your sake: I have renounced all my ambition, I have stifled all thoughts of revenge upon an usurping Prince, onely because he had a meer relation unto you: I have disobeyed the commands of the King my Father; I have suffered the rigour of a long imprisonment, I have wandered like an unknown vagrant throughout the world, only to observe you will: there is nothing which I have left undone, that was within the compasse of possibility, to please you: yet the Conqueror of Asia hath got a greater share in your heart then I have; his glory charms you, and dazzles your eyes: and questionlesse you may employ all your Arts to make him as perfidious as your selfe. But what likelihood is there, (added this incensed Prince) that Cyrus, who hath expressed such high testimonies of a constant passion unto Mandana; who hath gained so many battles; taken so many Towns, and put all Asia in armes for her deliverance, should after all this become inconstant, if you had not cunningly employed all your charmes, to supplant a Princesse, whom he had so long loved? Doubtlesse you think, unjust Princesse, that I am still in Prison, and that nothing can interrupt your joyes: perhaps you hold intelligence with the King your brother, which hath ravished away Mandana, least that Prince should shake off your fetters, and assume hers: Doubtlesse, you hope that Cyrus will reconquer the Kingdome of Pontus for your brother: and that if you give me my liberty, it is more then you ought to do. But thanks be unto the Heavens, I am not your debtor for it, but shall perhaps be in such a condition as shall revenge Mandana for the infidelity of Cyrus, and to punish you in his person for infidelity to me: As Spitridates was entertaining himself with these thoughts, the taking of Sardis was confirmed by diverse reports: So that having nothing to do any longer at Atarnes, he took horse, and resolved rather to ruine himselfe then not him who took the heart of Araminta from him: However (said he unto himselfe) Araminta can dissemble her inconstancy no longer, for since Sardis is taken, and Mandana carryed away: if I find Cyrus courting her without any care of Mandana or thoughts of following her; there is no colour or excuse for them: I know very well, that to fall upon the great Conqueror of Asia, will be a most dangerous attempt, but since I hope for death not victory, what need I fear? After this, Spitridates plunged himselfe so deep in his own thoughts, that he himselfe knew not what hee thought: and thus he went on till towards the evening; and then desiring to set out a lodging in a village which hee saw on his right hand, he spied a party of twenty horse, who coming out of a little wood, crossed his way, and one of them came to him: Spitridates then, rousing himselfe then out of his contemplation, went to meet him, but he was exceedingly astonished, when hee saw him to be Cyrus, since it was impossible any other in the world should so much resemble himselfe: Cyrus (for it was he) was as much amazed on the other side, making no question but it was Spitridates, thinking no man upon earth else could so much resemble himselfe: The astonishment of both these Princes was so great, that they stopped their horses some three or four paces off each other: during which time, the whole Troope came up, and all of them were as much surprised to see Spitridates, as Spitridates and Cyrus were to see each other: Spitridates, had a mixture of joy amongst his wonder, to see Cyrus in a place where in all probability he was in quest of Mandana: and Cyrus amidst his misery Page 187 was glad he was in condition to cure so great a Prince of so unjust a jealousie as hee knew had infected his soul: Also he was the forwarder to speak not onely to ease Spitridates of his tormenting passion, but also to aske whether he knew any thing concerning Mandana. Yet since he would not wholly trust unto this prodigious resemblance; Generous stranger, (said he unto him, after a long pause of looking upon him) if you be the same which my eyes make me believe you are, I have very joyfull news to tell you: and I wish unto the gods, that in recompence of it, you could tell me as good concerning Mandana whom I am in quest of, and whom perhaps you met. Spitridates hearing Cyrus speak in this manner, his soul was fuller of joy, then he was able to expresse: for now he knew not whether hee should look upon Cyrus as his Rivall, or as the protector of Araminta; but at last, calling the tumultuous turbulency of thoughts, and desiring clearer satisfaction of all his doubts: Sir, (said he unto Cyrus) you need not doubt, but that I am the unfortunate Spitridates, who, for some reasons which now I shall forbear to tell you, is come into Lydia, to find out the end either of my daies or of my miseries: But in coming thither, as staying at the Port of Atarnes which is a daies journey from hence; it was my fortune to see a thing which I cannot chuse but wish earnestly, that it may trouble you; to the end you may make me as full of joy as you have done of hope: for truly Sir, it was my fortune to see the King of Pontus carry away the Princesse Mandana, but I was not able to help it, or know it, till after they were imbarqued. How (said Cyrus, with so much sadnesse as pleased Spitridates) did you see Mandana embarque? and cannot I follow? howeever, for heavens sake, tell me which way the unjust Ravisher carried her from me. Spitridates then seeing all the symptoms of a real sorrow in the face of Cyrus, was so well pleased with it, that ceasing to hate him, and beginning to hope that Araminta was constant, he told him all he knew concerning Mandana, & with all aggravations possible, for he could not chuse but rejoice at the despair of Cyrus, because the more he saw him troubled, the more he beleaved Araminta was faithful: & the excessive sorrow of Cyrus did so perfectly undeceive him, that he began to interest himself in the same sorrow which procured his joy. As they were thus talking, the Prince Mazares came unto that place with his troop, where Cyrus acquainted him with all he understood from Spitridates, the sight of whom did much surprise him: Cyrus then obliged them to salute each other, after which advising upon the best course, they were extremely perplexed; for Cyrus could not goe unto Atarnes, because it was not yet brought into subjection, and where a guard was kept without a hazard of being arrested, and disabled from serving Mandana; nor did he know which way to seek her, since he knew which way she was carried. The result of their consultation was, to send unto all the Sea-ports, to see if they could hear any thing of her: Cyrus then went unto the next house to write, where in one hour he sent dispatches unto Ephesus, Milet, Gnides, Cuma, and all other Ports on that coast with orders to make strict enquire, and to entreat Thrasibulus and Euphranor, father of Alciodonia, to send out ships to sea, and to give intelligence unto Sardis of all their adventures: for since this Town was almost at an equal distance from all these places, his best course was to goe thither, that he might so order his Troops as they might in an hours warning be ready to march where he should hear the King of Pontus was: After which, and before he took horse, he took Spitridates aside, and told him with as much generosity as sincerity of his unjust jealousie, so that this Prince being ashamed of his weaknesse, and unjust hatred of him, did now give him such plausible language, as spoke him not unworthy of his friendship: Cyrus to settle his mind in tranquillity, offered him never to see the Princesse Araminta again, though he had a most high esteem of her: But since the extraordinary sorrows of Cyrus had entirely cured Spitridates of his jealousie, he answered with as much generosity as spirit; and these two great Princes began to contract as great a league of friendship, as there was a resemblance in their faces. After this, they took horse and went towards Sardis, unto which he could not come untill the next day at noon, because they were forced to rest themselves four or five houres at a little town in the way. In their return they met with the Prince Artamas: Cyrus also met with those whom he sent into the Woods, so that all these Princes being met againe, they came to the gates of Sardis, where they were received with loud acclamations of joy: But at his entrance he met with Hidaspes, who came hastily to him; Sir, said he unto him, in a low voice, you come in a happy hour to calm a great disorder which is in the Town; for be pleased to know, ever since your departure, the King of Assyria, having made a strict search in all the houses of the Town to no purpose, he is fallen into such a fury, especially Page 188 since he missed you, that he is almost out of his wits: But the worst of all is, that by a hundred slight conjectures, he thinks Croesus knows where Mandana is; so that this violent Prince having tried all wayes of mildnesse to make this King confesse that which perhaps he knows not, hath added menaces, and is resolved to seem as if he would put him to death, and make him discover out of fear that which he desires to know. Oh heavens, said Cyrus, is it possible so great a Prince should be culpable of so great a crime? Yes, Sir, replied Hidaspes, and the people are so incensed, that to prevent any Sedition, I am come unto this gate to see whether the guards be strong, and all the Officers there; for just now I beleve Croesus is upon the Scaffold, the Princesse Palmis all in tears; the Prince Myrsiles lamenting, and all the inhabitants of Sardis in a generall revolt. Cyrus no sooner heard this, but riding immediately unto the great Plain which is between the palace of Croesus and the Cittadel, where Hidaspes told him this sad spectacle might be seen, he came with such hast, as made it apparent that he blamed the King of Assyria's violence; when he first came upon the plain, he saw all the plain full of souldiers in their armes, and people crying; in the midst of which was a Scaffold erected, and a stake unto which Croesus was tyed, and faglots round about him ready to be kindled, many Assyrian souldiers holding lighted Torches in their hands ready to set them on fire if he would not tell where Mandana was. Cyrus beholding so sad an object, was struck with so much horror to see a man of that quality in such a pittifull condition, he made his way through the crowd, and came unto the Scaffold just as the King of Assyria, the more to terrifie Croesus, had put fire unto a faggot, which began to kindle, and just as that unfortunate King remembreing the saying of Solon, That none was happy before his death, began to cry out, Oh Solon, Solon, how true is thy speech? Cyrus then coming to the Scaffold which the fire began to bum, and hearing these words, commanded the fire to be quenched, that Croesus should be untied, and carryed back unto his Palace, turning towards the King of Assyria, who was present, to check him for his violence, and told him he was certain that Croesus did not know where Mandana was. As soon as Cyrus had given this command, the people and souldiers did make the air echo with their acclamations, every one being forward to quench the fire, some to pull away faglots, others to fetch water; but there was no need of it; for as if the heavens had been obbey obedient unto the command of Cyrus, it rained upon a sudden so abundantly, that the fire was immediately extinguished. After which Croesus coming down from the Scaffold, Cyrus made a thousand excuses for the injury done him, and went with him as far as his Palace, to give him all the consolation he could. As for Cyrus he went to lodge in the Cittadell, and the King of Assyria followed him, whom he did extremely chide for his violent proceedings, and then he related unto him all he knew concerning Mandana, Mazares, Artamas, and Spitridates followed him; so did Sesostris, Tigranes, and Anaxaris, who having an extream desire to know the successe of his voyage, did accompany him unto the chamber which was prepared for him, that they might know whether they should rejoice or grieve with him; also to know who Spitridates was, whose extream resemblance with Cyrus, begat a great curiosity in all that saw him.

The end of the Sixth Part.

The Seventh Part.

BOOK. I.

IT was not Sesostris, Tygranes, and Anaxaris alone, who were full of curiosity to understand who Spitridates was, and who were desirous to know the success of Cyrus his voyage, for that illustrious Conqueror was in a moment environ'd with a croud of Princes, Captains, and men of Quality, who did most feelingly interest themselves in all that concerned him, insomuch, as for a while he was forced to smother his sorrows, purposely to assure them, that theirs for him did oblige him, and that he would not be ungrateful unto them for it. But whilst he was expressing his acknowledgment unto these illustrious persons, Tegeus came to present him most hearty thanks from the Princess Palmis, for quenching those flames which were ready to devour the King her Father. The Prince Myrsiles sent also to the same end, and Cyrus had so many complements both to pay and receive, that he had but a very little time of liberty to enjoy his own thoughts; handsomness also required that he should dine in publick. In the mean time, the Prince Artamas went to visit the Princess Palmis, and to assure her, that he would employ the very uttermost of his credit with Cyrus to move him unto a well treating of the King her Father: He saw also the Prince Myrsiles, and was extremely joyed to find him able to return an answer: As for Croessus, he durst not attempt to visit him, but resolved to stay, and see whether Cyrus would present him: In the interim, the King of Phrygia and Hircania hearing of Cyrus his return, came to the Camp at Sardis, to acquaint him with two things which could not be pleasing unto him: The first, That all the parties which they had sent out in quest of Mandana, could meet with no intelligence of her: And the second, That the taking of Sardis had more weakened his Army, then either the last battel, or the siege of that Town had done; for since Plunder was not restrained, those who had enriched themselves had disbanded themselves Page 2 during his absence, some carrying away what they had got, and others selling off their shares, that they might more easily slink away. This news did exceedingly grieve Cyrus, but to prevent any further disorder, and to keep those which remained within the compass of their duty, he caused more to be given unto them then he had promised at the beginning of the Siege, and severely punished some of them which fled, and were taken again: But his Army was yet so numerous, that if his Love of Mandana had not been in a most superlative degree, he would not have apprehended it too weak to assault and take all the places which the King of Pontus could chuse for a Sanctuary. But since it is the nature of that passion to think no obstacle small, though really they be so; Cyrus apprehended this accident, as if it were much more considerable then indeed it was, yet was he very circumspect to perceive, that Phraartes appeared not amongst all those who came to visit him upon his return, and his thought also was to give Spitridates speedy satisfaction in seeing the Princess Araminta: Then he began to inquire where Phraartes was, but none could give any direct account of him where he was; all that any knew was, as soon as Cyrus departed, Phraartes vanished also. Cyrus knowing his affection to the Princess of Pontus, made no doubt but that he was gone to visit her, and knowing him to be of a hasty and violent temper, his fear was, lest some disastrous chance should fall out, if Spitridates went by himself to see that Princess; therefore he prevailed so far with Spitridates, as notwithstanding his impatience to stay until the next day, before he went unto the place where his longing desires called him, Cyrus most obligingly telling him, that since he was cured of his jealousy, he would wait upon him to the Princess Araminta, but could not possibly that day, by reason of divers orders of grand importance, which he was to give out: Since the term was but short, Spitridates consented unto the desires of Cyrus, who in the mean time sent unto the Castle where he left Araminta, to see whether Phraartes was there, and to command his return unto Sardis: After which, this Prince, after he had given all requisite orders for the tranquility of the Town, for the incampment of his Army, and for the Guard of Croessus, he went to visit the Princess Palmis, and the Princess Timaretta, to crave their pardon for his abrupt departure, and leaving them when he went out of the Cittadel without any tenders of civility, beseeching them to consider his excuse, that since he was busied about the liberty of the Princess Mandana, it had been a grand crime in him if he had stayed a little longer with them, after he understood the King of Pontus had carried her away. These two Princesses being both of them sensible of their obligations unto Cyrus, Palmis in respect of Croessus and Artamas, Timaretta also in respect of Sesostriis and her self, they returned unto him as many thanks, as he made excuses unto them: They were obliged also unto it by the fresh favours which he did them, for he told the Princess Palmis, that he would carry the Prince Artamas unto Croessus, and that way put him in remembrance of his obligations unto Cleander; afterwards he told the Princess Timaretta, that as soon as he had taken convenient order for the handsomness of her voyage, and for the magnificency of her Train and Equipage, she should when she pleased return into Aegypt, under the conduct of Sesostriis, upon condition notwithstanding that she would honour him with her promise, to make that renowned Prince as happy as he deserved to be.

These two great Princesses having answered Cyrus as civilly as generosity obliged them, he left them to visit Croessus, to the end he might ask his pardon for the King of Assyria's violencies, to condole with him his misery, and to present the Prince Artamas unto him, knowing well that the King of Phrygia would consent unto this reconciliation: But in going thither, Hidaspes who had the guard of these Princes, and of all the Castle, caused them to pass through the stately Chamber wherein all the Treasures of Croessus did lie. The sight of such a mass of riches, and so many glistering things, had not brought him out of that profound study into which the taking away of Mandana had put him, if Tigranes, Anaxaris, and Chrisantes, who followed him as well as the Prince Artamas, had not expressed their wonder and astonishment, by the cries which they could not restrain, notwithstanding those respects which they were alwayes wont to observe unto that Heroique Conquerour: Yet notwithstanding their admiring noyse had not invited Cyrus unto any consideration of so many glorious sights, if Chrisantes, who was loath to pass so soon out of so fair a place, had not by his words awakened him: Look Sir, at least, I beseech you (said he, and smiled) upon that you have conquered; and be confident, that since Fortune has so far smiled upon you, as to make you Master of all these Treasures, Page 3 it is impossible she should frown so much as to let you lose the Princess Mandana: Therefore Sir, you may very well look upon them as most certain pledges of your future good fortune: I shall look upon him (replied Cyrus) when Ciaxares gives me leave to recompence the valour of so many brave men, who hath aided me as you have done to conquer them, or when he has permitted me to restore them unto the unfortunate Croesus in the consideration of the Prince Artamas: But since that is not yet, it is sufficient I appoint Hidaspes to have a care of them; and indeed Cyrus had not stayed a minute longer in consideration of all that magnificence, if he had not observed that Tigranes had an earnest desire to stay longer: So that being unwilling to oppose his curiosity, he walked softly through three great Chambers, and two Galleries, which passed from one into another, and which were all filled with most rare and precious things: All placed in such an order, and by so much Art, that one might every where observe a regular confusion, and pleasant disorder, which the lustre of the magnificent Cabinets did make; all which did fill the imagination of beholders with abundance of pleasing concepts, and forced their minds and spirits into admiration; and certainly not without good cause, and Cyrus as disinterested as he was, and though full of sorrow and passion, yet in the end honored with his observance, this prodigious heap of riches which Croessus had so dearly doted upon, and which Solon so little esteemed, that they purchased his aversion: Never was seen together so much silver, so much gold, so many precious stones, nor so many rarities, as there were in those three Chambers and two Galleries: The Grandure of the Dishes and Vessels were prodigies; the Statues of the same mettle were innumerable, and in beauty incomparable; but amongst all these several figures of gold, there was one of Marble so admirable, that it invited Cyrus to stay, and a long time to admire it above the rest, though the material of it was not so precious as many others; it was fashioned with so much art, and represented so fair a person, as it is no wonder, if it charmed the eyes of a Prince, whose judgment was most delicate, and who was exquisitely able to judge of all beauties. This Statue was of a natural and ordinary grandure, standing upon a Pedestal of gold, between Pillars on four sides, of an admirable beauty, to each of them were Captives chained of all sorts and conditions, but they were chained by little Cupids, so rare and admirably wrought, as eye never saw better. The figure represented a Woman of about eighteen years of age, of a most superlative, surprizing, and exact beauty; all the features of her face were wonderfully fair, her stature so noble and handsome, that nothing could be more alluring, her dress was so Courtly and extraordinary, that it was equally after the mode of Trojan Ladies, after the fashion of the Nymphes, and after that fashion in which the Goddesses are dressed, but particularly the Goddess of Victory, as the Athenians deck her, that is without wings, and only with a Coronet of Laurel upon her head: This Statue was placed upon its Basis, with such a sprightly action, as it seemed to be animated: The face, the neck, the arms, the hands were of white Marble; as well as the thighs and feet; whereof one part only was to be seen through the lacing of her buskins, because she did with her left hand a little hold up her Mantle, that she might, as if it were, the more easily walk, holding in her right hand the skirt of her Vaile, which descended from the hinder part of her head, under the Coronet of Laurel, as if she would prevent the Wind from whirling it too much. All the garnishings of this figure were cut in Marble and Jasper of various colours: The garment of this fair Phenecian, which was lapped in a thousand pleasing folds was of Jasper, whose colour was so lively, that it resembled the Tiran purple. A Scarf which was negligently thrown about her neck, and reached to her shoulders; was of a kind of Marble, mingled blew and white, which infinitely pleased the eye: The Vaile of this figure was of the same piece, but carved with so much art, that it seemed to be as soft and pliant as a piece of Tiffany: The Coronet of Laurel was of green Jasper, and the Buskins were of enamelled Marble; but the rarest piece of admirable art was, there was a kind of Air and Spirit in this figure, which did inanimate it, and which perswaded all beholders that it was ready to walk and speak: One might perceive a sprightly Physiognomy, and a certain kind of fierceness in her action, as let all beholders know, that she whom it represented had a fierce soul, this figure looking with scorn upon the Captives which were chained at her feet. Moreover, the Carver had so exactly imitated the freshness and plumpness of young fair ones, that one might know the age of her whom he represented by that Statue. This figure being thus admirable, it was not without reason that the illustrious Cyrus was so curious as to ask the Prince Artamas, whether it was not the work of Dipoenus, Page 4 or of Scyllis, who were the two most curious Gravers that were then in the world, imagining notwithstanding, that this Statue was more then the bare effects of a fine phancy: But the Prince Artamas, after he had told him, that it was indeed the work of one of those Gravers whereof he spoke, who were of the Isle of Crete; he told him further, that it was made in representation of a Lady of Quality in Tyre, with whom the late King of Phenicia was in Love, and who was reported to be one of the fairest persons of the World, much fairer then her Statue: This being so (said Cyrus) Why did not that amorous King keep this figure? Because as I have heard say (replied Artamas) this Statue was not finished when that King died; and as doubtless you know Sir, since you have been in Greece, Dipoenus and Scyllis did leave four images imperfect, which they began in Peloponnesis, to wit, of Apollo, of Diana, of Hercules, and of Minerva, because there was not ready payment made of what was promised unto them, so you may easily conceive, that the King of Phenicia being dead, and the Prince his Son who succeeded him, having business of more importance upon him, then to give them what the King his Father had promised; Dipoenus and Scyllis were no more patient with him, then they were in Greece; for after one demand of their wages, perceiving there was some respite of time required for the payment, they imbarqued in the night, and carried their work with them: And Croessus then having a repute to collect all rarities in all Asia, they addressed themselves to him, and sold this Statue unto him: 'Tis true, the report is, that a little after the War, the young King of Phenicia sent to demand it of Croessus, offering the double of what it cost, but he would not part with it: This adventure, replied Cyrus, is doubtless worthy the beauty of this Statue which caused it. After this, he looked upon the miraculous quantity of Arms belonging to all Nations in the world, Arms of pure gold set with precious stones: He also admired the Thrones of mossy gold; the figures of all the Gods which were adored throughout all Asia, whose price of the bare materials only were worth more then is imagineable: He saw also in that place, Tables, Mirrors, and Cabinets of an inestimable price: All the Tables which were set round those Chambers and Galleries, were filled with a million of most rare and rich things, Pearls, Rubies, Emeralds, Diamonds, and such things, made such a glorious and precious miscelany, that no diaped Meadow in its glory of the Spring could make a more pleasant object, then the variety of precious things did which lay upon those Tables: In the midst of these magnificent varieties, the ingenuous fables which Aesope composed at Sardis were shewed unto Cyrus, in which he had writ, and with such art couched all the history of Croessus his Court, and which this Prince so esteemed, that when Aesope departed out of Lidia, he would needs have him give them unto him: And to testifie how much he esteemed them, he caused them to be richly bound with those which he had before composed, which taught most excellent Morals unto those who understood well the language of Beasts, whom he made to speak: Indeed the book was covered with enamelled gold, and so set with Diamonds, as turn it which way one pleased, the name of Aesope appeared; the Claspes were as rich, and suitable to the rest; and Croesus did not more honour unto Homer, or any of the books of the Sibbels, so famous throughout all Asia, then he did unto Aesope, since he thought his works worthy to be amongst his Treasures, which he prized at a higher rate then all things in the world besides. After a serious contemplation of this world of riches, and with astonishment beheld the vast number of huge giblets of gold and silver: After, I say, he had reflected upon the misfortune of the Prince who lost them, and so passionately loved them, Cyrus went out of this place of riches, unto the Chamber of miserable Croessus, with whom was the Prince Myrsiles: This old King, and this young Prince, received Cyrus with all civility due unto a Conquerour, yet without any base dejection of Spirit: As there appeared a sorrow in their eyes, so also there appeared a constancy in their souls; and Cyrus seeing with what resoluteness they endured so great a misery, said aloud, That they deserved to wear all their lives that Scepter which they had lost, and that it should not be his fault, if Cyrus did not restore it unto them: And indeed, this generous

Prince did so behave himself towards Croessus, and his Son, in such an obliging manner, that it may be said he made a most absolute conquest of them, and gained their hearts by his civility, as well as conquer their Kingdoms by his valour. As soon as Cyrus entred into the Chamber where they were, they advanced towards him: but this minded Prince, making hast to meet them, received them with as much civility, as if it were in times of peace, or as if their present fortune were equal: I could never have believed (said Croessus to Page 5 his illustrious Conquerour) that I should ever have thought my self able to give thanks unto a Prince who conquered my Crown: Yet Sir, since I owe my life unto you, and since the same hand which pul'd me from my Throne, pul'd me also from the Scaffold which the King of Assyria's violence caused me to ascend, I think it rather my duty to commend you, then to complain of my misfortune: But Sir, since the life which you have preserved, can neither be glorious nor pleasing unto me, let it suffice I only com|mend you without giving you thanks, and that I acknowledg you to be worthy of that glory which you possess: I do not desire you should thank me, replied Cyrus, Nor do I fully consent you should commend me; but I cannot indure that you should hold so bad an opinion of the Medean Kings, as to despair of your being in a more happy condition then you are, especially considering, that this Prince (added he, and presented Artamas unto him) is my most dear friend, and considering that I have almost as much cre|dit with Ciaxares, as Artamas hath with Cyrus. The King of Lydia, who had after then once since the taking of Sardis, repented himself of the injustice which he had done the Prince Artamas, did receive him very civilly, yet with much shame, it not being possi|ble he should see him, and not remember the obligements wherein he was bound, when he carried the name of Cleander, and the unjust imprisonment which he caused him to suffer, after he was known to be the Prince Artamas; yet notwithstanding, as he was resolved to acknowledg unto Cyrus, that he did not deserve his misfortune, he did check himself, and said, since Conquerours may impose what Laws they please upon the Con|quered, I will believe what you please, and beseech the Prince Artamas to bury all my violencies and injuries in Oblivion: It becomes me, replied the Prince of Phrigia, to forget all the miseries of Artamas, but it becomes me also never to forget the obligations wherein Cleander stands bound unto you; therefore Sir, I do promise you, to be unto you as long as I live the very same I was when you honored me with your friendship: I beseech you Sir (said Cyrus, and interrupted him, speaking to the King of Lydia) re|new that old friendship with a Prince, who by many services and much fidelity hath de|served it: The friendship of a King without a Kingdome (replied Croessus, and sighed) ought not to be twice asked, by my most illustrious Conquerour; therefore Sir, I consent unto all you desire of me, and readmit the Prince Artamas into the same place which for|merly he possessed in my soul, being extremely sorry that I have not in me a power wherel|by to recompence his virtue: When I have intreated the King of Medes, replied Cyrus, to recompence your own, I shall let you know, that you have power enough to re••ene|rate his, and I wish unto the Heavens you had prevented your misfortune at the begin|ing of the War, by giving him the Princess Palmis, and restoring me the Princess Man|dana: But I beseech you, added Cyrus, Give me leave to ask you, (if I may do it with|out exasperating your sorrows) by what motives and policy were you engaged in this un|just War? And what was the true reason which moved you to slight the King of Medes and my friendship? No reason (replied Croessus sadly) but your good fortune and my bad: For truly Sir, it doth most clearly appear, that the Gods would never have per|mitted me to protect the Ravisher of Mandana, but only to make you a Conquerour of my Kingdome: Never believe Sir that you can lose this Princess; and to manifest it unto you, consider, that every carrying her away hath gained you a Kingdom; and be assured, that it is to make you Conquerour of all Asia, the Gods have suffered she should wander from Province to Province: But oh you unjust Gods (cried he out) Why have you deluded me by Oracles so clear in appearance, and so obscure in reality? Cyrus per|ceiving that without any design he had incensed the sorrows of Croessus, to comfort him, would hearken to his complaints, and dive into his thoughts; therefore he desired him to give a reason why he accused the Gods? I accuse them Sir (said he) for advertising me by their Oracles of all the least considerable passages of my life, and deceiving me in the most important business that ever I consulted with them about: When I beseeched them to tell me the issue of the Warre against you, they answered in these very tearms:

If thou unto this War will go,
An Empire great thou'll overthrow.

Is it just Sir (said this grieved Prince) that after so many offerings unto them, they should so far delude me, as to make me believe I should destroy them, who have destroyed Page 4 <1 page duplicate> Page 5 <1 page duplicate> Page 6 me? Therefore Sir, I beseech you permit me amidst the transport of my sorrows, to send unto Delphos, to the end it may be a testimony unto all posterity, that it is dangerous to be too curious in future matters, and that men ought not to pry too narrowly into the secrets of the Gods; for though I do accuse them of injustice, yet my second thoughts are more reasonable then my first, and that it is my self who am unjust in complaining of them; whereas in very truth, I ought only to complain against my self: For indeed the Gods are just, and said truly, since in overthrowing my own Empire, I have overthrown one of the greatest in all Asia: However (replied Cyrus, and interrupted him) I will do my utmost that you may have cause to commend my way of dealing with you, and to sweeten all your bitter misfortunes. In the mean time, if any of your Guards do diso|bey my commands, and not render you that respect which I would have them, let me be advertised of it; to the end, that their punishment may satisfy you, and justifie me. Oh Sir (cried Croessus) I do not wonder that a Prince who knows so well how to use his vir|tue, should alwayes Conquer: And I wonder less that the King of Assyria hath been conquered by a Prince, whose virtue transcends his: The King of Assyria (replied Cyrus modestly) hath been unfortunate, because his design was unjust; but for the rest, though he hath been ever my enemy, and though he be still my Rival, yet I must needs justifie him in some part of that violence which he used towards you; and assure you, that his design was only to terrifie you so far, as to make you out of fear to tell where Man|dana was, but his intentions never were to put you unto death: It is a thing which I am bound to tell you, because I know it to be a truth; and to tell the sooner, because I cannot indure, that the man whose quality is equal unto yours and mine, should be ac|cused of an action so barbarous. After this, Croessus began again to commend him, the Prince Myrsiles did second him, Artamas, Tigranes, and Anaxaris could not chuse also but applaud Cyrus: whose modesty not being able to hear such commendations of himself, was forced to depart a little sooner then otherwise he would from the King of Lydia. This unfortunate Prince did entreat Cyrus before he went away, to use well his new conquered Subjects, beseeching him not to take it ill, if he used his best endeavour to be their Protector, though he could not be their King. Cyrus was so moved at this request, that he renewed all the protestations and promises which he formerly made unto Croessus; assuring him, that he would employ all his power with Ciaxares, that he would restore the Crown unto him which he had lost, upon condition that he should become his Vassal, as the King of Armenia was, and that he should follow the Wars until he had released Mandana. And indeed Cyrus was no sooner returned to the Cittadel, but he belgan to write unto the King of Meades, both in the behalf of Croessus, and to render him an accompt of all passages, intending to dispatch a Post the next morning, and then to be in a readiness for a visit of the Princess Araminta, and to carry with him the Prince Spitridates: The truth is, he could not write without perturbation of mind, and inter|ruptions to himself, for his imagination was filled with thoughts of the Princess Mandana, upon the least noyse which he heard, he always thought that some was bringing intelligence of her, and the place where she was carried unto; so that these flattering hopes begot a most horrid renovation of grief, when he found they were deceived. But whil'st he was writing in these perturbations of mind, Spitridates was entertaining himself with hopes so full of impatience, that it may be well said, time was a torment unto him, for believing he should see the Princess Araminta the next morning, every minute seemed an Age unto him: As for Sesostris and Artamas, after they had conducted Cyrus unto the Cittadel, they returned to the Pallace, to see at once those two Princesses who reigned in their souls: The first of these, since he had not of a long time seen his dearest Timaretta, he thought he should never see her enough: And the second, besides the joy which he should have to be with his Princess, he was joyed, that he was able to render an accompt unto her of the conference between Cyrus and the King her Father, and that he was able to tell her that he was well received. Since these two Princesses had two Chambers which joyned together, and since they were both in their own Chambers, which Seso|stris and Artamas came to see them, they parted at the doors of the Chambers. But whil'st Sesostris vvas entertaining his dearest Timaretta, and vvhil'st he vvas protesting that his Love vvas as violent, as vvhen she vvas the fairest Shepheardess of all Aegypt, and he the most amorous Shepheard of the World. Whil'st, I say, Artamas vvas protesting unto the Princess Palm*, (after he had rendred her an accompt of all passages bet <...> <◇> and him) that the a•teration in her fortune had vvrought no change in his heart, Page 7 and that he did love her with more zeal and respect, though the King her Father vvas a Captive, and though he had lost his Crown, then he did before, when she was the Daughter of the most puissant and rich King of all Asia: Whil'st (I say) these two ill|lustrious Lovers found some sweetness in discoursing of their past misfortunes and present miseries, Andramites prepared himself to wait upon Cyrus the next morning, when he intended to carry Spitridates unto Araminta, to the end he might the sooner see his belo|ved Doralisa: Ligdamis also, as well as he had the same design to see his dearest Cleonice: Parmen•des also, who came to Sardis as soon as he heard it was taken, thought of re|turning to see Cydipe; so that all these Amor•tes being no less amorous then Spitridates, were no less impatient then he, and expected the happy hour with as much restlessness of mind: They all departed, not so early in the morning as they could have desired, be|cause Cyrus had yet so much business to dispatch, that the Sun was a great height before he took horse; for he had not only his last orders to give unto the messenger whom he sent unto Ciaxares, but he had commands to give concerning the bringing of Menecra|tes and •hrasemedes unto Sardis: He had written and sent unto Persipolis, but he had yet to command, that they should go unto certain small Maritime Towns, whose names were out of his memory when he sent unto Ephesus, Milete, Guides, and Cuma; for though in his sending thither he had given orders in general to go unto all the Ports on that Coast; yet because he had not precisely named the Towns which he then remembered, he vvould send thither, chusing rather to do a hundred things to no purpose, concerning the Quest of his Princess, then to fail in the least circumstance that had any shadow of possibility in doing her service: But at last all business was dispatched, and he departed, first asking pardon of the Prince Spitridates, for keeping him so long from the sight of the Princess Araminta, conjuring him to pardon the fault of an unhappy Lover, who was not so neer the sight of her he loved as he was. After this complement which Spitridates received with the same civility it was expressed, they rid towards the Castle where Cyrus had lodged Araminta: Tigranes knowing the violent disposition of his Brother Phraartes, would also make one in this journey, to prevent any unruly attempt, which his Brother might fall upon at the sight of Spitridates: As for Andramites, Ligdamis, and Parmenides, they waited upon Cyrus at this time, more for their sakes whom they loved, then for any other reason: Aglatidas, who was interest in all these Lovers, was very desirous to be a witness of all their joyes, so that he accompanied Cyrus as well as Anaxaris, Artabanes, Chrisantes, Hirmogenes, Leontidas, Megabises, and many others. This Prince took with him two hundred horse for his Guard, conceiving that there was not need of any more, though it was a daies journey in a Country newly conquered, for Croessus had no Troops in the field, the disorder was so great amongst the people, and the Dominion of Cyrus was hoped to be so gentle, that considering •he state of things, there was no fear of a|ny revolt: Also a great part of the way he was to go, was through the Camp, and their own Quarters, and by consequence less dangerous: But when these Princes were about fifty furlongs from Sardis, Cyrus met a servant of Artabases, unto whom he had com|mitted the Guard of Panthea and Araminta, when he displaced Araspes: This servant came to tell him from his Master, that the Prince Phraartes had carried away the Princess of Pontus: This servant had no sooner openly delivered his message unto Cyrus, but Spitridates gave so sad a cry, that he did most sensibly move the hearts of all who heard him unto pity: As for Cyrus, though he had only a most pure harmless affection unto Araminta, and pity of Spitridates, yet was he most extremely troubled at the accident; the sence of honour, mixing with the tenderness of his soul, caused him to resent very bitterly this little respect which Phraartes had of him in taking away a Princess who was his prisoner: Tigranes for his particular was exceedingly grieved at his Brothers fault; and it had been a difficult matter for a stranger, seeing these three Princes to know which of them was the Lover of the Princess who was carried away: Though the sorrows of Spitridates were a thousand times deeper then those of Cyrus and Tigranes, yet his eyes, his words, and all his actions, could not make it appear how great they were: After his first apprehension of sorrow and despair, he stood still more then a quarter of an hour in a Lethargy of Spirit, which made him hear what others said, as if he understood them not. During all this time of this sad silence, he had such a cloud of dismal melancholy in his face, as made it most apparent, that his soul was in most horrid torments: The first words he uttered were, Is it possible that Artabases, the fidelity of whose heart I make no doubt, should not prevent so great a misfortune? Sir, replied the servant, the Page 8 great wounds which he hath received upon this occasion, will sufficiently testifie, that he hath not failed in the duty which he owes you, and that his extraordinary valour did not at this time fail him: But how is it possible (replied Cyrus, and interrupted him) that Phraartes could execute his design? Sir (replied the servant) to acquaint you exactly how it was, be pleased to know, that when the news of taking Sardis came unto the Castle where we were, all the Souldiers in it looked upon those who were with you, as much more happy then themselves, because there they might enrich themselves with the plunder of that rich Town, insomuch as the very night following, the greater half disbanded themselves, intending to mingle confusedly amongst your victorious Troops, and share with them in their booty, so that by this means the Garrison was extremely weakened: My Master determined to acquaint you with it, but since he was to keep such as were prisoners, and no prisoners, such as you looked upon rather as their Protector, then as their Conquerour, he conceived that it was not necessary to acquaint you, especially since there was no likelihood that any should attempt their releasement. Thus fearing lest you should tax him with negligence, he would not advertise you of Souldiers his flight, but rested quiet as before. After this Sir, so it chanced, that the same day you went in quest of the Princess Mandana, the Prince Phraartes came to see the Princess Araminta, who gave him most cold entertainment. As soon as he had left her, she sent for my Master to complain unto him of you, saying, that she had entreated you to prevent Phraartes from seeing her; but he telling her, that you were ignorant of his coming, and that he came out of Sardis after your departure, it was some consolation unto her, conceiving then that she had more right to treat him ill: But truly, I being at the Princess Chamber to speak with Hesionide, when he came unto her the second time, I was a Witness that her language was so sharp, and bitter unto him, as I admire he would ever carry away that Princess, who expressed such a terrible aversion towards him. As soon as he was gone out of her Chamber, she charged me to tell my Master, that she conjured him not to let Phraartes enter any more into her Chamber: And the truth is Sir, Artabases went unto him, desiring him to see her no more, but to go out of the Castle. Phraartes as violent as his humour is, did upon this occasion curb himself, and answered him with so much civility, that he did not think it fit to force a man of his Quality out, without special order from you: And since he was then ignorant where you were, he could not advertise you of the passage; so that contenting himself with keeping Phraartes from going unto the Chamber of the Princess Araminta, and could not in any reason fear, that a Prince who had only one Page with him, would ever attempt any thing of force. During this time, Phraartes would often visit Cleonice, Aralice, Lycaste, Doralisa, Cydipe, Candiope, and Phoenice, with all the rest of the prisoners, discoursing continually with them of the Princess Araminta: When he was not with any of them, he would walk under the Window of that Princess, from whence he sometimes saw her against her will; for you know Sir, she lodged in a low Chamber towards the Garden: But whilst he carried it thus, his Page, who was very observant of him, was continually talking and playing with those Souldiers, who were off from the Guard. In this manner Sir did Phraartes behave himself until yesterday, when one of those you sent unto Epheesus, to Guides, to Cumes, to Miletus, and many other places, after you had met with the Prince Spitridates, came to this Castle, where he lodged, because it was in his way: So that he meeting with Phraartes, who was walking before the Gate, where by chance I was, I saw he knew him: He asked him from whence he came, and whether he went? The other answered, that you Sir had met with Spitridates, that he had told you how the King of Pontus was imbarqued with the Princess Mandana at a Port called Artames, that you treated that Prince with a thousand welcomes, and that you went both together unto Sardis. Phraartes no sooner understood that the Prince Spitridates was with you, but he changed countenance, causing him to repeat over again what before he told him: After which. . . but that Spitridates was the very same who was so much talked of for his language, which this man said was between him he had seen, and without all doubt he would be shortly with Araminta, and the Princess unto Sardis: So that it is probable, for this reason he that design which he was hatching when he came first to the Castle, because we understanding this morning, that his Page with that small number of Souldiers which we had, he had presents and gifts, for one of them who is now wounded, Page 9 hath discovered the truth unto us. But in conclusion Sir, not to abuse your patience any longer, presently after all the Ladies were retired unto their Chambers, and Artabases according to his custome had gone the Round, visited the Guards, and was entered into his Chamber, Phraartes came out with his men, from the place where we thought he had been asleep; so that assembling all the Souldiers whom he had suborned, the rest were so small a number, as they were not able to resist their companions: Also to affright them, he threatened to kill them. After which, dividing themselves, some went unto the Chamber of the Princess Araminta, and others unto the lodging of Artabases, to prevent him from relieving: And in short Sir, their design took such effect, as they carried away the Princess, and we not able to hinder them; not but that the noise which they made in breaking the Windows of the Chamber, and the cries of the Ladies did awaken us at the first. Artabases was wounded at the beginning of the tumult, and some felt the weight of his arm, who would have kept him from coming out to the relief of the Princess: yet at last he received so many Wounds, and lost so much blood, that he fell down as dead, and was no longer able to oppose the violence of Phraartes: In short, he has thriven in his unjust design, and hath made use of some of my Masters Horses to carry away the Princess, and indeed leaving none that were able to follow, for he mounted upon them all the Complies of his Crime. I shall not relate unto you Sir, the cries and tears of Cleonice, Doralisa, Phoenice, Candiope, Lycaste, Arpalice, and all the rest of the Ladies: But give me leave to tell you Sir, that as soon as my Master came unto himself, he commanded me to get a horse at the next house, and to come in all haste to acquaint you with this disastrous adventure, and his sorrows, which Sir is such, as he would not let me stay a minute to get his Wounds dressed, though I assure you there was great need of it. As long as this discourse of the servant lasted, the soul of Spitridates was in torment, his sorrows for the carrying away the Princess was not all the cause of it, for many pangs of an unjust jealousy of Cyrus began to revive, and his fear was, that it was Cyrus who caused Araminta to be carried away: For since he did not yet know that Phraartes was in Love with her, he could not devise what motive should induce him unto that act of Violence. On the other side, the sorrow and anger which he saw in the eyes of Cyrus, did thwart his unjust opinion: Also considering that Artabases was very much Wounded, he could not understand why Cyrus should let such a man to perish, whom he esteemed worthy to have the Guard of two great Princesses: However, though he saw some reason on the one side, and no appearance of any on the other, yet he could not compose his resolutions, and his soul suffered more torment, then his tongue was able to express: But these jealous thoughts had no long time of resting in his heart, for as soon as the servant of Artabases had ended his relation of all the business, Cyrus expressed himself so obligingly, so generously, and so tenderly unto Spitridates, that his candid language had a more prevalent operation, then reason only and truth had, for he did quite eradicate those sparks of jealousy which began to kindle in the mind of that Prince, and which would not suffer him to complain against the cruelty of his adventure, not well knowing whether he should quarrel with Cyrus, as the Ravisher of Araminta, and as his Rival, or complain against him as his friend, and as the Protector of his Princess. But when he heard Tigranes ask Cyrus and him pardon for the violent crime of his Brother, and said, That he himself would be the first who would help to punish him, and that he would never leave Cyrus until he had found that Princess which he had lost: And when he understood from the mouth of Cyrus, that the Prince Phraartes fell in Love with the Princess Araminta, as soon as she came unto Artaxates, his soul found some ease amidst his sorrows; and then he began to hearken and answer unto the sincere protestations which Cyrus made unto him: You know (said this free-minded Prince) That I am more obliged then any other to interest my self in what concerns you, since I owe my life unto the Queen Arbiana your Mother, at that time when she received me into her house in Bithynia: For though she did think me to be her Son, yet I must set a value upon her cares of me; and truly she treated me so generously after the discovery of her error, that though there were no other reasons then this, yet I should think my self obliged to serve you with my real affection: But generous Prince, I have more prevalent reasons then that; your own merit, Noble Prince, hath arguments enough to oblige me; the Virtue of the Princess Araminta requires my best services, and the injury which I have received from Phraartes, makes the matter as much more as yours, since the Prince Tigranes, before whom I speak, is of a generous soul, I am confident he will allow Page 10 me to complain against his Brother: But not to lose a minute of precious time, let us hasten unto the place where the crime was committed, and try if we can find which way they took: Then would Spitridates have dissuaded Cyrus from going any further towards the Castle, desiring of him only fifty horse, with whom he himself only would pursue the Ravisher, but Cyrus would not be dissuaded: So that all of them setting in all haste forward, they came thither betimes, where they understood more then they could by the servant of Artabases, whom they found so ill of his Wounds, that Cyrus had not power to accuse him for not acquainting him with the flight of his Souldiers, which was the cause of the Princess Araminta's being carried away: Spitridates not being able to rest all night in the Castle, intreated Cyrus that he might go out the same night, and that he would lend him fifty horses: Cyrus then excused himself a thousand times unto that Prince, in that he could not quit the interests he had in Mandana for his, and in that he should part from him before he had recovered Araminta, conjuring him to acquaint him with all passages concerning her, to the end he might send him an Army if need were, protesting, that there was nothing which he would not do for his satisfaction, and the liberty of so virtuous a Princess; adding, that since Tigranes would go with him, there would be less need of his valour. Spitridates at the first did oppose the intentions of Tigranes to follow him; but afterwards, considering that his presence might be useful, he accepted his offer, and went together, after they had rested their horses some two or three hours, during which time they had intelligence which way Phraartes did first take: But in lieu of fifty horses, Cyrus gave a hundred unto Spitridates, who would not see those Ladies who were in the Castle, for his soul was too much perplexed for any complements. When this Prince was ready to take horse, Cyrus embraced him, and told him, that he was sorry there was as great a resemblance in their misfortunes as in their faces, and wished he might be more happy in releasing Araminta, then himself had been in releasing the Princess Mandana; after which, these two Princes parted. Spitridates was no sooner gone, but Cyrus resolved to return unto Sardis the next morning betimes, and therefore went to see all the Ladies in the Castle, and to dispose them for a removal unto Sardis, and also to cheer them up after the disaster of the Princess Araminta, knowing very well, that they all did most tenderly love her: He found them all in the Chamber of Lycaste, where Andramites, Parmanides, and Ligdamis were before him, for they were not able to be any longer in a place where the persons whom they loved were, and not to see them. Though Cyrus was full of sorrow, both for his own misfortunes and his friends, yet he carried himself with such civility towards all the Ladies, as there was not one who did not highly applaud him.

After he had in a condoling manner spoke concerning the Princess Araminta's carrying away, he told Lycaste, that to prevent the like misfortune in Arpalice, her Lovers must be agreed, and their differences ended, and therefore he conjured him to return unto Sardis; speaking also afterwards in a most obliging manner unto Arpalice, Cydipe, and Candiope: Afterwards he talked a while unto Doralisa and Phoenice, concerning the Queen of Susiana, and also spoke something unto Leonice in favour of Ligdamis. But Mandana being the principal aim of all his thoughts, he asked them all in general, Whether they did not pity him in his sufferings of so many such sorrows as Spitridates had now tryall of? And there was not one amongst them, who did not employ their best eloquence to persuade Cyrus, that they did extremely interest themselves in the misfortunes of that Princess and himself. Cleonice among the rest, to testify her zeal, said, That as oft as she remembered how and by whom the Princess Mandana had been carried away, she conceived such an extreme hatred against men, as there was not above two or three men in the whole Universe, whom she did not hate: Really, said she, I do not think there is any such pernicious Villains in the World, as those who carry away Women without their consents; I will not except so much as Assassins, Poisoners, or Traytors; for revenge, or such like, may sometimes have causes so considerable, as may justify, or at least extenuate the most bloody effects: But can any one persuade me, that it is a good reason for the carrying away of a Woman, to say he was in Love with her? It is impossible, for where one loves another, he will do nothing but what shall make himself loved, and not such things as will procure hatred: I must confess, (said Doralisa, and interrupted her) That to look upon the matter as you do, you have cause to hate all men: But to consider it as I do, I think that I have cause to say, that by the same reason I should despise almost all Women; and I think my self able to maintain, that if Page 11 there never had been any who had pardoned their Ravishers, the Princess Mandana, nor the Princess Araminta, had never been taken away: But since every man can fetch some example of some Lady or other, who was appeased after she was taken away, they flatter themselves in a hope to thrive no worse then they did who carried them away: So that it may well be said, that it is the weakness of some Women which caused the insolent boldness of men, for never any did attempt the committing of a crime, without hopes of thriving by it: This which you say, replied Cleonice, Does not justify men, but only excuse them: 'Tis true, said Doralisa, But they have something to say for themselves, more then Women have who pardons those who take them away, since, as I conceive, they are without all manner of excuse: What can they say to authorize their imbecility, but that their souls were of a base mould, and their hearts pusillanimous? Are they not Mistresses of their own lives, though not of their liberties, in case a[n]y violence be offered? But certainly those who can pardon such a crime, can pardon any thing else: For my part, I must confess ingenuously, That I had much rather be accused for voluntary abandoning my heart, unto a man whom I should think worthy to enjoy it, then suffer my self to be perswaded by a man who treated me ill, and carried me away: I conceive the opinion of Doralisa to be so generous and reasonable, replied Cyrus, that I am perswaded there is not a Lady in all the company who will contradict her: I assure you Sir, replied she, that peradventure there is some one who will allow of it, rather out of respect to you, then out of her own opinion: I would gladly know, said Arpalice, Whom it is you suspect not to be of your opinion: Since I will assure you, that it is not your self, replied Doralisa, and since I confess my self to be perswaded that you vvould never pardon Menecrates, if he should carry you away: You need not importune me a[n]y further, and to speak sincerely, I do not know: The scope of what I said was only this, that I verily believe there are few Women of firm and generous souls, and that I might the more applaud the illustrious Mandana, who though she hath had three of the greatest Princes of the World asking her pardon for carrying her away, and yet vvould never grant them, chusing rather to see all Asia in a flame, then yeeld unto the desires, sighs• and tears of her Ravishers: For my part, I do confess, that when I had the honour to see her at Susa, I was more ravished at the constancy of her soul, then at the charms of her beauty or Wit, though she be the most absolute accomplished Princess of the World: But to testifie, that all Women are not of my opinion, Give me leave to tell you, that some of the Queen of Susiana's Women, finding the King of Pontus to be a very accomplished man, and seeing in Love and much perplexed, they murmured against the stubbornness of the Princess Mandana; and wished her of a little more flexible nature: I beseech you, said Pherenice, declare that I was not of that opinion: I do not remember you were, replied Doralisa, but though you were, the illustrious Cyrus would think never the worse of you; for then you had not the honour to know him: Doubtless I should not, replied Cyrus; But I do confess, I had rather she were not of that mind; and you have much more obliged me then I thought I was, by acquainting me with your opinion: If you be obliged, replied Licasta, unto all those vvho vvish the Ravishers of Mandana may perish, and that you may be happy, you are obliged unto the greatest part of all Asia: Since I do believe Madam, replied Cyrus, that you measure the thoughts of others by your own, your expression doth infinitely both please and oblige me: But because I would not be too troublesome unto her who is a wisher of my good fortune, by staying too late, I shall take my leave of her until to morrow at night, when I shall hope for the honour of seeing her at Sardis, with all this honoured company, whom Andramites and Ligdamis will convey thither: Methinks Sir (replied Doralisa cunningly) That since it is requisite your Convoy and Guard should be stronger then ours, you vvore best to take Andramites along vvith you, and leave only Ligdamis vvith us: Since I think my self a little better versed in the Orders of War then you are, replied Cyrus and smiled, I hope you will excuse me, if I do not follow your advise in this, though I will obe <...> in every thing else: In saying so, Cyrus rise up, without staying for the thanks of Andramites, and after he had saluted all the Ladies with extraordinary grace and <...> retired unto the Chamber which was prepared for him, where he reposed himself <...> break of day, and then commanding a care to be had of Artabases, he departed, but was with a melancholy soul, for thinking that this accident unto a Prince whom he so much esteemed, and unto a Prince who resembled him, vvvas a very bad Omen; and considering, that the advantage of the Princess Araminta, Page 12 was now out of his power, it grieved him very much, for she vvvas Sister to the King of Pontus, and was a very good Pawn which he had lost, so that every step of way was a fresh thought of melancholy: Anaxaris kept the nearest him, and to him he spoke the most that day. After a long descent upon his misfortunes, Cyrus upon a sudden began to slack his pace, and looking very obligingly upon him: How long valiant stranger (said he unto him) Will you hide your self from me, and put me to the necessity of saying, that you are the man whom of all the world I know best, and know least? I am most confident there is none knows your worth better then I do; I know you are of an excellent composure, I am acquainted with the acuteness and excellency of your Spirit; Generosity shines in your soul, your valour is absolutely Heroique; but for all this, I know not who you are, nor know whom to ask; therefore, dear Anaxaris, I beseech you give me leave to ask the question, and let me not be denied: I wish Sir, I could deserve those commendations you are pleased to give me: And I wish also, that I were able to satisfy your curiosity: But since it is convenient for me to conceal my self, as since it will not at all avail you to know, I hope you will not put me to necessity of disobeying you: Though all this doth but augment my curiosity, replied Cyrus, yet because I love you, I will check my desires, upon condition you will be perswaded, that my greatest reason which moved me to desire the knowledge of vvhom you vvvere, vvvas my desires of serving you: Anaxaris returned thanks unto Cyrus for the honour which he did him, but it was in such terms as perswaded that Prince, that Anaxaris was of such a Quality, as was more used to receive then give thanks. Since now they drew neer the Camp, Cylrus, though of giving out several orders as he passed, he visited many of the chief Commanders, so that it was almost night when he came to Sardis: At his entrance in he met Mazares, who came to meet him, and they saluted with the same civility which they usually shewed unto each other, but in such a melancholy manner, as made it manifest there was no news to be heard of Mandana: I will not ask you (generous Rival) said Cyrus unto him, Whether you know any thing concerning our Princess, for your sadness speaks you do not: 'Tis very true Sir (replied Mazares) I do not know any thing of the Princess more then what you knew yesterday when you parted; But I know another thing which will be a Wonder unto you, and which I will immediately tell you: Since it is not any thing which relates unto the Princess, replied Cyrus, you may tell me what you please, and I shall hearken unto it without any impatience: I do not say, replied Malzares, That it does not relate unto Mandana, but only that I do not know any thing of that Princess, for if I had said so, I had said untruly, since it is to be believed, that the King of Assyria is gone to seek her: Is the King of Assyria gone? (replied Cyrus with astonishment?) Yes Sir, answered Mazares, One of his men whom he left with a Letter for you, told me, that he himself took horse about four hours since, and that he intended to ride all night, and do what he could to be the first who should know where the Princess Mandana is.

Cyrus no sooner heard this strange news, but he changed colour, and cholor began to mix with his sorrows: He was afraid the King of Assyria had received some secret intelligence of the place where Mandana was: It vexed him that the violence of his nature should prompt him unto a thing which would be taken for excess of Love: He was afraid that he would find out some wayes to come unto Mandana, and deliver her, though there was no likelihood of it: As for Mazares, his thoughts were as turbulent as those of Cyrus; for though his Love was without any hope, and though he was resolved to look no further then the liberty of Mandana, yet many times his heart would sparkle out some hatred of his Rival, and Love of the Princess Mandana; so that he stood in need of all his reason to expel and smother these gusts of his old passion. At this time he had no leisure to vent his thoughts, for Cyrus had so great a desire to see what the King of Assyria had writ, that he sent in all hast for the man who had the Letter, appointing him to be brought unto the Cittadel, vvither he vvvent, to expect him vvith an impatience suitable to the grandure of his Love; yet he was not long in that restless mood, for the King of Assyria's Officer, knowing that Cyrus was returned to Sardis, came unto him at the same instant that he was sent for; so that within a quarter of an hour after Cyrus came to the Cittadel, he received the Letter, which he so impatiently longed for: He opened the Letter in all hast, and read it so fast, as if he would have known all the Contents of it in one instant; yet notwithstanding his impatient hast, he was long in reading it; for the King of Assyria writing it in hast, the Character was not legible, yet in conclusion he picked out these words.

The King of Assyria to the too happy CYRUS.

NEver think that the design which I have undertaken to go in quest of the Princess, shall make me decline the least jot from our old conditions; on the contrary, leaving you in the head of a hundred thousand men, and I going alone to discover if I can where the Princess it, the confidence which I have in your Word, obligeth you to keep exact touch with me: As for my part, never fear that I will fail, since a King without a Kingdome or Army, is not in a condition of daring to do it, though he would. Give me leave then to go and be your Spy, since it is the pleasure of Fate I can do nothing else, as long as we believed the Princess Mandana to be in Armenia, or knew that she was in Sardis, the hope of delivering her, did suffer me to indure the sight of you and Mazares: But now, since we know not where she is, and since I shall be less useless in the Army, then perhaps I shall be elsewhere, I will quit my self from the sight of my Rivals, not but that I know the height of your generosity in all that relates unto me: But I had rather that the Princess Mandana should accuse you of too little Love unto her, in your too much civility unto me, then she should accuse me of too little affection unto her, in the too acknowledgment which I have of you: Therefore I leave it to the publike voge, either to commend you, or blame me for what we do: However, once more, I incite you to the observation of our conditions, and remember alwayes, that you can never enjoy Mandana, until you have ruined

The King of Assyria.

After Cyrus had read this Letter, his soul was a little more at ease, although he found many things which nettled him, and which revived in his heart that old hatred which he had towards this furious Rival, when he passed under the name of Philidaspes, and when he himself under the name of Artamenes; but his comfort was, that he perceived the King of Assyria's departure was only an effect of his phantastical humourt, and of his violent temper, not that he knew any particulars of the Princess Mandana; yet the remembrance of that favourable Oracle which this Prince received from the Temple of Jupiter, Belas at Babylon, did somewhat sting his apprehension: And since he could not think upon that Oracle, but he must needs also remember that sad answer vvwhich the Silbel gave him, these thoughts revived some fears in him; yet notwithstanding, when he considered, that the plausible Oracle of Croessus had been ill interpreted, his hopes revived. In the mean time, since he found extraordinary virtue to be in the Prince Mazares, and since he did not then look upon him as his Rival, he shewed him the King of Assyria's Letter, as if he had been his intimate friend. These two Princes did discourse a while upon the violent humour of their Rival, and of the design which he could have; and the more they considered it, the more they believed it to be a meer Vagary of his hummour. As they were in these thoughts, Feraulas came in, who came to acquaint Cylrus, that he had brought Arianita and Timonide unto Sardis; and that he had brought that Lady unto the Palace, unto whom Cylenise had given half of her Chamber. Cyrus, who loved all that belonged to his Princess, was very glad to know that Arianita was bet[te]r then when he last saw her, though she was not alwayes favourable unto him; and he appointed Feraulas to have a care of her, desiring also Tegeus, vvhom he savv in his Chamber among the rest, to tell Cylenise, that he took all her good offices done unto Arianita, as done unto himself. Presently after, Ligdamis and Arianita came in, who told Cyrus, that all the Ladies which he savv the night before, vvvere come to Sardis; and since they had no desire to separate, they vvvere all lodged at the house of Licasta's Sister. But Cyrus not liking that, he sent to entreat them they vvwould be pleased to lodg in the Palace, vvvhich vvvas of capacity enough to lodg them all conveniently; vvvhich offer, after once refusal, they accepted; So as it may vvvell be said, That never vvvas there such a company of Beauties as this was in the Palace of Croessus: 'Tis very true, every one of them was not equally satisfied: There was three of them who were unfortunate, and the rest very happy: Timaretta was all hopes, and had nothing to fear: Sesostris was living, Sesostris was faithful, and Heracleon was dead; so that nothing wanted to compleat their contentment, but to return into Aegypt, where Amasis did earnestly desire them. On the other side, Croessus was as unfortunate, as Timaretta was happy; and Page 14 all his consolation was in the generosity of his Conquerour. The Prince Myrsiles, though he lost the hopes of a Crown, yet obtained of the Gods the liberty of his speech; but he only employed the use of that Organ in lamenting his misfortune, it was a benefit too dear to be sensible of. As for the Princess Palmis, since Artamas proved so highly ge[n]erous and constant; and finding Croessus was well received, and the King of Phrigia was not opposite to his design, she had reason to be very well satisfied, if she could have without sorrow seen the King her Father, and the Prince her Brother turned out of the Throne, and made Captives. As for Ligdamis and Cleonice, they were the happiest of all, and enjoyed all the sweets of a most pure love and friendship: As for Arpalice, the incertainty of what agreement Cyrus would make between Thrasimedes and Menecrates, did keep her in a restless condition, though yet she hoped, that at the request of Andramites, he would favour the first of these: Cydipe for her part, she was not sorry to see that her beauty did eclipse that of Cleoxene, in the phancy of Parmenides: Candiope thought strange she could hear no news of Philiston: And to say truth, there were very few who had not their perplexities, not only in the Palace and the Cittadel, but also in all the great Town; for certainly, there was then a strange kind of tumultuous constell[ati]on, which moved those who had not business, to make some; and questionless every one was a sufferer, either in the person of their friends, or their own: Yet the behav[i]our of Cyrus towards Croessus, and the Prince Myrsiles, did so win the hearts of the people, that he was as safe in Sardis as he could be, either in Persipolis, or Ecbatan. The next morning Lycaste, and all the Beauties who came to Sardis, went to visit the two Princesses, who received them according to their deserts. The Prince Myrsiles, who had the liberty to go unto the Chamber of the Princess his Sister, with whom all this pleasant company was, he was there also, but his design was only to see Doralisa, whom he had not seen since she went from Sardis to Susa with Panthea: So that after he had addressed his complement unto the Princess Timaretta, and whispered with the Princess Palmis, he asked their permission to go neerer Doralisa, since she was then far off the Princesses, and busie in talk with Candiope, she heard not what he said: So that when he came neer her, she thought he would have expressed himself by the help of that Table Book, which heretofore he used too wittily, when Aesope was in the Lydian Court; for though she heard he was not mute, yet she could not imagine that he could speak, or at least speak well: The cause of her error was, because she did not consider that he was never deaf: She was extremely surprized; when she heard him speak better then most did, who spoke alwayes: So that when she heard his first complement, in lieu of answering, or testifying her sorrows for the misfortunes of his house and Country, she could not chuse but go back, and look upon him with admiration: How Sir, said she unto him, Is it not above five or six daies since you could speak? No, no, it is impossible: Most certainly you spoke long in secret, otherwise you could not speak so well in publique: And certainly you have been silent for the time past; purposely to put all other to silence for the future: Your language, replied the Prince Myrsiles, Is not perhaps so pleasing as you think; for truly these excessixe applaude you give me, does argue, that my silence did much displease you, and was troublesome, since you think this little which I speak to be worthy of admiration. Doralisa, who was recollecting her self, considered that she had commanded this Prince too much: And to carry it more prudently, it were better to commend him less, and lament his misfortunes more: So that to repair her error, she altered his discourse, and began to talk with him upon all the misfortunes of Panthea, and of all the alterations which she found in Lidia at her return: However, said she unto him, You have this advantage, that your Conquerour is the most generous Prince in the World: 'Tis true, replied Myrsiles, But for all that, most amiable Doralisa, The King my Father is the most miserable, since it is a very great misfortune for those who are used to conser favours upon others, to be put unto the necessity of receiving them from another: Yet this is some consolation, that we are subjected unto one of the greatest Princes of the World, and unto one whom you esteem, and unto one whom I know you are obliged: 'Tis very true Sir, answered Doralisa, I am obliged unto him, but I wish that you were not in a condition to be so; and that on the contrary, the King had obliged unto him, which he might have done, by rendering back the Princess Mandana. What's past, replied Myrsiles, cannot be recalled; and in lieu of acknowledging those faults which cannot be repaired, we must endeavour to indure our bad fate, like men who are worthy of better: And to testifie that I do all I can to sweeten my miseries, I protest unto you, I find some Page 15 sweetness to think, that the Gods, who once had made me above the Quality of the almiabile Doralisa, hath now made me her equal: Oh Sir (replied Doralisa, and interrupted him) Your civility is excessive; and it had been a better wish, to have desired the Gods, that I might be exalted unto your Quality, then to say you find any sweetness in their debasing you down unto mine: Since the first of these is not in my power, and the other really is so, you need not wonder, I should chuse rather to tell the thoughts of my heart, then to trouble my self in making unprofitable wishes. Doralisa was going to answer when Cyrus entred, and broke off their discourse: but that which most surprized Lycaste, Arpalice, Cydipe, and most of all Candiope, was to see Philistion enter amongst those who accompanied him; they could not imagine so readily as they wished, why he would not see them before he saw Cyrus; they durst not change their places to speak unto him, nor could he come handsomely unto them, though he much desired it: But presently after the Prince Sesostris entred, and some of those who were with Candiope went out. Philistion at last came up, and talked with as much delight, as before his impatience was great. Candiope for her part received him with abundance of joy, insomuch as it was easie for Doralisa to observe, that there was a greater love between them, then Candiope had spoke of, when she related the adventures of Thrasimedes and Arpalice, for she took notice that Philistion was so taken up with looking upon Candiope, with speaking and hearkning unto her, that he never so much as thought of any civility unto Lycaste, Arpalice, and Cydipe who were close by him, and it was not long before she told Candiope what she thought. Doralisa then hearing the name of Philistion, when Cyrus presented him unto Palmis, and knew very well that it was the same Philistion who shared in the adventures of Arpalice, seeing with what earnestness and affection Candiope and he talked together, she went towards Candiope, and pulling her gently by the Govvn; I pray tell me (said she cunningly) Whether this Philistion unto whom you speak, is that Philistion, who is the friend of Thrasimedes, and who counterfeited Arcon so well, as for my part I cannot imagine it is he. Candiope was so surprized at the discourse of Doralisa, that she blushed, imagining that it was because the ayre and garb of Philistion did not please her, and that the Idea which he had formed by the recital which she had made of him to her, was more advantageous for Philistion, then that conceipt which himself begot: So that being much ashamed, and fuller of anger then she would suffer to appear, which yet appeared more then she would have it, she asked her friend, Why she made a question, Whether he she saw was that same Philistion of whom she heard her speak: The reason why I did not believe it to be him, replied Doralisa, Because you told me, that there was only terms of esteem betwixt you and him, on a kind of slight affection, which you could not phrase either Love or friendship; and which was of such a nature only, as that you would speak well of each other in all places, and this is all the proofs of his affection you ever had from him; So that finding in the face of this Philistion the joy of a Lover, who sees his Mistress after a long absence, you may well pardon me if I doubted whether Philistion was Philistion: If you believe, as you say, (replied Candiope, and both smiled and blushed) You were very malicious to interrupt me: To deserve the title which you give me (answered she) I profess that I will not suffer you to speak with Philistion in private all this day, unless you entreat me to let you talk with him: Then I will entreat you, replied Candiope, For there are some things of importance which he began to tell me, the which I must needs know, because they will facilitate the agreement between Thrasimedes and Menecrates: No, no, replied Doralisa, That shall not serve your turn; for if you do not entreat me, and confess that I do you a pleasure in it in consideration of your self, I will not let you be in quietness: I beseech you let it satisfie (replied she and smiled) That I entreat you only for the Love of Philistion: I will, answered Doralisa, Upon condition you will promise me, to tell me what he saith unto you: I do protest I will, said Candiope, and turned towards Philistion, who really had something to impart unto her, which did conduce to the reconciliation of Thrasimedes and Menecrates, though Candiope said so unto Doralisa, as an excuse of her self. Also after that this counterfeit Acon had expressed himself as fully as Love could prompt a Lover after a long absence, and had assured her of the fidelity of his heart, and protested that 'he never saw her so fair and lovely in all his life, as at this his return: Then he told her the reason why he did not follow Thrasimedes, when he came into Sardis, which was, because he was forced to stay in Halicarnassus, by reason of some Wounds he had received in a combat, in which Page 16 he was engaged, concerning the interests of both Arpalice, and of one of his Sisters. Candiope not comprehending how Arpalice, who was of Patara, could have any interest mixed with a Sister of Philistion, who was of Halicarnassus, seemed to be much surprized: But for her satisfaction, Philistion told her, how he had a Sister whose name was Androclea, who was loved by a man of Quality in this Town, named Ephialtes, whom she much disliked, but durst not shew it, because she had an imperious Mother, who would needs have her marry him; that whilst Ephialtes was absent, Menecrates and Parmenides chanced to come unto Halicarnassus: When were they in that Town? (said Candiope and interrupted him.) They were there, replied Philistion, after their departure from Arpalice, and whilst Thrasimedes and I were at Patara; So that whilst Thrasimedes fell in Love with the Mistress of Menecrates, Menecrates fell in Love with my Sister at Halicarnassus: Was Menecrates in love with your Sister? (replied Candiope.) Doubtless he was, replied Philistion, and the worst was, my Sister had as great an inclination to him, as she had aversion unto Ephialtes; So that she being easily perswaded unto a thing which she much desired, she believed he loved her, and he quickly perceived that she did not hate him; and by this means there grew so great an amity betwixt them, as to impart all their secrets unto each other: This being so, my Sister acquainted him that her Mother would marry her against her will unto Ephialtes, and Menecrates also acquainted her, that his friends would likewise engage him unto a Lady of Licia, whom he loved not. Thus this conformity augmenting their affections, they grew to such a point, as to promise each other to use their best endeavours that they might marry together; So that when Menecrates departed from Halicarnassus, he told my Sister, That he went to use all his endeavours for breaking off with Arpalice, and that as soon as it was done, he would return unto our Town: But he being of such an humour, as very often to begin Love phantastically, and so to end it, he forgot my Sister as soon as he was out of her sight; for indeed you know how he behaved himself at his return to Patara, how Cydipe for a while did take him, and how the love of Thrasimedes to Arpalice revived the love of Menecrates unto the Beauty. In the mean time, my Sister being nothing of the temper of Menecrates, when Ephialtes came to her, he was coarsely entertained, and all the authority of a Mother could not compel Androclea to marry him. This was the state of things, most amiable Candiope, when Thrasimedes and I returned from Halicarnassus, after we had left you at Patara: Since the Love of Menecrates and my Sister was closely carried. I was ignorant of it at my return; but afterwards, my mother dying, as well as the Father of Thrasimedes, and Ephialtes addressing himself unto me for my Sister, as one whom my Mother had promised unto him, I pressed Androclea to tell me why she would not marry him? And she being driven to the necessity of giving me a reason for her proceedings, she confessed the whole truth unto me. I no sooner knew this, but designing to advance the marriage of Thrasimedes with Arpalice, and break off that of Menecrates and her, I consulted with Thrasimedes, and told Ephialtes, that not being of the same humour of my Mother, nor having the same power over my Sister which she had, I could not force her to marry him; and therefore I wished him to desist from any further thoughts of it, intending afterwards to return unto Patara, and to carry Androclea thither also, under a pretence of consulting with the Oracle, to the end I might summon Menecrates unto his promise, and to trouble all his designs. But Ephialtes would not permit me to do as I intended, for he being of a most violent and hasty temper, and deep in Love, he could not brook my refusal of forcing my Sister to accomplish my Mother's promise; So that he sent me a challenge, and we fought, unknown to Thrasimedes, I had the good fortune to get the better, and to make him quit his pretences; but I had the misfortune also to be much Wounded, and could not follow Thrasimedes when he got into Sardis, which doubtless I had done, if my hurts had permitted me. In the mean time, since I was not able to live out of your sight, and since I had promised Thrasimedes to make use of the Love which Menecrates bore unto my Sister, I brought Androclea with me, intending to leave her at a Frontire Town of our Country which joyns upon Licia, and which is not far from hence, where we had some friends, to the end that when I had found Menecrates, she might be neerer the place where I knew he would be: But hearing by the publique talk, that Sardis was taken, and also by a Halicarnassean Soldier, who was returning unto his Country loadened with booty, who said, That Thrasimedes and Menecrates were both in the power of Cyrus, and that there were some Lician Ladies which went out of Sardis, who were sharers in the interest of those two prisoners, Page 17 I collected that it must needs be you; So that without more delay, I took a resolution of coming hither, and bringing my Sister with me; So that taking the benefit of a Convoy of Cyrus his Troops, we came safely to Sardis without any danger; but since no strangers were suffered to enter, whose names were not presented unto Cyrus, I answered unto those who asked mine, by the name of Philistion, and that I was friend unto a valiant man who came into Sardis, and who Cyrus treated so well: They told that Prince positively the very same words which I told them: so that the name of Thrasimedes, caused me to be brought unto him, after I had conducted my Sister unto the place where the stranger Ladies lodged. This Prince received me very well, and told me, that I came opportunely to be a witness of that accords which he would that day make between Thrasimedes and Menecrates. I no sooner heard this, but I took the liberty to tell him, that he could not justly do it, unless first he did me the honour to give me a little audience, and he consenting unto it, the same hour I told him what now I told you: Afterwards, he commanded me to follow him hither, telling me, that he would go unto the Chamber of Lycaste, whether he would have Thrasimedes and Menecrates brought, to the end he might reconcile their differences: The matter will not be difficult, replied Candiope, after this which you have told me; but I do conceive it requisite, that Lycaste and Arpalice know what you have told me, before any accommodation be made. Philistion, conceiving what Candiope did say to be reasonable, permitted her to advertise her friends of what she thought fit: Before Cyrus began to speak of the business between Thrasimedes and Menecrates: And Candiope had no sooner imparted it unto Lycaste and Arpalice; but Cyrus addressing himself to the first of these, I intended, said he unto her, to have come unto your Chamber, purposely to endeavour the reconciling of two friends, by setting Thrasimedes and Menecrates at liberty: But since there is some difficulty in the business, to conceive it were more expedient to take the advice to these two great Princes, before whom I speak, and of these two Princes, upon condition notwithstanding, that the fair Arpalice consent unto it: Arpalice, replied Lycaste, is not so accustomed unto her own will, that it is necessary to consult with her thereupon: therefore Sir, I beseech you follow the Dictates of your own will without any further information of hers; And indeed Sir you may judg by the blushes in her cheeks, that she has not confidence enough to tell you what she thinks: I can desire nothing Sir (replied Arpalice modestly) But what shall please you, and therefore it is not necessary my words should express my thoughts: Since so (said Cyrus unto Lycaste) I beseech you Madam, let the matter be before such an illustrious company: My will Sir, said she unto him, is what shall most please you, hoping that the more illustrious persons there are, who shall give their votes in favour of him who shall be happy, the more patient will he be, against whom the sentence is given. After this, Cyrus who had a most admirable memory, and rare eloquence, and who knew how to compose the largest adventure in few words, began succinctly to relate the whole business of Thrasimedes and Menecrates, which he received either from Andramytes, or Doralisa, or Philition, bringing the story unto the very day when Thrasimedes would have got into Sardis, which was besieged, because he thought his Mistress to be there, and when Menecrates would have come out, because he thought she was not there; adding also, that the Sister of Philition was in Sardis: You remember Madam, (said he, and addressed his discourse unto the Princess) That Menecrates and Arpalice were designed by their Parents to marry: That Arpalice cannot confirm her mind unto the will of her parents without extremity of violence upon her self: That Menecrates hath a long time slighted her, and also played away her picture unto Thrasimedes: Moreover, he seems to have renounced all right unto that fair Lady, in promising the Sister of Philition to do all he could to break off with her: That Thrasimedes hath ever loved Arpalice since first he knew her, and that Menecrates never began to love her, until he began to fear lest Arpalice should love Thrasimedes. Then after Cyrus had set forth the interest of both these persons unto those who knew it not, and had revived it in the memory of those who did know it, he thought it requisite to see the Sister of Philition, and therefore he sent immediately for her: Though Androclea had no mind to appear amongst so great a company, yet the affection of her soul unto Menecrates, and her desire to break off this marriage with Arpalice, prompted her to appear; and the sooner, because her Brother, in point of honour, and for her interest, and that of Thrasimedes, did extremely press her unto it: So that after she had employed a quarter of an hour in dressing her self, so that it might appear her beauty deserved not to be slighted, she went unto the Page 18 Palace of Croesus, being conducted by Philition; But she entered with so good a grace unto the Chamber of the Princess Palmis, where all the illustrious company was assembled, that she did attract the eyes of all those who were present: Androclea was handsome, and of a large stature, her aspect was very Majestical with a mixture of sweetness with it; and though every particular feature was alike beautiful, yet she had the air of so high a beauty. After she was come into the Chamber of the Lidian Princess, and that Cyrus had very civilly received her, he presented her unto Timaretta and Palmis. As soon as she entered, she looked about her, to see if she could know Arpalice, by the description of Philition. Arpalice for her part, having a great desire to see Androclea, who had the advantage to move the heart of Menecrates before her, she did most attentively look upon her; so that looking accidentally upon each other at once, and Androclea believing her she looked upon to be Arpalice, so it chanced that they both blushed, and Cyrus perceived it: I see very well (said he unto them) That there is no need you should be named unto each other, and that you know one another before you be acquainted: Since I would excuse Menecrates, replied Androclea, I shall be very glad that so perfect a beauty as this Lady I look upon hath caused his inconstancy, upon condition, that this inconstancy do cease: The applauses which you give me, replied Arpalice, may well make me blush for shame; but in lieu of rejecting them, give me leave to tell you, that I am much joyed, to see how according to all likelihood Menecrates will no sooner see you, but he will repent himself of the injustice which he hath done you, and the trouble he hath put me unto. After this Cyrus, who desired to be speedily delivered of all business that might hinder him from the thoughts of Mandana, began to ask Arpalice What were her interests in this business? But this discreet Lady answered him, That she had only two: The first, To be dispensed from that engagement wherein the testament of Menecrates, his Parents and hers, had brought her with him: The other, That by his wisdom and prudence, he would prevent Thrasimedes and Menecrates from fighting. After this, Arpalice was silent; though if she had humored the secret motions of her heart, she would have urged the matter more pressingly in advantage of Thrasimedes, but her modesty did check her. After this, Cyrus asked Androclea, What she pretended unto? I pretend, said she, unto nothing, but to punish Menecrates, for not beginning to love the fair Arpalice as soon as he began to know her: That you will oblige him to keep his word with one, whose merit and beauty is much inferior unto hers whom he hath preferred before her; but I think him obliged to love her only, because he hath promised: After this, Cyrus willed Philition to give his opinion, who being no less bold then generous, told him freely, That since he was the friend of Thrasimedes, he would to his utmost oppose the Marriage of Menecrates with Arpalice: And moreover, he being the Brother of Androclea, he could not endure it; and therefore Menecrates must of necessity prepare himself to fight, both against Thrasimedes and himself, if he thought of marrying Arpalice.

Cyrus hearing what Arpalice, Androclea, and Philition pretended, desired them to withdraw into another Chamber; after which he sent for Menecrates, Parmenides, and Thrasimedes, one after another: But before he asked the first of these, what were his pretensions? He hinted unto him, That now Philition and Androclea were at Sardis, with intentions to hold him to his word. But Sir (said he and cried out) If the heart which I had then, when I promised Androclea to love her, be changed, what can I do to satisfy her? Moreover, I did make no further promise unto her, but to do what I could to break off with Arpalice, and I wish unto the Gods that it were in my power to do it; for considering the scorn of that cruel Lady, and the goodness of Androclea not yet to hate me, I should be most glad to be revenged of her; but since I am not able Sir, I conjure you to remember, that the wills of the dead ought to be inviolable: However (said Cyrus unto Menecrates) It is just you hearken to the complaints of Androclea: Menecrates would have refused it, but the Princess Timaretta, and the Princess Palmis commanded him to go into the room where she was with Arpalice and Philition, upon condition, that C [...] nice and Doralisa would conduct him thither, unto which he was obedient. Then Parmenides appeared, who having quite forgot Cleoxene for Cydipe, declared, that he had no other interest in the business between Menecrates and Thrasimedes, but only his promise to the first of them to do him all the good offices he could unto his Sister, from which he would not alter, though he did not marry Cleoxene. Parmenides having said all he could, he retired, and Thrasimedes was brought in, though it was not necessary Page 19 to ask him what he pretended unto, it being easie to comprehend, that so they would give Arpalice unto him, he would be no longer an enemy unto Menecrates: Yet for orders sake, Cyrus would have him speak, which he did with so much spirit, and expressed such sensible symptoms of Love unto Arpalice, that all those who heard him, were absolutely on his side; so that retiring, as the other did, he left the illustrious Cyrus at liberty to take the advice of the Princess Timaretta, of the Princess Palmis, of the Prince Sesostrius, of the Prince Mysriles, and all the company. But though it was not usual to see so many persons together without difference in opinion, yet at this time they all concurred. At the first, there were some, who thought they were perswaded that Thrasimedes did better deserve Arpalice then Menecrates, yet they had much ado to dispense with the last will of a Father which he makes when he is dying: But after they heard Cyrus speak, they altered their opinion, and conceived that Marriages ought to be so free as Parents, if they be wise, will never constrain their children to marry against their inclination: Judg then I beseech you said this great Prince, Whether it be not blameable in a Father to marry his child against her inclination; and whether it be not permissible for Arpalice to follow her own will, not her Fathers: since he could not foresee when he appointed her to marry Menecrates, that Menecrates would slight her a long time, that Menecrates would promise Androclea to break off with Arpalice; that Menecrates would love his Daughter only out of a cupritious humour, and to hinder his Rival from being happy: For my part, said the Princess Palmis, I cannot think a Father ought by will to dispose of the affection of his children; Who would undertake, said the Princess Timaretta, that the young child which the Father would have to be the Husband of his Daughter hereafter, will be virtuous? I am perswaded, replied Sesostrius, That Fathers who make such Testaments, do intend they should be obeyed only in case the match prove fit and reasonable: Since so, said the Prince Mysriles, A sentence must be pronounced in favour of Thrasimedes: My opinion is, said Cyrus, to endeavour the making of as few unhappy in this business as we can, and to prevent the fighting of such brave men, as which side soever the Victory falls, the Conquerour will have cause to regret it: For though Menecrates be inconstant, and a little capricious, yet he is a man of Soul and Spirit: I beseech you consider (said Cyrus, and turned to both the Princesses) that if Arpalice be enjoined to accomplish the Testament of her Father by marrying Menecrates, they will all be unhappy: Menecrates will be engaged to fight both against Thrasimedes and Philition; against the first upon the score of his Mistress, against the second upon the score of his Sister: Doubtless there would be many unfortunate, replied Lycaste, but not all, for Menecrates would enjoy his Mistress: 'Tis true, replied Cyrus, He would enjoy the beauty of Arpalice, but I am fully perswaded, that since he would not enjoy her heart, he would never enjoy contentment; and the greatest good that Menecrates would have in the business, would be the hinderance of his Rival from being happy; for as soon as the first daies of marriage are over, he will turn even desperate for marrying one who hates him, and who perhaps he will hate also, for considering the temper of Menecrates, I am the most deceived of all men living, if the enjoyment of that which he loves, be not an infallible means to quench the flames of Love in his heart: As for Arpalice, it must needs be concluded, that since she marries Menecrates whom she loves not, and does not marry Thrasimedes whom she loves, she would be most miserable. Androclea for her part, she would not be satisfied, to see a man whom she loved become the Husband of another; nor would Philition be at all contented to see Menecrates, after a promise to marry his Sister married unto another; and as for Thrasimedes, it must be concluded, that he being in love with Arpalice, and knowing himself to be loved, he would be one of the most miserable Lovers in the World, if his Rival should enjoy his Mistress: So that it is apparent, by giving Arpalice unto Menecrates, all those who are interested in this business, are made unhappy; for Parmenides himself, though he make a shew of being engaged in the interest of Menecrates, yet if I be not deceived, he will be glad that his Sister would not marry the Brother of one whom he will see no more, and one who hath treated him ill. On the contrary, if Arpalice be given unto Thrasimedes, both they will be happy: Philition will be satisfied: Justice will be done unto Androclea: Parmenides will not be disobliged, and Menecrates will be forced to be happy whether he will or no, since he may have a Wife who loves him, and is delivered from one who hates him. Moreover, though he will not submit his mind unto reason, yet he will have no ground of any quarrel but with Thrasimedes, and hath nothing to say with <2 pages missing> Page 22 Ly unto Cyrus, I wish you had only let me seen that fatal Scarf, without a sight of that Divine Picture; for by the vision of that mark of my crime, with the apparition of that Beauty which caused me to commit it, I should have been only exposed to a renovation of my sorrows and repentance, and had been out of danger to revive my Love: I ask you pardon (replied Cyrus, and would have shut the Case in which the Picture was) for exposing you unto so great a danger: Alas Sir (replied Mazares sighing, and holding Cyrus by the arm) I know not why I should fear it, or complain; but I am most certain, that though my Love were more violent, if it were possible, then it is, yet I would not attempt any thing which would offend you, as long as our Princess loves you, and not me: Therefore since you may be confident that she will for ever love you, and never me, do not envy me the happiness of one minutes seeing the Picture of Divine Mandana, to the end, that the sight of the adored Princess whom I have so much offended, and caused all her misfortunes, might augment my repentance: So that Sir, in lieu of reviving my affection, you will add unto my remorse that ever I carried her away: Look then upon the picture of our Princess, most generous Rival, replied Cyrus, but look upon it with such thoughts as will keep me your friend, and not frustrate that Heroique resolution which you have taken, of contenting your self with the esteem and friendship of Mandana, and endeavouring her release: I do promise it Sir, said this perplexed Lover; after which he looked upon the picture, and he had no sooner cast his eyes upon it, and a little contemplated upon it, but blushing, he found such a violent agitation of heart, that doubting the constancy of his resolution, he hastily shut the Case, and restoring it to Cyrus: Here Sir, said he unto him, take this most angelique picture, I am of a weaker temper then I thought my self, and dare not so confidently answer for my thoughts, but to testify the desires I have to overcome them, give me leave only to look upon this Scarf, which revives in my memory Mandana floating upon the Waves, and ready to perish through my default: Methinks I see her yet (said this amorous Prince) when having no other help but mine, in spite of the impetuous Waves, she endeavoured to be loose from me, chusing rather to die, then receive life from the hand of her Ravisher: But alas, divine Princess, said he, you were ignorant of that reformation which was in my soul: I wish, most generous Rival (said he, and looked upon Cyrus) that I were assured to have all my life the same thoughts which then I had, when a mountain of horrid Waves overwhelmed us, which loosed this Scarf, and separated me from our Princess, whom then I saw swallowed up by that terrible Element, and thought to be ever lost: I wish Sir once more, that this horrid Idea might be for ever imprinted in my mind: But alas Sir, Many times against my will I see such things as are fuel to the fire of my passion.

Mazares spoke all this in such sadness and sincerity, that the heart of Cyrus, though a Rival, melted; and he was so sweet in his expressions, that Mazares had no cause of complaint: and after this miserable Prince had condoled his Fate, and Cyrus lamented his bad fortune, and both of them pitied and cheered up each other, they asked one another whether they heard any thing concerning the Princess, since they saw each other, and did mutually displease by answering, they heard nothing. In the mean time, since their discourse had continued long, Cyrus was told, that many waited in his Chamber, so that he went out of his Closet to dispatch them who had any business with him. Afterwards, he went to visit Ariantia, purposely to talk with her concerning his dear Princess. He had often a mind to do as the King of Assyria had done, but upon better thoughts, he conceived it better service to Mandana for him to stay in such a place where he might receive the intelligence of all who went to inquire of her: So that contenting himself with preparation of all things in readiness to march, as soon as he should receive intelligence where she was, he omitted nothing which did become his generosity, either for the Princess whom he had vanquished, or for those whom he protected, or for his friends, or his domestiques, or his soldiers: So that the third day which Menecrates had taken, being come, he omitted nothing which concerned his business; but he understood, that he was the last night fallen sick, and so violently, as it was not fit to ask him his resolution. Cyrus no sooner heard of this, but he appointed Physicians to take care of Menecrates: When they did visit him, they found him in such a desperate condition, as that they durst not answer for his life. This news being told unto Androcles, she was so perplexed at it, that her affection would not permit her to follow the exact rules of handsomness, considering the infidelity of Menecrates, but she did every day visit him Page 23 with Lycaste: Also Arpalice, hoping that the sight of Doralisa would work upon the heart of Menecrates. she desired Lycaste to carry her unto him: At the first Menecrates seemed angry; afterwards, as his disease increased, he seemed to take no notice; but when it began to diminish, and when he considered that he did not so much as think upon him all the while he was sick, and that he had seen the fair eyes of Androcles swim a thousand times in tears for him, he permitted the sight of her with less trouble, and a while after, he looked upon her with delight: It might very well be said, that as his fever vanished, so did his infidelity, and that he recovered the health of his body and mind both together, and that he was able to follow the dictates of reason, and the counsels of Cyrus. In the mean time, such magnificent equipage was in preparation, for sending Timaretta unto the King her Father, as it was evident Cyrus would do her all the honours he could. Also he ordered that Ships should be ready at the same Port where Sesostris embarked at his coming unto Asia. But whilst all this equipage was making ready, Sesostris without any impatience at all expected the day of his departure, for he found so many sweets in Timaretta, and so much satisfaction with Cyrus, that he did not regret this little prolixity which kept him from his compleat felicity. The Prince Artamas for his part, did every day find so many occasions of doing service unto his Princess, either in behalf of Croessus, or of Mysirles, that he would not change his happinesses with any; and when Cyrus compared the state wherein he was with his own, he thought himself much more miserable; but also when he remembered the condition wherein he had seen the Prince Artamas, and considered the alteration of his fortune, he did not despair of his own; but ere long after he was most sensibly perplexed, for after many daies tedious expectation, those whom he sent unto Milete returned, who told him, that certainly the King of Pontus passed not by that Coast. Those also whom he sent unto Guides, returned as ignorant as the first, who could learn no more then those who had been at Ephesus, and many other Maritime Towns, all who reported for certain, that the King of Pontus touched not in those places; so that Cyrus and Mazares were in a most inconceivable perplexity, when one morning he who had orders to go into Cames returned, and so opportunely, that he spoke unto Cyrus and Mazares, before he had spoken unto any of his acquaintance; for having a great desire to tell that Prince what he knew, and knowing he should be highly rewarded for the pains he had taken, he went strait unto the Cittadel, where he found Cyrus talking with Mazares in his Closet, consulting what was the most expedient resolutions for them to take. As soon as he appeared, Cyrus knew him to be the same who had orders for Cumes, he went towards him, and asked hastily whether he had learned any intelligence: Sir, said he, thanks be to the Gods, I have been more happy then the rest of my companions, and am able to inform you where the Princess Mandana is. At these words, Cyrus and Mazares did both of them at once embrace him, and bad him tell them what he knew. Sirs, said he unto them, I know of certainty, that the King of Pontus and the Princess Mandana are at Cumes, but they are known by very few: I know that the King of Pontus at his landing, did set up the colours of Milete in his Ship, as if it had been a Merchants Vessel: I know also, that he came thither in the night; that before he landed, he sent a servant in a little Boat unto the Prince of Cumes, who as you know is very young, though he be most absolute in his Dominions. In the mean time, though I know not the reason of his transaction, yet he doth not discover unto the Inhabitants of Cumes, that he would give any retreat unto the King of Pontus; but on the contrary, to carry it more closely, he does not lodge him in his Palace, and the Princess Mandana is lodged in a private house, though strictly guarded. Moreover, under the pretence of your great Victories; and that all Asia is in Arms, the Prince of Cumes begins to tackle up his Ships, and to make Levies of armed men in the Country: The reason, said Cyrus, Why this Prince will not have it known that he gives us retreat unto the King of Pontus, certainly is, because he is not in a condition to defend them: It is not to be doubted, answered Mazares: But yet said Cyrus unto him who brought the news, How came you to know all this? And how can we give credit unto your words? Sir, replied he, I have travelled much in my life, and was a Soldier very young, and so it falls out, that a servant unto him at whose house Mandana is lodged, was my Comrade in the Milesian Wars against Poligrates, so that meeting this man upon the Port of Cumes, and there renewing our acquaintance, I resolved to make use of him for the discovery of what I desired to know; but I was not put unto the necessity of his discretion, for insensibly passing from one discourse unto another, Page 24 as I was telling him, that he was a very happy man in dwelling within a peaceable Town, whilst all Asia was in Arms, he began to tell me, that Cumes ere long would have its turn, and afterwards told me all that I tell you: And he told me, that his Master with whom Mandana lodged was extremely troubled, that the Prince of Cumes had given a retreat unto the King of Pontus, because he feared that it would be the ruine of his Country, telling me, that he heard his Master express as much unto his Wife, not thinking that he did hear him: But, said Cyrus unto him, Know you nothing but what this man told you? Yes Sir, replied he, But I beseech you lend me a little patience, and then I shall tell you, that after this which I have already told you, this man told me, that there was a Woman with that Princess, whom he pitied the most in the world; that she sometimes spoke unto him out of grated Windows which opened into a back Court, and endeavoured to suborn him to carry a Letter for her unto one whom she would direct him unto, after he had promised fidelity, offering Jewels which she shewed unto him, which seemed to be of a great value: But said he unto me, I was put to a great nonplus, for I would not betray my Master, nor would I discover what this Woman said unto me, lest they should lock her up and treat her ill: Oh my dear friend (said I unto him, the better to perswade him unto my desires) your virtue is too too scrupulous: Let us divide the Jewels, and give me the Letter to carry, so may you be a gainer without danger: At the first, he could hardly resolve upon it; but after, seeing me so forward to be a complice of his crime, I brought him to consent unto the Commission of it; so that without more ado he took my counsel, he spoke that night unto Martesia, he seemed to be perswaded by her, he took the Jewels and the Letter which was directed unto you, and brought both Letter and Jewels unto me: Oh most cruel man, said Cyrus, Why did you not give me this Letter at the first? Because, said he, I would first make an orderly relation, but to repair that fault, I will give it unto you, and so he did, which Cyrus opening, found these words.

MARTESIA unto the illustrious CYRUS.

Though the Princess continually complains of you, since I am confident it is without cause, I thought it fit to acquaint you, that we are at Cumes, where in all likelihood we shall for some time remain: If you will justify your self unto her who accuseth you, you must quit the Princess Araminta to come and release her; but to comfort you, know that your Rival is no gainer by your disgrace; but the Princess not being able, as the state stands with her, to revenge her self upon you, doth revenge upon him that infidelity whereof she suspects, I will not say, accuseth you. In the mean time, be confident, that as soon as I see your Forces appear, I will speak in your behalf, and plead hard in your justification. After this, I must further tell you, that I understand both by good fortune and craft, the King of Pontus fears to be besieged, both by Sea and Land, and fears that if he see a Naval Army, he shall not be able to carry us away. This Sir is the advice of one, whose hopes are, that he who hath taken Artaxates, Babylon, and Sardis, will ere long put an end to all our misfortunes, and take Cumes.

MARTESIA.

After that Cyrus had read this Letter, he shewed it unto Mazares, who read it with some slight resentments of joy; for though he hoped for nothing, yet it was some consolation to know by this Letter, that Mandana complained against Cyrus; and though he well conceived that time would justify this Prince, yet he could not chuse but find some sweetness, in thinking that at that time she loved him less then she had done: As for Cyrus, doubtless he was grieved to know that the injustice of Mandana continued; but also he was much joyed to know that Martesia was his Advocate, and to know where Mandana was. But before he resolved upon any course, he asked him who gave him this Letter, if he knew any more? and why he did not endeavour to see Martesia himself, to tell her how he was sent purposely unto Cumes, to enquire news of the Princess? Sir, replied he, it was my design; for after I had taken the Letter, I told my friend, that I would leave all my share of Jewels with him, upon condition he would bring me to the speech of Martesia, which he promised me: But as ill luck was, this Page 25 man speaking unto her was seen by his Master, who observing him earnest with her, turned him away immediately, so that he returned unto me, and told me, that now he was not in a condition to do as I desired; and so I seeing that I was not able to do you any further service in that place, I returned hither with all the hast I could make. Cyrus seeing that the man had no more to say, caused him to be so magnificently rewarded, as it was apparent that a Prince so liberal was deeply amorous: But as he dismissed him, he charged him to be very silent, and speak not a word of any thing he knew concerning Mandana: After this, Mazares and he consulted upon the best expedient in the business. And after they had seriously considered upon all the circumstances, they concluded it the best course to seem being ignorant of where the Princess Mandana was, until they were in a readiness of besieging Cumes, especially until they had a Navy ready to block up the Port of Cumes, if it were possible; and the better to conceal it, Cyrus gave it out unto all the World, that he could not discover where she was, and so more subtilly deludes the Spies of the King of Pontus which he had in Sardis; yet Mazares advised him to send unto divers places, as if he endeavoured to inquire, which Cyrus observed, and in publique dispatched many Officers to that purpose: But to lose no time, and the better to palliate his design, he sent Leontidas to Thrasibulus, with ample instructions of what he desired him to do, conjuring him to set out as many Ships as he could, and arm them as well and speedily as possible, desiring him to colour his preparations so, as none should suspect they were for him, conjuring him also to engage the Prince of Mytilene. Also he sent Megasides unto the Prince Philoxipes, to whom he writ a Letter of thanks for the good hopes which he gave him, by letting him know the Oracle which the Princess of Salamis had received, and which had been so happily accomplished; but he conjured him also to procure some Ships for the King his Master: He sent also unto the Prince of Sicily upon the same business, and to have an eye always whether the King of Pontus remained still at Cumes: He sent thither the same man, who brought him the intelligence, that he did not give it out he sent him thither: He gave him a Letter to Martesia, and Jewels wherewith to suborn those who guarded the Princess, and so by that means he might get admittance to deliver Martesia's Letter: He gave him also two trusty and faithful Slaves, that he might send them any whether if occasion were, when he came to Cumes. Also he resolved with Mazares, that their Land Army should not move until the Navy were out at Sea, lest it should too soon alarm the Prince of Cumes and the King of Pontus, and so ruine their design of releasing Mandana in lieu of advancing it. In the mean time, they seemed to the World as if they grieved extrem, that they could not hear any intelligence where the Princess was; but their real sorrow was, to know that she was in so strong a Town as Cumes, which at that time was a terror to all her Neighbours; yet notwithstanding, since Cyrus never assaulted any which he did not take, and since his Valour never met with any obstacles which he did not surmount, the hopes of vanquishing once more caused some tranquility in his soul. Things standing upon these terms, Cyrus received Letters from Ciaxares, by Posts which he had set up, which Letters intimated unto him, that his power was not at all limited, but that he might dispose absolutely of all things, that he might give and take away Crowns as he pleased, and do with all his Conquests what he thought most fit; that he thought it convenient as well as he did, it would be more easie to keep Lidia, by restoring it unto Croessus upon the conditions which he proposed, then by guarding it, and making him a Slave: Also that by making him a Tributary King, he did himself much honour, since he made him a most illustrious Subject; adding notwithstanding, that to keep him within the compass of his duty, and prevent revolts, he would not have him restore his Treasures unto him, but desired him to take them unto himself. After this, Ciaxares lamented the misfortune of Mandana, and encouraged him to pursue his Victories until he had released her. Cyrus then having absolute Authority to treat Croessus as he pleased, took up a resolution worthy of his great soul; for as the King of Phrigia, and Artamas were talking in his Chamber, he told the first of them, that since he could not find to break off the Marriage of the Prince Artamas with the

Princess Palmis, and having no mind he should marry the Daughter of a King without a Kingdome, he was resolved to restore that Crown unto Croessus which he had lost. Oh Sir, said the Prince Artamas, I pray heaven I have rightly understood you: Yes, replied Cyrus, and to testify that I would have a perfect reconciliation between Croessus and you, I would have you go and tell him from me, that the King of Meldes having left the disposition of his Crown entirely unto me, I do restore it unto him, Page 26 upon condition he will become the Vassal of Ciaxares, as the King of Armenia is; that he shall pay a small Tribute as a mark of his dependency; that he shall follow me to the Wars with the Prince his Son, until I have released the Princess Mandana, and that until I shall depart unto the place where I shall hear she is, they shall have Guards upon them; and this, not that I shall make any question of their words which they shall pass, but because the people shall not make any new Insurrection which may force me to ruine him. After this, the King of Phrigia returned a million of thanks and applauses unto Cyrus: But Cyrus knowing that it would be the height of joy unto the Prince Artamas, that he could tell the Princess Palm <...> she should see the King her Father upon his Throne again, imposed silence upon him, conjuring him to it in all hast, and perform his Com[m]ission: But since I know you desire to go unto the Chamber of the Princess Palmis, before you go unto the Chamber of Croessus her Father, I conjure you to do so, and tell her, that I am extremely glad I am able to do any thing which shall be pleasing unto her. Ar[t]amas answered the civilities of Cyrus with a profound reverence; after which, he went in all hast unto his dear Princess to acquaint her with the happy change in her Fathers for[t]une.

This news did so surprize her, that she could hardly believe it; but since she could not chuse but give credit unto the words of Artamas, her joyes were above her expressions, yet she would not permit any long repetitions of his testimony, for she was so impatient, that Croessus should know his good fortune, as she pressed Artamas above twenty times to go and tell him, which accordingly he did, after he had presented the complement of Cyrus unto her: Then he went unto the King of Lidia, whom he found sitting in a profound melancholy: As soon as Artamas entred into the Chamber, Croessus did rise up to receive him; but Artamas, as soon as ever he had leasure told him, that Cyrus had restor[re]d the Crown of Lidia unto him: Oh, I beseech you, said Croessus, and interrupted him, Do not add vweight unto my Chains, by puffing me up into any false hopes of ascending the Throne: No Sir, replied Artamas, The happiness vv[hic]h I tell you of, is none of those vv[hic]h are to be hoped long for before enjoyment; you are already King of Lidia, if you please. And then Artamas began to tell him the conditions vv[hic]h Cyrus required upon his reestablishment, vv[hic]h Croessus did apprehend to be so svveet and easie, consid[er]ing the unfortunate condition vv[hic]h he expected all his life, as they did not diminish his joyes of ascending the Throne. As they were thus in discourse, Chrisantes entred, vvho came to tell Croessus, that Cyrus entreated him he would not take it ill, if he added one condition more unto those, vv[hic]h Artamas was to tell him, before he made a publlique Declaration of his reestablishment. The vvords of Chrisantes did exceedingly per[p]lex both those Princes: Croessus began to doubt of his good fortune, and Artamas apprehended no less, at least that the condition vv[hic]h Cyrus would add, was of some hard and shameful nature for the King of Lidia: since he had not charged him with it. But in conclusion, Chrisantes addressing his speech unto Croessus, Sir, said he unto him, The orders vv[hic]h I have to present unto you from the Prince my Master is, that the same day vv[hic]h he shall make choice of to restore your Crown unto you, in one of your most famous Temples, and in the sight of all your Subjects, you will be pleased in the same Temple to give the Princess your Daughter unto the Prince Artamas, vvho by many ser[vic]es hath deserved her.

The discourse of Chrisantes, did so pleasingly surprize both those two Princes, that they were a long time before they could speak: But at the last, Croessus reviving out of his extasie of admiration at the virtue of Cyrus, desired Chrisantes to tell his Master, that as precious as his Crown was, vv[hic]h he restored him, he thought himself more obliged unto him, for giving such a Husband unto his Daughter, then for giving him his Crown and Kingdom: And he might assure him, that this last thing vv[hic]h he desired, should be no impediment unto his ascending the Throne, since he did not think him unworthy of it, and since his great soul consented unto it. Artamas hearing Croessus speak so, made a thousand protestations of real service, and afterwards applauded Cyrus to the Heavens: And the Prince Myrsiles coming then into the Chamber, and knowing the passages, he did participate in the joyes of the King his Father, and added his Tri[bu]te of thanks and commendations unto his. After they had sufficiently expressed their acknowledgments, the Prince Artamas and Chrisantes returned to Cyrus, to acquaint him vvith vvhat joy and resentments of gratitude Croessus, Myrsiles, and Palmis, received and admired the altitude of his generosity to them; it was not only by their reports that Cy[rus]Page 27 understood it, for Croessus not daring to ask the liberty of coming in person to express his resentments, did send unto him, as vvell as the Prince Myrsiles, and the Princess Palmis; But Cyrus knowing, that vvhoever obligeth soon, doth double the price of the obligation, he told the King of Phrigia, he vvould give orders, that things requi[sit]e for this double ceremony should be presently made ready, to the end that the solemnity might be before the departure of Timaretta, and that the Marriage of the Prince Artamas might be honored vvith the presence of the Prince Sesostri[s], and the Princess of Aegypt: In order unto vv[hic]h, Commission is given unto Chrisantes, and they begin all preparations for this great Feast. In the mean time, Artamas as soon as ever he vv[en]t from Cyrus, acquainted Palmis vvith his fresh and high obligation, aggravating his joyes vvith so many raptures of Love, that this Princess never knew the greatness of it until now: For her part, she being extremely modest, she expressed much less joy at the assurance of her marriage, then at her understanding that her Father was to be restored unto the Crown, though the succession of it did not directly fall upon her; yet Artamas did not murmure, for knowing this Princess so vvell as he did, he ever thought that if elv[er] he chanced to be happy, she vvould hide some part of her satisfaction from him. In the mean time, though Cyrus did not intend that the business should be blazed until the day of ceremony, yet it vv[as] not possible to be hid, especially since there vv[as] an enter[vie]w between the King of Phrigia and Croessus; so that some noyse of it being vvoged abroad, it vv[as] presently divulged over all the vvorld. Now vv[as] the name of Cyrus highly celebrated amongst the Inhabitants of Sardis; but the admiration was, that the principal joy vv[as] to understand, that though their King vv[as] restored unto them, yet they vv[er]e in a sort under the power of Cyrus still, since Croessus vv[as] the Vassal of Ciaxares. One thing also vv[as] very extraordinary in this incounter; for though it be the custome of that place, that vvhen any one receives a benefit, to go and visit those vvho receive it, and rejoyce vvith them, vvithout any visits unto him vvho conferred; yet upon this occasion it vv[as] not so; for all those of any Quality in Sardis, vv[en]t to thank Cyrus, before they vv[en]t to rejoyce vvith the King of Lidia, insomuch as there vv[as] nothing to be seen but complements, both in the Palace and Cittadel. All the Ladies vv[en]t also unto the Prin[cess] of Palm <...>, as vvell those in the Palace as those in the Town, vvho could not chuse but extol Cyrus, vvho in sweetning the bitter misfortunes of those he had vv[an]quished, did sharpen his own: For vvhen he considered Artamas vv[as] shortly to enjoy her he loved, and considered that Mandana vv[as] yet in Cumes, and in the hands of his Rival, that he vv[as] tediously tarry in expectation of a Naval Army to assault, and that the success of the Siege vv[as] dubious, his sufferings vv[er]e incredible: The King of Assiria's absence also did somewhat acquaint his perplexities, though his presence vv[as] almost unsufferable. Howvv[er], not to lessen the joyes of the Prince Artamas, vvhom he so highly esteemed, he confined some part of his sorrows unto the Closet of his heart, lest they should dull the joyes of this glorious Feast, and lest he should fail in any circumstance, he vv[en]t to visit Croessus and the Prince Myrsiles, but it vv[as] more as their friend then Conquerour: He vv[en]t also to visit the Princess Palmis, and the Princess Timaretta; but in his return unto his own lodging, he vv[as] much surprized to see Menecrates, vvho beginning to quit his Chamber that day, came to render thanks for the care vv[hic]h Cyrus had of him, and to acquaint him, that the malady of his body had cured the malady of his mind, and had so perfectly let him know, that Androclea did merit his affection, as he came to tell him, that he vv[as] ready to obey his commands, and not to look upon Thrasimedes as his Rival. Cyrus being even ravished at the conversion of Menecrates, did send immediately for Thrasimedes, Philistion and Parmenides, to vvhom having told the happy change vv[hic]h vv[as] in the heart of Menecrates, he found the vv[er]y first of them vv[er]y ready to imbrace him; and as for Parmenides, since he had no other concernment in the business, but that of Menecrates, since he vv[as] satisfied, he vv[as] so also, so that there remained nothing to do but advertise Licaste, but Cyrus needed not to trouble himself for that, for her Husband being come to Sard <...> vvith Lisia's Brother of Candiope, she came to present them unto Cyrus, accompanied vvith Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope and Androclea; so that by this means there vv[as] a perfect reconciliation made amongst all those persons, vvhoose interests vv[er]e so confusedly mingled: But to make it more solid, Cyrus conjured Menophiles. Licasta's Husband, vv[ou]ld permit the marriage of Arpalice and Thrasimedes to be solemnized the next morning, vv[hic]h vv[as] the same day of Prince Artamas: He made the same request also unto Philistion in behalf of Androclea and Menecrates; and since he Page 28 knew the thoughts of Parmenides vvowards Cydipe, and of Philistion vvowards Candiope, he spoke unto Menophiles and Lycaste in behalf of the first, and to Lisia's and Candiope in behalf of the other, and he spoke vvith such perswasive Rhetorique, and found so few obstacles in the minds of those persons vvhom he endeavoured to perswade, that they all consented unto his desires.

Thus these four marriages vv[er]e made up in an instant, and three differences, vvhoose consequences might have proved fatal, vv[er]e happily reconciled: The business being known, Lycaste and her fair company vv[er]e no sooner returned unto the Palace, but the Princesses came to visit her, Doralisa and Pherenice vv[er]e vvith them, and Cleonice came in the last, because she had been busied in receiving her mother, vvho knowing that her Daughter vv[as] at Sardis, vv[as] come from Ephesus to see her, vvith intentions to carry her thither: So that Cleonice having advertised Stenobea vvho the Ladies vv[er]e, and her obligations to them, she came also to visit them, and vv[as] conducted thither by Ligdamis, vvho taking hold of this fit opportunity, did earnestly beseech Ismenia, vvho had ever been the confidant of his dear Cleonice, that she vv[ou]ld speak unto Stenobea concerning his marriage. The business might the more easily be brought to pass, because her Father, vvho vv[as] Governour of the Castle of Hermes vv[as] come to Sardis; and Cyrus having made his peace vvith Croessus, he might the more easily assent unto it: Ismenia accordingly made the Proposition, but her power alone vv[as] not prevalent enough; but Cyrus must intercede vvho did it so effectually, that Ligdamis could not vvish it better; yet he vv[as] a little sad to see Cleonice become a little more reserved, as soon as she vv[as] that she vv[as] infallibly to marry Ligdamis: And after he had pressed her himself in vvain, to tell vvhat it vv[as] vv[hic]h interrupted her joyes, he set Ismenia upon her, vvho answered, That it vv[as] because she feared, that as heretofore she vv[as] grieved, because the friendship of Ligdamis vv[as] become Love, and since that, grieved because his love did not return unto friendship; so it vv[as] happen, that vvhen she had married Ligdamis, perhaps it vv[ou]ld become neither love nor friendship to her, she conceiving that marriage vv[ou]ld rather procure indifferen[cy], jealousy, and scorn, then any esteem, love, and friendship. As soon as she had expressed her self unto Ismenia, she told it unto Ligdamis, vvho expressed so many test[im]onies of love unto Cleonice by his sorrows that she should suspect him, that in the conclusion this melancholy cloud did vv[an]ish out of her mind, and he did perfectly perswade her, that she might expect from him, both a vv[io]lent and an everlasting passion; so that after this, joy began to sparkle in her eyes. Then she returned and received all civilities unto Cydipe, Arpalice, Candiope and Androclea: But amidst so many happy Lovers, Andramites vv[as] an infinite sufferer, since he found Doralisa more cruel; the joyes of others vv[er]e his griefs, and the preparatives of these marriages tormented him, for she vv[as] so full of her witty rally, as made it apparent to him, that she vv[as] not in any humour to augment the number of married people. Seeing then that all his services and Courtships vv[ou]ld not prevail vvith her, he resolved to apply himself unto the Prince Myrsiles; for observing that she much esteemed him, and that he vv[as] reinvested into his power and authority, he thought that if he vv[ou]ld undertake to speak for him unto Doralisa, perhaps she vv[ou]ld then marry him by reason of his intercession, though not out of affection. But before he vv[ri]ed this way, he advised vvith Pherenice, vvith vvhom he had an intimacy, and she telling him, that this course could not prejudice him, he vv[en]t unto the Prince, to desire his protection, but he vv[as] much surprized, vvhen after he had opened his des[ig]n, the Prince told him, that he desired a business in vv[hic]h he vv[is]hed vvith all his heart he vv[as] able to serve him; but for divers reasons vv[hic]h prevented him, he vv[ou]ld seek out some other way vvhereby he might testify how much he esteemed him. In the mean time, he advised him as a friend, not to persist in his Love to Doralisa: After vv[hic]h, much company entring, Andramites vv[en]t out, as ill satisfied vvith the Prince Myrsiles, as vvith his Mistress. As soon as he vv[as] gone, this Prince, vvho had not seen Doralisa since he vv[as] in hopes of succeeding to the Crown of Lidia, vv[en]t unto her Cham[ber] upon a visit, for he had the free liberty of all the Palace before the ceremony of re[st]allation vv[as] solemnized. In the mean time, Pherenice after she had advised Andramites to vv[im]ploy the credit of the Prince Myrsiles, spoke unto Doralisa in his behalf, the better to prepare her for the Princes mediation, but she so fully expressed her resolution of never marrying Andramites, that she vv[as] out of all hopes; so that he thought it exp[ed]ient to advertise her friend of vvhat the Prince Myrsiles vv[ou]ld say unto her, to the end she might deny him more civilly; but she vv[ou]ndred to see Doralisa extremely angry Page 29 at Andramites, for having recourse unto the Prince Myrsiles: 'Tis true, she had not time to say much against him, for the Prince entred presently, and made her change her discourse. As soon as he entred into Doralisa's

Chamber, Pherenice went out upon some business which called her away, and by that means Myrsiles had opportunity of discourse with Doralisa: But he was no sooner set down, then this incensed Lady, thinking he would speak for Andramites prevented him. I perceive Sir (said she unto him sharply, not giving him leasure to bethink himself) that you are preparing to speak unto concerning the follies of Andramites: But I beseech you Sir, tell me nothing which may molest those joyes I ought to have at the generosity of Cyrus towards the King your Father, and your self: Never fear, dear Doralisa, said he unto her, that I will ever speak concerning the passion of Andramites, not but that he hath much solicited me unto it, but I have so strong a reason to the contrary, that you need not fear I shall sollicite you in his behalf: Since it is so, replied Doralisa, I must needs express my satisfaction to see you so reasonable as you ought to be: If I were so reasonable as I ought to be, replied he, doubtless I should wish that thing now, which I have wished a long time, and which you do not desire I should: Why Sir, replied Doralisa, cannot I desire you were King of Lidia? That is not it which I mean, replied he, Nor do my desires most carry me to a Throne; for I most desire that now, which I desired when the Prince Atis lived, and which then I ought not to pretend unto: For my part, replied Doralisa, I do believe that at the time you speak of, you wished most that you could speak: 'Tis most true, answered he, but the chief reason of my wish was, that I might be able to tell you I do love you: Oh Sir (said Doralisa, and laughed, not believing that the Prince Myrsiles spake seriously) If you had then any such desire, you were able enough to make me understand it, you I say, who could so well interpret unto Pherenice the Fable of Aesope, which concerned the Princess Palmis and her Lovers: 'Tis true, replied he, I could then have let you know that I loved you, since then I could write a little; also as dumb as I was, I could have told you as much in the language of eyes, but what reason had I then to expose my self unto the rally of the most witty person in the World, I, I say, who have many times seen some of best language stand mute before you, merely out of the fear of your Wit: But Sir, replied she, am I not as terrible now as I was then? You are, replied he, and much more Madam, for I find you much fairer. But I am grown more bold, and now dare without difficulty acquaint you with that which I have all my life concealed: Now then beloved Doralisa, that I began to love you as soon as I began to see you, from your very infancy I have born you affection, this affection increased with your beauty, and during all the loves of Cleander, Artesilas, Abradates, and Mexaris, I loved you with more zeal than all those Princes did those Princesses with whom they were in Love: Yes, charming Doralisa, all the time of my sullen silence, I then burned, in the flames of affection to you: Oh Sir, said Doralisa, you can never persuade me of it; for since the tenderness over the King your Father caused you to speak, when you saw the Souldier ready to kill him, I am confident that if your passion had been so violent unto me, you would then have spoke and told me of it: But at that time, certainly there was as deep a silence in your heart as in your tongue, and there was as much tranquility in your soul as in mine: Do you not know Doralisa, replied the Prince Myrsiles, that Love useth to make even those who speak best to become dumb? How then would you have him make an unfortunate Lover speak, who was dumb before? Why then do you speak now, replied she? I speak, replied he, by the same reason that I was silent, for I was silent because I could not speak, and I speak because I cannot be silent. Moreover, since I have ever heard you profess that you would have a heart fresh, which never loved any but your self, I thought that mine being such a one as you desired, I might without any injury offer it unto you. Moreover, I do not only offer you a new fresh heart, but I do express my passion in such words as never were prophaned with the expression of either feigned or real passions: I never pronounced the Word Love but unto you only, I never said I love you, but once, and that was unto you: Be not therefore so unjust, I beseech you, as to reject me with the same rigour, as if I had presented unto you a heart which had received a thousand several impressions, or as if I had told you things which I had spoken a thousand times unto another: I assure you Sir, replied she, That you do so much perplex me, as this little which you have spoken forceth me to regret the time wherein you could not speak unto me: Truly I wish that I could speak, neither too sharp nor too uncivilly; but I fear that if you continue to persuade me unto this Page 30 belief, it will be hard for me to keep within those just limits, which those respects I owe you requires of me; therefore not to take what you have said seriously, be pleased to know, that when you heard me say I would have a new fresh heart, it was when I spoke of men whom I knew very well had none such: For to speak the very truth, I neither care for a new nor an old heart, I desire only to keep mine own entire, and continue always an absolute Mistress of my self. Moreover Sir, I must advertise you, that for one that is a very stupid Sot in matters of the World, I am one who of all Women upon earth knows least how to speak upon matters of Courtship and gallantry: Sometimes I can chide others for it, but to speak my self is a thing which I cannot do; therefore Sir I beseech you either change your discourse, or else I shall wish you dumb: Most cruel Woman, replied Myrsiles, What pleasure can you take in blasting me with all your fury, me I say, who hath yet expressed but one part of my love to you? Faith Sir, replied she and laughed, I do not believe the half you have said already, nor will I often give you any occasion of discoursing with me, but that you may not have any cause to complain of me, now I beseech you Sir, that I am much fitter to make a friend than a Mistress; for though to my misfortune I should have a tender sensible heart towards you, you would not be a jot the happier, since as soon as ever I did perceive it in my self, I should carry it as if I hated you: Take heed therefore Sir of being in too good terms with me, for fear of being in too bad; and to testify how nice and phantastical I am in such things, I must tell you, that I have often in my life, even almost hated the most compleat men, only because through weakness without reason they have put me to the blush in talking with them: Consider therefore what I should do, if you should offer to intangle me in any such kind of gallantry: Consider Sir that I am not fit for it; if you please to esteem me more than another, I shall be glad of it, but let this esteem be without any ingredient of Love or tenderness, if you would oblige me unto you. As Myrsiles was ready to reply, Arpalice and Cydipe came in, who told Doralisa after their first complements were performed, that within this hour an Ambassador would arrive, which the King of Phenicia sent unto Cyrus, whose Equipage was reported to be more magnificent then ever was seen; and that the Princess Timaretta, whose Chamber opened unto the place where he was to pass, had charged them to tell her she would be very glad of her company with the rest of the Ladies to see these Phenicians, who were reported to be so magnificent. The Prince Myrsiles hearing what Arpalice and Cydipe said, did withdraw himself, having no disposition to see an Ambassador pass, who came not to the King his Father. Also the passion of his soul did so possess him, and the manner of Doralisa's usage did so trouble him, that he was not in any humour of seeing such diversions: But it was nothing so with Doralisa, for she was so well pleased at her harsh language unto the Prince Myrsiles, that she went with the blithest disposition in the World to quibble at these Ambassadors who were to arrive, but she found not what she sought for, and her blith and critical humour could not find any cavil in them she went to see: The truth is, the like magnificence was never seen, both for the great abundance of Camels covered with cloaths of Trian Purple embroydered with gold, and for the rarity of their Horses, also for the richness of their habits. Moreover, this Ambassador (whose stature was as high as his Quality, which was of the best in all Phenicia) had with him above a hundred men of Quality, extraordinary handsome, whose curiosity only to see Cyrus induced them unto this voyage. Amongst this hundred, there was one illustrious person, whose merit was rare and superlative, his name was Aristheus, a name very famous, both through all Greece and all Asia, so that in what humour of rally soever Doralisa was in that day, she was forced to commend all she saw to day. However, this Ambassage was variously talked on, though none knew what it was, yet they were not ignorant long, but knew the cause of it. After this Ambassador was lighted from his horse at the Gate of the Cittadel, he was conducted by Hidasps unto a great Hall, where Cyrus gave him audience. This Ambassador spoke in his own language, which Cyrus did very well understand, and presented a Letter from the King his Master, which began thus.

The King of Phenicia unto the greatest Conquerour that ever was.

AS I make no question, but that since you have besieged Sardis, you will ere long take it; So I have sent this Ambassador to ask that favour from you which Croessus cruelly denied me, but which I hope you will not: He hath Commission to offer you my alliance and friendship with thirty thousand men, if you stand in any need of them: I assure you, that if you accept this offer, and accord unto my demand, you will ever oblige me;

The King of Phenicia.

All the while this Letter was reading, Cyrus was thinking what it should be that the King of Phenicia could desire of him, but not being able to imagine it, he told the Ambassador that it was from him he must know how to satisfy the King his Master: Then the Ambassador told him with an excellent grace and much eloquence, that the principal point of his Voyage was to satisfy the desire which the King his Master had of being allied unto so great a Prince, and to the end that this alliance might be more firm, he desired that he might be obliged unto him, by requesting a favour which Croessus denied a little before the War. Then the Ambassador pursuing his discourse, let Cyrus understand, that the young King of Phenicia's desire was, he would be pleased to restore that Statue which Croessus bought of Dipoenus and Scillis, and which the late King his Father caused to be made a little before his death, offering for it above three hundred Talents of Incense, and whatsoever Arabia the happy produced out of her precious and Aromaticall store, for Siria joining upon Arabia, and Phenicia making part of Siria, there was constant commerce between those people; therefore the King of Phenicia made choice of that which he thought most worthy for the ransom of the Statue of the fairest person in his Kingdom, and most worthy to be offered unto the greatest Prince upon earth. This Ambassador told Cyrus further, that he came from Tyre, as soon as the King of Phenicia heard that he had won the Battel against Croessus, and as soon as he heard that his design was to besiege Sardis, adding in applaud of Cyrus, that he made more hast in his Conquests, then himself did in his journey, since he came after his Victory. But to testify unto this Prince, that the King his Master did not doubt of his generosity, but beseeched him before he gave his answer, to honour him with a view of those presents which the King of Phenicia sent, beseeching him to look out at the Window upon the Camels which stood loadened, and which by the magnificence of their coverings, made it evident, that what they carried was precious. Also it might be judged by the odoriferous smells wherewith the Air was perfumed, by reason of those perfumes, that it was a most magnificent present.

Cyrus seeing such generous proceedings, did satisfy the Ambassadors desires: To testify unto you, said he unto him, that without further deliberation I consent unto the King your Masters desires, I will accept of what he hath sent, not as a price of that Statue which I will restore him, but as a Gage of his amity, which is very dear unto me: And I do accept of his present, to testify that I will learn how to imitate his liberality. After this, Cyrus behaved himself with a thousand civilities to this Ambassador, for he seemed to be a most accomplished man. Moreover, Cyrus knowing that the Tirians were very powerful at Sea, he hoped to get some aid from them for the siege of Cumes; therefore he resolved to render unto the King of Phenicia in the person of his Ambassador all the honours that he could devise. But since the King of Phenicia's extraordinary desire to have this Statue, filled Cyrus with much curiosity, he asked whether it were possible that the person whom it represented, were as full of beauty as it? Asking further, Whether she had a soul and spirit worthy of so fair a body? But he told him that she was much fairer then her Statue, that her Spirit was as high as her beauty, and that her soul was more worthy of esteem and admiration then her beauty and Spirit; adding, that her fortune was as extraordinary as her merit, and her virtue more admirable then all that he had said. After this, the Ambassador presented unto Cyrus the best sort of those who followed him, and amongst the rest, the illustrious man, who bore the name of Aristheus, Page 32 and presented him as a particular friend unto that fair Lady of whom he spoke, and as being himself one of the rarest men in the World: I think my self very happy (said Cyrus in embracing him) that he is only her friend, for had he been her Lover, perhaps I should not have had the happiness to see him, since it is probable he would have been with the substance for whom this Statue is made: I can assure you Sir, replied Aristheus, that though I were her Lover, and desired above all things to please her, yet should I have had the honour which I have received this day; for that most excellent person takes such great delight to hear talk of your Virtue and Victories, that to obtain her favour, I ever intended to be a Witness of so many truths as you Sir make good, and so be able to please her in talking of you: Your language (replied Cyrus in the same Aristheus spoke) does much oblige me, but I would not have those who come unto me use many adulations and flatteries as you do, lest in taking too much delight in their applauses, I should grow in the end not to merit them from any. After this, Cyrus gave orders unto Hidaspes to conduct this Ambassador and all his Train unto the lodging which was prepared for him, commanding her to treat him with magnificence worthy of that King who sent him. In the mean, though Cyrus by the will of Ciaxares was become Master of all the Treasures of Croessus, upon condition not to restore them unto him; yet he told him concerning this Ambassador, though he was not yet in the possession of his Crown which he would restore unto him, and though it was not above eight daies before the ceremony was to be solemnized with the marriage of the Prince Artamas, and all the rest of the happy Lovers who were then at Sardis; and he did more than that, for he did so transact the business, that Croessus and this Ambassador did see each other, Cyrus telling the latter of these, that he ought not to consider this Prince as him who had denied the Statue which the King his Master demanded, but as a Tributary King unto Cixares, of whom he desired alliance, since he desired his; so that after this reconciliation, which this Ambassador had power to make, for his Commission was not limited, he did visit the Princess Palmis, as well as the Princess Timaretta, and was so charmed with this magnificent Court, and with the beauty of all the Ladies in it, that at the desire of Cyrus, he promised to be at this great Feast which was to be kept within eight daies, during which time, nothing was talked of but the King of Phenicia, whom they said was in Love with that Beauty whose Statue he demanded, every one were full of curiosity to know more precisely the particularities of the adventure; the reason of the difficulty to know it was, because there were only three or four with this Ambassador who understood the Lidian and the Greek Tongue, and these three or four were so busied in answering all that was asked them, as they could not be moved unto any long conversation. Also during the first daies, they were taken up in seeing the rarities of the Town, and all the Treasures of Croessus, so that at last the great Feast day arrived before any knew that which they had so great a desire to know. This ceremony was doubtless one of the most sumptuous in the World, and the most glorious for Cyrus, if he had followed the dictates of his own inclination, he had stopped many things which wounded his modesty: But there was a necessity of submitting unto the custome, and unto the Councils of the King of Hircania, Gadates, Gabrias, and Chrisantes, who told him, That it was fit the people with their own eyes should see their King was a Slave, and that it was he who made this Slave a King, so that maugre the repugnance which he had unto it, he yielded unto custome, and hearkened unto the counsel of his friends, though not in all things, for he would not suffer Croessus to go chained through the streets of Sardis, from the Palace to the Temple, but thus prevented it. Presently after break of day, Croessus and Myrsiles were carried in a Coach to the lodging of the High-Priest, which joyned to the Temple where the ceremony was to be solemnized, where they stayed until it began. In this Temple, which was one of the greatest in the World, was erected an Amphitheater, most magnificently covered with the richest Tapistry of Sidon, where all the Ladies might most conveniently sit and see. All the streets, from the Cittadel to the Temple, were also sumptuously hung, there standing ranks of Souldiers on both sides, all in such glittering Arms, as never was a more glorious sight; a thousand Martial Instruments made the Ayr echo, with shrill and pleasant sounds, which attracted all the people of Sardis, either into the Temple, or into the street which joyned to it, or into the place before the Cittadel, out of which Cyrus came accompanied with all his Court, which was so numerous, and so glorious that day, as it was suitable unto the Court of Asia's Conquerour. As for the Phenician Ambassador, he was in the Temple upon a Scaffold with all his Train, next Page 33 him was the Princess Timaretta, and all the Ladies which lodged in the Palace of Croessus. When Cyrus entred into the Temple with a huge croud of people about him, Croessus was brought by the Priest into the midst of the Temple, having a Chair, and Fetters of Gold upon his hand, and behind him the Prince Myrsiles in the like manner. The Princess Palmis was next him, but under a Canopy of golden Tissue, and without Chains, Cyrus having no mind that she should have any sign of servitude, or that they should upbraid him with triumphing over a Lady. As soon as this Prince entred into the Temple, most admirable Musique was heard, which after it had played a quarter of an hour, some Hims that were sung unto the Gods, did cease: After which, Cyrus who was upon an elevated Throne descended, and taking off the Chains and Fetters which Croessus and Myrsiles wore, and which he gave unto the Priest, he took from the hand of the said Priest a Crown, and put it upon the head of Croessus, after he had caused him solemnly to swear, that he would acknowledge the power of Cixares, never to depart from his interests, and inviolably to keep the conditions between them. Cyrus had no sooner put this Crown upon the head of Croessus; but the vault and roof of the Temple did ring with acclamations, and the people could not be silenced from extolling the generosity of Cyrus. But at the last all the tumultuous noyse of joy being appeased, Cyrus ceasing to treat Croessus as vanquished, and to behave himself as a Conquerour, demanded his Daughter for the Prince Artamas in the presence of the Phrigian King who stood next him.

He had no sooner asked the question, but Croessus taking the Princess Palmis by the hand, presented her unto Cyrus, and bad him dispose of her as he pleased: After which, causing the Prince Artamas to approach, the Priest advanced also, and the Princess Palmis: At the conclusion of which Musique did play again, and presently after the Prince Artamas conducted the Princess Palmis into a most magnificent Chariot, which waited at the door of the Temple, and which was followed by a hundred others full of Ladies, all the Princes riding on horseback, accompanied with all the Gallants of Quality. When they came unto the Palace, there was a most sumptuous Feast prepared. and after Dinner a Horserace in the Great Plain. The repast at night was no less Princely than that in the morning. Bonfires were made at every door, the Palace was full of harmonious Musique, but the Princess Palmis would not permit any dancing, by reason of the excessive sadness which she saw in the eyes of Cyrus, though he forced himself as much as he could. Also, though Cyrus had restored much unto the King her Father, in restoring the Crown, yet Croessus had lost much in losing his independent Authority, and his Treasures: So that though it was a Festival day, yet it was not one that had all the signs of joy which it might have had: yet the Phenician Ambassador was extremely satisfied as well as Aristheus, who could not enough admire the illustrious Cyrus, and he was full of observance, that his eye was never off him, as long as he could see. In the mean time, Cyrus having not forgot the desires of Ligdamis, Thrasimedes, Men crates, and Philistion, the ceremony of their Marriages were accomplished the next morning after that of the Prince Artamas, and the whole Court did honour them with their presence. This second Feast was no less magnificent than the first, and Cyrus was no less melancholy this day then before, to see how far short he was of the happiness of all these Lovers. Mazares was no more pleasant then he: However, Cyrus had an extraordinary care that the Phenician Ambassador should be well pleased with his civilities, and to that end he did divert him as much as he could and prepared Presents for the King his Master and him, which were above the double worth of those he received; and finding much satisfaction in the company of Aristheus, he talked with him very often, and certainly not without good reason, for there was not a man in the World who could speak better concerning Politiques, nor who better understood the interests of all Princes in that time, then Aristheus did: And to speak truth, Aristheus spoke well in all things whatsoever: And Cyrus did not content himself with discoursing of Affairs in general, but he carried him along with him into the Visits which he made unto the Princesses and other Ladies. He made use of him also to know how the King of Phenicia could furnish him with Ships, before he made any Propositions of it unto the Ambassador of that Prince, insomuch as Aristheus and Cyrus were almost inseparable. Since he was generally knowing in every thing, he spoke so many several languages, that he was able to converse with all the Ladies there, though there were those of many several Countries. In the mean time, since the Phenician Ambassador knew that the sooner he returned, the more acceptable he should be unto Page 34 the King his Master, he moved for his departure as soon as might be. Cyrus designing to satisfy him, that he might the sooner obtain those Ships he desired, told him, that he was ready to keep promise with him. But before he restored him the rare Statue which he demanded, the Princess Timaretta went to see it, and afterwards all the Court: Those who dwelt in Sardas, and had seen it several times, went again, by reason of that curiosity which this adventure begot in them. And indeed, the curiosity was such, as nothing else was talked on: And Aristheus being very conversant amongst the Ladies, they asked him a thousand questions, but most especially Doralisa, unto whom he applied himself more than unto any other, though others courted his converse more than she did. But the more she talked unto him concerning this admirable person whom this Statue represented, the more he augmented her curiosity: So that being one day much importuned in the presence of the Princess Palmis and Cyrus to relate the History of her Adventures, he promised that it should be exactly done by a friend of his, who knew the particulars of it better than he did, and who indeed did so most pleasingly. Since you are not this Countryman, replied Doralisa, and since I have not the honour to be well known unto you, you do not know that I never use to give any time unto those who promise me any thing, especially when by holding them to their promises, I shall oblige two persons so illustrious as those who now hear me, and who will certainly be very glad to know the adventures of a Lady in whom the King of Phenicia hath so much interest. Cyrus approving of Doralisa's Speech as well as the Princess Palmis, Aristheus told them, they should be satisfied when they pleased: So that without further delay, it was resolved, that at that night he should perform his promise, as indeed he did: For he prepared him who was to relate what they desired to know, to go with him unto the Princess Palmis Chamber, where the Princess Timaretta would be a partaker of that diversion. 'Tis true, Aristheus could not stay there, because the Phenician Ambassador sent a Post that night unto the King his Master, to give him an account of his happy success in his <◇>, and he was obliged to write also: So that after he had brought his friend thither, whose name was Clamis, and that Cyrus and the Princesses saw him to be a man of good Spirit, he <◇>, asking leave of Cyrus to go, whilst Telamis was making his relation, and make another unto the King of Phenicia of his magnificence and generosity, and of all the most rare Qualities which he found in him; adding further, most obligingly, that since he intended to conceal none of his active virtues from the King his Master, he did not think he could return before the end of Telamis his relation: After which, making me <◇> low obeysance, he retired, and left Telamis with the Princess of Phrigia, Timaretta, Cyrus, and Doralisa, who after some short preamble to excuse his imperfections in the Narration of his history, he began it most elegantly in Greek, which all his Auditors did understand admirably well, Palmis and Cyrus desiring him to address his Speech unto Timaretta.

The History of ELISA.

Though I know very well Madam, that persons of your Quality are ignorant of nothing which passeth in the Courts of Kings, who most remote from their own; yet I may in reason think, that an African Princess will take some pleasure in hearing exactly related, the manners and customs of one of the most considerable Kingdoms in all Asia. Also, since the History which I am to relate cannot be very well understood, before I give you an Idea of our Court, and the manners used, I conceive it better, first to make a general description of it, before I come unto the particular persons whereof it is composed, and who are interested in the adventure which I am to relate: I must therefore tell you Madam, how that since the Phenicians were almost the first people of Asia, who exposed themselves unto long Voyages at Sea, and established the greatest Commerce amongst his Neighbour Nations, they abounded in riches much more than others, and consequently it may be very rightly said, that their delights, their luxury, their voluptuousness, and their magnificence were more abundant amongst them than any other people; not but that this State hath been shrewdly shaken several times: One while by the commotion which the Phenicians made concerning the Daughter of the King of Arlgas: Another time by the Rebellion which those of Crete made at Tire, concerning Page 35 the King of Phenicia's Daughter: Sometimes by the division of Pigmation and Did <...>, and by the flight of that Princess: And another time by the general Rebellion of all the Phenician Pesants, who intirely subverted the Government. But at the last, maugre all these revolutions of Fortune, this Kingdom hath of late recovered its first splendor, and the Cities of Tire and Sidon, which may both of them be termed the Metropolitans of this Estate, are certainly two of the goodliest, most magnificent, and richest Towns in the World, either in respect of their scituations, or the beauty of their buildings; or their great traffique in Purples wherewith they cloath the Kings of the earth, and are an ornament of the World. Moreover, as there is nothing which contributes more unto the perfection of Arts then Riches, nor which more readily attracts all strangers who have any excellencies then abundance: It may very well be said, that one might find all Greece in Phenicia, since certainly there were the Workmen of all those famous Towns: So that by this means, the buildings in Tire and Sidon were not only most stately, but most regularly built, the Painters there were good, the Ingravers excellent, and the Musique comparably charming unto the Lidian. The Ladies were not only fair, but they were also stately, ingenuous, and apt in every thing they attempted to learn, there being not one Woman amongst the Phenician people who did not excel in some work or other, either for the ornaments of Women of high quality, or for the use of the Temple. As for the Court there, I may well say, and not say too much, that it is the most compleat in the World: The lives they lead, are doubtless most pleasant, especially because Merits there before Birth are promoted to the highest Ranks: The converse of Ladies is there allowed, but yet in such a Medium of liberty as is equally void, both of too much ceremony or any incivility, Dancings, Walkings, and Musique, are the ordinary recreations of that Court: Discourse is the chief business of all those who have any Spirits, and especially of Ladies unto whom there is daily resort, and who are the dispensors of the glory and reputation of all compleat men; for whosoever hath not the approbation of four or five Ladies, can never hope to pretend unto any universal esteem. As for the men, it may be said there are of all sorts: And indeed there are some men of great quality, whose merits are infinitely above their quality: And there are also some who have nothing to boast of but their quality: There are some whose glory consists in the magnificence of their Train, and richness of their cloaths: And there are others, whose glory is only in their own virtues: And doubtless there are another sort of men, of an insupportable vain-glory: But to speak generally, there is a kind of such a Spirit of Politeness that reigns in the Court, as renders it most delightful, and which produceth an incredible number of most compleat men; and that which makes them so, is, because the men of Quality in Phenicia scorn to be ignorant in all sorts of Sciences, and are not as in some other Courts, where they imagine, that if a man know how to use a Sword, may be allowed to be ignorant in all things else. But on the contrary, there's not a man of a[n]y condition in our Court, who is not able to judg of the rarest works, or at least who does not strive to honour himself, by honouring those who are more knowing than himself.

This Madam was the condition of our Court, when that most admired Lady, of whom I am to discourse, came into the World; and this is that same which it is at this day. It requisite I tell you Madam, before I begin to speak of this most excellent person, that the late King of Phenicia, who hath a great part in the beginning of this History, was a Prince who merited the name of a great Conquerour, making himself most eminent upon a hundred several occasions, and having purchased the reputation of extraordinary valour; but being born under a more amorous constellation, then ever any of his condition was: It may very well be said, that he joyed more in the Conquests of his Love, then he did in those of Mars. He had an universal civility unto all of that Sex, which made him generally loved: And his Spirit being infused unto all the Courtiers, every man under his Reign had all Ladies in a high esteem and Veneration: Also I assure you, the Gods could never have sent this person into the world, of whom I am to speak in an age disposed to adore her Beauty, admire her Spirit, and reverence her Virtue, as in this. Now Madam, I shall tell you, that this incomparable Lady, whose name was Elisa, is of a very Noble Family, and hath this advantage, to be born in great abundance of wealth; for her Father, whose name was Straton, was extream rich. This man was of Spirit enough, but it was a Spirit of ambition, and for the world: He was of a hot and lively temper, who loved all manner of pleasures, and who was never content, unless his house Page 36 were filled with all the Grandure of the Court; he kept an open and plentiful Table; his house was the Rendezvous of pleasures, either in Walkings, Musiques, or Feasts: So that it may be said, Elisa was born in a house of joy. The Wife of Straton, called Barlcea, was fair, but phantastical, and did not contribute any thing, neither to the pleasures of her Husband, or of those who came to him: And it often so fell out, that she was not seen, and left in her Chamber without the least, how do you. Since Straton had been long married before he had any children, when Elisa came into the World, he was extraordinarily joyed at her, and solemnized her Birth, with a Feast of a vast expence. I will not insist long Madam upon the extraordinary beauty of this Child, when first she saw light: But I beseech you permit me to begin the History of her life, from her coming out of her Cradle, since certainly in Tire they talked of the little Elisa, as a great miracle, when she was not above five or six years of age: It was not only the prodigious lustre of her beauty which filled the Court with admiration, but it was as well her rare wit and sprightly answers; it was her excellent grace, and strange facility to learn any thing was taught her, and her pleasant conceits in diverting company; also a stateliness at that age, as would have become the Majesty of a Queen: Besides all these qualities, she had two more, which did render her most amiable, for she had such an admirable voice, and such an inclination unto Dancing, as that at the age of five years she was most excellent in both, beginning also to play upon the Lute, which she did with such a grace, that she charmed all her hearers. Elisa being thus qualified as I tell you, and much more amiable then I am able to relate, you may easily conceive that her Father did most tenderly love her, and he loved her so much the more, because he observed that his Wife did not love her over-well, and because the beauty of his Daughter, though a child, did stick in her stomach: Nor did he leave her unto her guidance, but on the contrary, he placed the little Elisa in a Chamber, far off hers, and set a Governess over her, who was as virtuous as she was apt, and fit to cultivate the sweet and noble inclinations of this young Lady: So that she being of a natural sweetness, and educated with such extraordinary care, it is no wonder this rare child should make a greater noyse in the World at nine years of age, then the fairest use to do at eighteen. Also one occasion did present it self, which did make the rare merit of this young Elisa to shine, and which was not talked on only in Tire, but also throughout all Phenicia, and all the Kingdoms, whose Ambassadors were then at our Court. Be pleased to know Madam, that a Tirian named Crysiles, who was admirable in Musique, and had travelled, returned unto Tire, and being a very accomplished man: and known of all the Court, he came unto Straton's house, as others did, and was so charmed with the young Elisa, that he would needs become her Master in Musique, and teach her upon the Lute, and to sing all those Songs which he learned of the famous Arion, with whom he had an intimate friendship at Lestos, and whom he had seen at the Cape of Tonarus, when that Dolphin which saved his life brought him thither: Since this accident was a great miracle, and Crysiles an eye-witness of it, I believe he was desired by every one to tell it, a thousand and a thousand times over, so that it was the only talk of the Town for many daies. The King himself caused him to relate it, and so did the Queen; and Chrisiles was so tired with so often relating it, as he said once laughing, that Arions Dolphin was not so weary with carrying him, as he was with telling the same thing so oft over: The time was then, when the custome was to celebrate a great Feast unto Neptune: For the Tirians being all Seamen, their grand devotion is unto the Sea Gods: They conceived also, that their Town being an Isle, they were more obliged then any others to reverence Neptune: You know Madam, how it is a received belief every where, that during the love of this God unto Amphitrites, there was a Dolphin which did prodigious feats for him, and how this Fish was placed among the Stars for the good services which he had done that God: So that the Tirians in the honour of this God and Amphitrite, do extremely reverence Dolphins; and understanding this adventure of Arion from Crysiles, they attributed the miracle unto Neptune, as Master of the Seas. This time being neer that Feast, and it being the King who was to be at the charges of that ceremony, this Prince did contrive a place according unto the custome, to represent some Emblemes of Neptune, and he made choice of this adventure of Arion. He no sooner had this phansie, but he did communicate it unto those that had the contrivance of such things, and unto Crisiles also; and they all agreed, that this adventure would furnish out a most rare Sceane, and make a most pleasant shew; So that without any Page 37 more delay, Painters, Engravers, Engineers, and Musicians were to be employed, and the King being then deeply in Love with a Lady of that Court, it may very well be said, that this magnificence intended, was made as much for her as for Neptune. In the mean while, the Engineers and Painters found out an invention to represent the Sea, to make Neptune appear sitting in his Chair, and Amphitrites in hers; to represent Ships, and the Tritons, and the Nereides, to shew a Dolphin which should seem to swim, but they could not devise who it should be that should represent Arion, who as Crisiles said, was both young and fair; and since the best Singers there were neither young nor fair, they were a little puzzled; but in conclusion, Crisiles who aimed at nothing more then the glory of the young Elisa, made a Proposition unto the King, that he would command Straton to permit his Daughter to represent Arion, which he could not refuse, since the Queen her self was to represent Amphitrites. The advise of Crisiles was not at the first liked by the King, who feared that the young Elisa would be out of countenance, and spoil the finest passage of the Musique: But Crisiles answered the King so satisfactorily, that the King consented, and he was no less busie in ordering this entertainment, then he would have been in ordering a Battel, and therefore sent immediately unto Straton, to propose the business unto him: But lest he should be denied, he did both pray and command at once, so that Straton did not deny. This Prince also desired the Queen to ask Barce concerning Elisa, lest out of her capritious design, she should be any obstacle unto the design. But in conclusion Madam, not to abuse your patience with any frivolous and impertinent relations, Crisiles taught the young Elisa the very same words and Aire <> Arion used to allay the cruelty of those that would have devoured him. Crisiles <> obtained the favour to have them from him, though he would not give them unto a <...>, and the wonder was, Elisa did so admirably learn them, that Crisiles himself was a <...> ed; but the greatest wonder of all was, to see the confidence and boldness of the young Elisa, without any more astonishment, then if she had been in her own Chamber, having no other Spectator but her Governour, though it was in the presence of a full and glorious Court. I will not lose so much time Madam, as to describe the magnificence of this Musique; it will be sufficient I only tell you, that never was a finer in Phenicia, and I will only insist upon that which concerned the young and fair Elisa: Though I could tell you Madam, that the Sea was so fully represented, that all the Spectators feared the Waves would have dashed themselves against the Company: And that the Chairs of Neptune and Amphitrites, were adorned with all that the Sea produced most rich; that Pearls, Choral, and Rubies, were the garments of these two Divinities: The vestures of the Nercides and the Tritons were of Aggates, Mother of Pearl and Sea Rushes: That the Ship out of which Arion was cast into the Sea, seemed to be far distant, as if it had floted to catch the Dolphin; and that all the Sceans were so lively represented, as that they did deceive the eyes. But give me leave to tell you Madam, that when the young Elisa appeared upon the Dolphin, all the Assembly shouted a cry of admiration, which in lieu of amazing, did imbolden her, and caused their wonder to double. The truth is, never could any thing be a rarer Spectacle, then to see Elisa upon this Dolphin, which swimming gently, and lifting his head out of the Water, as if he were proud of such a burthen, seemed as if he would leap amongst the Assembly, swimming sometimes on one side, and sometimes on another. The young Elisa, whose hair was fair, like as Apollo is represented, did tie up her locks with much becomingness, lest they should have hung down too long, yet divers of them in Breads did hang negligently upon her shoulders: Her dress was of Tissue in divers colours mingled with Gold: Her Buskins, which suffered some part of her white legs and feet appear under her waving Garment, which the motion of the Dolphin stir'd, did imitate the manner how Fishes do swim. A thousand Diamonds set in several places of her Garment did cast a shining flame, but the eyes of the fair Elisa did out-shine them all: The sleeves of her Garment reached no further then her Elbowes, which suffered the lovely plumpness of her youth to appear. The Aire being then very hot, and Elisa having naturally a Love incarnate complexion in her cheeks, with a mixture of pure white, her Beauty augmented, and appeared more lively and fresh; her lips were perfect Coral, her teeth no snow was whiter, and her eyes no Stars more lustrous. After all this, you may well conceive Madam, that Elisa was a glorious Object, who without any astonishment at the motion of the Dolphin, nor at the stirring of those well represented Waves, nor at the presence of the King or Queen, Page 38 nor at that huge number of Spectators, did hold her Lute with a most admirable grace, and did sing with so much wonderful confidence and skill, that all the Court was surprized and charmed. Crisiles was in an extasie of joy, and indeed it was a wonder, that the voice of one so young should reach so far, as to fill so vast a place as that was with a harmony so charming, as moved all hearts unto admiration. Also when she was landed at a Cape, which represented the Cape of Tenaros; and when the Dolphin had set her on shore, the King was so transported with admiration, that not staying the end of the Musique, he went to embrace her, and made extremely much of her. Afterwards he carried her to the Queen, who was also come out of her Chair, and gave her a thousand commendations, which she received with much respect: But the applauses which every one in the Court did give her, with the most Majestique fury in the world, as if for a thing which she thought to be a meer vanity: After this Madam, she went often to the Queen, yet she never went, but she still augmented the admiration of all those who saw her; and I am confidently perswaded, that she made more Lovers at that time, then did think themselves to be so, and who because of her exceeding youth, imagined their passions were no more then only an admiration, and complacency of themselves, which moved them to seek all occasions of seeing her, only because she diverted them: Since the King was engaged at that time in a most violent passion, and since Elisa was a very child, he looked upon her only as a miracle, and not as a Mistress, yet he made her a thousand welcomes, and applauded her to the Skies upon every occasion: He never saw Straton, but he asked how his Daughter the fair Elisa did; and there was never any extraordinary diversion, but the young Elisa must needs be present. In the mean time, as she grew, so did her beauty, and faster, and every Spring put fresher Lillies and Roses upon her cheeks, then grows in any gardens: At fourteen years of age, she was the most exact Beauty that ever was seen in Phenicia: And Madam, as I have already described the beauty of Elisa in her Childhood, so I beseech you give me leave to describe her, as she was at fourteen, and as she is at present; and it is requisite I let you know her heart and her Spirit, that you may with more delight and attention hear her adventures: Imagine therefore Madam, a person of the most handsom and noble stature in the world, if you will conceive Elisa's: And though it was much under the common height of one that can be called tall, yet her stature was so exactly handsome, as all her body was as fair as her face. Moreover, her port was so noble and free, and yet so full of Majesty, that never any was seen to walk with a better grace, nor stand still with a more modest countenance, yet confident enough.

Moreover, her action was no less pleasing, then her stature was noble, and her Port Majestique, her favour was neither forced nor careless, she looked without affectation, and yet looked, as if she would appear fair: If she consulted with her glass to rectifie any thing that was amiss in her dress, she did it with so handsom a grace, and with so much art, that any would say her hair did with delight obey those fair hands which ordered it. All that she did was done in such a taking way, that one knew not how to look upon her, and not love her. Moreover; Nature never gave fairer eyes unto any then unto her, they were not only full and fair, but they were also fiery and sweet, and sparkling altogether, but so quick and sparkling, and so dazzled all that looked upon them, as their true colour cannot be well defined; her mouth was as perfect a beauty as her eyes; the pure whiteness of her teeth deserved the Carnation of her lips, her young and fresh complexion made so great, so natural, and so surprizing a lustre, that at the very first sight she would force admiration and applauses: Indeed the delicacy and purity of her complexion cannot be expressed by any tongue, ingredients of white and red were so sweetly mixed, that the fairest and sweetest Jessimons and Roses comes not neer it in comparison: Her Nose was of a most exact Cicemtry, and Proposition, without rising too much or too little, but made a most compleat beauty: Indeed the whole composure of her face being neither very round, nor very oval, though it inclined more to the last then the first, was a most prime work of Nature, who joyning all her wonders together, kept back nothing that could possibly be desired. Moreover, Elisa's Neck was no less fair, then all the parts described before, so that the most envious at her beauty could find no fault to carp at: You may well imagine then Madam, that such a young Lady as I have described, who dressed her self to the best advantage, who played most admirably upon the Lute, who sung better then ever any did, and who danced with a grace above imitation, was most fit to take hearts: Yet I can assure you Madam, this is not all, for which Elisa was commendable: Page 39 for be pleased to know, that her spirit and her wit had a million of charms and Beauties in them, and she knew so well how to make a mixture of mirth and jolity with her wisdom and modesty, that never any was more exact in the Art: There was in her humour such a jolly pleasantness, as would make a great company very merry, though they were all the most serious and grave persons in the world; and she knew so well how to answer all those who did visit her, both how to divert them, and how to please them, and how to oblige them, that every one was infinitely pleased with her, be they of what humours they would. Since she had seen all the compleat Gallants in Phenicia, one may safely say she knew all that they did know; and believe it, she could speak of all things very fitly and well, though she spoke of many things which she never heard before: But as she was good at conversation in general, so was she also at particular; for she would be a whole afternoon talking with one of her friends with as much gravity, as if she were at a great Feast: Questionless she was a lover of company, but she would not be weary in solitude; and when she was in the Countrey walking by a Rivers side, and hearing the Nightingals sing, she would be as pleasant, as if all the Court was with her. Moreover, never any was of more regular nor of more exact civility then she; she did as much as possibly she could to accord the disobliging of any, but on the contrary, did with a serious care study how to oblige all the world: But Madam, her soul was yet far greater then her beauty, and transcended her wit, and it cannot be better expressed, then by saying, that it was so full of generous and heroic thoughts, that glory only did animate her heart: She was indeed something cholerique, but her choler was so temper'd with an ingenuous sweetness, as that it never displeased, and as there was a kind of pride in her soul, so there was a sweet tenderness in her heart. Indeed never any loved her friends with more zeal, nor treated her Lovers with more rigour: There was never any unto whom she promised friendship, had the least cause to complain, she was ever ready to do them all good offices with joy, even to the expences both of purse and health, by taking pains in their business; she loved them, though absent, exiled, prisoners, without money, without credit, and her friendship hath sometimes gone as far as their very graves. Grandure never daunted Elisa, she has seen Kings and Princes at her feet, and would never permit her soul to be taunted with that vain-glory, which looks only at appearances, and seduceth all weak souls: She was as unmoveable as a stone at the interest of riches, as you shall perceive by the sequel of the story; she was not capable of any envy, though almost all the Beauties envied her: On the contrary, she did ever aggravate the Beauty of others; and one of her greatest delights was to see any good qualities in others, virtue had predominate charms over her, she loved all that was worthy to be loved, and hated vice with as much zeal as she loved virtue; she was not only full of humility, but modesty, but it was a true real modesty, which is no less in the heart then the face, and which never deceives those who admire it.

Moreover, she was as full of prudence as wit, though far from that which is called subtilty, which often passeth for that virtue amongst many persons: But as for Elisa, she was full of sincerity, she was capable of the closest secrets, and of a constancy which hath few examples amongst those of her Sex. The truth is Madam, Elisa is a miracle, and it is no wonder at all she should get so many lovers and friends: But since she hath been more happy in the last of these then the first, I will speak as well of her friends as of her Lovers. But to return to the business from whence I digressed, give me leave to tell you Madam, that Elisa being arrived at the age of fourteen, she made so many Conquests, and subjected so many hearts, that perhaps I should not find belief, if I should number them; for she was beloved of all who were capable of loving; all the Princes in the Court were her Slaves; three Brothers of that Quality Rivals at a time; all men a little inferior unto that Rank acknowledged her power, and she was a Mistress unto all their Masters.

Chrisiles in teaching her to sing, learned to sigh for her, and he loved her with so much devotion, that he would never teach any other but her, to the end she might only sing perfectly. The very Painters who took her picture, burned in hot flames of Love; there was not one who had any reason that were not in the same condition. In the mean time, Elisa in the midst of all these victories, stood firm as Marble, still the same, and out of a Noble pride, which rendred her more charming, she was not puffed up with her Conquests, and it may very well be said, that Straton had more joyes then she; but it was not so with Barcea, who could not indure the great reputation of her Daughter: The Page 40 young Elisa suffered all her phantastical humours with unparalleled patience, and was verry complacential unto the will of her Father; and it was chiefly to please him, that she exposed her self to so much company who came thither, since certainly he affected it much more then she. But to honour the Triumph of Elisa's Beauty, the King of Phenicia, that famous Conquerour, became her Captive, but her Captive in a different manner from that he was accustomed to be, for heretofore his heart was able to make a retreat, but his passion to Elisa was otherwise obliged, and except some that envied her Beauty, none ever spoke or thought any thing which could be disadvantageous to her, and certainly they had no reason, for I verily believe, that there was never any person whose virtue was more pure, nor who was put unto more difficult trial then the virtue of Elisa. I then had the honour to be much in the Kings favour at that time, and was the confident of his passion, and by consequence was a witness of Elisa's virtue, though since she hath confessed unto me, that at the first she was joyed a little, to see a Prince who was beloved of his people prostrate at her feet: One who was a terror unto all his Neighbours, and esteemed of all Asia: But she did so discreetly palliate those joyes, and always received the King with such an indifferent civility, as I heard that Prince a hundred times say, he never came neer her but he trembled: I know very vwell, that those vwho had a mind to diminish the honour of Elisa, have reported that it was not impossible to resist a Prince who was none of the handsomest, who had the Garb more of a Souldier then of a King, and one who indeed was no proper man: But for all this, he was one of the most illustrious Kings in the world, and one, who by reason of his familiarity and affability, was extreemly pleasing and taking, he would discourse with so fine a grace, and behave himself with so much sweetness, that he gained the hearts of all the world: Moreover, never was Lover so civil, so obsequious, nor so respectful as he, and by consequence it may truly be said, that Elisa did merit infinite glory in resisting so great a Prince: I will not insist Madam, upon any relation of his Courtships, nor upon the Feasts which he made in consideration of her, nor with what assiduity he did visit her, for that would be too tedious and long: But give me leave only to tell you, that he was as diligent in his Courtships of her, as he was of all the others whom he loved. In the mean while, Straton who was of an ambitious composition, was much joyed to see the King was in Love with his Daughter, yet he would always tell Elisa, that he pretended unto no further, then to make use of the Kings favour for a certain time, and not that she should sacrifice her self unto his fortune: In order unto this, he was very glad that the King did him the honour to come often unto his house, and that it was become an absolute Court: As for Elisa, she was quickly weary of all these glistening gallantries, for she saw that they were dangerous to her reputation, and deprived her of million of pleasure and divertisements: The respects of a King, caused all the Lovers of Elisa to conceal their Chains; and some of them seem to love others for fear of offending the King, and who durst not so much as speak unto Elisa, which she remembered very well, when afterwards they addressed themselves: Since the virtue of this Lady was well known unto the Queen, the Kings Love did not put Elisa out of her good opinion, or of the King: On the contrary, when this Prince was at any time in a melancholy mood, the Queen would seek out for some occasion to make him go and see Elisa: If he were at any time sick, she would send for Elisa to charm his disease with singing, & she esteemed Elisa as much as the King loved her: Since this Prince had a Genius of Rallary, Elisa did a long time receive the expressions of his passion, as if he did it only to divert himself; but afterwards, his passion encreasing, she saw that she was driven to the necessity of resolving what course to take, and how she should behave her self towards him: If she followed her own inclination, and the fierceness of her natural disposition, she would have made it her glory to have treated the King worse then the meanest of his Subjects, but she was not ignorant that her Father would take it ill: So that since she knew this Prince had naturally a light kind of a soul, and could entertain more then one passion at one time, she used her best endeavours to extinguish his passion unto her, by reviving in his heart the former love which he had, and perhaps might have again unto a person of rare beauty and virtue, whom he had quitted for her, conceiving, that if he did quit her only for her, and should persist, it would be dishonourable. Halving then fixed upon this resolution, she would sing before the King only such songs as had been made for this illustrious Rival, whom she desired should only reign in the heart of this Prince, and that by singing her praises, he should apply himself unto her again. Elisa made use of a thousand such desires to lessen the Kings passion towards her, and Page 41 knowing that I had some credit with him, spoke one day unto me, when I was intending to move her to be a little more favourable unto the King: Talamis (said she unto me) The King doth me the greatest honours in the world in visiting me, and making a distinction between me and others of my quality; yet I wish you would be pleased to do me a good office unto him, which would be a very acceptable favour unto me, but I am afraid you will not: Methinks Madam, (said I unto her and smiled) you should easily believe without any arguments of perswasion, that I cannot deny any thing unto the Mistress of my Master: And besides, I am so devoted unto your service, that you may command me any thing without the least fear of disobedience: It is not as the Mistress of your Master, replied she, that I desire you should satisfy my desire, but as I am your friend, and as so I will be (if you do not deny me) as long as I live: I beseech you Madam, said I unto her, make hast, and tell me what is your pleasure I should do to merit that glorious Title which you are pleased to promise me upon those conditions: My desire is, said she, That you will cause the King to love me less then he doth, and that he will renew his affection unto that most accomplished Lady, whom he so zealously adored before: How Madam (said I unto her) would you have the King love you less? Yes, answered she, I much desire it, because I am a real Lover of honour, but wish not to be ranked with three or four persons whom he hath already loved, and whom a little false glory seduced: I must confess unto you, added she, that if the King should quit me out of scorn, perhaps I should be so weak as to be a little angry. And I think also, that if he should cast me off for some whom he named unto me, I should also be something moved: But if he should leave me, only because he hath repented of his infidelity unto so accomplished a Lady as she is whom he quitted for me, I do assure you I should be extreemly joyed; therefore I conjure you to speak unto him upon all opportunities, in behalf of this illustrious Rival: Let him often look upon her Picture, and rekindle, if it be possible, that fire which blazed out so glorious a flame: For truly Talamis, I consider that the King cannot make me a Queen, and though he could, yet is not my Quality worthy to be one; and he would be infinitely injurious to himself, if he should have any such thought: But I assure you, that my heart is too high, and my soul too noble to sacrifice my honour upon an ill-grounded vanity; therefore Talamis I conjure you not to deny me this request.

I do confess Madam, that this Discourse of Elisa did surprize me: At the first, I thought that she had some secret inclination another way, which perhaps was one part of her virtue; for I could not imagine that one so young as she was capable of such a resolution as this: but I was quickly undeceived, and was constrained to admire the virtue of Elisa, more then her beauty: The truth is, I was so charmed, that I forsook the Kings Interest for hers: so that in lieu of negotiating with her as he pleased, I negotiated with him as Elisa pleased: Yet was it not possible to do as she desired; so that resolving to speak unto him her self, she did it with so much confidence and generosity, that this Prince loved her the more: yet she had so much power over him, as he protested that he would never have any unjust designs upon her, and that he would do what he could to moderate the violence of his passion; which was no easie matter for him to do; but to bring it about, and to chase one passion out with another, he designed some Conquests upon the Sircans which are toward the West; and in order to that, he prepared a great Navy, and employed himself wholly in the Wars, purposely to lessen that love which reigned in his Soul: so that it may be said, he was as diligent in chasing Elisa out of his heart, as if he would have won her by winning of Battels. In the mean while, it delighted Elisa, that all Phenicia did strive in vain to know the cause of the Kings designs; and it pleased her that he talked of nothing but advancing her family, but advancing her father, and promising her, that if he could not cure himself of his passion by this voyage which he was attempting, to let her live as she pleased at his return: and that he would endeavor all possible ways to please her. But to testifie how extreem the Love of this Prince to Elisa was, even at the very same time that he endeavored to extinguish it, be pleased to know that Dipoenus and Scillis, whose Fame was blazed over all the world, being landed at Tyre, he entertained them, to make during his absence the rare Statue, which at this present is among the Treasures which Croesus had heaped up, and which doth so lively resemble Elisa; appointing them to represent her, as the Athenians did represent Victory, which was without wings, intimating by that as well as they, he would not have Victory forsake and fly from him: For their pains, he promised such great Recompence when he returned, that it is not imaginable Page 42 what he would have given for the possession of Elisa her self, since he would give so much only for her Statue. Since he had several Pictures of this fair Elisa, Dipoenus and Scillis did form their model by them: Also they had several sights of her, though she knew not the reason why they looked so upon her, for the King did keep it secret: In the mean time, Elisa was much joyed in her hopes, that her fathers ambition would be satisfied without any hazard of her honour or reputation; and therefore she made a thousand vows and prayers for the happy success of the Kings expedition, who imbarqued after he had given Straton a thousand Assurances of Grandure at his Return, not daring to express himself more directly concerning his Passion: I shall not weary you Madam, with a Relation of this War: The beginning and sequel was prosperous to the King; he defeated his enemies wheresoever he met them; and he never sent any news of his Victories unto Tyre, but he writ unto the incomparable Elisa, and thanked her as the cause of all his happy success: In conclusion the difference between the King of Phenicia and the Sircans came to General Battel, which the King gave, and had the Victory, and sent presently by me the news of it unto the Queen, and at the same time unto Elisa; forbidding me to speak unto any, that he had received a slight wound with a dart on his side, lest it should disquiet the Queen, or diminish the joys of the people for his Victory: commanding me moreover, to assure the Queen and particular Elisa in private, that he would follow within eight days with his victorious Army, after he had left some Garisons in certain places which he took in the beginning of the War. So using the help both of Sail and Oar, I came to Tyre with incredible speed, and brought with me this news of Joy, which presently became so universal, that nothing was thought on but magnificent Preparations for the Kings Entry. Elisa, though not very well, yet she did partake of this publique Rejoycing, and the sooner, because the Letter, which I brought from the King, was the most obliging in the world; and because I assured her, that in lieu of losing this Princes heart as she once intended, she had only purified it, and made it capable only of an innocent passion: Adding afterwards, how he had commanded to tell Straton, that he should prepare himself to receive as soon as he arrived, one of the most considerable Offices in the State. So that Madam, Elisa, having reason to hope for the being the Kings Favorite, and not his Mistress, as so many others had been, she began to desire his return, and to be impatient of seeing him: Since I had an extraordinary esteem of her, and loved no other, I never was from her, where Straton was very glad to see me; and I went the oftner, because the house of Straton being towards the Sea, I was certain from the Chamber of Elisa, to see a Ship arrive, which I thought to be one of the Kings that came before to acquaint us with the hour of his arrival; but it was not so, for that Ship suffering Shipwrack, we wondered one day when I was in Elisa's Chamber, to see the whole Navy appear: Since I spied it the first, I could not chuse but express my joyes, by acquainting Elisa with it: Come Madam, said I unto her, Come and triumph over the Conquerour of others, and fully enjoy your Victory.

She blushed at my words, and we no sooner went to the Balcone, but we discerned the Fleet, and presently after, we discovered how all the Ships had their ornaments of victory: We saw a thousand Flags waving in amongst the Cordage, as many flames flashing, the Ships were set round with colours gained from the Enemies, and all the Decks shined with gold and silver: But that which most surprized Elisa and me when the Fleet came neerer, was to perceive all these Flags and Pennons, in lieu of being of several colours, as they use in combat or in Triumph, were all of one dusky dark colour mixed with gold and silver, such as is used in the Funeral ceremonies of Kings: The sight of this made us begin to tremble, but our admiration augmented, when coming neerer the place where we were, we could distinctly perceive, that the Captain who had more ornaments than the rest of the Ships, had upon his Deck a great Coffin, placed upon a half part of three stairs, and that this Coffin was covered with black cloth, wrought with gold, upon which was placed a Crown, and a magnificent Sword, and at the head of this Coffin a Trophie elevated, to signifie, that he who died and was in the Coffin, died in triumphing, a hundred lighted Lamps hung round about the Deck: The Kings chief Officers were in mourning, and waited round about the Coffin: This sight caused extream sorrow in Elisa's heart and mine; a doleful musique was heard from every Ship, which by its lamentable tone spoke the King of Phenicia to be dead: All the Ships gained from the enemy followed this Captain, but without any Flags, Pennons, Banners, or Ornaments to signifie their defeat; the Souldiers in them were chained upon the Decks Page 43 of the Ships, to honour the Funeral Pomp of that illustrious Conquerour. To be short Madam, it was the King of Phenicia who was dead of his slight hurt, which he had commanded me to conceal from the Queen and Elisa when he sent me to carry the news of his victory: Doubtless you will ask me Madam how it was possible, that a wound which permitted this Prince to write unto the Queen and Elisa, and which did hardly trouble him, should cause his death so suddenly: But I shall answer, that the Dart which had been poisoned, as it was known after my departure, and the venom having not dispersed its malignity when I came from him, he did not seem to be so much as ill. But as soon as I had left him, the venom reached his heart, and he died within twenty four hours after: He was no sooner dead, but his Lieutenant General dispatched a Ship for Tyre, to bring this sad news: Mean while, he cast anchor neer a great Town not far off his Road, purposely to give orders for all things necessary to honour the Funeral Pomp of the King his Master: But as I told you, the Ship which should have preceded the Fleet, being Shipwracked, none were advertised of the Kings death, nor of the Navies approach. After this Madam, you may easily imagine, how Elisa and I were amazed and grieved; for though the soul of Elisa was not engaged in any passion to this Prince, yet since she was of a generous disposition, and sensible of benefits, it was impossible she should look upon the Coffin of this Prince, whom she had seen so respectively at her feet, with a dry eye, or tranquile soul: And when the Captain of the Ship came under her Window, she hastily retired, as not being able to endure so sad an object; yet notwithstanding her retirement, her sorrows increased when the Ship came into the Port, and the people who were crowded to render honour unto their victorious and living King, did cry out most dolorously, when they knew that their Prince was dead: The noise of such a clamour was so great, that the Chamber of Elisa seemed to shake, and it was long before we could make our complaints, because we could not hear each other: 'Tis true, our tears did speak our sorrows, and we said many things in saying nothing: But at last our tongues were sad expressors of our losses, yet it was not suddenly, for Elisa desiring to know all particulars of his death, willed me to go out and inform my self. But this is not pertinent to my discourse, let me only tell you Madam, That the last words of the dying King was with the name of Elisa, which did not lessen the grief of this fair and virtuous Lady. As she was moved only out of her generosity, so Straton grieved out of interest and gratitude both, for all his hopes were quashed, and could not expect that from the new King which he hoped for from the other. Never was a more general mourning then this, never was a greater consternation then seemed to be amongst the people, and never did change of Prince cause such an alteration in private fortunes.

During this confused unsettledness, and trouble which was in the Court, Straton went into the Country, and carried Elisa with him, who was glad of such a solitude to hide her melancholy, and where she was pleased I should sometimes come and see her: But during this time, Dæonius and Scillis, having moved the Kings Officers for what the late King had promised unto them, and these Officers, perhaps without acquainting the King having repulsed them, they imbarqued in the night; and carried away with them the rare Statue which they had made, and which they said was an absolute miracle. In the mean time, as it is the custom to mourn for the death of a King, so it is also the custom to rejoyce with him who is to succeed; and as publique sorrows never last long, so a calm began suddenly to appear in the Court, and things were settled as before: As for Elisa, though she was not of an humour to pass so quickly from sorrows into joyes, yet out of reason and wisdom she rowzed up her self; and since her heart was not engaged in any particular affection, her sorrows were more easily comforted: Straton then returning unto Tyre, Elisa returned also; and since she had never seen the Queen since the Kings death, she went to her as soon as she had got into a habit of mourning. Never was the Court so full as now, there was not a man of any quality in all Phenicia who was not there at Tyre; So that when Elisa was with the Queen, with a Princess who loved her very well, she met with the applauses of all the Grandees in the Court and Realm: For indeed Madam, the mourning which Elisa wore for that renowned Conquerour, did so very well become her, that without doubt it helped her to conquer many hearts which were not yet subjected, that black and plain dress, that vail hanging down to the ground over her fair hair, that plated Tiffany about her fair Neck, and tyed with several black Ribbons, like a Scarf; those turned up sleeves, which let the whiteness of her arms appear, and all her sad habit, which gave a more fresh lustre to her eyes, and was a foil unto the freshness Page 44 of her complexion, all of these were so advantageous unto her, that her greatest adorsers confessed, they never saw her so fair; and they pressed so that day to see her, that one could hardly pass through the Chamber unto the Queen, who did treat her according to her merits. Amongst that croud of gallants, there was one that day with the Queen, whose name was Poligenes, who was one of the most considerable men in our Court, both for his quality and merit, who being a great friend of Stratons, and one of the prime Admirors of Elisa, was ravished with joy at the acclamations which were attributed to her Beauty, yet he thought that this joy was as much an effect of that friendship which he held with the Father, as the love which he bore the Daughter; for having seen her in the Cradle, and used in her infancy to speak unto her, as if he had been her Brother, also given her a hundred advisements in divers accidents, he could not believe he was in Love with her; yet it was not long before he did perceive it, as I shall hereafter tell you: Amongst this multitude of men of Quality, who were then at Court, there was one of Sidon, called Phocilion, who having never seen Elisa before, was so surprized and charmed, that he could not talk of any thing else: He did not content himself with looking upon her whilst she was with the Queen, but he followed her when she went out as far as her Coach, afterwards he came in again unto the Queen, and mixing with the company of three or four, whereof Poligenes was one, he began to extol the beauty of Elisa very highly, asking where she lodged? who used to visit her often? and who could carry him thither? Poligenes, who till now was glad of the praises which were attributed unto Elisa, began to think strange at those which Phocilion gave her, for he was very handsome, and he told this fresh Adorer of Elisa, that the house of Straton was not now so open and free, as it was wont to be in the time of the late King, and therefore he would not advise him to court his new acquaintance; adding further, that since he was a Sidonian, it was not convenient for him to see such a dangerous person in Tyre; yet for all this, his perswasions would not work upon Phocilion, for which he was very sorry: So that calling himself to an account, he found, that certainly the affection which he bore unto Elisa, was of another nature then he imagined: But before I acquaint you Madam with the progress of this Love, it is requisite I acquaint you what kind of man the Lover was. Poligenes was doubtless descended from a very illustrious family, and out of a house more noble then that of Elisa, his person was very handsome, he was rich and neat in his habit, and never any had a more Polite and facetious wit then he, Courtship and gallantry were qualities born with him, civility was inseparable from him, and though he was of a little too serious composition, yet he was not melancholy; but on the contrary, his conversation was very pleasing: 'Tis true, he was a little reserved and particular, and never spoke in any of those tumultuous conversations, where there was much company: If he was at any time to give a treatment, he would do it with so good a grace in such order, and so neatly, that one would believe it cost him half as much more as it did; and in any thing which he undertook, either Races, Musiques, Balls, Walks, or Feasts, he alwayes had something extraordinary and rare; so that all unanimously did give him the reputation of the neatest of men, and it may well be said, that all the spruce youths of the Court came not neer him: Poligenes was about thirty five years of age when the late King of Phenicia died, although he seemed not to be above twenty and eight: He had a Brother much younger then himself, but he was not then at Tyre; Poligenes being as I have described, did not mix himself with the youth of the Court, which made such a croud upon Elisa, as if he were their Rival; but on the contrary, he behaved himself as the friend of Straton, and his Daughter, not but that he did commend her with a better grace then they, and was as full of his expressions of gallantry, but it was in a way more subtil, and by not professing the Gallant he was more Courteously then they: Since he knew the sharpness of Elisa's humour, he carried it so as he perswaded her, that whatsoever he said, were only effects of that Gallantry which proceeded from his natural Genius; so that Elisa not suspecting he had any particular design upon her, lived with him in much confidence, and as if he were her brother: The better to palliate his own thoughts, Poligenes would sometimes give her advice, either in acquainting her what was said of her, or in advising her to rid her self of some who visited her, craftily chusing those whom he feared most prejudicial to him: Elisa thinking him well intentioned towards her, thought her self exceedingly obliged to him for his behaviour to her, and his advice, though she would be her own Governour, nor was she of too easie a belief, yet she lived with him in a most obliging manner: So that whilst she made all those to despair whom she thought her Lovers, Page 45 Poligenes whom she thought only her friend, received a thousand testimonies of esteem and friendship. In the mean time, Phocilion notwithstanding the advice of Poligenes, found out a way by the help of a friend to be carried unto Elisa, and being handsome and of a good spirit, also being of good quality, and a very compleat man, Straton entertained him very well, and the better, because he looked upon him as one who might in reason think of a Marriage with his Daughter, for he knew very well, that all those Princes and Grand Signiors who had loved her, would not marry her. As for Elisa she looked upon him as a compleat man, and never looked further, for in the humour she was, marriage was no part of her inclination. Phocilion being discreet and wife, having a sweet and pleasing wit, and never speaking any thing unto Elisa, which might give her the least cause to shun his company, he courted hers, and he had presently got that pleasing familiarity with her which she allowed to her friends, and denied to her Lovers. Poligenes upon whom Phocilion cast a shadow, employed all his Stratagems to put him out of Elisa's favour: Sometimes he would tell her, he was but a Rustique, other whies, that if she had any thoughts of Marriage, it should be one of a better Rank, and that she might the sooner take his counsel, he would speak sometimes very well of Phocilion, whom he feared more than all the rest: For since he was well acquainted with the high virtue of Elisa, he did much less fear the Princes who loved her than Phocilion, whose condition and quality being more equal unto hers, might permit him to look upon her as a man whom she might innocently Love: But notwithstanding all his advises, he could not persuade Elisa to his wish; and knowing her to be imperious, and that perhaps he might anger her if he assumed any authority over her, he durst not be further importunate: However, his soul enjoyed her usual serenity a few daies after, for since Phocilion was not forward, and since his design upon Elisa was not a simple design of Gallantry, but of Marriage, he did not transact as other Lovers did, but carried it with much less noyse, because he was not sorry to observe the carriage of Elisa amidst so many Adorers before she would declare her self: So that negotiating as the friend of Straton, Poligenes did a little reassure him self, and also came to be very friendly with Phocilion, who having observed that Poligenes was in Elisa's favour, took a special care not to be upon any ill terms with him. As there is no manner of mourning is so soon passed over, as that of the Court, especially where a young Prince succeeds an old King, so pleasure now began to bud out in Tire, where they began to make many magnificent Feasts, of which Elisa was the fairest ornament.

There were also divers games of Prize to be played, and I remember one which conducted much to the glory of Elisa, and which procured her the hatred of many beauties: For imagine Madam, that those who won the Prize that day were to carry it unto Elisa, out of the extreme desire they had to please her, and to get some honor in her presence. Those three Princes Rivals whereof I spoke, and who were Brothers and Rivals both, were in the number of those who were to lay at her feet those marks of advantage which they had won: But it was most admirable to see, with what modest pride Elisa refused what they presented unto her, and with what repugnancy she obeyed Straton, who commanded her to accept their offerings. Poligenes, who was one of those who brought the Prize, was yet received more favourably than the rest, because she feared not in him those consequences which she apprehended in those who were her declared Lovers; yet I am confident, that for all her fury, she was not sorry for receiving an honour that day, which none but her self ever had, yet she did hide her satisfaction so well, that she returned home with so little sign of joy, as if she never thought upon it. The next morning, all those who shared in her glory went to visit her, to testify that they were very glad of the honour which she had received; but they found that she had a soul so infinitely above all that can be phrased vanity, that they judged her more worthy of a Crown than the Prize they had offered, not but that she received their applauses with a submissive modesty; but on the contrary, it was with such a proud and fierce humility, (if it may be said) as made it apparent, that she found more satisfaction in her self, then in the praises of another, not but that she did love the commendations of her friends, but she would have their commendations to be real signs of that esteem which those who commend her have of her, and that they be worthy who give her any such applauses: As for those tumultuous Encomiums which are given out of custom or decency, they did more vex then please her; and I have seen her receive them so fiercely, as she hath been ready to convert her love into hatred against those who gave them, and truly it is not strange she Page 46 should; for besides her natural humour of fierceness, and cholor, Poligenes did much contribute unto it; and I am confident that he would commend this Spirit of fierceness in her, a hundred times more then her beauty, voice, or wit: I remember one day amongst the rest, when none but Poligenes, Phocilion, and I were with Elisa, and beginning to commend her generosity in loving to do good offices unto her friends, we fell insensibly to repeat one after another all the excellent qualities which she was owner of, though she endeavoured to make us change our discourse: Since you will needs have me endure your Panegyriques (said she, seeing we still went on) I pray do me the favour to tell me of my faults that I may amend them: For my part, said Phocilion, I cannot find any but one which I can desire should be mended, which is, that you are a little too scornful: For my part, replied Poligenes, I think, and could rather wish she were not so sweetly familiar; for I do profess unto you, that if there were a necessity Elisa should lose any one of those qualities which renders her so admirable, I would let any of them go, rather then her scornful and haughty way of demeanour: How, (said I with admiration, and looked upon Poligenes) Do you prefer the pride of Elisa before any other of the good qualities which she is owner of? I beseech you consider well what I say, (replied he) and do not think I speak without reason: I must confess, replied Phocilion, that my reason reacheth not so far, nor can I understand how it should be possible you can consent that Elisa should part with the least good quality she hath, rather then that pride and scorn, which addeth an ingredient of fear, to be mixed with the Love of those who profess any affection to her: For my part (said Elisa and laughed) I am so glad to find any one who will commend a fault which I cannot mend in my self, as I cannot sufficiently express my obligation unto Poligenes for it: I assure you Madam, replied he, you need never thank me for a thought which I cannot chuse but think: But I beseech you, said Phocilion, What is the motive which prompts you to affect this pride in Elisa, which blemisheth all the rest of her virtues? It is, replied he, because thereby her heart is not easily conquered; and as I am fully persuaded; (speaking in kind of rally) that it is not my destiny to make that illustrious Conquest, so I am very glad, that there is something in the spirit of Elisa which may hinder others from it as well as my self; and to speak in reason, there is nothing that better becomes any high beauty, then this noble Pride, yet I must needs say, that this humour does not suit handsomly with every one, for there is requisite a thousand good qualities, to produce those pleasing effects which I speak of, and it must be a high Beauty that must set it off, for Beauty only is not enough, but a high spirit and a great heart are essentially requisite; and I am persuaded, that the haughtiness of a fair fool hath such a neer resemblance of Pride, and comes so neer a kind of foolish idle vanity, as it doth much misbecome them, and renders them insufferable. I know that if this person who hath this loftiness of behaviour, have not also a great and generous heart, she will be bitter and tart, and surely in lieu of being stately, this I do not wish to be in any accomplished person: Sullenness and Stateliness are two different things, the first is Ugly, the other is Majestical, the one a sign of a melancholy Spirit, the other of a great and noble soul: Yes, the stateliness which I speak of is a spark of Divinity, which distinguisheth those who are so from the common herd of people, which makes them feared, and respected of those who love them, and which without the least incivility, forbids too much familiarity with those who are so stately, and which quality I do every day admire in Elisa; and therefore wonder not that I should desire her to part with any other quality then with this noble Pride, which I so much love in her, and which also hath rendred you so good offices: To me, replied Phocilion, For heavens sake do not offer to persuade me that I am any Debtor unto the haughtiness of Elisa: Indeed you are, replied Poligenes, For can you think, that she being so fair, so amiable, and so much adored as she is, her heart would have been at this time to dispose of, if she had not been as stately and majestical as she is? or if she had been so affable and sweet, as you seem to desire her, she could never have seen so many denied Suitors at her feet, without having pity upon some one of them, insomuch as when you came unto Tire, and courted her acquaintance, you would have found her heart engaged, whereas now you find it free, and so disengaged from any affection, as the most passionate of all her Lovers cannot find in her behaviour the least cause of any jealousy: 'Tis true, replied Phocilion, But on the other side, they cannot find any foundation of hope: Yes, replied Poligenes, very much, since there is no fear that any will be more happy then your self: But I beseech you (said Elisa, and interrupted them) Wherein does this stateliness you speak of consist? I pray Page 47 tell me, that I may know how to be more or less lofty, as occasions shall be offered? Is it in the Aire of my visage that it appears? or in all my actions in general? Is it in my words? Or in the accent of my voice? Is it in something which I cannot define, replied Poligenes; For truly, you are more civil then many others, who pass for more sweet and affable then they are; you are essentially good, you are ready to do all good offices to your friends with an excellent grace: Also upon some occasions you are pitiful and tender, but with all these you are high-minded and stately, as I would have you to be; and to say truly, I think that this brave and noble Pride, hath its source from the root of your heart, and from thence it passeth into your Spirit, into your eyes, into your face, and into all your actions and words: Since so (said Elisa then) I must be as long as I live the very same I am at this present, for I must needs confess unto you, that I would not change my heart for any others: Though your highness of behaviour should make you have no other thought but that, replied Poligenes, yet I should for ever love it; for as I said before, I should not be sorry if others cannot enjoy that thing, which I cannot my self enjoy.

Phocilion was not yet satisfied with the reasons of Poligenes, but this discourse lasted so long, that night summoned us to leave Elira, who doubtless was gladder to see her stateliness commended, then any other Quality, for she heard every one applaud her beauty, her voice, and her Spirit, and sometimes she met with some who found fault with her stateliness, and extremely complained against it. This was the state of things Madam, when the Brother of Poligenes, whom I told you was travelling in Greece, returned unto Tire: He was then about four and twenty years of age, and there being such a difference of age between Poligenes and him, he respected him almost as his Father; and indeed Poligenes took as great a care of Agenor, as if he were his Son; he was therefore extremely glad to see him so handsome, and pleasing every way; and I assure you Madam, a man could not be more handsome then he was; he was not only handsome and of a good garb, but he was also exceeding agile in all the exercises of his body, especially in dancing. Moreover, he had an admirable wit, but it was a merry and diverting wit, which infinitely pleased all companies. Moreover, he was the aptest of all men to make secrets, to discover those of others, and to hide his own when he would: 'Tis true, this humour lasted not long, nor took him off; for he had a vanity, which caused that he could not be loved, without desiring it should be known; yet the passions of his soul were very violent, but vanity would not permit them to be strong in his heart; and certainly, if Agenor had not had this fault, he had been much more amiable in the eyes of those he loved then he was: For as for others, except his Rivals, he was the sweetest and most civil of men towards them, his vanity being only confined unto his Gallantries. Agenor being such a one as I have described, he returned to Tire, whilst Straton, Barce, and Elisa were gone for fifteen daies into the Country. In the interim, Poligenes shewed his Brother all the Court, who got in it extraordinary reputation, especially among the Ladies. In the mean while, Agenor having a soul naturally disposed unto Gallantry, could not live without a business of that nature; he applied himself unto one of the Queens women named Lyriope, one both of beauty and merit, but of an envious and revenging spirit, such as would not permit her self to be at rest: Indeed Lyriope looked upon any thing that was advantageous unto any of her companions with a spiteful eye; and I believe she never saw a good face, but she had ill rest all that day: I think also that she wished her self both fair and brown both at once, that she had eyes both black and grey, and indeed to be all that others were, yet be what she her self was also. Lyriope was not only envious at the beauty of others and their Conquests, but at their very cloaths also, not enduring any should have more riches, nor better made then her self, without extreme regret: You may then imagine Madam, that a woman of this humour was extremely joyed, that a man whom all the Court most talked of, and of greatest bravery, should apply himself to serve her, and to make choice of her amongst a Court full of beauties; so that fearing lest this Conquest should escape her, she resolved to joyn her endeavours unto her charms, and retain by some light favours what her beauty had gotten: But Lyriope was mistaken in her reason at this time, for I am persuaded, that if her heart had been harder to conquer, she had kept her conquest longer: However, this gallantry made a great noise in the world; for as soon as it was said that Agenor loved Lyriope, it was also said Lyriope did not hate Agenor; so that when Elisa returned out of the Country nothing else was talked of.

Page 48 She was no sooner returned unto Tire, but all the Court came to her, so as Agenor wondered, that he could hardly find a man that day in all his visits, yet it was not long before he knew the reason, for going at night unto the Queens lodging, he understood by the discourse of the Gallants in the Court, that Elisa was the cause of the solitude he found in every place: Some said she was returned fairer, then when she went away, and that the Country Aire had purified her complexion, others said she was grown taller, others affirmed her to be something less proud, or at least, their joyes to see her at Tire again, made her seem more sweet and affable; others who heard her sing, said and swore she had learned some Musique of the Nightingals in the Country, maintaining she never sung so well as now.

Agenor hearing these commendations of Elisa, asked Lyriope whether she deserved them or no: But she, according to her envious humour made a description which out-vied envy it self; she told him, that Elisa's eyes were so great and staring, as would affright him, that her complexion was so high as it was an absolute red, and that she was so arrogant and proud, as that she was even dogged and surely; so that detracting from Elisa all her beauty and good qualities, she made her Picture nothing like her. I chancing to be present at this discourse of Lyriope could not chuse but contradict her, and hate her also: I beseech you Sir, said I unto Agenor, do me the favour to suspend your judgment of Elisa, until you have seen her, which shall be ere long, for I am a witness how she chid Poligenes, for not bringing you to her house this day, telling him, that she did not believe, being his friend so much as she was, he would have had a Brother so much accomplished as reports speak you, and not make her acquainted with him. Agenor hearing me say so, did easily apprehend that Lyriope spake enviously of Elisa's Beauty; for though he was in Love with her, yet he doted not, and though she had touched his heart, yet she had not got it: However, he carried the matter, as if he had most zealously loved her, and therefore he asked her leave in a low voice to see Elisa, which she durst not deny him.

Agenor having leave to see Elisa, he was no sooner returned home to his Brother where he lodged, but he went unto his Chamber, to see whether he would acquaint him with Elisa's desire of bringing him unto her, as I had told him, but he wondered to see Poligenes not speak a word unto him concerning her; yet none had ever told Agenor that his Brother was in Love, he imputed it unto his oblivion: So as he resolved to acquaint him with what he knew, Poligenes was much surprized at his Brothers discourse; and the truth was, it was not his forgetfulness of what the fair Elisa said unto him, which restrained him from acquainting his Brother with it; but the true reason was, because he was not yet fully resolved whether he should be glad of that acquaintance or no: Yet notwithstanding, since Agenor seemed to be much in Love with Lyriope, he resolved upon it, nor did he well see how he could prevent it; therefore desiring his Brother to excuse his forgetfulness of the honour which Elisa did him, he promised to carry him thither the next morning: But to be a little better assured of the business, he would pump out his thoughts of Lyriope, to see whether it were to be hoped that his passion to her would keep him from any thoughts of Elisa: Brother (said he unto him and sighed) are you not afraid to make the fair Lyriope jealous, by seeming so earnest of Elisa's acquaintance? Since she cannot think me in Love with one I know not, replied Agenor, I had no such apprehensions, not shall I render this visit without her leave: And indeed Agenor told him upon what terms he was with Lyriope; and after he had caused him to promise fidelity unto the confidence he put in him, he let him know that Lyriope did willingly permit him to speak of his passion, that she had not forbid him to hope, that he had already several Letters unto her, that indeed she had not returned any answers, but it was only because she durst not trust the messenger, that not a day passed whereon she did not give him an occasion to see and speak to her, that she did always acquaint him with the places where the Queen be, to the end he might be there, and that indeed he had some reason to think himself assured I assure you Brother, replied Poligenes, You have much reason to think the same, you, and I am very glad of it: For indeed (said he craftily beside) that is very fair, and the Conquest cannot chuse but be very pleasing and unto you, you will also satisfy your ambition as well as your Love, since it is by this means that the Queens favour then all the world believes: I know some which I cannot acquaint you with, (said he, though he had none) do you persuade you unto a careful conservation of what you got, and to cherish the affection of Lyriope. After this, Poligenes thinking himself as secure as he could desire, parted from Agenor, who being to visit a person of such extraordinary merit, of whom such high reports were famed, he ordered his servant the next morning to give him a Sute of clothes which he affected, and which indeed did admirably well become him; for it was neither too plain nor too gaudy, but the colours and trimming suited so well, as it was very handsom to the eye. Agenor, neglecting nothing which might set himself off, with the most advantage, went to Poligenes as soon as it was convenient time to visit, and claimed his promise, which indeed he kept without any repugnancy; imagining that since Lyriope was so kind, he would not be so perfidious to her, as to change for one whose Conquest seemed impossible: So that without further delay he went with Agenor unto Elisa, prucing himself so up that his brother should not look younger then himself; And to speak the truth, the choice was very hard to be made; not but there was a difference between these two brothers almost in every thing, but yet the difference was without any inequality of merit, both of them having the esteem of most accomplished men: The Maxims of Poligenes and Agenor in point of gallantry were very opposite unto each other: For Poligenes said, that one ought never to declare his love openly, until he had some assurance of being beloved: Agenor on the contrary maintained that he ought not to hide the passion of his soul one minute from her that was the cause of it; And indeed Agenor did not speak this out of a bare humor of gallantry, but did ever so express himself: Poligenes, for his part, he would be a close Lover until he had assurance of reciprocal affection; and therefore finding in the spirit of Elisa marks only of esteem, and no disposition unto such an affection as he desired, neither to him nor any other, he silently adored her, though with an unmeasurable passion, hoping still that this respective friendship would at last convert it self into love, maugre her intentions.

But to return where I was; Poligenes and Agenor were betimes at the house of Straton, when no company but my self was there, so that I only was the Witness of this first interview: Since Elisa was after at the Chamber of Straton then in that of Barce, because of her fantastical humors, it was there where Poligenes presented his Brother Agenor unto the Father and the Daughter, both whom received them with much civility. After the first Complement, Straton having some business with Poligenes, carryed him out of the Chamber, and left Agenor with Elisa and me. This Beauty was that day in such an advantageous habit, as it is no wonder if the Lustre of her beauty dazzled the eyes of Agenor. Since she had no intentions of going abroad, her dress was as Ladies use when they keep their Chambers; but yet as one who would be seen, and not as one who was sick, her habit was blew trimmed with Silver; her hair was part barred up behind with Pearls and blew Riband, and part hung negligently down upon her neck, on which she wore a Necklace of Diamonds set in Gold enamel'd black: Moreover, since Chance would have Agenor see her with some extraordinary delight, she did sit upon a Cushion of Carnation Tinsel; so that this Carnation and this blew did cast such pleasant reflection of colours upon the cheeks of Elisa, that her beauty appeared in full advantage of lustre: so as the light being full in her face, she appeared as she was, fair enough to make an infidel of Agenor, who did sit just opposite to those eyes which had made so many Conquests: We were no sooner sit, but Elisa begun the Discourse: I do assure you Sir, said she unto him, I can hardly pardon Poligenes for the injury he hath done me in making me no sooner acquainted with you, since he hath deprived me of a pleasure which I know not how to recover. It is my part Madam, to complain against him (replied Agenor,) and not yours; but though it were so, that the sight of me does not displease, yet since I have the honour to see you now, I know not why you should say Poligenes hath deprived you of a pleasure which you cannot recover. The Reason is (said she and laughed) because I have an extreme desire and delight to hear the discourse of those who have travelled, especially you who are returned from a place of most exquisite Politeness. Provided Madam you will permit me (replied he and smiled) after I have told you what I have seen excellent in Greece, to speak also of what I have found most rare here, I shall promise you to satisfy your curiosity. Perhaps you may think (replied she craftily) that I think you will not take so much pains as to tell you what Beauties there are about the Queen. I mean not of about the Queen, replied he; and when I asked permission to speak of all the Beauties I found to be fair here, I did not intend that this word here should extend it self further then this very Chamber wherein you are. However it be said she, I pray do me the favor to tell me, whether the Ladies are as fair in Greece, as they are fam'd to be? That beauty (said she) Madam, replied he, is certainly most admirable: But if you had been as now you are, when I parted from Phnicia, or as young as then you were, if I had then the honour to have seen you, I should not have been guilty of a thousand Injuries which I have done you during my Travels: For truly Madam I must needs ingeniously confess, I have sworn a thousand times unto a thousand Ladies, both at Corinth, Athens, Argos, Thebes, and Sparta, that there was not one in all Phnicia which was comparable unto their Beauties: But to repair the injury I have done, I beseech you Madam give me leave, that as I have told this extreme truth unto a thousand Greeks, so I may tell you also as often in real truth, that you alone are fairer then all they together. Though what you say were true (replied Elisa rally) yet I should not be obliged unto you for telling me one thing so often; and to speak truly (added she, and turned towards a great Glass upon her right hand) I need not look once upon my self to confute all you have told me. Oh Madam (said Agenor, and looked in the Glass also) if you will but believe your own eyes, you will believe my words. Whilst they were in this Discourse, and I harkened unto it, I observed that Poligenes, who was walking in the other end of the Chamber with Straton, gave no great heed unto what he said unto him, but on the contrary listened with a jealous ear unto the talk of Elisa and Agenor, especially when they walked nearest where we were; yet I thought his reason was only a bare curiosity to know whether Agenor was pleased with the Discourse; and I confess I had those thoughts of a Brother which should have been unto a Lover: However, since they did often pass from a serious discourse unto a pleasant, and from a pleasant unto a serious; Elisa chiding him for his extolling her beauty very sharply, and Agenor obstinate in his applaude of it, their discourse was very little of News either of the People or War: But Agenor, according to his maxim, highly extolling Elisa, and not hiding his advantageous thoughts of her, he commended her to the Heavens, and that with much earnestness: So that Elisa, to make him change his discourse, and to testify she knew how Lyriope had a share in his heart; I pray tell me, said she unto me, whether Agenor use to commend all those he talks with, with such excess as he doth me? to the end I may know how to take all he says unto me: Since you have seen him with the Queen, you may easily give me this satisfaction; therefore I conjure you to tell me, what he said unto all the Ladies he saw; then she named many of the Ladies unto me, and amongst the rest, Lyriope. For my part Madam, replied I unto her, I never heard him commend any so much as you. How, said she, does he commend me more then he doth Lyriope? Oh Telamis, it cannot be: Yet it is very true, replied Agenor, that I never commended any so much as you. I perceive (answered she) you do not believe I know that you are in love: But Agenor, I have better intelligence then you think I have; and the Report of Lyriope's Conquests did fly into the Country: And I must also tell you (added she and laughed) that for my own glory I was very glad she had made this Conquest before my return, because now I cannot be upbraided for my inability to do it. People newly subjected (replied he and looked upon her) are oft-times very glad to revolt. Ah Agenor, replied she, I would have no Subjects rebel against their first Masters; And I am persuaded the chains wherewith Lyriope hath captivated you, are so strong, that though you would you cannot break them: however, I think you very bold in telling me that you commend me more then her. I confess Madam, replied he, that you do a little puzzle me; yet I do conceive that without any injury unto Lyriope, I might say as much as I have done; for truly, said he, I am of such an humor, as I no sooner perceive my self to be in love, but I must immediately tell it: Also I conceive, that in saying one loves, one hath made a long speech unto her he says it: nor will I answer that I can commend you long as I have done. This way of commending, replied Elisa, should never be my custom; but Agenor, you have better expressed your self then I imagined: however I must tell you, that I am very glad you are in love, because I shall be more apt to contract friendship with you. I do know many persons Madam, replied I, who will never contract any friendship with a man in love. If I had any secrets to keep, replied Elisa, I believed should not say as I do: but all the friendship which I desire with Agenor, is only a bare complacency, and a petty kind of exchange of indifferent secrets, which hardly can be termed secrets, which yet help very well to furnish out discourse and for such a friend, it is no matter if he be in love. Oh Madam, replied he, if I be not much mistaken, you are a most dangerous friend. Poligenes hearing these last words, could not chuse but draw neerer, and assure his Brother (whilst Straton was talking with one of his men) that he was mistaken in what he said, since Elisa was as good a friend as she was a dangerous Mistress.

Page 51 As he spoke these words much company came in, which caused discourse to be more general: However, though first Visits use not to be very long, yet Agenor continued his until night, and he grew as well acquainted with Elisa, as if he had known her all his life: But when at night he went to the Queens Lodgings, he was put to a puzzle how to render an account unto Lyriope of his actions in the afternoon: As soon as she saw him, she observed that he had spruced up himself that day, and that he was finer then on the first days when he designed to please her: not but that he was always very handsome; yet passionate people can spy day at a small crany, and find a difference betwixt a natural neatness without design, and an extraordinary tricking up, which proceeds from some secret design: So that since Lyriope had not seen Agenor all that day she was extremely desirous to know where he had been: She no sooner saw him, but she began to question him, yet without any discovery of her thoughts, I pray Agenor tell me (said she unto him) how you have spent this day? and how comes it to pass I have not seen you? I have been in a hundred places, and could not meet with any company, replied he, and at last Poligenes having promised Straton to bring me unto his house, would have me go along with him. Well Agenor (said she and blusht) what think you Elisa? You made such an ugly description of her, replied he, that I believe it caused me to think her fair. The fate of this woman (replied this envious person) is very strange; for I am perswaded, that though they say every Nation hath a kind of beauty which is particular to it self; some affecting the fair, others the black, and some the brown, others red; some would have them tall and gross, others little or of a mean stature; some one complexions and features, some others: yet I do beleieve, that if all men from all parts in the world did see Elisa, they would all consent to commend her beauty. As she was saying this in a low voice unto Agenor, one of those who had been at the house of Straton, came into their company and asked Agenor (not knowing what he had told Lyriope) whether he stayed long with Elisa after he came away? But Agenor had no sooner told him a confident lye, and said he came away immediately after him, but another entered, who had stayed there late, and came away when he did, who asked Agenor, if ever he saw a fairer then Elisa? And to drive him the more upon the Rock of a non-plus, a third came in, who knowing Agenor had never seen Elisa before that day, and having seen him enter so soon after dinner, told him, that he did very well in making his visit so long, and coming so timely to see the sunshine of Elisa's beauty at the height of the day. Lyriope no sooner heard this, but she blusht for very shame, spite, and jealousy, for she plainly understood Agenor went to the house of Straton very timely, and was all the whole afternoon there; so that he told her a lye, when he said he had been in a hundred places and could find no company. Then she sternly fixed her eyes upon his, as if she did upbraid him with it; but he not being ignorant of the power he had over the heart of this woman, did not much trouble himself at it, beleieving it no Herculean labor to make his peace; And indeed he used such arguments as perswaded her that she was beholding to him for the lye he had told: For, said he (as we understood afterwards) you may well imagine, that though I should fall in love with Elisa, and be an Infidel unto you, yet I could not in so short a time become so deeply engaged, as to make a mystery of a passion which yet had taken no root: But beleieve me, it was only my complacency unto Poligenes which moved me to so long a visit; and my fear lest you should take it ill that I had been there all the day, moved me to invent and tell this lye: However (added he most craftily) I am very glad that I have discovered a spark of jealousy in your soul, and as oft as I desire to receive any new favor from you, I think it my best course to make a long visit unto Elisa. This is rather the way to lose those which you have already, replied she: Ah Lyriope, said e, I beseech you know me a little better; and beleieve it, Rigors will never for me to repentance: 'Tis sweetness only will reclaim me, if ever you think there be any fear of losing me. Lyriope having a soul prepossessed with a violent passion, thought the best way to appease Agenor was to oblige him: And being a woman of more wit then judgment, she received his Reasons as good, thinking that to keep him from turning Apostate, and loving Elisa, her best course was to load him with new favors. As for all these petty trifles which make such a blunder in the world when they are known, she was resolved to grant them all unto Agenor, thinking thereby indissolvably to tie him unto her, to hinder him from loving Elisa, and to oblige him to marry her: But all did not hit, as you shall perceive by the sequel of the story. In the mean time, since Elisa went much abroad, though Agenor went not to her, yet he saw her every day; and since her composure was such, as the more one Page 52 looked, the more he liked and admired her; Agenor, who was able to judge her merited admiration, did perceive that admiration grew in his heart every time he saw her; Yet for a while he gave his heart the check, and bad resistance unto the beauty of Elisa; Yet when he began to be glutted with the favours of Lyriope, he began also to yeeld a little unto the darts of Elisa; the easiness of the one, and the difficultie of the other, did faint his desires of Lyriope, and so kindle them of Elisa; that he could not live and not look upon her: Yet he durst not so soon appear an unfaithful Changeling, and therefore his visits of Elisa unknown unto Lyriope, put him to abundance of trouble. On the other side, Poligenes who had an observant eye over his Brother, perceived presently that the over-indulgence of Lyriope did deaden his passion, so that he began extremely to fear he would become his Rival. In the mean time Phocilion, finding every day more virtue in Elisa, became so extremely in Love with her, as he was resolved to do all he possibly could to marrie her. Since he was verie rich, he doubted not but Straton would approve of his design, but he did not think it fit to acquaint him with it, without the permission of Elisa: He saw that this fair and wise Lady was verie civil to him, and that she seemed verie much to esteem him, but he saw her so far from any thought of such a particular affection as he desired, and his fears of denial so fainted his soul, that he could not resolve to discover his design. But at last, after several visits, with full intentions of speaking to her, and durst not, he took heart, and being one day alone with her, he determined to discover his long concealed thoughts. But being acquainted with her majestical haughtine <...> he endeavoured to find a way of doing without incensing her.

After then he had talked a while of things indifferent, he began to speak: Since you have the reputation (said he unto her) of being one of the most generous friends in the world, I desire Madam you would be pleased to do me the honour of affording me some faithful counsel in a business whereon depends all the good fortune, and all the bad fortune of a man, who is very much your servant, and in whose fortune I have a most neer concernment. Elisa hearing Phocilion say so, stood a little surprized, for she knew he had much affection to her, though he never told her; yet since she knew him to be very discreet and wise, she did not think he would say any thing that would displease her; therefore considering well with her self for an answer, Methinks, said she unto him, You should rather consult with your own reason for counsel, then ask mine, for I am very unable to give advice unto any: Therefore if you will believe me, said she and laught, You shall never reveal the secret of that person in whom you have such interest, lest two several inconveniences should befall you at once, the one of receiving ill counsel, the other of making me to desire to tell that which you should tell me. As for the last of these, replied Phocilion, I fear it not: Then it seems you think me to be more secret then prudent (replied Elisa) Since you do not fear I will reveal your secret, and conceive that I will not give you bad counsel: However it be, replied he, I beseech you Madam do me the honour to hear me, and hear me without interruption, promising you, that when I have told you the business, to wait for your answer, and to cause the person who is concerned in it to follow the counsel you shall give: Out of meer curiositie, replied she, I will permit you to speak, and therefore tell me what the business is: Before I obey Madam, replied he, I must beseech you not to ask the name of him for whom I ask your counsel, unless you have given such counsel as he desires: How now (said she and interrupted <◇>) Does he desire counsel, and yet will not follow it unless it suit with his inclination? Ah Phocilion, if it be so, I am not fit to give it, for I use to counsel after my own inclination, and not after others: You may do as you please Madam, replied he, However, I beseech you give me leave to tell you, that there is a man in the world, who after he had lived a long time without the happiness of knowing you, had at last the honor to see you first, the first day you were with the Queen, after the death of the late King: What's the reason Phocilion (said Elisa and interrupted him) that I am brought into the business of him unto which you would have me speak? You shall know it presently Madam, replied e, if you will be pleased to hear me without interruption: Be pleased to know then (pursued he) that he of whom I speak, no sooner saw you, but he ador'd you, and fixed his resolution to adore you as long as he lived: Truly Phocilion, said Elisa, you are a very strange man, for in lieu of consulting about the business of another, you talk of nothing but me: Once more Madam, replied he, I beseech you hear me: Since I have <...> gaged my word (replied she sharply and blusht) I will do so; but remember also, that you are obliged unto two things, the one to hearken quietly unto all I shall answer Page 53 you, the other, to make him who desires my counsel to follow it: I know it very well Madam, pursued he, and I will keep my word. To return from whence I digressed, I must tell you Madam, that this man who adored you upon the first sight, and will adore you eternally, not being able to live, unless he can live happily, charged me to ask you what is your pleasure shall become of him? You are already so civil unto him, as he thinks himself much your debtor for it: You have given him many marks of esteem, for which he is eternally obliged: Straton does him the favour to honor him with his friendship, his quality is equal unto yours, his fortunes though much less then you deserve, yet ample enough to make you happy, if riches will do it. And Madam, this man is possessed with such a respective passion, and is so full of reverent devotion to you, that he durst never acquaint you with it: And though he hath some reason to believe, that Straton would not deny it if he asked his permission to Court you unto his desires, yet he would never so much as think of it, until first I asked your counsel for him: But Madam, before you give it, be pleased to know, that never man knew how to love more zealously nor respectively, then he you; and you must not be ignorant, that if you advise him to be sadly silent, and to hide the unmeasurable passion of his Soul, you will force him into such an excessive despair, as he will most certainly have recourse unto death. Consider also I beseech you, how the reverence he bears you is so great, that knowing your severitie and your scrupulous virtue, he dares not make it known that he dies for the Love of you, without letting you know also the innocencie of his intentions: I know well Madam, that there are every day Princes at your feet, and that he for whom I mediate is none: But let all your Princes be as amorous as they can, I am most certain that his soul exceeds all theirs in veneration and Love: Therefore Madam, I beseech you consider seriously what I say concerning him: I do so perfectly know his thoughts of you, that I assure you I do not know my own thoughts better: Speak then Madam I beseech you, will you advise this secret Lover to discover himself unto Straton, or unto your self? And is it your pleasure I should tell you his name? Since you have told me, replied Elisa, that you will not reveal his name until I advise him as he would have it, I conceive it best not to name him, until I have given my advice, lest not finding suitable unto his humour, it should displease you: Oh Madam, I do most heartily beseech you, said he unto her, to consider well before you cast this unfortunate Lover into the Hell of despair: To testifie unto you, replied she, that he could never have chosen a more fit mediator to solicit his business, if it were a business unto which I were capable of perswasion, I will open the very closet of my heart unto you, as unto one of my best friends; and that I know that I am of a harsh disposition naturally, yet I am confident, that at this time I shall not give you any cause of complaint against me, that I do not give such advice unto your friend as he desires: Alas Madam, said Phocilion, if you advise me otherwise, you will doom him unto despair, and it will be a verie difficult matter for me not to complain against you if you deny what he desires: Doubtless then you would complain without cause, replied she; But Phocilion, you must not condemn me before you hear me: Therefore give me leave to tell you, that I have so great an esteem of you, that I have so good an opinion of your judgment, and that I am so fully perswaded, that you have some esteem of me, as I make no doubt, but that the marriage which you would propose unto me, would be verie advantageous, but for the most horrible aversion which I have against Marriage: But Phocilion, let me tell you, that this aversion is so verie strong in me, as I should certainly hate the man that should make any Propositions unto my Father, which should cause me to marrie him; therefore if you set any value upon my advice, let not him for whom you intercede speak unto Straton. But to shew you that I do not speak this, because I have any secret engagement with any other, I do permit him to speak unto my Father, if he can discover unto him, that I do refuse him upon any other reason but what I tell you: But Madam, answered Phocilion, I beseech you take a little longer time of consideration upon a matter of such importance as this; and though you forbid this unhappy Lover to speak unto Straton, yet allow him the libertie sometimes to tell you how he adores you: Hitherto, replied Elisa, you have spoke nothing which I could except against; but Phocilion, these last words are somewhat difficult to be understood by one of my humour: Yet since I have resolved to temper my sharpness, I will excuse and pardon them, upon condition you will do as I bid you in all things: Alas Madam, replied he, Is there any man in the world that is more willing to obey you then I am? Then I conjure you (said she) Cause him for whom you speak, never to speak unto me or my Father concerning his passion, and Page 54 be you your self for ever silent, and speak unto me no more of it: But Madam, replied he, What hopes can I then give unto this unfortunate Lover? Hopes never to see me grant unto another that permission which I refuse him, replied she: However Madam, pursued he, give me leave to argue with you a little against this your aversion unto marriage; and I beseech you promise me, that if I convince and convert you, it shall be in favour of this unfortunate Lover: Since I am confident that my heart will never alter, replied she, I am contented, but this Lover you speak of will get no advantage by it. Elisa pronounced these last words in such a manner, and so perswaded Phocilion of her real aversion against marriage, as he was extremely sorry; for knowing her virtue and resolute constancie, he perceived she was not a person that would be engaged into any kind of Gallantrie: So that standing in a deep silence, and looking upon Elisa with eyes of sorrow, he fully perswaded her that he loved her, and that this secret Lover, for whom he had solicited, was himself: As good luck was, both for Elisa and Phocilion, I came in and found them both extremely perplexed: Immediately after Lyriope came in also with one of her Cozens, for though she hated Elisa, yet she would visit her; and presently after all Poligenes and Agenor also entred severally. Since divers marriages were then talked of in Tire, and everie one told what they heard: but Elisa, who had some secret design in it, began to condemn the opinion of those who say, that there is a necessity a woman should either marrie, or else go into a Nunnerie, maintaining, that a greater injury could not be offered unto her Sex, then to think, that it must either be a Husband, or high walls which only can preserve their virtue: After this, falling into a general discourse of Marriage, Lyriope who was never of Elisa's opinion, spoke as one who thought that much happiness was to be found in Marriage; and Elisa on the contrary maintained, that all married people were almost unhappy: For truly, said she, take for example one of the most accomplished men in the world, and one of the most perfectest women in all Phenicia, though they do love as well as they can, though they be young, handsom, rich, and think themselves verie happie in Marriage, yet I am most infallibly confident, that they will not long continue so: For my part (replied Lyriope) I am not of that belief, but conceive that much happiness may be found by marrying a compleat man, who both loves, and is loved: I concur with you, replied Elisa, That they may sometimes esteem themselves happy in Marriage; but I tell you, this happiness is not lasting: For consider a little the qualifications of this condition, her husband must be a verie accomplished man, they must reciprocally love each other, he must have an estate suitable to her Quality, he must be neither phantastical, jealous, or covetous. Moreover, she must enter into all his interests, and become ambitious if he be ambitious, entirely subject her self unto his humour, obey him without murmure, even in things most difficult, and never be at libertie or Mistress of her self. She must further be turmoiled with the oeconomical cares and conduct of a great house, be exposed to all the peevish consequences of Marriage, lose perhaps her health and beautie both before she be old, be exposed to be jealous, or suffer her husbands, and at last perhaps have wicked, ill-favoured, and ungrateful children. These things Lyriope are ordinarie consequences of Marriage, and whosoever looks upon such a Precipice, methinks should be so affrighted, as they should not dare to throw themselves into it: Yes Lyriope, Marriage is a most terrible thing, and all those who venture upon it, are certainly verie fool-hardie: Though I know very well, said Phocilion, that the fair Lyriope needs no second, yet I beseech her to give me leave to help her in defence of this cause which she maintains: Give me leave I beseech you Madam (pursued he, and looked upon Elisa) to tell you, that in speaking as you do, you are most injurious unto the Gods; for if there be not any two persons in the world who can love happily together, without any of those inconveniences which you do aggravate with so much zeal, it may be said, that the Gods are unjust and imprudent: How can you without extraordinary impietie maintain this against them? I must confess, replied she, that I admire their providence, but neither know it, nor will penetrate into their secrets; yet in the mean time I must maintain, that as they do not accuse the Gods when they blame a man who is Shipwrackt, because he set out to Sea in a Storm, and in a rotten Vessel, so I do not accuse the Gods when I blame those, who knowing the crabbed consequences of Marriage, will yet ingage themselves in it. Whilst Lyriope, Elisa, and Phocilion were thus in discourse, Agenor was all silence, not daring to enter into the thoughts of Elisa. In the mean time, since he was more in love Page 55 with her then with Lyriope, he was pitifully perplexed in being between these two, for he would not do any thing which might perswade Elisa he was in love with Lyriope, nor would he make the last of these think he loved her less then he had: So that to have the delight of looking upon Elisa without disobliging Lyriope, he did sit down by her, but his chief reason was, because she did sit opposite to Elisa. Thus sitting on Lyriopes side, and a little behind her, he enjoyed the sight of Elisa without any notice taken by the envious Lyriope, but otherwise by Poligenes, who easily observed that the cunning Agenor did sit purposely by Lyriope, that he might the better look upon Elisa: As for Phocilion, he was so busied with his own passion, that he never minded others; for since he saw the high virtue of Elisa, he never feared his Rivals; and he was so confidently perswaded that she would not marry, as he never doubted her preferring another before him. Thus the company parted with several apprehensions: Poligenes went out in a fear that his brother would become his Rival, Phocilion was extremely troubled at the insensibility of Elisa, and her aversion to Marriage, Lyriope was infinitely envious that Elisa was fairer then her self, and Agenor was much less in Love with Lyriope, and much more with Elisa, who never minding the turbulencies she had caused in the mind of others, rested in her ordinary tranquility; yet the procedure of Phocilion did extremely oblige her, and invited her to do what she could, to convert an obsequious Lover into a real friend. But this miracle was impossible to be wrought, he was resolved to content himself with Elisa's commands of silence, yet he offered once to speak unto her again, but she retired her self in such sort, that he imposed upon himself so strict a silence, as he durst not so much as sight it in secret: 'Tis true, Elisa to comfort him, did make a promise, that if ever she changed her mind, and took a resolution to marry, the change should conduce unto his advantage, yet conjuring him to believe, that she did not think such a time would ever come, she earnestly entreated him to live with her as if he were her brother: And indeed Phocilion (whose most secret thoughts I knew) durst never after this be so bold, as to speak one word of his passion unto Elisa. In the mean time, Lyriope still thinking her self more sure of Agenors heart, did continue his favours, and gave him a thousand testimonies of a violent passion. In the mean time, all the Court perceived it, and talked broad of her: All the Advisees of her friends were in vain, for she had a Maxime which was most dangerous for such as would keep their reputations unstained, which was, to believe, that so she were not in any crime, she needed not to fear any reports: But her behaviour coming to the Queens ear, she received so sharp a check for it, that she began to find her indiscretion: Yet perhaps this had not restrained her, nor changed her behaviour towards Agenor without another reason, which much induced her: For be pleased to know Ma'dam, that Poligenes being perswaded, the faintness of Agenors love to Lyriope proceeded from the easiness which he found in her Spirit; he thought, that to help it, and to hinder the growth of that passion which he saw began to take root in his heart towards Elisa, his best course was, that Lyriope should mix some security with her complacencie towards him: So that bethinking himself how he might compass his design, he pitched upon one of the Queens women named Phocinde, who was a friend both unto Lyriope and him. Poligenes being full of wit, did so negotiate the matter, that he engaged her to speak unto Lyriope, of whom he seemed to have much esteem; telling her also, though untruly, that he should be very glad if Agenor should Marry her. So falling insensibly into a confidence concerning this adventure, Phocinde told him, how Lyriope found that of late Agenor was grown a little negligent of her, that notwithstanding she did all she could to oblige him, assuring him, that she was never more pliant and affable, nor more ready to do alny thing he desired her. If I had any intimate friend, replied Poligenes and laughed, who were in Love with the fair Phocinde, I would be sure not to discover one secret unto her, lest in advantaging Lyriope, I should thereby prejudice my friend; but since Fate hath so ordered it, that I have no intimacy with any of her Lovers, I will discover unto her a weakness in men, which doubtless she is ignorant of it, to the end, that she knowing it, she might advise the fair Lyriope, that if she would rekindle in the heart of my Brother a passion which I wish were violent enough to oblige him to marry her, she then must follow it: I do extremely desire this alliance, (added he, though untruly) and therefore sweet Phocinde, I must acquaint you with the reason why the passion of Agenor doth so saint towards Lyriope: It is, because she is too too sweet unto him; for you must know, that to speak of Love in general, it is never violent, but when the desires are violent; and since it is impossible they should be so, when whatsoever they desire is alwayes Page 56 easily granted, it must necessarily follow, that to make a passion violent, a Lady must never grant those favours which she is pleased to bestow, but with much entreaty, to the end a great value may be set upon them, and that there be alwayes a long interval between the first desires, and the fruition of the thing desired: It is for Kings (pursued he) to give speedily, and with a free-will; but it is fit Ladies be slow, and to give, as if they almost repented; they must be niggardly in their favours, for otherwise they will be received without delight, they will lose their value, and consequently be received with a cheap acknowledgment: It is with the favours of fair ones, as with a little River which runneth so sweetly and silently between two grassie banks, as those who walk neer can hardly perceive it; but on the contrarie, if it be full of little rocks which obstructs the passage, then it swells, it twines, it murmures, it runs after most pleasantly, it di'verts those which look upon it, it rowzeth them out of that studie or at least makes them studie with more delight; therefore Phocinde, the favours of Lyriope to Agenor, must not be conferred so easily and so often; for I must tell you again, that men do slight favours easily obtained; and since I must discover the imperfections of my Sex, I must tell you my thought, which is, that it is more easie to revive those flames with an excessive severity extinguished, then those which are choaked by too many and continued favours. Since Love is a capritious enemy unto reason, a passion that subjects all Rules and Lawes, and since it often infuseth into one and the same heart, both fears and hopes, insolencie and respect, joy and sorrow, it would also have a continual miscellany of rigours and favours, bitters and sweets, which succeeding each other, do cause desires to revive in the heart of a Lover, and that love there last, and continue without glutting; therefore Phocinde, to reduce my brother within the compass of his duty, you must advise the fair Lyriope to mingle a little severity sometimes with the favours which she confers upon him: And indeed, besides the general fault of all men, it is his temper in particular which requires such Physique as I speak of; for he being a lover of glorie, I am certain he would delight in overcoming any thing that makes resistance; and if she could make him believe, that he is not sure of her heart, he would out of very obstinacie only Court her to be entirely his. But Phocinde, this rigour which I advise Lyriope to make use of to cure the Soul of Agenor, is like certain violent Medecines which the Arabian Physitians have invented, they will almost raise even from very death, if a right quantity be taken, and applied at a right time, but they will also kill immediately, if too much be taken, or too little; it must be therefore Lyriopes discretion, to apply a right doss of severity, which doubtless will produce its desired effects. All the while Poligenes talked, Phocinde listened with an attentive ear, and was so fully perswaded by his arguments, that she resolved to advise Lyriope as Poligenes desired her: But to the end it might work a better effect, he obliged Phocinde not to tell her friend how they had talked together, which she promised and performed, yet she found it not so easie a matter to perswade her friend, as Poligenes did to perswade her; yet notwithstanding, perceiving that Agenor was every day more negligent, that he often forgot what she said, and that he was nothing joyed when he saw her, that he mused much when he was with her, and was very much altered, she resolved to do that for the reducing of Agenor, which she would not do for the preservation of her reputation: But she not being accustomed unto severity, she did it with the worst grace that ever fair one did, yet at first the matter succeeded very happily; for the first time that Agenor perceived her cold carriage to him, he did very importunately ask her the reason, and perhaps if she had carried the matter handsomly, she had reduced this rebellion Slave; but she having ever more spirit then judgment, was so glad to see the a <...> e of Phocinde had produced so good effect, did think that the only way to bring Agenor unto reason, was to continue still rigorous; So that following her violent and enl <...> disposition, she did not only seem severe, but phantastical and something worse: Inasmuch a Agenor, who already loved Elisa very well, and who was much puzzled to find a handsom pretence for quitting Lyriope, made use of this which she gave him, and b <...> to see her less and less by degrees, till at last he le't off seeing her at all. Thus the counsel of Pol <...> enes being neither rightly understood, nor well executed, produced an effect quite contrary to his design, for it quenched a passion which he would have kindled, and studied another which he would have quenched: You may easily imagine in what a desparate condition Lyriope was, when she perceived she had lost her Conquest, she broke off with Phocinde, because of the counsel which she gave her, she grew more envious then before, and began so horribly to hate Elisa, with whom she kne'Agenor continually Page 57 was, that she resolved to take her for the object of her anger and revenge, though she did never voluntarily contribute any thing unto the infidelity of Agenor: For as Elisa did never subject any hearts with any design so to do, so I know of a certainty that she looked upon Agenor as a verie pleasing friend, but yet as a very dangerous Lover, and that there was not a man upon earth of whom she was more afraid to be loved then of him: For she being of a most piercing Spirit, did most perfectly know his, who being full of boldness, craft, and vanity, could not love long without prejudice to those he loved, or at least persecuting them a hundred several ways. In the mean time, it was so natural unto Elisa to inspire respect unto all those who came neer her, and her stateliness was so faithful a Guardian of her beauty and virtue, that Agenor as bold as he was, durst never attempt to make a serious Declaration of his Love, yet he could not forbear sigh'ing in secret, and suffer a thousand torments, which yet he would not suffer to appear: And he would often say, that those puling languishing lovers, who are continually sigh'ing and lamenting were good for nothing but to trouble those they loved; but that on the contrary, the way to get Love was to please, and the way to please, was to be pleasant and merry; and that since Love is alwayes represented laughing, he concluded that sighs and tears were not so fit for him as joy and divertisements. Also, that since Elisa was of a merrie nature, he conceived his best course to be diverting her, without any serious talk of his passion. Likewise, considering her humour, he thought he should never obtain that liberty; therefore his design was, to accustom her insensibly unto a permission of telling by way of rallarie that he loved her, conceiving, that since she knew the world, and understood rallarie, she would not be offended at a thing of this nature, which he told her laughing, and in the presence of much company, hoping by this way to hide the truth of his passion from the eyes of his brother, whom he suspected to be in Love with Elisa, as well as himself, and whom he would not have thought that he was his Rival: And indeed Agenor being one day with Elisa in a great companie, they began to tell him of his inconstancie to Lyriope (for this imprudent woman was not less scandalized for breaking off with Agenor, as she was for contracting amity with him) and so much the more, because they said that the Queen intended to send her home unto her parents, and was much incensed against her for her ill-carriage of the business. Agenor then seeing them put a hundred questions to him concerning his inconstancie, resolved not to let a day pass without putting his design in practise; so that he put them all off with Feasts, and was wonderous jocund: For my part, said Elisa and laughed, if I were in your case, I should rather say that I never loved Lyriope, and that I only made a shew of being so, then to confess as you do, that you are unfaithful, since in cases of Gallantrie, inconstancie is as great a crime as cozenage, for to the last of these is only requisite wit, boldness, and invention, but the first proceeds only from weakness: Also I am perswaded (pursued she) it had been less dishonorable for Lyriope, that you never had loved her, then that you should cease loving and quit her. Since my passion was quenched by the rigour of Lyriope, (said he with a dissembling modesty) I am perswaded that my inconstancy is neither dishonorable to her nor my self: Never excuse your self by the rigour of Lyriope (said Poligenes, who was glad he could accuse him before Elisa) for I am sure, that before she began to be severe, you began to be inconstant, and out of your own lightness left off loving her, before she did contribute any thing to it: 'Tis true, (answered Agenor, and laughed, as if he spoke only in merrie rallarie) I am forced to confess, that I left loving Lyriope, before she thought of treating me with severity, but yet it was not out of my own lightness good brother: What other reason besides could you have (replied Elisa sharply:) My reason was (replied he, looking upon her, and raising his voice that all the company might the better hear him) because you use to make all those inconstants who look upon you, and because I cannot be with her, and with you too, because I am often weary to see no company about the Queen, whilst all the Gallants of the Court are at your feet adoring you; and because I would do as all others do, that is, see you, hear you, admire you, and to tell you boldly before all this company, that which I am sure not one of your Adorers dares do in secret. Agenor speaking this with that blithness which was his natural way, and which did verie well become him, all the company began to laugh, <◇> Poligenes who blush: So that Elisa not daring to take that seriously, which so many accomplished persons took as a piece of gallant rallarie, she began to laugh as the rest did, yet it was after a scolding way, and with a blush: But she answered Agenor as in reason she ought, without any anger, and interpreting Page 58 the matter as a bare piece of merrie wit; and indeed Elisa thinking it to be so: I pray Agenor, said she unto him, make not me an umbrage for your weakness, nor loaden me with the hatred of Lyriope: So you can admit of my love, said he, never care for her hatred, for thanks be to the heavens, I am verie well cured: I assure you, replied Elisa, I had rather Lyriope should love me then you, and I fear her hatred more then I do yours: As for my hatred Madam, said he unto her, You are safe; but as for my Love believe it you are not, for since I have made you some expressions of it before so much company, it concerns my honour to go a little farther: But replied she and laughed, as it concerns your honour to go further, so it concerns mine to hinder you; and therefore I conjure you to be silent, unless you will verie seriously have me take the part of Lyriope, and chide you extremely for quitting so fair a person: And I pray tell me (said she and laughed still) what assurance can I have in the affection of a perfidious A|postate? The assurance is (replied he) That you will not treat me as she did, and that I hope you will invert the order which she kept with me, for she was sweet at the beginning, and severe in the end, and I hope you will be sweet in the ending, as you are severe in the beginning: Indeed Agenor you are much deceived, said she unto him, I am no Changeling like your self, that which I am once, the same shall I be as long as I live, and since I am crabbed now, I shall be so for ever: That which you call crabbedness, does so well become you Madam, said Poligenes to her, that you would wrong your self if you should leave it: Affabilitie and mildness would become her better, replied Agenor: Elisa is so sweet and affable unto her friends, (said I unto Agenor) that I am verie glad she is not so unto her Lovers, because if she were, I am perswaded she would not then be so unto me: It is a gladness which you will long enjoy, replied Phocilion: I am much obliged unto you for your good opinion of me, replied she: And so am I to you, said Agenor unto her, for receiving a Declaration of my Love with so much indifference, as that you are not so much as angry at it: I wonder not, replied Elisa, that Lyriope should be wearie of you, for you have been but one quarter of an houre in telling me you are my Lover, and I perceive you do not know what you would have; sometimes you say affabilitie and mildness becomes me, and other times that my anger obligeth you; and therefore all I can say is, that I repent my self of accusing you for inconstancy to Lyriope, and am so far from thinking that you quitted her, as I think that she drives you away for troubling her with your impertinencies, for truly you have wearied me already, though you have only told me the same in jest, which you told her seriously: After this Agenor would have replied, but Elisa addressing her discourse unto me, did alter the subject, and made all the company do the like. In the mean while Phocilion observed a little better then Poligenes, how maugre the mirth of Agenor, that which he seemed to speak in jest, was really true: And also he perceived by the restlessness of Poligenes, that his affection to Elisa was not of the same nature he said it was, so that Phocilion found two Rivals more then ere he thought of, the one of which concealed his passion by discovering it, and the other discovered it unto Elisa, by hiding it, or at least gave her some cause to guess at it. Phocilion yet had not that sadness of soul which use inseparably to follow the discoverie of fresh Rivals, for on the one side he feared not Elisa; and on the other side Poligenes, who was subtil, and experimented in matters of gallantry, after a serious observation of his brother, he apprehended him to be desperately in Love with Elisa, yet the light humour of Agenor, and the austere gravitie of Elisa eased him of his fears. Agenor also, intending to deceive his brother, went at night unto his Chamber to see him, and began to express his joyes at all he had said that afternoon unto Elisa: For said he, I am sure Lyriope will know it, and so I shall be fully revenged on her for her severity to me: Indeed Madam, Agenor did jest it out so well, as he did much puzzle Poligenes, and made him doubt of that which he believed but one quarter of an houre before. In the mean time he continued his way with Elisa, as he had done the day before even before Straton, who took much pleasure in what he said: The presence of Barce did not hinder him, as phantastical as she was; so that Elisa was forced unto a custom of this publique Gallantry, and the rather, because she did not believe Agenor was really in Love with her, yet she <◇> everie day moved unto some fits of anger against him, but the jealousy of Agenor did <...> pt her, she conceived that Agenor's aim in it was only to spite Lyriope, for what there was much company, Agenor would then be sure to be full of his Courtship, and address himself to her with a thousand pleasant Gallantries: He would then be always next her, he would look seriously upon her, commend her to the heavens, observe her dpently, and do everie thing that Love Page 59 could prompt the most violent and passionate Lover unto: All this he did with a most admirable freedom of Spirit, which made Elisa believe that his heart was not at all engaged. But the rarest part of this storie was, that though Agenor was full of a thousand Gallantries when much company was present, yet when they were gone, and he remained alone with her, then he became as silent and timorous as a Sheep, he lost all his confident boldness, he was all serious and sadness, and discoursed with Elisa only of things indifferent: But that which Agenor did with design Elisa should thereby guess at his passion, was it which kept her from knowing it, it not being imaginable, that a Lover speaking without any witnesses unto the person he loved, should not then give her some cause to think he loved her: However Agenor was always with Elisa as much as he could, and spoke to her of his passion, when there was much company, but not a word to her, when they were alone together: But however, this phantastical proceeding of his, procured him a thousand privileges; for since he was full of pleasant discourse, and much delighted Elisa, it moved her to talk more with him then with any other. Moreover, every one did contribute their assistance unto such a piece of gallantry, as afforded such jocund diversion, and to the heart-burning of his Rivals, it procured him great familiarity with Elisa, and to be continually with her: Also he so got the love of Straton, as he could not endure he should be a day out of his sight: On the other side, Lyriope knowing of Agenors procedure, did imagine, that perhaps he did not love Elisa, but that he used this open gallantry as a punishment for her severity, and still loved her in his heart: So that this indiscreet woman practised a hundred unprofitable stratagems to reduce him, which did indeed drive him further off, and which augmented her hatred and fury against Elisa, when she perceived that really she had no share in the heart of Agenor, who went on in his ordinarie custom; and he so used Elisa unto his complacential discourse, as she returned answers without any anger. None of his Rivals were jealous, except Poligenes, who could not digest in this divertisement, which passed only for a piece of merrie wit. In the mean while, Elisa's scrupulous virtue began to fear that Agenor would tell her that seriously in private, which he in a Rallarie told her publicly, and she was the sooner induced unto this thought, because Poligenes and I coming together to see her, we found Agenor there, who as soon as ever he spied us, began his usual way of Gallantry: This sticking in the stomach of Poligenes, he fell into so deep a studie, as Elisa could not chuse but chide him, for not hearening unto what they said, asking him of what he thought? I think Madam, said he unto her, that I had rather know what you did my Brother the honour to say unto him when Telais and I entred, then to know what Agenor saith now.

Poligenes had no sooner said so, but Elisa blusht, and then imagined that her fears were not ill grounded, yet she would not take it as in earnest, but on the contrary, she told Poligenes, she was much obliged unto him, for hinting unto her, that she should not suffer Agenor to talk with her in private: Then Madam, replied Agenor, It seems you would have me talk to you of Love perpetually, whereas before I talk unto you of it only in publique, and never in private: However, replied Elisa, I will for the future never talk unto you without witnesses: I shall be much beholding to you for it (said he) for when I was alone with you, I was in such fear of you, and respect did impose such a cruel silence upon me, as I never durst tell the thoughts of my heart unto you: Truly, said Elisa and laughed, I do not think that ever Lover returned the like thanks: However it be, replied she, I had rather you should speak unto me of Love in publique, then of things indifferent in private. But Madam, I will not insist any longer upon relation of trifles, which are not fully pertinent: Let me tell you only, that Elisa after this, did warily avoid all discourse with Agenor in private: So that when he determined to talk seriously unto her concerning his passion, and to perswade her he was in earnest, he was much puzzled to find out a fit opportunity. In the mean time Phocilion behaved himself towards Elisa, in such a respective and obliging manner, that in verie acknowledgment of it, she thought her self much engaged to him, and permitted him once to tell her, that the Lover of whom he spoke, and himself, were one and the same person, yet he could draw no further advantage from this favour, but that she promised him again, if ever she altered her resolution, and did intend to marrie, it should be in favour with him, but withal she told him at the same time, that she believed this time would never come, and therefore conjured him to content himself with being in the number of her friends. I shall not spend any time Madam in telling you how many Slaves the fair eyes of Elisa did Page 60 captivate, for the number is so great as it is incredible, all whom she treated with ex|tream rigour; but I will apply my self principally unto those whose persons and humours I have already described.

To prosecute therefore my intention, give me leave to tell you then, that Agenor seeing the more he told Elisa in publique, he was in Love with her, the less she believed him; he resolved therefore upon a secret way of declaring it unto her, yet he did consider this design as the most dangerous that he could attempt: But since he could not endure to love, and not be beloved, he resolved to put it unto the hazard. In the mean time, Elisa according all occasions of privacy with him, since the discourse of Poligenes he was many daies before he could meet with his desired opportunities, yet he was the fittest man in the world, to put the most difficult matters into execution, and to close with any occasions which offered themselves; for besides his being verie cunning, diligent, and ingenious, he had many servants and creatures who knew verie well how to discover whatsoever he desired to know, and who would follow his directions most exactly: Moreover, he was Master of a most insinuating and flattering affabilitie, which joyned unto his liberal disposition, did render an absolute Master of the Domestiques in the houses, when he had any interest of Gallantry, and by this means he could easily know when much company was with Elisa, and when none: He was so faithfully advertised, as he knew she had commanded one morning, that they should say she was not within: So that making use of the familiaritie which he had with Straton, he went to dine with him: After Dinner he would conduct Elisa unto her Chamber, who desiring to see no body, would neither stay in the Chamber of Straton, nor Barce's: She would also have hindred Agenor from carrying her unto her Chamber, but her Father, who loved Agenor verie well, desired her to accept of the civillitie of him who was his friend, so that she was forced to permit him. When he was at the door, where she believed he would have left her, he seemed as if he had pleasant matter to impart unto her, so that he being accustomed to tell such things, she entreated him to enter: After which, Agenor inventing some kinde of odd storie or other, for a pretence of beginning his discourse with her, she thought that he had no farther design, but to tell this adventure aloud. But after he had told it, and she desired him to retire, Agenor began his intended Speech. Madam (said he unto her in a low voice, lest he should be heard by two women who were in the Chamber) I am not yet at the end of my business, for the truth is Madam, I must acquaint you with a business which I fear will surprize you, though it ought not to do so, and which is likely to vex you, though also it ought not: For ought I see, replied Elisa, You think me to be verie unjust, since you say I shall be surprized and angered at that which I ought not to be; however, I desire to know what thing this is? It is Madam (said he unto her) That there is a man in the world who extremely laments that you should not know how he adores you, though he has told you of it a hundred thousand times. How's this (replied Elisa, and blusht for anger, not thinking Agenor did speak of himself) Is there any man in the world who was so insolent, as to tell he loved me? I knew Madam (replied Agenor faintly) that you could not endure to hear me without cholor: Yet I would have you tell me (replied Elisa innocently) wh this man is that has lost either <◇> reason or memorie, or both: I will Madam, replied he, but it shall be <◇> a <◇> you will not banish me, though I should tell you such things as shall <...> for unless you promise me this verie solemnly, you shall never know it: It is <...>, replied she, to condemn the innocent with the culpable; but since you will my equitie, I will promise not to banish though you tell who this a hundred thousand times told me that which never told me so much at once: But I pray tell me pursued she was he born, and what his ? The man of whom I speak (replied this Lover) was born in and his name is Agenor: Agenor (replied), not believing he) he is so accustomed to foolishly, there is no heed to be taken says, and though I know him better than , yet I will not be always by him. , said she, I wish to you did know me, for is it possible you should think, that when I told you before world I loved you, I told you so only, because that kind of discourse seemed a diversion? Indeed I did so, answered Elisa, and I think so still, shall do as long as I , and shall never think otherwise; also I think it is advanced that I should do so: Then I have no other business in this world, but to prepare my for death, replied Agenor: Was there ever such a accident as Page 61 this? Can I not persuade you that I love you, only because I have told you so too oft and too publicly? I pray Agenor (replied Elisa, still thinking he jests) do not inveigh so against my incredulity; and be most confident that if I did believe you, you should not talk thus long with me.

It is not perhaps so easy a matter as you think, said he, to impose silence upon a desperate Lover, and such a Lover as is accustomed every day to say he loves you, without any secret confinement of his passion. However it be, said Elisa, I declare unto you, that I cannot endure this kind of Gallantry when none is present: Rallarie suits best with a tumult, and is fittest for a general Conversation, not for a private: Those who jest should have many laughers standing by them; they lose the pleasure of their conceits when only a single person hears it; and certainly when two only talk together, they ought to be more serious. I do protest Madam, replied he, I did never in my life speak a truth more seriously than this, when I said in Rallarie that I loved you, and whatsoever I said did really proceed from the very thoughts of my heart. Take heed (said Elisa and interrupted him) you do not give me cause to think you are serious, for since your company is very pleasant, I should be very sorry to banish you. It is not in your power to do it, replied he, for I engaged you by Oath to the contrary. No, no (said Elisa and laughed) do not think me so simple as to believe you. I wonder Madam, replied he, you should not believe me: Though I had never told you that I loved you, yet methinks my assiduous visits only should have persuaded you of it. If you had never told me, replied she, I should sooner and more easily have believed you, and you perhaps have been more happy in your desires. Alas Madam, replied he, if I should not love you, what should I do with that passionate Soul which the Gods did give me when they gave me life? How is it possible a heart so easy to be enflamed as mine is, should know you and not love you, especially knowing you so perfectly as I do? For truly Madam, I must needs tell you, that there is not one of my Rivals who knows the transcendence of your merits so well as I do: Since it is my whole studie and care to observe you, I may boast that I know better than they how superlative your beauty is above others, and how your merit transcends all of your sex and time: And since so Madam, how can you conceive it possible I should not love you? Let me tell you once more Agenor (said Elisa and interrupted him) that I cannot endure this Rallarie unless it be before much company; nor can I imagine, a man really in love can in a jest tell it to the person whom he loves, before a hundred several persons. Alas Madam, replied he, if you would permit me to tell it you in private, I should never have sought unto this weak remedie of my misery; but since I know you to be austere even unto Cruelty it self, I thought it best to deceive you and my Rivals, and to make use of this invention until I had rendered you some such service as might in reason hope for a pardon of your rashness in daring to adore you. Elisa hearing this, was much at a stand, for on the one side she had some reason to believe that he had a mind to deceive her, and on the other side she feared there was some truth in his expressions, since he seemed to speak very seriously: so that chusing rather to incline unto severity, then to give him any reason or belief that she was less austere then usual, she was resolved to afford him no hopes, therefore making all the austerity of her Soul to appear in her eyes, in her aspect, and in her language, this Lover, as stout and bold as he was, found himself put to pitiful perplexity. Leave off Agenor (said she unto him) leave off speaking thus as you do, unless you will lose my esteem for ever, either under the notion of a Friend or of a Lover: if the last of these, I ought not to suffer you after all this impudent boldness; if the first, yet ought I to break off with you, since you have so little complacence as at my desire not to leave off that Rallarie which I endure in publique, lest I should seem fantastical, but which I abhor in private. Agenor, who was acquainted with Elisa's humors very well, perceived by the tone of her voice, that if obstinately continued his telling her seriously she loved her, that he should be banished therefore he durst not do it: so that fearing to render himself more miserable by , to prevent it, he took up another Resolution, which was to conquer himself, to up melancholy in the cabinet of heart, and to put on a face beginning to speak in that which he used in his Rallarie: Truly , said he unto her, I am now arrived at that Point which I proposed unto my have made you angry: but for all that (pursued he and laughed) never think to appease you I will go and say I do not love you, for that's a little too coarse to a Lady, especially a Lady so superlatively fair as ; such words as these come out of my mouth: be Page 62 contented I assure you, that I am what I ought to be unto you, that I see how you receive Declarations of Love from others, and that I may know whether the friendship you are pleased to honour me with, be strong enough to let me tell you what others do: But upon second and more serious thoughts, and since I perceive I have no particular privilege above others, I will begin to behave my self as I did before, that is, to speak upon matters of Love unto you in publique, and of things indifferent in private.

Agenor having quickest and most nimble wit of any man alive, he said this unto Elisa in such a manner, as almost persuaded her, that it was only one of his old humours of Rallarie, or such a pleasant trick as one knows not how to be angry at; so that she being in a kinde of confusion betwixt mirth and anger, she began to laugh with Agenor for company, yet grumbled at the fallacie which he put upon her, as if she were not altogether deceived, and as if the anger she had expressed was not real, saying she never thought him to be in earnest: However, after much bandying betwixt them, Elisa drove Agenor away from her, believing indeed that it was as he had told her; yet sometimes she would think her self only neutral and indifferent towards him, but never thought him possessed with any violent passion to her, imagining, (if it be permitted to say so) that his soul was only possessed with an amorous friendship: As for Agenor, he went from Elisa in mightie pelt: Have not I (said he to himself, as he told me afterwards) spoken of Love unto Elisa, more then ever any did since Cupid made any lovers, and can it be that Elisa should not know I love her? But why was I so simple, since I had spoke seriously enough to make her angry, as to endeavour the appeasing of her, rather then the perswading her of a truth which she must know? Yet what would that her knowledge have availed me, if upon it she would both banish and hate me? What should I do? said he, To what purpose is it to tell in publique that I love her, since thereby I shall not be believed when I tell her it in private? And to what purpose is it to make her believe it, if it be her resolution to love no body? Yet I must not deprive my self of the pleasure which I take in telling her that, which none but my self dare tell her: Who knows, but by continuing in this course, I may in the end be so happy, as that she will tell her self in secret, that which I dare only tell her in publique, and make her know the truth without being angry? As austere as she is, her heart perhaps is not so insensible as she thinks it; for since it can be tender in point of friendship, it is not impossible but it may become so in point of Love. These Madam were the reasonings of Agenor, who indeed carried the business towards Elisa as formerly he did.

In the mean time Poligenes observing by a hundred of his brothers actions, that certainly he was in Love with Elisa, resolved to impede the progress of this passion, not imagining it to be yet grown unto a height of violence, nor doubting but that Agenors obligations to him, and the respect which he both owned and used to pay, would make him cease his pretensions, as soon as he should acquaint him that he himself loved Elisa: So that by this means Poligenes resolved to discover unto one of his Rivals that he loved Elisa, before he had discovered it unto her self; but to transact more surely, and that at the same time, he was negotiating with Agenor to cast off Elisa, he might also oblige Elisa to cast off Agenor, he resolved to have discourse with her unto this effect I shall presently acquaint you with; but since he was resolved to begin with Agenor, he sought out for a fit opportunity of talking with him, which he could not meet with until the next morning, for of late they did not lodge together. To this end, he engaged him to a solitary walk which is in T-re, and which certainly is one of the most pleasant in the world: For be pleased to know Madam, that Tire being an Isle separated from the Continent only by a little distance, the banks opposite to this stately Town make a most pleasant prospect unto the place where Poligenes carried Agenor.

But since it is something necessary that I describe unto you the place where they walked, in order to your better understanding of the passage, let me tell you, that on the East side of the further part of the Town, which hath no other walls in that place, then what Nature fortified by impossible access, where the Rivers make a long Tarras of above five hundred paces, upon which eight or ten persons may walk a brest, there being upon the left side of this rocky walk which riseth and falls sometimes more, sometimes less, several grots extremely pleasant and cool, where wearie walkers may rest themselves, if the Stars or annoy them. On the other side, is the Sea, which dashing sometimes to the verie of this natural Tarras (as I may term it) and making a noise mixed both of terror and delight, doth pleasantly entertain those who walk there alone. Moreover, the sight Page 63 of that opposite shore of which I spoke before, adds much pleasure to the place; for Madam, since there is not one pleasing inhabitant of Tire, who hath not some house there, it appears full of magnificent Structures and pleasant Gardens. Also the Port full of Ships and Gallies, makes the most pleasant prospect in the world, together with the sight of the main Sea at the end of this Tarras walk, where the eye hath nothing to look upon but Ships which go and come to Tire, and several Boats of Fishers in many places, especially towards the evening, which was the time when Poligenes brought Agenor to this lovely place.

But before I tell you of their being there, be pleased to know Madam, that Phocilion whose passion was as respectful as violent, having then no confident of his passion, did much delight in solitary contemplation, when he could not be with Elisa: So that having passed over almost all the day, and lodging near this pleasant walk, he went thither, sending away all his men, and resolved to stay there verie late. When he was at the end of this long Tarras, as he turned back, he spied afar off Poligenes and Agenor, who taking no notice of him, were taking earnestly to each other. Phocilion having no mind to interrupt either them or himself, went into one of those pleasant Grots of which I spoke before, intending to let them pass by, and to go out when they were at a distance from him; but to the end he might not be perceived by them, chance inviting into a Grot that had many crannies and convavities one within another, he passed from the first into the second. In the mean time, just as he entered, there chanced to fall one of those sudden Summer showers of rain, which unexpectedly use to surprize, and cannot be foreseen: This caused Poligenes and Agenor to look out for shelter, and to enter hastily into the same Grot where Phocilion was: But since their design was only to avoid the rain, they took up with the first, and never looked into the second, out of which Phocilion had come into their company, if he had not heard Poligenes and Agenor name Elisa: So that since it was impossible, not to be curious of knowing what these two men, whom he suspected to be his Rivals, did speak of the person whom he loved, he stood still in the place where he was unperceived, and where he might hear all they said, the hollowness of the second Grot easily receiving the sound of their voices. They were no sooner set, but Phocilion with a listening ear, heard Poligenes begin to speak: I see very well (said he unto his Brother) that you were desirous to know, why I talked yesterday unto you so much concerning Elisa, and why I am so very desirous to know what you think of her beauty, of her wit, and all the rest of her charms, and thinking that perhaps you did not answer me sincerely, I will acquaint you with the true reason which moved me to ask you what your thoughts of her were; I know verie well, that you are verie deeply engaged in Love to her, if you be at all, but fearing you should too much intangle your self in a business which can never be effected, I thought now to testifie unto you, how dear your tranquillitie is unto me, and what confidence I have in your discretion: Know therefore Agenor, said he unto him) that I have loved Elisa even from her very Cradle: Do you love Elisa, (replied Agenor with as much astonishment in his countenance, as if he had never suspected any thing:) Yes Brother (replied Poligenes) I do love her, and love her in that height, as it is impossible for any to love her more; therefore perceiving you apt to engage your self my Rival, I had a desire to prevent it, by trusting you with my secret, which is, that though Elisa be all virtue, even in the abstract, yet I believe if her austere ever suffer any to adore her, it must be my self who must enjoy that happiness: Since I have continually seen her ever since she saw the light, and since my Love of her began to be known unto her ever since she could know her self, my passion hath not made such a noise in the world, as the passions of all the rest of her Lovers have done; and indeed you may perceive e, that I am entertained with more familiarities then they, that the never is shy in talking privately with me, and that she seems much my friend unto those who do not know I am her Lover; therefore Agenor make use of this advice which ^{ow} I give you, and think, that I do not give it out of jealousie, but only to the end you should not lose your time which ought to be most precious unto you: For truly, said he and smiled, you are just now at an age fittest to make Conquests: If I had not loved you dearly, I should have let you run on in your error, as all the Court doth, and should have taken delight in seeing how you de ^{<...>} d your self like all the rest of my Rivals, but it ^{<...>} y love to you that would not suffer it.

Whilst Poligenes was talking thus without any interruption, Agenor was consulting with himself what resolution to take, and being ^{<◇>} of b ^{<...>} ty then Poligenes, he knew very Page 64 well, that what he said was only to stave him off from Elisa: So that he resolved upon a course as bold as wicked, and answered unto Poligenes in these terms, whilst Phocilion unperceived, did hearken both with wonder and attention: Brother (said Agenor unto Poligenes) I am verie unhappie, in that you did me not the honour to acquaint me with your love to Elisa, at that time when you advised me to preserve that affection which Lyriope seemed to have towards me, for then the respect and dutie which I owed you, might easily have quenched those sparks of Love to Elisa in me, which now are grown to a flame. Since I had then no suspicion of your passion to her, I must confess, my soul is so wholly devoted to her, that it is absolutely impossible for me to disingage it; Not but that if I were fully perswaded (added he most craftily) you were more in her favour then I, and that she would make you happie, then I would resolve to make my self miserable, I would then voluntarily exile my self, and yeeld Elisa unto you: But Poligenes (pursued he) I am most confident she deludes you, and that you are not in such favour with her as you think you are, and that you have a Rival above you in her thoughts: For indeed by your own confession Elisa knows you love her, and takes it verie well: Do you count that no[thing] (replied Poligenes) and do think it is not a greater favour to be suffer'd by the most austere person in the world, then all the beauties in Phenicia can confer? I do in[deed] believe (replied Agenor faintly) that you have some reason to take it as a favour, but I believe also, that the Lover of whom I speak, has reason to think himself more in Elisa's favour then you are. I wonder (replied Poligenes sharply) that if there were any such thing, you have not staved off such a Rival from Elisa; for believe it, I, who seem not so violent as you are, if I knew any so happie, as you would make me believe there is, I would not let him continue long so: I am very sorrie Brother (replied Agenor, and assuming a most serious countenance) That I must needs discover a secret to you, which I resolved never to impart unto any, but the condition wherein I finde your soul, and mine for your sake, moves me to hazard all the happiness of my life, rather then fail in point of friendship: Hear me then I conjure you, and if it be possible for you to be just your own cause, I am most confident you will condemn your self, and con[fess] that I am not able to yeeld Elisa unto you. At these words Poligenes blusht, and Phocilion in his Grot had such turbulent pangs of soul, that he could not chuse but make a noise as he was shifting place, to the end he might hear the better: But they were so attent upon their discourse, as they took no notice of it, so that Agenor proceeded: I know verie well (said he unto Poligenes) that I shall make you extreamly sad, and my joyes of being more in Elisa's favour then any whosoever, is excessive. Alas, Agenor, said Poligenes, and interrupted him, Your green experience deludes you, may be you think, that because Elisa was delighted a little with your publique Gallantrie, therefore she loves you more then any other: But believe it Agenor, believe it confidently, that the hearts of those who are perswaded unto love, are never moved by publique talk before so much companie: However it be, said Agenor, I have told her that in private, which you never did, and I am sure I never expressed one passionate word before you and o[th]ers, but I expressed the same when I have been alone with her: But I pray Brother, without further moving me to betray Elisa's secrets, why do you not make some reflection upon things past, and from them draw infallible proofs of my happiness? Have you not seen me slight Lyriope, who loadened me with favours, and that Elisa did burthen me with the weight of her Chains? Lyriope was fair, she loved me, and I did not hate her: Can you think that because Elisa is fairer then Lyriope, that I would quit her who favoured me, to take one that was rigorous? No, no, Poligenes, I am not of that composition, hopes is alwayes as much in my heart as Love is, and I cannot tell whether or no it sometimes precedes it; believe it I should never have left Lyriope, if I had not some cause to believe Elisa would be favourable to me; I know that my way of carriage to her hath been something extraordinary, but I know also that by-ways are often the shortest: Yet I cannot believe, replied Poligenes, that the way which you have taken, will ever lead you to the heart of Elisa, nor that you have found out this blind way, which so many men have only sought for in vain: I could easily let you run on in your error, replied Agenor, but since it is advantageous unto my Love, that you be undeceived, I will acquaint you upon what terms I am with Elisa.

Then began Agenor to tell a thousand confident lyes to Poligenes, assuring him, that he held a most intimate correspondencie with Elisa, that they two had agreed upon a thousand things, which he repeated one after another; that she took in serious earnest Page 65 all that he seemed to speak in Rallarie, and that when they were in private together she would tell him all that the rest of her Lovers said unto her.

If it be so (said Poligenes to try whether Agenor spoke truth) you know in what terms I expressed my passion unto her. Agenor now was put to a n n-plus; yet remembering he had heard his Brother say that he would never discover his Love until he was almost sure of being loved, he imagined (whatsoever he said to the contrary) that he had never openly declared himself unto Elisa: therefore without any demur to his Question; As for you, said he unto him, I must needs confess that Elisa never told me you spoke unto her of your Love: Perhaps the reason why she would not tell me was because I being your Brother, she would not mock at your passion as she did at the rest of her Lovers: but certainly, she ranked you only in the Catalogue of her Friends when she spoke unto me; and therefore I never suspected you to be in love with her, and consequently I am inno[c]ently engaged to be your Rival; but so far engaged that I cannot make a retreat. Poligenes hearing Agenor say so, made no question but he said truly: for since he knew very well that he never told Elisa how he loved her, the concordance of Agenor's talk with this truth, moved him to beleeve all that he said both before and after: But since Jealousie made him invent a way now to pick out some advantage by his knowledge of all the past[s]ages between Elisa and Agenor, he confined his anger and his sorrows unto the closet of his own brest, and beginning to speak; Go on you happie Lover (said he unto him) and acquaint me with all your good fortune, that by quashing all my hopes, I may not disturb your felicity. But is it true (said he unto him suddenly) that this austere woman, who has slighted so many Princes and Kings, can so far suffer her heart to be captivate as to tell you that he loves you? I dare not say positively that she did, replied he. But is it possible, replied Poligenes, that she should tell you of all those who anored her? I assure you, replied he, that since the late King unto Crysales, I know all passages. Yet Phocilion, answered Poligenes, seems to be more in her favour, then to be comprized in that Rallarie which she useth to all her Lovers: Yet he is not, replied Agenor, but is more mockt at then others. Phocilion at these words thought out of a rapture of sorrow to come out of the place where he stood concealed; but his desire of hearing more, though what he had all[ready] heard was nothing pleasant, restrained him: yet he heard not much more which did directly concern himself, for Poligenes passing from one discourse unto another, talked unto Agenor with extream dissimulation. I could never have beleeved, said he unto him, that one of my Rivals should be happy, and I not horribly hate him; yet since I know very well that the choice which Elisa hath made is just, I will condemn my self: But since it is impossible I should so suddenly fall from Love unto lue-warm indifference; and since I had need to know whether Elisa confers any fresh favors before I quit all pretensions to her; I conjure you to acquaint me with all that she confers upon you, and not to think it strange, if in waiting till you receive such as shall stifle my Love, I continuing seeing her. Agenor, very glad of this Proposition which Poligenes made, told him of a thousand imagi[n]ary favours, and assured him, that he would give him a Diurnal of the happy Progress of his Passion; asking a thousand pardons, and professing as many sorrows for being an irre[m]ovable obstacle unto his good fortune.

After which, these two Rivals seeing the showre was past, went out of the Grot, and walked to the end of the pleasant Tarrass, still talking of Elisa. As for Phocilion, he was so astonished at what he heard, as that he thought to stay and die in the Grot; but at last he went out, and taking away quite contrary to that of his Rivals, he went with all haste home, not knowing any reason why he should be so hasty. He was no sooner there, but tells his servants he would not sup, he shut himself in his Chamber, musing so profoundly upon this cruel adventure, as he was not Master of his own thoughts. Is it possible, said he to himself, that Elisa, whose virtues seemed always unto me more admirable then her beauty, whose austerity seemed invincible, who seemed to affect glory with so much zeal, that she should have any private engagements both with Poligenes and Agenor? all this at the same time when she assured me, that if hereafter she ever enclined to marry, it should be unto me? Certainly I mistook them: yet all these cruel words between Poligenes and Agenor were so distinctly pronounced, and are so rivited in my memory, as I have not lost the least sillable. It is too true (added this desperate Lover) Elisa has but a seeming vir[tue]: her austerity is but an unbrage to deceive those who think they know her best: and that Soul which I thought to be far above all the imbecillities of her sex, is capable of the greatest follies, which is, to love many at once. Is it possible (cried he) that the proud Page 66Elisa should scoff at the poor Phocilion, and sacrifice unto the happiness of Agenor? and could I hear it from the mouth of two Rivals whom I thought worse treated then my self, and live? If I can endure this, I shall merit my misfortune: But I must either die for grief, or else I must kill one of my Rivals, or he kill me. Did ever such a disastorous Fate hang over the head of any Lover? I thought I had loved an insensible woman, who by her insensibility and austerity together overwhelmed me with jealousy; or being out of hope my self, I thought none of my Rivals were happier then my self was: yet I find my self in least favour of them all. But who knows (said he and interrupted himself) whether all this be true? Ah no, no, alas, alas, it is too too true: were he only one Rival who boasted of her favours, I should think he had belched out some horrid lye; but there is no likely-hood that Poligenes and Agenor both should be cheats, especially being Brothers: Let it then be most certainly concluded, that there is no assurance in any, since not in Elisa. I have not so much consolation in my miserie, as that can in reason call her Perfidious, since she never promised me her affection; only assured me, that if she did alter her resolution of never marrying, then it should be in my advantage: yet it seems she preserves her libe[r]ty only to engage her self unto two at once: But O Heavens! am I not unjust in speaking this of Elisa? Can Elisa love any, and not Phocilion? Can she suffer others to speak of Love, and impose eternal silence upon me? Alas Elisa, said he and sighed, since your heart can admit of division, why had not I a part? But what do I say (said miserable Phocilion:) No, no, Elisa, I will have no shares in your affection: I had rather a hundred times you kept your self neutral, and that you mocked at me and all my Rivals, then to enjoy a moiety only of your heart. I had rather Elisa be hated by you, then to be loved with another: Take heed Elisa, lest this divided affection should purchase you none at all: As for me, who have entirely given you my heart, I cannot be contented with a half. However, unjust and ungrateful Elisa, I have this satisfaction, that I am revenged of you even by those whom you preferred before me, for they talk of favours conferred upon them without any rapture of Joy, and without any discretion: They talk of these favours with delight, only because it suits with their vanity; and I doubt not they will ere long be blabbing to the world those things which they talked in private. Alas Elisa, what an ill choice have you made if you desire to have secret Lovers? But to say truth, she who can favour two at once, never thinks upon any discretion which they ought to use. I, Heavens knew, never had any favour to conceal; but when you did at any time look upon me without scorn, I did conceal it almost from my self; Yet Elisa, you prefer two men who love you only out of vanity, and who love you more for their own sakes then yours: If I had but one happie Rival to deal withall, I might hope that after I had defeated him, I my self might be your Favorite: but that Elisa should have two Favorites, this opens a door for all my Rivals, and renders my happiness impossible, since I cannot endure to be in a di[v]ided heart: But since it is granted, that Elisa is not the same she was thought to be, ought I in reason to continue the same I was to her? should I adore her that is not worthy of any adoration? or ought I to love her who loves many? or at least who tampers so with two of my Rivals, as if she did love them: But on the other side, How should I not love Elisa? Elisa, who is Beautie in the abstract; Elisa, whose charms are inevitable; Elisa, who has my heart in her hands; Elisa, whom only I find fair; and Elisa, whom only indeed I can love. Go on then Phocilion (said he, and reprehended himself) hate thy Rivals and not Elisa; pitie only her weakness, and be revenged on them for her injustice, since thy respects will not suffer thee to do it upon her.

These Madam were the ravelled thoughts of Phocilion all that night, not being able to resolve upon what course to take. In the mean time, be pleased to know, that Poligenes and Agenor, after they came out of the Grot, continued their walk, as I told you, and still talked of Elisa: And since Poligenes knew that he never told Elisa he was in love with her, nor had any hopes of being loved, he took another course to defeat Agenor, in faining still to be in Elisa's favour. Since it is the will of Fate (said he unto his Brother with as much seeming ingenuity as he had subtily in his heart) that we must be Rivals, and Rivals both in favour: in lieu of disputing who shall yeild up Elisa unto the other, let us both equally forsake her, since she is almost equally perfidious to us both, and thus by a generous disdain, and surmounting our passions preserve our friendship: and for a full revenge upon her, let us forsake her whole Sex in general: Let us look upon all Beauties only as bare ornaments of the Universe, without any doting upon them, but with the same freedom of spirit we use to look upon fair flowers in meadows, or upon blossoms of trees, or buds, Page 67 or fountains, or such like: Why should we lose our rest and reason? Gallantry is confessedly a dilectable thing, but a violent passion is meer folly: Let us therefore Agenor quit this unjust woman, who cannot content her self neither with your love nor mine, for what she does to us, she does the same to all our Rivals: Let us not omit any thing that may blunt the edg and beautie of her charms: My dearest Brother (said Agenor craftily) your expressions do infinitely joy me, but since you are able to quit Elisa out of jealousy, spite, and reason, doubtless you can also quit me out of pitie, generosity, and affection: No, no, replied Poligenes, deceive not your self, I am able to quit Elisa if you can, but I cannot forsake her unless you can also. As good hap was, some companie came, and broke off their discourse; for considering the disposition of their souls, it was to be feared that perhaps they would have quarrelled, if none had come to them. In the mean time, Poligenes and Agenor parted with different thoughts, for Poligenes went away extremely jealous, but so did not Agenor, for he did not give any credit to his brothers words, neither did he fear that Poligenes would tell Elisa how he bragged of being in her favour; for knowing that it was not so, and that he never had so much as a favourable word from her, as her Lover, he imagined that Elisa would never accuse him of any such invention; but that she would rather think it the device of Poligenes to put him out of her favour.

Thus was he extremely joyed at his finding some reason for not yeelding Elisa unto his Brother, and at his making him jealous, hoping that verie spite would make him forsake Elisa, yet was he not sure as he imagined; for Poligenes was no sooner up, but he went unto the house of Straton, and to the end he might have the opportunity of speaking with Elisa without any witness, he made choice of the morning; and for a better pretence, he told Straton, that some Ladies in the Countrie had desired him to send them some Jewels, and since Elisa was known to have excellent judgment in such things, he desired Straton that he might shew them unto her in her Chamber, shewing him also which he brought on purpose some Diamonds, saying it was to let his Daughter see them. Straton no sooner heard this, but he sent to know whether his Daughter were awake, and hearing she was drest, he carried Poligenes to her Chamber door, and having some business, left Poligenes with Elisa, whose beautie without any art or ornament appeared in greater lustre then ever he had seen it: At first, Elisa thinking he had some business with her, asked earnestly what it was: For I do imagine (said she unto him) that it is of some importance; since you come to me at an unusual houre for the visit of Ladies: 'Tis verie true Madam, replied Poligenes, the business I come about is of great importance: But I must tell you, (said he, and spoke in a low voice lest any of her women should hear) that the business concerns you more then me: For indeed Madam, had it been only my own business, I should not have been so unciul, as to have disturbed you at such an unfitting houre; yet though my business is only your service, yet I deluded Straton in telling him, that I desired your judgment in some Jewels, for I did not think sit that he should know what I have to tell you.

Elisa was at the first surprized at the discourse of Poligenes, but since he never used to tell any thing which displeased her, since she thought him to be her friend, and never suspected him as her lover, she recollected her self, and imagined, that since he had gi|ven her heretofore much good advice, so now perhaps he was come to acquaint her what Lyriope had said of her; so that thinking Poligenes had somthing of consequence to impart, she made a sign unto her women to go out of the Chamber; after which, turning towards Poligenes: I have a great desire, said she unto him, to know what you have to tell me: Madam, said he unto her, though in telling you my business, I shall give you good proof of my affection; yet I wish things were so, that I could omit it; for indeed it is of such a nature, as friendship alone is not enough to excuse the Treason which I shall commit against one whom Nature bids me love; but for all that, since it concerns the glorie of Elisa, I shall not weigh it; for I am perswaded, that I ought to his interest or my own, rather then fail in the respects I owe you: I am infinitely obliged unto you (replied Elisa most sweetly) for your expressions of so much zeal in any thing which concerns me; but because I will not hinder you from relating this business which I so much desire to know, I will not therefore at this time return you your due thanks: Though my desires of telling you, replied Poligenes, are higher then yours, yet I cannot chuse but terrible at the Treason which I shall commit; Yet notwithstanding I conjure you Madam said he to colour his design) that when I shall have discovered the crime of a man committed Page 68 against you, that you will not then think me a partaker in his crime, but to make use of the advice which I shall give you, according as your prudence shall think most conducing to your tranquillite: I promise to be directed by your advice Poligenes, replied Elisa, lest I should disoblige him who hath so much obliged me: Then Madam, replied he, I must with some shame and anger tell you, that the man whom I accuse is my brother: How Poligenes (said Elisa and interrupted him) hath Agenor done any thing which will offend me? Agenor (replied Poligenes faintlie) doth doubtless adore you as much as possible he can, but to be sincere with you, he hath blabbed out some things which certaintie he ought not: But I beseech you (said Elisa sharplie) which way can the indiscretion of Agenor concern me, for there is no private intimacie betwixt me and him, or any else? I wish Madam, replied Poligenes, that all he hath told me of you were not true, if it be not, your glorie is much more safe: How Poligenes, (replied Elisa and blusht) has Agenor told any thing to my dishonour? He hath told me somthing, which at least is advantageous unto himself (replied Poligenes;) But Madam before I complain, give me leave to speak, and in accusing Agenor, in some sort to excuse him; and let me further tell you, that it is almost impossible to find a man of his age who is discreet: Discretion is a most excellent qualitie (replied Elisa sharplie) but yet those who come into my companie may fail in it, yet not prejudice me: But Poligenes, I pray unmask this Riddle: Madam, said he unto her, I would gladly talk with you, as if you did not know, that Agenor loves you: Alas Poligenes (said Elisa and interrupted him) I believe Agenor hath deceived you, as once he deceived me, when he would have perswaded me, that all those Gallantries which he was used in companie, were real marks of his Love; for I profess unto you, I was a long time verie angrie with him for it, yet in the conclusion I was well satisfied, that all his designs were onlie to divert, so that we were reconciled again, and I both lost and found a friend in one quarter of an houre: No, no, Madam, replied Poligenes, there is more in it then so: Agenor who is accustomed alwayes to have two or three confidants of his passion, to the end he might have so many witnesses of his glorie, made choice of me for one; and indeed I know all the passages between Lyriope and him. Alas Poligenes, said Elisa, Lyriope and I are of verie different humours: 'Tis true indeed (replied Poligenes) He does not boast of receiving from you such as he received from her, I mean letters, pictures, tokens, and such like favours as may be kept in a Cabinet, but he is so bold as to say, he hath received such from you, as can be kept onlie in the heart with a pleasing remembrance: I am so ignorant in matters of Gallantry (replied Elisa with exceeding anger) as I cannot tell the differences between favours and favours, all I know is, there be none so little as are not criminal, or which I could ever find in my heart to confer upon any person: But yet Poligenes, pray ye tell me, what did Agenor say I did for him? He said Madam, since I must tell you, (replied Poligenes) that he has told you a thousand times in secret how he loves you, that you permitted him so to do without the least anger, and that you and he together did scoff at all his Rivals; and that in conclusion, you did not hate him, if you did not love him, and I believe he talked of something more obliging then all these; for he talked, as if he often read in your eyes, that he had a little room in your heart: However Madam (added Poligenes, the more to prejudice Agenor) since I have discovered the weakness of my Brother, yet I must needs ask your favour for him, advising you not to punish him: Ah Poligenes (cried she out) You give me most obliging intelligence, in acquainting me with the wickedness of Agenor, but trulie withal, you give me verie ill counsel, and I cannot tell whether you do me not a great injurie in it, for you seem to think that what he said was not invented: Since Agenor is my Brother, replied Poligenes, You may well pardon me it I did not easilie suspect him guiltie of so horrid a crime as to invent what he said unto me: If I had thought Agenor had added lies unto his vanitie in lieu of advertising you of his crime, I should have punished him my self: Then punish him, replied Elisa, for he never spoke unto me of his pretended passion, but after the manner as I told you, and consequentlie all that he said are meer forgeries: But since I think it will redound more unto my glorie, I will take another course, which shall be never to see him again: Poligenes finding so happie a beginning of his design, to confirm Elisa the more in her resolution, he seemed to oppose it, telling her, it would be enough if she removed from him all subjects for his vanitie, and not to grant him the libertie of talking any more in private with her: But the more he pleaded, the more averse was Elisa from ever seeing Agenor again, of which Poligenes was verie glad: But since I perceived Elisa was angrie with Page 69 him, for seeming to believe that Agenor had not invented what he had said; he did so carrie the matter, as he perswaded her, that indeed he did believe Agenor did forge what he had reported: So that Elisa thought her self extremely obliged to him for his intelligence, and looked upon him as her best and most faithful friend, promising to banish Agenor, and to find out a pretence for it without reflection upon him. In the mean time, her anger against Agenor was extreame high, she would not stir out that day; and as soon as ever Poligenes was gone, she feigned to be ill, and put on her night dress, commanding that none should see her, but those who received this command, did not exactlie obey it: Indeed Phocilion being resolved to return unto Sidon, and quit Elisa, as soon as he had twitted her with her weakness, went to her as soon as ever Dinner was done, and found no difficultie of entrance; So that going straight to the Chamber of Elisa, he found her alone, and in a profound studie: She no sooner saw him, but chiding her women for not telling him she would not be seen, she sent me to renew the same command, which was exactlie obeyed all the rest of the day, so that Elisa unawares gave Phocilion an opportunity of a long audience without interruption; for since she esteemed him verie much, she could not in civillite bid him be gone, yet she would not bid him sit down, but upon condition he should stay but one quarter of an houre, but he told her such things as she could not foresee her condition was broken, and stayed a great part of the Afternoon. Elisa seemed verie sad; and Phocilion was much incensed: They were no sooner set, but he began to speak: Methinks Madam (said he unto her) that for one who has filled many others with joyes, you are verie sad your self: I know not whether I had filled any other with joy, replied she, but I am sure there is some who have filled me with sadness: I am afraid Madam, replied he, that I am in the number of those you speak of, and that I am troublesome unto you in rendring my last visit: You need not doubt it (replied Elisa verie obliginglie) if you come to bid me adieu, for then you add much unto my sorrow: But Phocilion, You have not placed this word Troublesome right, it had been much better, if you had said you come to make me sad: Your language Madam, replied he, had made me the most happie of men, if you had said so yesterday; but to day, I must confess, the more civil you are unto me, the more rigorous you are: Your language Phocilion, replied Elisa, seems so odd, that I know not how to answer it: That which I know Madam, replied Phocilion, is so strange that I am sure I know neither what to say, nor what to think, and therefore you need not wonder if I be obscure in my expressions, I wish if it were possible, that I should not be understood, and yet I must needs complain; but I am resolved to complain of my own misfortune, and not positively against you: I profess Phocilion, replied Elisa, the more you speak, the less do I understand you: I pray consider well whether you understand your self, for I must confess, I cannot believe you have any good reason for what you say: I would to the Gods Madam, replied he, that I were culpable, and you innocent: Yes, yes, Madam, I am so zealously devoted unto your glorie, that as great as my desires are, you should love me, yet I should be contented with your hate, so what I know were untrue: For ought I perceive, replied Elisa, you accuse me of some great crime: The crime whereof I accuse you (replied Phocilion and sighed) is of such a nature Madam, that you would be verie innocent, if you were only culpable towards me only: Why Phocilion, (replied Elisa, and blusht for anger) Do you believe I love any one? I know not Madam, answered he, whether the respects I have, and ever will have of you, will permit me to say, I do believe it: But I am sure, that what I heard from the mouths of Poligenes and Agenor, is enough to make me fear it.

Elisa was amazed to hear Phocilion, who was ever both prudent and respectful, speak such strange language; and she believed there was some odd accident in the wind, whereof she was ignorant. Likewise her fear was, that the vanitie of Agenor had reached his ear: But her greatest wonder was, to hear him name Poligenes as well as Agenor: So that being extreame desirous to know the truth, and concealing a part of her cholor, she importun'd him to tell her what moved him to speak as he did, which he verie exact lie did, relating his walk, how he went into the Grotto to avoid meeting Poligenes and Agenor, how the Rain made them also to enter after him, and afterwards related to a syllable all he heard them say. Phocilion made this relation with eyes full of sorrow, he often interrupted himself with sighs, he looked upon Elisa in such a concerned manner, and spake so feelinglie and respectivelie, that she did not at all suspect him of any forgelie, nor did she make any question, but that what he related unto her, were spoken Page 70 by Poligenes and Agenor, and she did the sooner believe it, because there was much concurrence between the relations of Poligenes and Phocilion concerning Agenor: But the horror of the business, was her apprehensions of Poligenes, who never solicited her but as a friend, and who came to advertise her of his Brothers vanitie, that he should himself prove as vain as he. In the mean time, as she resolved to banish Agenor upon the report of Poligenes, so she resolved upon the same sentence for Poligenes upon the report of Phocilion: But to justifie her self unto him, and that with her natural austeritie; I am verie sorrie (said she unto Phocilion) that when it was in your power to ingage me infinitely unto you, you should so cruelly disoblige me; for you without any offence have told me almost dead, but you have told me it in wronging me; you might, if you would, have acquainted me with the lies of Poligenes and Agenor, as lies which you thought fit to advertise me of, and not as truths; and to tell you trulie, you have more offended me in believing what you heard, then they have done in forging it; and if there be any concurrence between their crime and yours, it is in that they believed one another, as you believed them: Why Madam, replied Phocilion, Can you think me more culpable then Poligenes? Or more wicked then Agenor? However it be, said she, you are not innocent, since you think me capable of extream imbecillitie. But to let you see how you are deceived, I am resolved upon three things which I will put in execution; the first is, to swear unto you by all that is Sacred, that neither Poligenes nor Agenor did ever express any affection unto me, unless by way of Rallarie in publique; The second is, that you may judg of what is past by the future, and to let you know that I fear them not, I will for ever banish them both: The third is, that though I assure you I have more esteem of you then ever I had of any, yet I will banish you as well as they, to let you see that I am Mistress of my own thoughts when I please; and to perswade you by this example, that one who has an absolute Sovereigntie over her heart, is not apt to ingage her self so lightlie as you believed: I cannot endure the sight of a man who is so simple unjust, as to accuse me of a horrid crime, a man who has given me a thousand expressions of elsteem, one who might have perfectly known me, one who I believed could not have harboured a disadvantageous thought of me, and one whom I thought had esteemed me so much, as rather would give himself the he, then entertain the least suspicion which might be prejudicial to me. Alas Madam, replied he, How is it possible to be in Love, and not be jealous at the hearing of what I did? And how can one be jealous, and not lose his reason, and be unjust? I know not how these hang together, replied she, but I know that it belongs not unto me to examine the cause of your injustice; therefore, with out further examination, whether you be unjust out of Love, or out of jealousie, or out of any other cause, it sufficeth, I have cause enough to punish you: But I beseech you Madam, answered Phocilion, Do you make no difference between them and me? Yes, answered she, for in banishing them, I shall extreamlie hate and scorn them, but I shall content my self to have much indifferencie towards you: This favour Madam (answered Phocilion with a sigh) is of such a nature, as may be received without any retaliation of gratitude: Whatever it be, replied Elisa, it is all you are to expect from me, but to comfort you, let me tell you, that none shall ever receive a greater from me; for after this cruel adventure which hath fallen upon me, I shall be verie cautious of such impostures as these which you have taught me. Phocilion perceiving the firm resolution of Elisa, did use all possible dissuasive Rhetorique; he joynd conjurations to prayers, sighs to words, and with tears he kneeled to ask pardon for his fault; but for all these Elisa was unalterable, and go he must without obtaining any thing; yet though he retired with a most sad soul, yet it was some easement unto him, to perceive, that Elisa was innocent; and he did so seriouslie repent of his facilitie in believing Poligenes and Agenor, as he hateled them as much as if they were his Rivals, upon whom he resolved a revenge for Elisa's rigour. Also looking upon them as a pack of impostures, he conceived it to be his dutie so to do in the behalf of Elisa, though he had no other motive. In the mean while, as Phocilion was full of sorrows and repentance, so was Elisa of anger, and her anger was so full of revenge, that if her soul had been capable of any violent and unjust resolution, she would have attempted any thing to satisfie her revenge upon Poligenes and Agenor. But Elisa being verie wise, and knowing that there are some things, which the more noise is made, the worse they are, of which revenge would be but prejudicial; she would not therefore set her self to punish these two offenders, yet she did make them verie sensible of her actions; for since they loved her with extream zeal, they did most b (<...) e Page 71 resent her usage of them. In the mean time, since she had taken a resolution to speak unto them, the one in presence of the other, she was two daies before she could find a fit opportunitie for it, which by good fortune did then present it self: For these two Rivals, both of them desiring to stay the last with Elisa, did stay until all the companie was gone from her; so that at the last they were alone with Elisa, but extreamlie ashamed, and not daring scarce to look upon her, so much did their remorse of conscience upbraid them: So that Elisa being confirmed in her belief of all that Phocilion had told her, began to talk to them both with such a serious severitie, enough to make the sturdiest hearts to tremble, and imprint respect in the souls of the most insolent: Since you are Brethren in evil, and guilty of one crime, said she unto them, I think it fit to accuse you both together, and pronounce the same sentence. Poligenes and Agenor hearing Elisa speak thus, were stronglie surprized: Poligenes thought Agenor had discovered his crime unto Elisa as he had his: And Agenor thought now that he was not mistaken, when he thought Elisa gave no credit to his words; but as bold as he was, he began to tremble as well as Poligenes, nor had they either confidence or leasure to ask Elisa what their crime was, for she went on in bitter severitie to them as she begun: Never think, said she unto them, that I will accuse you by particulars of all your impostures, the discourse would be unworthie of my self, let it suffice I tell you, that the Gods have revealed unto me all that you said in the Grot, that is in the long Tarrass walk by the Sea side, I expresly forbid you both ever to see me again, and let me tell you, that now I scorn you more then ever I have esteemed you; also I defie you, and bid you say the worst that can prejudice me: Never think to imploy the power of my Father, for if you do, I will acquaint him with the just cause of complaint I have against you; therefore without any resistance, or delay, I expect obedience unto my will without a syllable of murmure. After these words, Elisa went into her Closet, and made a sign unto them to be gone; so that Poligenes and Agenor not daring to stay her, began to quarrel for betraying each other, yet they durst not stay any longer in Elisa's Chamber, but went out in extream despair and furie, not yet directlie knowing what was the object of all their cholor. But they had not gone above twentie paces belching out the furie of their souls, when a friend unto Phocilion met them, and told them, that he expected them both at the Sea side which looks towards the North, with as many Swords as were requisite for two to fight against two, adding, that the cause of his quarrel was of such a nature, as no other way but this could give him satisfaction.

Poligenes and Agenor having sharp edges set upon their Spirits, did keenlie accept of this Proposition, and as men who had a greater mind to fight with one another, then against any else; yet point of honor not permitting them to deliberate, they told Phocilion's friend that they were readie to go along with him, and did so after they had sent away their men. Since their minds were full, they never considered what might Phocilion's reason be for calling them to this satisfaction, but in the heat of their furie fought, and knew not why; nor would Phocilion tell them directlie his reason, lest he should ingage the name of Elisa: The quarrel then not being known, the combat then could not be prevented, the event whereof was verie bloodie; it fell to the lot of Phocilion to fight against Agenor, and Poligenes against Phocilion's friend, all which four were wounded; Phocilion and Agenor more dangerous then the other two, Phocilion had the advantage of Agenor; but Poligenes had the better of Phocilion's friend. This combat made a great noise in the world, none knowing the cause; for when any asked Poligenes or Algenor, they bad them ask Phocilion; and when they asked Phocilion, he answered, that it was sufficient Poligenes and Agenor knew themselves not innocent. In the mean time, this combat produced this good unto Elisa, for Agenor, Poligenes, and Phocilion being all three wounded, she was at much more quietness, nor was any talk of her as the cause, only Lyriope began to chatter a little, but she durst not vie against Elisa, as formerlie she used, because her Parents were upon marrying her unto one of the Court named Asiadates, and indeed did marrie her unto him within a few daies after, more for interest of familie, then any other reason: So that fearing lest her hatred of Elisa should speak her Love unto Agenor, she concealed her thoughts of this business: As for Elisa, her anger against Poligenes, against Agenor, and against Phocilion also, made her think her self happie in being delivered from that sight, yet being of a natural goodness, if the thing had been in her dispose, she would not have permitted this combat; but since it was not, nor since she had no hand in it, it did not grieve her that the Gods had permitted Page 72 them to sight, and had ridde her of such men as she was resolved never to see again.

This being the state of things, and Elisa confirming her self more and more in her resolutions never to marrie, but to grow more austere if it were possible. Straton who never enjoyed himself since the death of the last King, but having lost all his hopes, he fell sick, and within seven daies died of so violent a Fever, as he was not able to order any business since the first day of his falling sick. This accident was so mournfully resented by Elisa, as I wonder it did not cost her life, at least her beautie, yet the tears upon her face was only like a dew upon Roses, which in lieu of changing them, makes them more sweet and lovely; and as melancholy has a kind of languishing sweetness in it, so Elisa doubtless was nothing so austere in her sorrows as formerlie, and consequentlie not so apt to drive her Lovers into despair. Elisa in losing Straton, did not only lose a most indulgent Father, but found a subversion of her fortune, by falling under the power of a phantastical Mother, who loved her not, but who since the death of Straton did persecute her a hundred several ways. However, Elisa carried her self with as much respect, as if she were the best Mother in the world; and her generositie was so high, that Barce having left her in the Countrie, and being returned her self to Tire, she there fell sick of such a contagious disease, as Husbands dare not come neer their Wives, nor Wives their Husbands; yet Elisa no sooner heard the condition wherein Barce was, but she departed immediateilie, and went notwithstanding the danger, to help that person who resolved to make her life as miserable as she could: But the Gods, who doubtless were pleased to make the virtue of Elisa more splendent, took Barce out of this world, just as Elisa was going into her Chamber, against the perswasions of all her friends: But seeing her Mother was past recovery, she withdrew from a needless danger, and retired her self unto a Ladies house who was her Cozen, who lived extreamly closely, and whose virtue was extraordinarie. Thus Elisa made it most evident by this action, that she had no design of admitting so much companie as she had during the life of Straton. But to the end Elisa might make the greatness of her soul appear, the Gods were pleased to abase her fortune, that they might elevate her Glory, by such a way as many have lost theirs Since Straton had great employments under the late King of Phenicia, all those unto whom he was indebted did fall upon Elisa for satisfaction, and seized upon all her estate with so much violence and injustice, that they made Elisa almost as poor as fair: However, though she saw her self in a most lamentable condition, yet her high soul never trembled at it, but she carried out her bad fortune with as much resolution, as she did her good with moderation, nor was she less austere; and when Poligenes, Agenor, and Phocilion were recovered, and would have seen her, she did forbid them with as much authority, as if she had been upon a Throne, and they her Subjects, she was more severe then before, and she would make it appear, that since she was Mistress of her self, she would follow the rules of virtue more exactly then before: But Madam, that you may see how great her virtue was, be pleased to know, that Asiadates whom Lyriope had married, did at that time fall so desperately in Love with Elisa, as he was readie to run out of all his wits and patience for her, and who did more hang upon her then ever Poligenes and Agenor did; Asiadates is a man of much Spirit, but verie violent and hastie, which moved him to act his desires with an unexpressible impetuositie; you may then verie well imagine, that he being deeplie in Love with Elisa, would do any thing to enjoy her he loved, if he could finde out fit opportunities for it. Since Elisa would not admit of any visits, unless of her most intimate friends, who could not be suspected of any Gallantrie, he could not find his desired opportunitie of seeing her at that Ladies house: At last he contracted a great league of amitie with a person of Qualitie, who was one of Elisa's friends: Since few men in all Phenicia were richer then siadates was, and since he understood the decay of Elisa's estate, he conceived that a woman, who was as high-minded as even unto verie pride it self, could never brook povertie, but thought that perhaps excessive liberalitie ha somly carried, would tempt her to admit of him as her friend at least, though not as her Lover, yet he durst not be so forward as to offer any presents unto Elisa, with capitulations of giving all his riches for the purchase of her heart but he told her by this friend (whom he perswaded that generositie more then Love prompted him, since he could not endure to see virtue poor) that he made her an offer of all his estate, without the thought of retribution or gratitude, but her acceptance: Also he put into the hands of this Ladie a vast number of Jewels, to present them unto Elisa; so that any other then Page 73 she, considering the state of her fortune, might easilie have been dazzled by them, for Elisa then did subsist only by the generositie of her with whom she lived. In the mean time, all the eloquence of his Lady Solicitor could not perswade her to accept of this magnificent present, though she did negotiate very cunningly with her; for having insensibly ingaged Elisa to look upon them, she carried her unto a Closet, where this abundance of Jewels did lie upon a Table: Elisa not knowing how they related unto her, began to look upon them she thought most admirably rare, and asked the Lady whose they were? Before I return you an answer, (said this dangerous friend unto her) let me ask you what you would think of a man who would give you all these Pearls, Diamonds, Rubies and Emeralds? I would say and think (replied Elisa) that he were either much in Love, or verie liberal, or else not very wise, for I know not what else I should either say or think: Yet there is something to be said (answered she) unto him that would give such a Present: For indeed Elisa, it must needs be confessed, that Asiadates is the most generous man alive, and the most real friend that ever I knew; and to make it evident, be pleased to know, that he is so charmed with your virtue, as not being able to endure Fortune should treat you with so much injustice, he hath charged me to beseech you, that you will be pleased he may do that which Fortune would not, and enrich you with what she has given him; He thinks his estate is not his so long as you do want it, and is per|swaded that you have more right unto it then himself. Moreover, never think that he has any ill intentions in it, he will not so much as see you, if you please, he expects no re|talliation or gratitude, but his liberalitie is all pure; therefore Elisa make no scruple in accepting the assistance of such a man, who offers it unto you by me, who would never advise you unto any thing which might be prejudicial unto you, and who would never offer you the aid of another, if I were of abilitie enough my self. All the while this La|dy was talking, Elisa's resentments were inexpressible, sometimes anger made her blush, and look with scorn upon her which spoke, otherwhiles her shame made her deject her eyes, and sometimes her wonder would bring such paleness into her face, as if she were afraid: But at last, not being able to keep silence, I could never have believed, said she unto her, that Fortune could have brought me into such a condition, that any one should be so bold as to make such a Proposition unto me: But as there are some who suck poyson out of the most innocent things, so by contraries I will draw glory out of the most infal|mous act in the world: And that you may not think I speak this out of an arrogant pride, I will render you a reason of my thoughts.
